MOROCCO, a country and Muslim state of northern Africa. The name (Spanish Marruecos, French Maroc) is a corruption of Marrākush, the largest town in southern Morocco [see the article MARRĀKUSH].

1. GEOGRAPHY.

Morocco occupies the western part of Barbary; it corresponds to the Maghrib al-Akṣā of the Arab geographers [see the article MAGHRIB]. Lying between 5° and 15° W. longitude (Greenwich) on the one hand and between 36° and 28° N. latitude on the other, it covers approximately an area of between 500,000 and 550,000 square kilometres. On the North it is bounded by the Mediterranean, on the West by the Atlantic and on the South by the Sahara. On the eastern side it stretches to the Tell and to the plateau of Oran. The boundary which separates it from Algeria is quite conventional and fixed definitely only on the northern side, for a length of 80 miles, from the mouth of the Wādī Kīs to Thenyet al-Sāsi.

Although Morocco forms one with the northern part of Africa it is chiefly oriented to the West. It is, one might say, the Atlantic slope of Barbary; it is nevertheless a continental country. The coast does not lend itself to a maritime population; the Mediterranean coast is steep and inhospitable, the Atlantic coastline straight and lacking in natural shelters. The estuaries of the rivers are of very little value because of the sandbars which obstruct their entrances. The geological structure is somewhat complicated. Below the folds of the primary age, of which there still exists much eroded evidence covered by secondary deposits, have risen strata contemporary with the Alps. The actual relief which has resulted from these movements of the earth's surface and from these successive modifications consists of folded mountain chains, plateaux and plains. The chains are two in number, the Rif and the Atlas. The Rif is the continuation from the other side of the Strait of Gibraltar of the Baetic Cordillera [cf. RIF]. The Atlas chain forms the backbone of Morocco. It breaks into the High Atlas oriented West-North-East, linked by the volcanic massif of Sirwā to the Anti-Atlas which lies more to the South, and also to the Middle Atlas running in a diagonal line from the South-West to the North-East, as far as the country of the outer foothills of the Rif, from which it is separated by the corridor of Tāzā [see the article ATLAS]. From these different chains stretch plateaux. Those of the east connect the High Atlas to the Saharan Atlas of Algeria; those of the West gradually descend towards the Atlantic. Amongst the latter some are only the vestiges of the primary layer raised and eroded; others are composed of sedimentary deposits of varying origins.

In consequence of the oblique orientation of the middle Atlas, which gradually draws away from the coast, the plains, which occupy in Morocco a more important place than in the rest of Barbary, lie mainly on the Atlantic side. They are composed of two series, the one stretching diagonally from the mouth of the Wādī Tensift to that of the Muluya (the sub-Atlantic plains, the plain of Sebū, the corridor of Tāzā, the plain of the lower Muluya). The other stretches to the foot of the High Atlas (Hawz of Marrākush) and disappears in the heart of the middle Atlas.

Climate. The climate of Morocco has been defined as "an Atlantic variety of the Mediterranean climate" (Gentil). This however must not be taken to apply to the whole of the country; the different regions differ as much in regard to temperature as in the distribution of rain. On the Atlantic coast the climate is relatively mild in winter and cool in summer; only small differences are recorded between the coldest month and the warmest (5°7 at Mogador and 10° at Rabat). In the interior on the other hand, the seasonal variations and even the daily ones increase the farther one goes inland. They become excessive in character in eastern Morocco where the climate is distinctly continental. The rainfall is equally lacking in uniformity. Brought by the West and S.-W. winds, the rains are abundant in the autumn, the winter and the beginning of spring but they are very rare during the summer. The Atlantic coast has everywhere a copious rainfall although the quantity which falls decreases as one goes from North to South (Tangier: 32 inches, Casablanca: 16 inches). It also enjoys the benefit of an atmosphere which is saturated with moisture even in summer. The interior is not so well served. The rains diminish in quantity from West to East. The mountain massifs always form an exception. They condense the moisture in the form of rain and even snow which, although it is by no means perpetual, nevertheless covers the high summits of the Atlas mountains until the beginning of the summer. Eastern Morocco on the other hand, isolated by the barrier of the Middle Atlas, is not subject to oceanic influences and only receives, except in the immediate neighbourhood of the Mediterranean, rare and irregular downfalls of rain.

The flora reveals in striking fashion these variations of climate. Forests of evergreen oak, of oak and of cedar clothe the peaks of the High and the Middle Atlas and of the Rif. The cork tree is found in extensive forests in the massifs of the Za'ir and Zayān and as far as the region of the Atlantic (forest of the Ma'mūra). The thuya and the arganier (a tree peculiar to the S.-W. of Morocco) are already more disseminated. Poplars, willows, elms and tamarisks form a fringe of verdure along the wādīs. The olive tree is met almost everywhere in its wild state. But, as the rain-fall decreases, the forest gives place to scrub where the jujube tree and the mastic abound, then to prairie and steppes. The prairie, which hardly goes beyond the limits of the maritime plain, is the home of plants which are used for fodder and of bulbous plants. The steppe is the home of shrubs and bushes (artemisia, drin, alfa) which are adapted to a dry soil and to extreme variations in temperature. The steppes cover a part of the interior plains of Western Morocco and practically the whole of Eastern Morocco, where they extend to the neighbourhood of the Mediterranean. As regards the desert, it is devoid of vegetation in the ḥammāda [see ṢAḤARĀ], although the oases form spots of verdure in the midst of the general desolation.

Hydrography. The structure of the country and the relative abundance of rainfall affect the hydrography. Morocco is much richer in running streams and in subterranean waters than any other country in Northern Africa. Wādīs (weds) are here more numerous; their courses are longer and their volume larger. A number of them even deserve the name of rivers. The waters flow in three different directions: towards the Atlantic, towards the Mediterranean and towards the basin of the Sahara. The Atlantic rivers are in all respects the most important. They can be divided into three groups: those of the North (Lūkkos and Sebū), those of the centre (Bū Rārag and Umm al-Rabī'), and those of the South (Tensift and Sūs). The Lūkkos drains the districts of the Gharb; the Sebū, those of the Middle Atlas, of the Zārḥūn, and the southern slope of the Rif. On emerging from the mountains it takes numerous turns and windings across the alluvial plain and reaches the ocean after a course of 300 miles. Although subject to considerable variation in volume, according to the season, it never dries up completely. It is even navigable in its lower course. The Bū Rārag and the Umm al-Rabī' run for a part of their course through the Central Plateau, the Moroccan "Meseta". The irregularity of their courses makes them useless for navigation. The Tensift, to the North of the High Atlas, the Wādī Sūs to the South, which are much less in volume approach more nearly to the classic type of wādī of Northern Africa. The watercourses of the Sahara (Wād Gīr, Wād Ziz, Wād Dar'a) diminish in volume as they go farther away from the mountains and end by disappearing in the sand. The Dar'a alone reaches the Atlantic, but it only flows intermittently in its lower course [see the article DAR'A]. As for the Mediterranean rivers, they are only torrents with violent and rapid floods. The Muluya alone forms an exception. It collects water from the slopes of the Middle Atlas but only reaches the sea in much diminished volume on account of the loss it suffers in crossing the steppes.

Although the common characteristics of all the countries of Barbary are found in Morocco, the greater or less differences in relief, the differences in climate, the peculiarities of vegetation bring in their train a diversity more marked than in Algeria or Tunisia. The combination of these different elements determines the existence of regions which differ the one from the other in their configuration, their resources, the density and manner of existence of their population. We may distinguish six such regions: Northern Morocco, the basin of the Sebū, Central Morocco, the country of the Atlas, Eastern Morocco, and Moroccan Sahara.

Northern Morocco. Northern Morocco comprises a mountainous zone (the mountains of the Rif properly so-called which are to the North-West continued in the "domes" of the Dжебāla as far as the Strait of Gibraltar) and regions less rugged in character which to the South-East and the West form the transition into the adjoining countries. The mountains, split into deep ravines by the courses of the wādīs, for the most part only leave between their last escarpment and the sea-shore a narrow strip, or a few bays enclosed between the rocky promontories. A few cuttings which run across the ranges afford communication between the two watersheds. The Rif, therefore, must seem to be a world very little accessible to influences from without. Arab influence has scarcely grazed it. The population has always vigorously opposed the political measures of the sultāns as well as the attempts of Europeans to settle themselves there. Crowded into a limited territory, since the highest parts of the mountains are useless, the Rifans find their chief means of subsistence in the cultivation of vegetables and fruits. A number of them gain from temporary emigration an addition to their resources. They are not nomadic but inhabit villages perched on the slopes. Towns are represented only by Shāfāwān and Wazzān, religious and commercial centres, situated the one on the northern side and the other on the southern side of the Dжебāla. Towards the South-East, plains interspersed with mountain masses extend as far as the Muluya. The lack of rain gives to these plains (Salwān, Gāret) the aspect of steppes more fitted to a pastoral life than to agriculture and a settled life. Towards the West the lowlying coastland, still a very narrow border at the strait of Gibraltar, increases gradually from the North to the South between the Atlantic coast and the last slopes of the Dжебāla. This district commonly called the Gharb is a corridor. It still keeps in this respect its historical significance, but its economic value is diminished by the stagnation of its waters in the hollows in the flat bottoms of the valleys, and by the insecurity resulting from the proximity of the warlike tribes of the high mountains. A few townships have however succeeded in establishing themselves, either at the crossing of roads such as al-Ḳaṣr al-Kabir [q. v.] or in proximity to the coast like Ceuta, Tangier and Larache [see the articles TITTAWIN, CEUTA, TANGIER, al-ARĀ'ISH].

The valley of the Sebū. The valley of the Sebū lies between the Rif, the Middle Atlas, Moroccan Meseta and the Atlantic. The situation of the region, the abundance and variety of its natural resources makes it of exceptional value. The Sebū links up the whole of it. Through its tributary the Innāwan, the valley of which leads to the pass of Tāzā, it makes communication with the rest of Barbary easy. The mountain masses there (Zerhūn, Zālāgh, mountains of Gerwān) offer no inseparable obstacles to communication. The high plains of Sā'is and Meknes are contrasted with the lower plains of the Shṛārda and the alluvial plains of the lower course of the Sebū. The influence of the Atlantic is felt far into the interior and combines with the numerous streams that flow into the Sebū and its tributaries and the subterranean waters to promote the development of all forms of vegetation. Forests cover the higher slopes of the mountains; fruit-trees flourish on the sunny slopes and cereals on the high plains; the merdja, temporary marshes produced by the Sebū, in its lower course are used for grazing until they are sufficiently dry to be of use to agriculture. This combination of circumstances, so auspicious for human habitation, has made the valley of the Sebū a centre of intensive settlement. The most diverse ethnic elements have settled together and mixed there. All types of habitation are found as well as all degrees of attachment to the soil from a nomadic to settled town life. Human activities are displayed in the most varied forms (grazing, agriculture, arboriculture, commerce, industry). The country villages, douars of "nuwālas" in the plains, villages of houses of clay in the mountains, are numerous, the towns are flourishing. Mawlāi Idris is the sacred city of Morocco, Sefṛū on the borders of the plain of Sā'is and the high limestone plateau lives by trading with the people of the mountains and the industry of its weavers and makers of slippers. Fās and Meknes are among the great cities of Morocco.

The first of these towns has remained to this day the political, religious, intellectual and economic centre of Morocco. It has resisted all the usual causes of decline. From all time the ownership of the high plains of the Sebū has been bitterly contested. Their possession has been the condition for the establishment and survival of the dynasties which have succeeded one another in Morocco. Their political significance and role in history corresponds very exactly to their geographical position and economic value.

Central Morocco. Between the valley of the Sebū, the ranges of the Atlas and the Atlantic, covering about a quarter of habitable Morocco, lies the region called by the geologists the Moroccan Meseta. It includes districts of very different character, the only feature uniting them being the possession of a common substratum, the Hercynian paenoplain covered almost everywhere by sedimentary horizontal formations. Differences of structure and of climate distinguish clearly the various parts: the Atlantic plain, the plateaux of the centre, and the interior plain of the Hawz. The maritime plain lies along the Ocean from Rabat to Mogador. Very narrow at its northern and southern ends, it broadens near the centre (Dukkāla, Shāwiya) to a width of 50 miles. To the rains and the constant moisture from the vicinity of the Atlantic, the abundance of running streams and subterranean waters, the natural fertility of the soil further adds to the conditions for prosperity. The īrs or black lands which run in an unbroken line behind the coast from the Bū Ragrag to Tensift are admirably suited for the growth of cereals. The rural population, almost everywhere settled, is therefore considerable. The land of the Dukkāla has 40 people to the square kilometre, a density very much greater than that of the other districts of Morocco. The towns of the coast, Salé, Rabat, Casablanca, Mazagan, Azemmūr, Safi, Mogador [q. v.], benefit by the richness of the hinterland. The exportation of agricultural produce has at all times been a branch of commerce, and has been much developed since the settlement of Europeans there. While facility for communications and the continental relations with the valley of the Sebū opened the plain to Arab influences, the ports of the coast maintained contact with abroad and permitted the infiltration of European influences.

The interior is much more broken. The ground rises gradually up to a height of 2,000–2,500 feet. The predominant formation is plateaux terminating on the north in the very old massifs of the Za'ir and Zayān, which are really mountains in character, in the south in the equally old but less elevated massif of the Raḥamna. These plateaux deeply cut into by the course of the Umm Rabi' overlook on the west side the lowlying coastlands from the top of cliffs, and slope gently on the S. E. to the plain of Tādā. This is a depression, over 120 miles in length, running to the north into the heart of the Middle Atlas where it terminates in a cul de sac, while it broadens greatly in its southern part. A low pass enables communication to be made between the Tādā and the Hawz of Marrākush, a basin shut in by the High Atlas in the south, the Middle Atlas in the east, the Djbilāt in the north and the hills of the Shiyādma in the west. The economic value of this inner region is very unequal. On the mountains of the north the rains and streams support forests and the natives devote themselves to cattle-rearing. The plateaux of the centre covered with a surface of limestone have great stretches of bare rock and cultivation is barely possible. The Tādā is no better favoured except in the zone adjoining the Atlas, watered by torrents descending from the mountains. The plain of the Hawz would also suffer disastrously from drought, if human industry had not averted this danger. An ingenious system of irrigation has transformed the country round Marrākush into a vast palmgrove and resulted in a particularly dense population (100 to the square kilometre). Comparatively large towns (Amismiz, Demnāt, Tāmaṣ-luḥet) and especially Marrākush [q. v.] have been enabled to rise and prosper. Between this region, already half Saharan, and the high lying plains of the Sebū, the plateaux of the centre and the mountains of the north which come down to within a short distance of the shore, interpose a barrier which the attitude of its inhabitants makes still more difficult to cross. The Zayān, the Za'ir, the Zemmūr, over whom the authority of the Maḥzen has never been very securely exercised, have more than once cut direct communication between Fās and Marrākush. These two cities have been at different periods the capitals of distinct and even hostile kingdoms.

The region of the Atlas. In spite of the marked differences between the different elements of the Atlas, the whole region nevertheless has general characteristics of its own. Between Atlantic Morocco on the one hand and Saharan Morocco on the other, the Atlas lies as an almost continuous barrier. Only the few transverse fractures in the Middle Atlas permit passage between the basin of the Sebū and the Saharan oases, while in the High Atlas valleys running right into the heart of the massif give access to passes opening on the valleys of Sūs and the Wādī Dar'a. Moist and colder, the Middle Atlas is covered with forests which are denser and more extensive than those of the High Atlas. Both however are great watersheds. From the Middle Atlas come the great rivers of the Atlantic slope (Sebū, Gīgū, Umm Rabi', Wādī 'l-'Abīd), from the High Atlas the Tasa'ut and the Tensift. The lands of the Atlas are nevertheless poor. The high mountains offer little to support mankind. Human activities are found mainly in the zones of contact between the mountains and the plains (dir) of the Middle Atlas and in some specially favoured valleys of the High Atlas. Except in the Middle Atlas, where the nomadic mode of life results in the exodus in the bad season of the inhabitants who lead a pastoral life, and on the plateaux of the High Atlas on the Atlantic side (Hāḥa, Shiyādma) the inhabitants of which are mainly engaged in cattle-rearing, the natives are settled. They live in villages perched on the slopes and terraces between wādīs or scattered along the valleys. There is nothing approaching a town in size. These regions, defended by the nature of the country, have almost completely escaped outside influence: they are still almost exclusively the domain of Berber tribes (Berāber in the Middle Atlas and Shluḥ in the High Atlas). The customs and institutions peculiar to this people [cf. BERBERS] have survived to a greater extent here than in any other region of North Africa. In particular their political organisation is still most rudimentary: municipal republics administered by a djamā'a in the Middle Atlas, feudal lordships ruled in patriarchal and despotic fashion by a few powerful families in the High Atlas. The people of these regions have also always opposed vigorously the central power; the authority of the Makhzen over the Berbers of the High Atlas has never been exerted except through the local chiefs. As to the tribes of the Middle Atlas they have retained to the present day almost complete independence. Even the most vigorous sultāns have never succeeded in forcing them into obedience for any length of time.

Eastern Morocco. Eastern Morocco may be described as the continuation of the Central Maghrib of which it has the distinctive characteristics. In it, as in Orania, we have a tell zone and a zone rising by successive stages up to 6,000 feet. The upper valley of the Muluya separates them from the Middle Atlas. The monotony of these vast spaces is only broken by the outcrops of gūr, flat beds of rocks cut up by erosion and by the depressions of the shott [q. v.]. Beaten by the winds, exposed to the rigours of an extreme climate, these lands are only fit for the pastoral life led by the nomads who raise sheep. The valley of the Muluya is no better favoured, except in the vicinity of the Atlas, where villages surrounded by vineyards with a settled population are found along the tributaries of the river. As to the Tell, hills of no very great height (the most important being that of the Benī Snāssen which does not exceed 5,000 feet) divide it up into compartments occupied by plains (plains of the Awlād Maṣṣūr, on the coast, of the Trifa, of the Angād which in the south reaches the cliffs in which the high plateaux end). The dryness of the climate frequently gives these plains a steppe-like character; only the western part of the plain of the Angād with a fertile and well watered soil lends itself to cultivation. The nomads come here to procure grain. But this region owes its importance less to its natural resources than to its situation on the natural route between Atlantic Morocco and the rest of Barbary. Ujdja [q. v.] which commands the passage, has thus been enabled to escape various causes of decay that have threatened it. A border district, eastern Morocco has always been a disputed region, a march for which the lords of Tlemcen and Fās have contended. The authority of the latter was never solidly enough established here to impose itself on the settled inhabitants of the mountains and on the nomads of the plateaux and plains. Down to the French occupation the country was left to anarchy and disorder.

The Moroccan Sahara. The Moroccan Sahara is the N. W. corner of the Sahara. There we find the general characteristics of this desert region [cf. ṢAḤARA]. Only the parts adjoining the Atlantic and the threshold of the mountains offer favourable conditions for man. In the plain of Sūs [q. v.] shut in between the Atlas and the Anti-Atlas, the rivers and the irrigation canals enable shrubs to grow. The Dar'a, Ziz and Gir are in their upper courses fringed by a thin border of cultivated land, pasturage, vineyards, and in their middle course assure the growth of palmgroves of which the best known, if not the most prosperous, is that of Tāfilālt [q. v.]. The richness — only relative it is true — of these oases is in contrast with the desolation of the rocky plateaux (hammāda) which form the greater part of the Moroccan Sahara. These natural conditions determine the mode of life of the inhabitants. Some lead a nomadic life and drive their flocks up and down the plateaux; others are permanently settled on the Sūs, in the high valleys and in the oases. Sūs contains numerous villages and even towns (Āgādīr, Tiznīt, Tārūdānt); the oases have a settled population in the kṣūr. Those of Tāfilālt, Tamgrūt, Bū Dnib and Figīg carry on a certain amount of commerce between Atlantic Morocco and the Sahara. But this very circumstance has prevented them escaping as completely as the lands of the Atlas from the political and intellectual influence of Western Morocco, especially Tāfilālt where considerable groups of Arab shorfā have been long established in the midst of Berber populations. But, although the present dynasty actually came from Tāfilālt, the people of this region have frequently escaped Sharīfan authority.

Begun in the last years of the 19th century, methodically pursued since the French occupation, the scientific exploration of Morocco is not yet completed. From the results so far attained one thing is clear: the lack of uniformity in the country. Thus its geography may explain to some extent the historical development of the country.

II. HISTORY.

Morocco before Islām. Morocco, like the other parts of North Africa, has probably been inhabited from a very remote period. We know, however, nothing definite about its earliest inhabitants. The traces which they have left, weapons and tools of chipped flint, pottery, rock-paintings, some of which represent animals of the quaternary period, now extinct, megalithic monuments identical with those found all round the Mediterranean basin, give us no information in this respect. At most, we may suppose that the primitive population consisted of emigrants from southern Europe, the Sahara and perhaps from Egypt. The fusion of these diverse elements gave birth to a race, the members of which, frequently different in type and physical features, were united by a community of language. The ancient writers called them Libyans and Moors. They were the ancestors of the present Berbers [q. v.].

The first historical fact known, and that only imperfectly, is the appearance in the xith century B. C. of the Phoenicians on the Moroccan coast. The sailors of Tyre and Sidon built factories there, where they exchanged goods of eastern origin for local products (cattle, wool, hides) and slaves. But Phoenician influence was exercised mainly through the intermediary of Carthage when it in turn had become the metropolis of a great maritime empire. The Carthaginians rebuilt the ruined factories and added new ones. In the middle of the fifth century, Hanno in the course of his celebrated "periplus" established on the Atlantic coast seven colonies of which one was at the mouth of the Sebū. Rusaddir (Melilla), Septem (Ceuta), Tingis (Tangier), Lixus (Larache), Sala (Salé) were the principal Carthaginian establishments. It does not seem, however, that Carthage sought to extend her power into the interior. She was content no doubt to conclude treaties with the native chiefs and to recruit mercenaries from the country. Morocco remained independent, but the tribes who inhabited it were not organised into states, except perhaps in the east, where ancient writers mention in the period of the Punic Wars the existence of a kingdom of Mauretania or Marusia, extending along both banks of the Muluya.

The destruction of the Carthaginian empire hardly altered this state of affairs. For two centuries Rome administered only the "Province of Africa" directly and left the other regions of Barbary in the hands of native chiefs under a more or less severe protectorate. Northern Morocco shared the fate of Mauretania down to the annexation of this kingdom in 42 A. D. The region to the east of the Muluya formed part of Caesarean Mauretania. The lands stretching from the Muluya to the ocean formed Mauretania Tingitana, an imperial province governed by a procurator. When the empire was reorganised by Diocletian, it was attached to Spain.

Roman Morocco never covered more than a small portion of the modern Morocco. On the Atlantic coast, it barely extended beyond the mouth of the Bū Ragrag, and in the interior to the massifs of the Zarhūn. The plateaux and sub-Atlantic plains and the mountains of the Rif, Middle and High Atlas escaped the authority of Rome. It was the same with the Sahara. The expedition of Suetonius Paulinus, who in 41 A. D. advanced as far as the wādī Gir, remained an isolated incident.

To defend herself against the rebellions of her own subjects and to protect the country from Berber inroads, Rome had to keep in Tingitana an army of ten thousand men, to build strategic roads and to establish fortified posts on the sides of the triangle: Sala, Zarhūn, Tingis. With the exception of Volubilis, the importance of which has been revealed by its ruins, methodically excavated in recent years, and which was undoubtedly a centre of influence of Roman culture on the people of the interior as well as a military base, the towns were all on the coast. They were Lixus and Tingis raised to the rank of "coloniae", and Ceuta. They owed their prosperity mainly to trade with Spain to which were exported oil and wheat, the two main products of the country. On the whole, however, Rome's influence on Morocco was superficial and has left little trace.

Without any really firm hold on the country, weakened by native risings and by the quarrels between the donatists and the orthodox, Roman rule was to collapse suddenly at the beginning of the fifth century. Germanic invaders, the Vandals, came from Spain and in 429 A. D. conquered without opposition Tingitana which they gave back a few years later to the Romans. Soon afterwards the western empire disappeared and the natives seized the opportunity to become independent. The Byzantines, who in the sixth century destroyed the Vandal kingdom, were content to re-occupy the two strongholds of Ceuta and Tangier. The rest of Morocco was in the hands of the Berbers. The latter were divided into a large number of tribes, of whom the principal were the Ghomāra on the Mediterranean coast, the Barghawāta [q. v.] on the Atlantic coast between the strait of Gibraltar and the mouth of the Sebū, the Miknāsa, in the central district, the Maṣmūda, on the western slope of the High Atlas and on the coast from the Sebū to the Sūs; the Haskūra between the Sūs and the Dar'ā; the Lamta and Lamtūna on the left bank of the Dar'ā. These Berbers were all of Ṣanhādja stock; some professed Christianity or Judaism but the majority still followed the old nature worship. The Arab conquest brought them a new religion: Islām.

The Introduction of Islām. The Arabs appeared in the extreme Maghrib at the end of the viith century A. D. Tradition relates that Sidi 'Oḳba, the founder of Ḳairawān, in 684–685 undertook an expedition which carried him as far as the shores of the Atlantic Ocean. This raid, however, if it ever took place, was too transitory to have any permanent results. But at the beginning of the following century, Mūsā b. Nuṣair [q. v.] who had just completed the conquest of Ifrīkiya, took Tangier, installed a governor there and set himself to conquer and convert the natives. He succeeded without much trouble. Attracted by the hopes of gain, the Berbers adopted Islām and enrolled themselves in the armies which were invading Spain. They were not long, however, in rising against the Arabs. Dissatisfied with the share allotted them of lands taken from the Christians in the Peninsula, and exasperated by the exactions of the governors of Tangier, they took up arms in 740 on the call of the porter Maisāra [q. v.]. The rebellion was both religious and political in character. With the same readiness with which they had adopted Islām, the Berbers adopted Khāridjī doctrines from the east, teachings which also appealed to their equalitarian tendencies and to their spirit of independence. The army sent from Syria to establish order was destroyed on the banks of the Sebū (742) and the extreme Maghrib was lost at one stroke to the caliph and to orthodoxy. Berber principalities were organised in the Rif [see SIDJILMĀSA]; in the west, the Barghawāta [q. v.] recognised the authority of a certain Šālih, founder of a rival religion to Islām, who had composed a Qurʾān, that is a sacred book, in Berber. None of these little states was strong enough to impose its authority on the others and to collect all the Berber tribes under one rule.

It looked for a time as if the Idrisid dynasty [q. v.] were to play this part. Idris I and his successor Idris II, actually enforced their authority over the greater part of the tribes of northern Morocco and successful expeditions extended their kingdom from the shores of the Mediterranean to the High Atlas and from the Atlantic to beyond Tlemsen. Ardent champions of Islām, they imposed their religion on those peoples who did not yet practise it or who had abandoned it after once adopting it. The conversion of the extreme Maghrib to Islām is their work much more than that of the Arab conquerors. Zealous defenders of orthodoxy, in spite of their 'Alid origin, they fought the Khāridjīs with the same vigour but did not, however, succeed in completely extirpating the heresy. It is not without good reason that legend has transformed these rude warriors into saints, the one Idris I, patron saint of Morocco, the other Idris II, the patron saint of the city of Fās [q. v.] which he had founded. The building of this city had enduring results. It gave northern Morocco a religious, political and economic centre which it had lacked since the disappearance of Roman rule. Favoured by its position, Fās prospered rapidly. It survived all causes of decline, even the collapse of the Idrisid power.

The Idrisids indeed rapidly declined. The various groups which had recognised the authority of the founders of the dynasty were not long in casting it off and fighting with one another. These rivalries were taken advantage of by the Fātimids of Ifrīkiya and the Umayyads of Spain, who during the tenth century A. D. disputed the possession of the extreme Maghrib. With the assistance of the Miknāsa, the Umayyads in the end remained masters of the country. They were in their turn ousted by the Maghrāwa [q. v.], whose chief Ziri b. 'Aṭiya, abandoning the cause of the Umayyads, seized Fās where his descendants ruled for three quarters of a century.

The Almoravids and the Almohads. The extreme Maghrib seemed to be condemned to anarchy and to be broken up among small factions when the Almoravid invasion came [cf. ALMORAVIDS]. After having first of all subjected all the lands south of the High Atlas, then established themselves solidly on the northern slopes, at the foot of which Yūsuf b. Taṣḥfin founded Marrākush [q. v.] in 1062, these Saharan hordes turned to the centre, east and north of Morocco, sweeping everything before them: Fās, Tangier, the Rif, Oran and Ténès fell before them. The Berber principalities of the Maghrāwa, the Barghawāta and Banū Ifren disappeared. In less than twenty years, Yūsuf b. Taṣḥfin became sole master of the extreme Maghrib as far as Algiers. To these territories, already vast, was soon to be added half of Spain. Summoned by the Muslim emirs who were threatened by the king of Castille, Yūsuf b. Taṣḥfin checked the Christian advance at Zallāka (1086), then dispossessed the petty Muslim rulers to his own advantage. Morocco was thus extended across the Straits of Gibraltar as far as the Ebro and to the Balearic Islands. The fortunes of the Almoravids were, it is true, as ephemeral as they were brilliant. In contact with Andalusian civilization, the Saharans rapidly became decadent. The rigid orthodoxy, which had been their strength, relaxed; they in their turn were regarded as infidels, "anthropomorphists" (muḍjassimūn), whom it was lawful and even meritorious to fight. It was in the name of orthodoxy that the Maṣmūda and the Hintāta of the High Atlas under the leadership of Ibn Tūmart and 'Abd al-Mu'min entered into the struggle against the Almoravids.

This struggle ended in the displacement of the Almoravids by the Almohads [see ALMOHADS and 'ABD AL-MU'MIN]. In seven years (1139—1146 A.D.) 'Abd al-Mu'min conquered all Morocco; Sidjilmāsa, Oran, Tlemsen, and Ceuta fell one after the other into his hands. Next came the turn of Salé, Fās, and finally of Marrākush, the gates of which were opened to him by the treachery of the Christian mercenaries. Muslim Spain was also conquered with the exception of the Balearic Islands. Even in Africa, the Ḥammādid kingdom of Bougie was conquered in 545—546 (1151—1152). A few years later (554—555 = 1159—1160) a new expedition led 'Abd al-Mu'min into Ifrīkiya and secured him possession of the interior and of the coast, which he took from the Normans of Sicily who had occupied it some time before. Morocco in the strict sense of the word was now merely a province in the vast Berber empire. The unification of these territories under one ruler had important consequences for the Maghrib. It facilitated the diffusion in North Africa of the Hispano-Moorish civilization, which was to be perpetuated in Morocco after it had disappeared from the Peninsula itself. Further it brought into the extreme Maghrib a new ethnic element: the Arab. 'Abd al-Mu'min, as well as his successors, on several occasions deported Hilālī tribes from the Central Maghrib and Ifrīkiya, where they continually created unrest, to the sub-Atlantic plains where other groups of Arabs joined them of their own free will.

The Almohad empire was too vast, it comprised regions of too different a nature, peoples too foreign to one another to last long united. The Almohad caliphs were powerless to restrain the separatist tendencies which revealed themselves on all sides. In the first half of the xiiith century A. D., the Almohad empire broke up. Ifrīkiya and the Central Maghrib recovered their independence; local dynasties set up in Tunis (Hafṣids) and Tlemsen ('Abd al-Wāḍids). The extreme Maghrib ended by slipping away from the descendants of 'Abd al-Mu'min who were replaced by the Merinids [q. v.].

The Merinids. Berbers of Zanāta stock, driven by the Hilālī Arabs on to the plateaux of Oran and into the central valley of the Muluya, the Banū Merin had at first entered the service of the Almohads, then turned against them, when the power of the dynasty began to decline. By repeated razzias they made themselves masters of almost all northern Morocco. After the death of the caliph al-Saʿīd, who had been able to arrest their progress for a time, their leader Abū Yahyā (1243—1258) seized Fās, Meknes, Rabat and Sijilmāsa. The capture of Marrākush (1269) by Abū Yūsuf, successor of Yahyā, marked the final triumph of the Merinids. Heirs of the Almohads, the first Merinids endeavoured to reconstitute the empire of their predecessors. In Spain, they enforced their authority on the Muslims of Andalusia. In Africa, they endeavoured to take the central Maghrib from the ʿAbd al-Wādids. They were successful when Tlemsen, besieged seven times in sixty years, finally fell into the hands of Sultān Abū ʿl-Ḥasan (1337 A. D.). Ten years later, the same ruler took Bougie, Constantine and Tunis, but his hold on these was very insecure. At the end of barely a year, Abū ʿl-Ḥasan, defeated by the Arabs, found himself forced to abandon Ifrikiya, the Ḥafṣids returned to Tunis and the ʿAbd al-Wādids to Tlemsen, while the sultān's own son Abū ʿInān rose against him in Morocco. Attaining to power, Abū ʿInān renewed his father's efforts. He re-occupied Tlemsen and Tunis, it is true, but could not retain them (1360 A. D.). The Ḥafṣids and ʿAbd al-Wādids recovered their kingdoms almost at once.

Separatist tendencies thus triumphed and on this occasion in a most definite fashion. The extreme Maghrib, the history of which had hitherto been so often that of Barbary, began to live its own life. The Merinid kingdom, while its boundaries in the east were still vague and changing, already corresponded roughly to modern Morocco and the Merinids may be regarded as the first strictly Moroccan rulers. Lacking the religious prestige of their predecessors, they endeavoured to secure the moral authority which they lacked by taking as their patron saints the apostles of Islām in the Maghrib. The cult of Mawlāi Idris in the xivth and particularly the xvth century assumed an importance which it has retained to the present day. No less characteristic is the development of intellectual life and the arts. The Hispano-Moorish civilisation never flourished more brilliantly in Morocco than in the Merinid period. The rulers attracted to their court the poets, men of letters and lawyers of the Iberian Peninsula and of the Maghrib. The university of al-Karawiyyin attracted students from all the lands of the western Muslim world. Fās, which the Merinids, abandoning Marrākush and Rabat, the capitals of their predecessors, chose as their royal residence, was given splendid buildings by them, palaces, mosques and madrasas. It was at the same time a commercial city in which African and Spanish merchants mixed with Christian traders.

This brilliant exterior, however, was quite deceptive. Merinid Morocco was never able to organise itself on a solid basis. The central power was very weak and did not succeed in imposing its authority everywhere. The accession of each sultān was an occasion for outbreaks. The pretenders who arose always found supporters readily, either among the Arabs or the Berbers. Powerless in the interior, the sultāns were no more fortunate in their enterprises against their neighbours of the Central Maghrib or against the kings of Granada. Their prestige and their authority could not survive these checks. The Merinids in the strict sense disappeared from the scene in 1465, after the assassination of the sultān by an Idrisid sharif. The Banū Wattās, descended from a collateral branch, the chief of whom seized the power in 1470, had themselves a wretched existence. Their kingdom broke up into a large number of independent little groups, principalities at Fās and Marrākush, Berber republics in the Atlas, Marabout fiefs in the Rif, the Gharb and in Darʿa and Sūs. The sultāns were quite powerless to prevent this decomposition.

The Christian offensive and the revival of Islām. Of all the causes which combined to enfeeble and discredit these rulers, the principal was undoubtedly their impotence against the offensive of the Christians against the Maghrib. In 1415 the Portuguese took Ceuta, in 1465 al-Kaṣr al-Ṣaghīr, in 1471 Tangiers. They thus secured themselves a base of operations in the north while by the occupation of Aṣīlā and Anfā (Casablanca; q. v.) they secured a footing on the Atlantic coast. In the early years of the xvth century, they built fortified posts at Santa Cruz (Agādīr) and Mazagan [q. v.] and took by force of arms Safi and Azemmūr [q. v.]. Holding all places of importance except Larache [see AL-ʿARĀʾISH] they brought under their protectorate all the lands near the coast (Shawiya, Hāḥa, Dukkāla), forced the natives to pay them tribute and to hand over to them strategic points up to the environs of Marrākush. Their expeditions had no other aim than plunder, no other result than to exasperate the inhabitants who saw their towns destroyed, their douars burned, their women and children massacred or sold as slaves.

Menaced in the west by the Portuguese, Morocco was threatened in the east by the Spaniards also. The latter completed the reconquista by the taking of Granada (1492). Thus free to go further afield, and still fired with the religious enthusiasm of Ximenes, they too went over to fight the Muslims on African soil. The occupation of al-Marsā al-Kabīr (1507) and of Oran (1509) and the establishment of a Spanish protectorate over the kingdom of Tlemsen constituted a serious danger to the Muslims of Morocco.

The threat from the Christians produced an awakening of religious sentiment. This renaissance of Islām in the xvth and xvth centuries, the results of which are still to be felt at the present day, is beyond question the great event in the history of Morocco since the Idrisid period. The way for it had, moreover, been prepared by the Ṣūfī teachings imported from the east and by the development of the brotherhoods in which the adepts of these doctrines were organized. It also found a favourable soil owing to the persistence of maraboutism among the Berbers. The bahṭūl or the charlatan, who had always been an object of public consideration, became readily identified with the shaikh, the possessor of the baraka. Co-operating with one another, these pious individuals became the religious leaders of the people of Morocco. They strengthened orthodoxy, excited the zeal of the faithful, preached the holy war, and led the defenders of the faith into battle. The ascendancy which they exercised, the wealth they accumulated in their zāwiyas, made them independent of the sultān. They thus became temporal leaders also, all the more readily as the sovereigns could not fulfil their office of defenders of Islām owing to lack of energy and also of means. The activity of these religious leaders was always of a local nature; it was only effectively exercised within a limited area and did not extend over the country generally. The religious solidarity thus established, the kind of common conscience thus created, did not put a check to the political decline until the time when the Sa'dian shorfa took direction of the movement and exploited it for their own benefit.

The Sharifian dynasties. A. The Sa'dians [q. v.]. The Sa'dian shorfa benefited by the prestige which the religious awakening had restored to the descendants, real or presumed, of Fātima, the daughter of the Prophet. Coming from Arabia at the end of the xivth century and settling in the valley of the wādī Dar'a, while another branch of the family settled at Tāfilālt (Ḥasani or 'Alid shorfa), they were not long in acquiring a considerable influence over the tribes of the south. Thus they were naturally led to support the people of the south, who were exposed to the attacks of the Portuguese of Santa Cruz. In 1511, the sharif of Tāgmādāret, requested by the Muslims to put himself at their head against the Christians, agreed to do so. Supported by the marabouts who gave him valuable assistance, he began hostilities against the Portuguese. The holy war regularly waged secured to his sons, Aḥmad al-A'radj and Muḥammad al-Mahdī, the possession of the whole of southern Morocco up to the Umm al-Rabī'. The intervention of the Merinid sultān in the quarrels which broke out between the two brothers only resulted in his own downfall being hastened. Muḥammad al-Mahdī took Fās in 1550; the foiling of an attempt to restore the Merinids in 1554, with the help of the Turks of Algiers, secured the definite triumph of the Sa'dians.

The coming of the Sa'dians meant a regular reconstitution of Morocco. Muḥammad al-Mahdī and his successors imposed their authority on the whole country, protected it against foreign foes and increased the extent of their territory by distant conquests. They finally triumphed over the difficulties created by the Turks of Algiers, and at the battle of al-Ḳaṣr al-Kabīr in 1578 arrested a counter-offensive of the Portuguese. Aḥmad al-Manṣūr (1578—1610) occupied Timbuktu [q. v.] and destroyed the Askia empire of Gao. For half a century the Moroccans were masters of the Western Sūdān, from the banks of the Senegal as far as Bornū. The plunder taken on this campaign of conquest enabled the sultān to keep a splendid court, the hierarchy of which was modelled on the Ottoman court, and to adorn his capital Marrākush with magnificent monuments.

To the same period also belongs the organisation of the makhzen [q. v.]. The early Sa'dians had relied for support on the Arab tribes of the south. To these al-Manṣūr added the Arab tribes of the region of Tlemsen and Ujda driven into Morocco by the Turkish conquest. These shirāga, as they were called, received lands around Fās in return for the military service they were forced to give. Reinforced by a regular army formed of renegades, Spanish Moors and negroes, trained by Turkish deserters, the makhzen provided the sultān with the means of preserving order and levying taxes; it was thus the essential instrument of sharifian government and tended to become the government itself.

This instrument proved sufficient in the hands of an energetic ruler but was inefficacious in weaker hands and in moments of crisis. The Sa'dians very soon found this out. The tendencies to disruption which had been held in check by the energy of al-Manṣūr broke out again on his death. The dispute for the throne set his sons against one another. One of them, Zaidān, ended by triumphing over his rivals but could not prevent the break-up of the empire. Larache was occupied by the Spaniards; Fās cast off sharifian authority. The Andalus of Rabat and Salé [q. v.], enriched by their piracy, formed an independent republic. Finally the Sa'dians, although they had owed their elevation to the religious movement, now found the marabouts rising against them. Delivered from the restraints which the distrust of al-Mahdī and his successors had placed upon them, the latter began to gain more and more hold over the people and contributed to the ruin of the sharifian authority. Sūs was in the control of one of them, Sidi 'Alī; Tāfilālt was under the Ḥasani shorfa, the Gharb under al-'Aiyāshi, leader of the "volunteers of the faith". In the centre, the power of the marabout of Dila' (a zāwiya on the upper course of the Wādī l-'Abid) increased. Muḥammad al-Ḥādjī, their leader, victorious over the Sa'dians and over al-'Aiyāshi, lord of Salé and Fās, seemed on the point of founding a new Berber empire from the Atlantic to the Muluya. Incapable, in spite of the support given them by the English and Dutch, of disposing of their adversaries, the Sa'dians now held only Marrākush and its immediate environs. The last representative of the dynasty died in 1660, assassinated by the shaikh of the tribe of Shabbānāt.

B. The Ḥasani Shorfa. The disintegration of Morocco was arrested by the coming of the Ḥasani Shorfa. The latter had taken advantage of the disorder to assert their authority in Tāfilālt, then by expeditions, which partook of the nature of brigandage as much as of warfare, they had conquered eastern Morocco. One of them, Mawlāi Muḥammad, had even tried, without success, it is true, to take Fās from the Dila'is. His successor Mawlāi al-Rashīd (1660—1672) was more successful. He took Fās, disposed of Ghailān, an adventurer who had established himself securely in the Gharb, destroyed the zāwiya of Dila', reconquered Marrākush, thus rebuilding as it were piece by piece the sharifian empire. Installed by force of arms, the new dynasty recognised the necessity of securing the moral prestige which their origin could not give them. They therefore sought to attract to their side the sharifian families. They heaped favours on the shorfa of Wazzān, whose patronage was a guarantee even for the rulers.

The work begun by Mawlāi al-Rashīd was continued and brought to a successful conclusion by his successor Ismā'il (1672—1729). During the first fifteen years of his reign, he did not cease to wage war on the rivals who disputed the districts of Marrākush and Sūs with him. While fighting his enemies, he was engaged in building up an army which would work his will. To the makhzen formed by the Shirāga and Udaya he added a body of black slaves, the 'Abid al-Bukhārī (Būāḳher), the property of the sultān; their children were specially trained for military service. The number of effectives in this corps by the end of the reign numbered one hundred and fifty thousand men. The sultān was thus able to reduce to obedience the Berbers of the Atlas and the upper Muluya. Defeated and disarmed, the latter were kept in control by garrisons placed in kašbas built at the exits to the valleys or commanding the lines of communication. The notables whom the sultān had taken into his service or united to himself by matrimonial alliances forced their tribesmen to live in peace. The bilād al-makhzen, i.e. the country where tribute was regularly paid, extended over almost the whole of the extreme Maghrib. The pacification of the interior did not cause Mawlāi Ismā'il to forget the obligations imposed on every Muslim ruler to fight the infidels. He therefore continued the holy war against the Christians of the coast. He recaptured al-Mahdiya, Larache, Aṣilā, and Tangier, evacuated by the English in 1684, but could not take Ceuta from the Spaniards in spite of a siege or rather uninterrupted blockade for seventeen years. He was no more successful in his enterprise against the Turks of Algiers, who disputed with the Moroccans the possession of the plains of eastern Morocco and the ḡsūr of southern Oran. The expeditions which he directed against the Algerians ended in failure, and the lower course of the Muluya continued to be the boundary of the sharifian empire. In spite of his lack of success here, Mawlāi Ismā'il is nevertheless the great figure of the Ḥasanī dynasty, the model the Moroccan sultāns have set themselves to the present day. Morocco, however, remained what it was before, i.e. an aggregation of different groups, the cohesion of which depended on the personal energy of the sovereign. The processes of administration were in no way altered; the sharif enforced obedience by drastic executions; he squeezed his subjects to the utmost to get the money necessary for the building of his capital Meknes [q.v.], the palaces of which were built by the forced labour of the natives and of Christian slaves.

On the death of Mawlāi Ismā'il, a reaction set in. For thirty years his sons fought with one another. The real masters of the situation were the 'Abid who made and unmade sultāns as they pleased. One of them, Mawlāi 'Abd Allāh, was proclaimed and deposed six times. He succeeded, however, in triumphing over his competitors by playing the Berbers off against the 'Abid, the importance of whom gradually diminished with the wars. The remedy, however, was not much better than the disease. This period was for Morocco one of misery and ruin. The authority of the sharifs emerged much weakened from it.

Mawlāi Muḥammad (1757—1792) succeeded, however, in restoring it. Inheriting the energy and vigour of his grandfather Ismā'il, he brought the rebel Berbers back to their allegiance, and by the taking of Mazagan in 1769 destroyed the last trace of Portuguese power on the Atlantic coast. Convinced, on the other hand, that the weakness of the central power was mainly due to a lack of financial resources, he endeavoured to procure money by encouraging the development of foreign trade. He inaugurated a mercantile policy, concluded treaties of commerce with Denmark, Sweden, England, and France and endeavoured to attract foreign merchants to his kingdom by founding for them the town of Mogador [q.v.] in 1764. Heavy taxes, however, severely impeded the progress of this policy. Morocco remained a poor country and did not open itself, as had been hoped, to European penetration. It also remained in a perpetual turmoil. Under Mawlāi Yazīd (1792—1794) the country was once more handed over to anarchy. Mawlāi Slimān (Sulaimān) (1794—1822), after at first being able to restore order, had to spend the last ten years of his reign in putting down the continual risings of the Berbers of the middle Atlas; in the course of one of these expeditions he actually fell into the hands of the rebels. This rebelliousness caused the sultān much misgiving; he also wanted to prevent the infiltration of foreign and anti-Muslim influences which he believed would aggravate it. He forbade his subjects to leave the country and restricted to a minimum their intercourse with Christians. The diplomatic and consular agents were relegated to Tangier, and access to the interior was made almost impossible for Europeans. His successors followed his example. Down to the end of the sixteenth century, Morocco was more rigorously closed than it had been in the time of the Merinids and Sa'dians and even in the early days of the Ḥasanī sharifs. In spite of this systematic isolation, the sultāns had nevertheless to face the same difficulties as Mawlāi Slimān and had no more success than he in overcoming them.

For half a century the domestic history of Morocco was a series of rebellions which the sovereigns had great difficulty in suppressing. The regions remote from the centre, Rif, Tafilalet, Figig, eastern Morocco, escaped the authority of the makhzen. In the very heart of the country, the Berbers cut communications between Fās and Marrākush, forcing the sultāns when they wanted to move from one capital to the other to make a great detour by Rabat. The empire broke up more and more. Mawlāi al-Ḥasan (1873—1894) postponed for a few years the inevitable collapse. His reign resembled that of Mawlāi Ismā'il. At the head of his army, the artillery of which had been reorganised by a French military mission, he was continually in the field raiding the rebels and tearing down kašbas. He re-established order in the region of Uḍja, forced the people of Sūs to recognise his ka'ids, reduced to obedience the Za'ir and Zayān, endeavoured to extend the makhzen country by expeditions against the independent Berbers, endeavoured to develop his influence in the Saharan regions and to restore his authority in Tuāt. But he died before completing his task and all had to be begun again.

Morocco and the Christian powers. The situation was the more critical that the fate of Morocco could no longer be a matter of indifference to the European powers. It increased the cupidity of some and aroused the cupidity of others. In spite of their desire for isolation, the sultāns had not been able to break every link with Europe. They had also to take account of the proximity of Spain, established for three centuries in the "presidios" of the Mediterranean coast, and of the French who had replaced the Turks in Algeria [q.v.]. The conquest of the old Regency, destroying all the sharifs' hopes of extension eastwards, had caused great irritation in Morocco. 'Abd al-Qādir [q.v.] found followers among the peoples of this country and support hardly disguised on the part of the makhzen. This hostile attitude resulted in the Franco-Moroccan war of 1844. The sharīfian army was crushed at the battle of Isly, the ports of Tangier and Mogador bombarded. The moderation of France alone enabled the makhzen to come fairly well out of this unfortunate escapade. Henceforth the relations between France and Morocco remained peaceful, although the impotence of the sharīfian government to guarantee security on its borders forced France to military demonstrations like the B. Snāsen campaign (1859) and the wādī Gīr expedition (1870). Spain in turn being unable to obtain satisfaction from the attacks directed against her garrisons decided also to resort to arms. The campaign of 1859—1860, ended by the victory of O'Donnell, revealed the military weakness of Morocco. The treaty of Tetwān (1860) granted to Spain, along with some trifling territorial aggrandisement, an indemnity of 100,000,000 reals. To pay this debt, the sharīfian government had to raise a loan in London on the security of the Moroccan customs and to accept the control of European commissioners. For the first time foreigners intervened in the domestic administration of the empire. The breach thus made was continually enlarged. The exercise of the right of protection, the erection of a lighthouse on Cape Spatel, served as a pretext for diplomatic negotiations and for the extension of international control. European ambitions were not dissimulated. In order to protect itself against them, the makhzen tried to play one off against the other and confined itself to granting, as it did at the conference of Madrid (1880), concessions devoid of all practical significance. Mawlāi al-Ḥasan excelled in this difficult game and the vizier Bā Aḥmad, who directed affairs during the early years of the reign of 'Abd al-'Azīz, Mawlāi al-Ḥasan's successor, displayed no less skill. Morocco was thus the object of a very keen struggle for influence. England wanted to maintain her economic preponderance along with the control of the Strait; France wanted to ensure the security of her Algerian possessions and of the roads leading to the Saharan oases occupied in 1901—1902; Spain appealed to her "historic rights"; Germany lastly was preparing to seize the opportunity to acquire openings for her commerce and emigrants.

The Moroccan crisis and the establishment of the French protectorate. Such a position could not last. The imprudences of Sulṭān 'Abd al-'Azīz precipitated the crisis. The whims of the sovereign and his immoderate desire for European innovations displeased the stricter Muslims. The modifications in the fiscal policy made by the ṭarīb disturbed the people already taxed to the utmost. Rebellion broke out everywhere. A pretender, the rūgī Bū Ḥamāra, rose in the region of Tāzā and routed an army sent against him. It was in vain that France by the agreements of 1901 and 1902 endeavoured to organise the activities of the makhzen against the rebels and to postpone the inevitable catastrophe. On the failure of this effort, France decided to arrange with England and Spain to settle the Moroccan question and prevent the dismemberment of the empire. In return for recognition of the protectorate de facto exercised by England in Egypt and the granting to Spain of a sphere of influence in northern Morocco, these two powers recognised the right of France to act as her interests best demanded. France hastened to propose to the sulṭān a plan for reforming the sharīfian administration. The intervention of Germany prevented its realisation. On March 31, 1905, William II landed at Tangier and in a sensational speech posed as the defender of the independence of the sulṭān. On the advice of the German representative, 'Abd al-'Azīz appealed for the constitution of an international conference to study the reforms to be introduced into the Maghrib. The conference met at Algéciras (Jan. 15—April 7, 1906) and affirmed the three principles of the sovereignty of the sulṭān, the territorial integrity and economic freedom of Morocco. It did not, however, settle the Moroccan question. The two international bodies which it decided to set up, the police for the ports and the state bank, both capable of being of great service, could not take the place of the general reforms necessary for the salvation of the empire. Disorders continued, acts of hostility against Europeans in Morocco itself and acts of brigandage on the frontiers increased in number. Not being able to obtain satisfaction for outrages on its subjects, the French government ordered the occupation of Ujdja and Casablanca in 1907. The country was then pacified around these two centres and order restored in eastern Morocco and in the Shawiya to the great benefit of the natives themselves. The Spaniards in their turn for similar reasons intervened in 1908 in the adjoining region of Melilla and after a severe campaign in 1909 occupied Salwān and a number of strategic points.

During this period war broke out between 'Abd al-'Azīz and his brother Mawlāi 'Abd al-Ḥafīz, proclaimed sulṭān at Marrākush and then at Fās. Supported by the anti-foreign party, the pretender was victorious. All the powers, including France and Spain, recognised him, after he had promised to respect the agreement of Algéciras, the international treaties and all the engagements entered into by his predecessors. France and Spain announced their intention of not prolonging their occupation of sharīfian territory. The Franco-Moroccan agreements of March 4, 1910, and the Hispano-Moroccan of Nov. 19 of the same year, stipulated that the occupation should cease as soon as the makhzen should have a force sufficient to guarantee the security of life and property and peace within its frontiers. This settlement seemed all the more desirable as there had been occasional friction between France and Germany which had only been smoothed over with great difficulty, the most serious being the affair of the deserters from Casablanca in Sept. 1908. A disquieting state of tension remained between these two powers, although France had endeavoured to give satisfaction to Germany in signifying, by the agreement of Feb. 8, 1909, her willingness not to impede the economic freedom nor hinder the development of German interests.

The aggravation of the situation in the interior hastened the dénouement. The sulṭān's rule was no more effective than that of his predecessors; the exactions of the sharīfian agents in the spring of 1911 provoked a rising of the Arab and Berber tribes in the region of Fās. Besieged in his capital and on the point of succumbing, the sulṭān appealed to the French. They decided to send an expeditionary force to the help of the sulṭān but ordered its commander to avoid any injury to the independence of the sulṭān and any occupation of new territory. Vigorously commanded by General

Moinier, the military operations had the desired effect. Fās was relieved on May 21, and after certain police operations necessary to secure the peace of the district, the expeditionary force returned to the coast. But, while the danger was thus banished from the interior, unexpected complications resulted. Spain, taking advantage of the occasion to take possession of the sphere of influence reserved for her by the agreement of 1904, established herself in Larache and al-Ḳaṣr. Germany, feeling the moment was decisive, claimed compensation in her turn and sent a warship to Agādīr. This demonstration provoked the greatest alarm in France and in Europe generally. In the end, however, a peaceful settlement was reached. After four months of difficult negotiations, the agreement of Nov. 4, 1911 put an end to the dispute. Germany abandoned all political claims to Morocco and admitted with certain reservations, chiefly of an economic nature, the principle of the French protectorate. There was no longer any obstacle to the establishment of this régime, which the sultān accepted by the treaty of March 30, 1912. This diplomatic document stipulated the maintenance of the sovereignty of the sultān, the representation of and protection by French diplomatic and consular agents of Moroccan subjects and interests abroad, the carrying out, with the collaboration of and under the direction of France, of a number of administrative reforms, judicial, financial and military, intended to "give the sharīfian empire a new régime, while safeguarding the traditional prestige and honour of the sultān, the practice of the Muslim faith and the institutions of religion".

The French protectorate now extends over the whole of Morocco, but the Spanish sphere of influence enjoys by the agreement of Nov. 27, 1912 complete autonomy from the administrative and military point of view, while Tangier and its environs form an international zone, the status of which is not yet definitely regulated.

The establishment of the protectorate was to have had as its first result the restoration of the authority of the sharīf, whose support was essential for the carrying out of the reforms. This could only be attained by a considerable effort. The central power was weaker than it had ever been at the time when the conclusion of the protectorate treaty put an end to the crisis. The biṭād al-makhzen was almost non-existent. France had to conquer Morocco for the sultān. The name of Maréchal Lyautey, appointed High Commissioner and Resident General, will remain inseparable from the history of the pacification of Morocco, like that of Bugeaud in the history of the conquest of Algeria. Very difficult in itself, for it brought the French into contact with warlike tribes, some of whom had never recognised the authority of the makhzen, the task was further complicated by events abroad. Order had hardly been restored around the chief towns, Fās, Meknes, Marrākush and communication restored between eastern and western Morocco, when the War of 1914 broke out. For a moment it was feared that the French were going to abandon the interior and fall back on the coast, but the progress of the pacification of the country was only slowed down, not interrupted. All the conquered positions were retained and the rebels held on all fronts. The counter-offensives of the rebels in the Tāzā corridor, along the Middle Atlas and in Sūs were crushed. The War finished, the offensive was resumed to reduce the districts still unsubdued (Middle Atlas, south of the High Atlas, upper valley of the Muluya). Three years of difficult fighting (1921—1924) ended in the occupation of "all Morocco of value", i. e. those regions of economic, political or military importance. The Rifan offensive in 1925, however, threatened to compromise all the success achieved. A Rifan chief, 'Abd al-Karīm, had gathered around him the greater part of the tribes of northern Morocco and inflicted serious reverses on the Spaniards and forced them to abandon a portion of the territory which they had occupied. Crossing the Spanish zone, he invaded the valley of the Wargha and threatened Fās. The resistance of the posts echeloned along the frontier gave reinforcements time to reach the scene of hostilities. Checked in the autumn, the Rifan advance was definitely crushed in the spring of 1926 thanks to the combined action of France and Spain. At the moment of writing, the conquest may be regarded as completed: only a few tribes of the Central Atlas and of the oases of the Sahara have not yet been reached by the French, but their reduction is only a matter of time.

The administrative reorganisation has kept pace with the pacification. The old machinery has been retained but submitted to a control which guarantees the natives against abuse of their power and excesses by the agents of the makhzen. Technical services have been created to give the country the works necessary for its economic life. The remarkable results obtained in all fields have been facilitated by the influx of European immigrants and capital. Morocco seemed condemned to vegetate. Now it is being completely transformed. A new epoch is beginning, very different from any that have preceded it.

III. POPULATION.

a. Total population and density. It is difficult to fix with any precision the total population of Morocco. The attempts made at a census in recent years in the parts subject to the sharīfian makhzen enable, it is true, comparatively accurate estimates to be made for the greater part of the country and corroborate for most districts the estimates made by European travellers before the establishment of the French protectorate. But the parts of the sharīfian empire still outside the authority of the makhzen and those whose southern boundaries are not exactly known have not been seriously investigated from this point of view, and until they have been scientifically studied it will not be possible to estimate the total population of Morocco to within a few hundred thousands.

The total usually given is 5,000,000, of whom a tenth, 500,000, are in the zone of the Spanish protectorate. This population is very unequally distributed and its density varies with geographical conditions. The most thickly populated part is that of the plains of western Morocco between the massif of the Djāla in the north and the Great Atlas in the south: Gharb, Shāwīya, Tādā, Dukkāla and ʿAbda. The density of the population also varies with the fertility of the soil. The population of this region is estimated at two fifths of the total. The mountainous regions, Djāla, Rif, Middle Atlas are not thickly populated, as we might have expected from the comparatively dense population of Kabylia, in another mountainous region of North Africa. As to the Sahara zone, outside the belts of oases in the Wādī Gīr, the Wādī Zīz (Tāfilālt) and the Wādī Darʿa (Dra), it is very sparsely inhabited.

b. Elements of the population. The population of Morocco consists for the most part of Berbers and Arabs, the former being the older element and the latter invaders. As to the Berbers, who do not seem to be a homogeneous race and whose origin is obscure, see the separate article on them. As to the Arabs, they are in a minority, but it is often difficult to attribute an exact ethnic origin to certain tribes or confederations, so much have the Arabs and Berbers become mixed since the Muslim conquest, and intermingled either by peaceful or warlike methods. It will be more prudent and will give a more accurate result if we distinguish in Morocco between those who speak Arabic and those who speak Berber (see below VII. LANGUAGES). The former live entirely in the plains, while with the exception of the massif of the Djāla, the inhabitants of the mountains speak Berber.

1. Berbers. Three main groups may be distinguished among the Berbers of Morocco: in the north the Rifāns and the Benī Znāsen; in the centre the Znāga (Ṣanhādja) and the Brāber (Barābir), who form the population of the Middle Atlas; the third group is that of the Shlūh [cf. the article SHILLUH] who occupy the western part of the High Atlas and of the Anti-Atlas, as well the plain of Sūs. In addition to these main groups, we may mention the Djāla, arabicised Berbers, to the N.W. of Fās, and the Harāṭin (plur. of the Arabic ḥarṭānī), who seem to be regarded as an intermixture of Berbers and Sūdānese and form the basis of the settled population of the zone of the Saharan oases.

2. Arabs. The early invasions at the time of the Muslim conquest do not seem to have appreciably modified the ethnology of the country. Down to the xiiith century A.D., the country districts of Morocco were almost completely Berber; it was the great Almohad ruler ʿAbd al-Muʿmin [q.v.] who was the first to introduce into Morocco Hilālī Arab tribes hitherto settled in the Central Maghrib or in Ifrikiya; these importations, continued by the successors of this prince and by the Merīnid dynasty, soon drove the Berber element into the mountains or absorbed and arabicised it. Evidence of such assimilation is still found in the fact that tribes with clearly Arab names contain sections whose names show their Berber origin.

These Arab tribes, who are all settled in the plain, may be divided into two main ethnic groups: the Banū Hilāl [q. v.] and the Ma'kil. The latter occupies almost exclusively the valley of the Upper Muluya as well as the lands south of the Atlas. The Banū Hilāl occupy the sub-Atlantic plains and the steppes of Eastern Morocco.

3. Jews. There are about 150,000 Jews in Morocco, mainly living in the towns. There are also a considerable number among the tribes of the Great Atlas. They also form the principal element in the population of the two little towns of Debdū and Demnāt [q. v.]. The origin of the earliest elements in this Jewish population is obscure: it is difficult to ascertain whether they were Jews who had migrated from Palestine or were judaicised Berbers. The modern element is made up of Jews who fled from Spain to Morocco in the xvth century. The former call themselves phlishṭīm (Palestinians) and are called forasteros (foreigners) by the Spanish immigrants, who are practically all settled in the towns of the coast and are rapidly becoming Europeanised.

4. Miscellaneous elements. The negroes, of whom there are considerable numbers in Morocco, do not however form a distinct group there. In the north we find many, who are almost all of slave origin. The predilection of the townsmen of Morocco for black concubines, noted for their domestic virtues, has brought into the population, especially in bourgeois circles, a very considerable amount of negro blood. To the south of the Atlas in the oases, the intermarriage of negroes and Berbers has produced the Ḥarāṭin. Finally the negroes of the Sūdān, since the Middle Ages, have always been esteemed as mercenaries to form the imperial guards, especially since the taking of Timbuktu by the armies of the Sa'dian Sulṭān Aḥmad al-Manṣūr [q. v.].

Large numbers of Muslims from Spain, whether of Arab origin or descendants of Christian inhabitants of the Peninsula, have contributed to form the population of the towns at various times: Cordovans banished by al-Ḥakam I at the beginning of the third century A. H. after the "revolt of the suburb" and Muslims expelled from Spain at the "Reconquista".

We must not omit the influence that may have been exercised on the population of Morocco by Europeans (renegades, who had adopted Islām, mercenaries recruited outside Morocco and settled in the country), and finally we may note that frequently the sulṭāns have purchased women for their harems in Constantinople.

IV. SOCIAL AND ECONOMIC LIFE.

a. Country. The population of Morocco, although for the most part rural, nevertheless has a larger proportion of town-dwellers than Central Barbary and, like the rest of North Africa, might be divided into nomadic and settled; this division does not at all coincide with that into Arabs and Berbers; there are still nomadic Berbers, while certain Arab tribes are becoming settled on the lands which they cultivate.

It has been shown that the nomadic or settled life of the country-people in North Africa does not depend, as was long thought, on ethnic factors, but is entirely conditioned by geographical considerations. It is the rule for dwellers in the mountains to be settled while the people of the desert steppes, forced to move about in search of pasture for their flocks, are nomads. There are however means between these two extremes and especially in Morocco, where we find many semi-nomads, who move only short distances, principally on the borders of the various mountains of the centre and south. But generally nomadism is the outcome of pastoral migration and its geographical area is in direct relation to the rainfall and therefore to the nature of the vegetation.

It is in eastern Morocco, in the steppes which lie to the east of the Muluya, and to the south of the Great Atlas, towards the Sahara, that we find the principal groups of nomads in Morocco. In eastern Morocco, we may mention among the large tribes which lead a nomadic life the confederation of the Benī Gil, between Bergent and Figig; on the other side of the Atlas, the Ait Seddrāt, the Ait Djallāl, the Īdā-ū-Biāl, the Ait-ū-Mribeṭ; lastly to the south of the Dar'a (Dra) country, the Rgiba, the Shkārna and the Awlād Dīm. As to the semi-nomads, we find them, outside the Middle Atlas, in the great plains of the Gharb, in the north, the Rḥāmna and the Shyādma, in the south, where a pastoral life has not yet completely disappeared before a more settled state of society.

Nevertheless Morocco is, of the three countries of Barbary, that which has in its rural population the largest proportion of settled people, of fixed habitat and living not only in tents but also in houses. The latter are rarely found isolated in the country, but on the contrary are grouped into villages of more or less importance and more or less near one another, according to the density of the population.

The type of dwelling varies with the district. In the mountains we find houses built of unbaked bricks or stone with a gabled thatch or a flat flat roof. In the plains, the tent predominates, more or less fixed to the spot, and with it we find more and more the hut of branches with a conical roof called nurwāla. In the Saharan oases, the population collects within a walled area or ḥṣār (sg. ḥṣar, from the class. ḥṣar); these conglomerations sometimes possess the elements of town-life. The villages are called duar (duwwār) in the plains, and dṣhar in the mountains. In some hill regions we find survivals of cave-dwelling.

b. Town. Among the towns of his country, the Moroccan distinguishes a certain number that he definitely regards as cities (ḥaḍariya). These are Fās, Rabat-Salé and Tetwan, which have been more than others subjected to the influence of Spanish culture. It must however be noted that in the majority of the other towns we can still find traces of the existence of colonies formed by Muslims from Spain, especially from the xvth century onwards. The population of the non-ḥaḍariya towns is found to be composed of rustic elements but little urbanised. This is the case with Ujda and Mazagan (country Beduins) and also with Tangier (countrymen from the hills). Marrākush and Meknes owe their special urban character to the fact that as capitals they have contained the courts of two Sharifian dynasties, both of Beduin origin; they are makhzanīya towns in which the standard of civilisation does not reach the refinement of the ḥaḍariya Spanish towns. The ports Tangier, Larache, Mazagan, Safi and Mogador were for long the only points of contact between Morocco and European influences, politically as well as commercially. Lastly in the mountains, little towns like Shefshāwen, Wazzān, Şefrū, Debdū, Demnāt owe their existence to political reasons. The two first were founded as bulwarks against the Portuguese advance in northern Morocco in the xvth century. Demnāt and Debdū are mainly Jewish towns. As to Şefrū, it seems probable that it is a survival of an old Berber town. We may also mention as towns of secondary importance, on the Mediterranean coast, Ceuta, completely europeanised for several centuries, on the Atlantic coast Arzila (Aşailā), Casablanca, which owes its origin to the little port of Anfā, Azemmūr, Agādir. In the interior, al-Ḳaṣr al-Kabīr (el-Ḳṣar, Spanish spelling: Alcazarquivir), Tāzā, Tārūdānt. Several ancient towns have now disappeared, e.g. Nakūr and Bādīs on the Mediterranean, Tīt to the south of Mazagan, the two Aghmāt and Tīnmallal to the south of Marrākush and several others, descriptions of which have been given by the geographers like al-Bakrī, al-Idrīsī and Leo Africanus.

As a rule, the Moroccan town is grouped round a citadel or ḡaṣaba (pop. ḡaṣba) which is the seat of authority. Under the protection of the citadel lies the mellāḡ or Jewish quarter. All around spreads the town proper or mdīna with its great mosque, markets and ḡaṣariya [q. v.]. It is surrounded by a rampart (sūr) beyond which there are usually the suburbs more or less rural in character. The town itself is divided into quarters (ḡauma) with streets (zanḡa), alleys (darb) and squares (raḡba).

c. Economic Life. The country people, whether settled or nomadic, who form at least four fifths of the population of Morocco, live on the land, either by agriculture or stock-raising, most often combining the two. Those in the highlands grow cereals (wheat, barley), certain leguminosae (broad beans, chick-peas, vetches) and fruit-trees. They also exploit their forests in a very primitive fashion (thuyas, cedars). The people of the plains devote themselves mainly to cereals and the rearing of cattle, sheep, camels, horses and asses. In the oases of the south, the population cultivates the date-palm and understands the art of irrigating the land.

The rural industries are very primitive. They are limited to supplying the necessary implements of agriculture, and weaving wool into the material for garments, tents and carpets. The Berbers of Sūs show a certain aptitude at metal-working (arms and jewels). Sūs no longer exports the cane-sugar and copper, which formed considerable articles of trade under the Sa'dians.

Each tribe has a certain number of markets (sūk) which are held in the open country and bear the name of the day on which they are held. It is in the sūk that the peasant sells his produce and buys the manufactured articles that are brought by the merchants from the towns. Cereals are preserved in siloes (maḡmūra); in the Great Atlas and to the south of it we find fortified storehouses, which belong to the community and are called āḡādir.

It is in the towns that we find industrial activity concentrated. Each trade, which originally formed a gild (hanḡa), is grouped in one street which bears its name. In it the articles are made and sold. The stocks are kept in the fonduks (Ar. fondaḡ) which correspond to the khān and wakālah of the east. Some products, like grain, oil, coal, wool, are sold in special places called raḡba.

The monopolies of exporting (sāḡa) corn and hides established by the sultāns at the end of the xixth century have now been abolished. Several European products have become of the first necessity in Morocco and form the subjects of an important traffic: cotton goods, tea and sugar and candles. For the history of the weights, measures and coins in use in Morocco before the establishment of the protectorate see the works by Massignon and Michaux-Bellaire quoted in the Bibliography. The very vivid picture drawn by Leo Africanus of the commercial and industrial activity of Fās in the Middle Ages is still very valuable.

The Jews, who devote themselves specially to certain trades that flourish in larger centres (goldsmiths, embroiderers), also play an important part as brokers. The citizens of Fās, who have a large number of converted Jews among their number, had almost a monopoly of the import trade of Morocco, especially from England, and for this reason had little colonies in the sea-ports.

The Berbers of Sūs like to settle in the towns as grocers (baḡḡāl) and having made their fortunes return to the country. Since the war of 1914—1918 a large number of them have migrated to France as labourers and they settle in groups, according to their original tribes, in the suburbs of certain large industrial towns.

V. POLITICAL ORGANISATION.

It is only at rare intervals and for short periods that Morocco has been entirely under the authority of the sultān: whence the distinction between the territory subjected to the government (bilād al-maḡhzen) and the territory unsubjected (bilād al-saiba). As a rule, the maḡhzen territory included the towns, valleys and plains. The mountains, on the other hand, remained more or less independent, according to the degree of power possessed by the sovereign. For further details cf. the article MAḤZEN.

Outside the towns the population is grouped into tribes (ḡabila). Several are sometimes grouped together under a common name, without however being a confederation in the strict sense of the word; this is the case with the ḡhumāra in the north, the Hāḡa, the Dukkāla, the Shāwiya in the south. The tribe is subdivided into sections (ruḡ, ḡhums, fakhḡḡa), which are subdivided into sub-sections comprising a certain number of villages of tents or houses.

The tribes who own the sultān's sway are governed by a ḡā'id appointed by the maḡhzen. His duty is to allot and levy the taxes, to raise contingents of soldiers and keep good order. He has under his command a shaikh for each section under whom are the muḡaddam of the sub-sections.

For the distinction between maḡhzen, ḡaiṣh (vulg. ḡish) and nā'iba tribes see the article MAḤZEN.

In the tribes not subject to the maḡhzen, political activity is confined to the ḡjamā'a, i. e. an assembly of men able to bear arms. The ḡjamā'a deals with all the business of the tribe, civil, criminal, financial and political. It administers justice following local custom (Arabic 'urf, Berber isref). It elects a shaikh (Berber amḡhār) who is only an agent to carry out its decisions. Alongside of the ḡjamā'a of the tribe, there are ḡjamā'as of the sections and sub-sections but their powers are limited.

All the tribes of the bilād al-saiba are divided into opposing factions or laḡf. When a tribe of a certain laff is attacked, those neighbouring tribes who belong to the same faction take up arms and come to its assistance.

In the towns, the makhzen is represented by a governor whose official title is kā'id but in certain large towns he is often called bāshā. The title of āmīl has been sometimes given to the governor of Ujda. The kā'id of the town, generally speaking, has the same powers as the kā'id of the tribe and acts as judge in case of any violation of the law. He has an assistant or khalīfa. Alongside of him, the muhtasib supervises the corporations, fixes their average prices and looks after public morals.

The kā'id has under his orders the muqaddam of the quarter and his police (makhzanīya) carrying out his instructions. Among the officials sent by the makhzen to each town may also be mentioned the nādir or inspector of endowments (hubūs), the trustee of vacant inheritances (wakīl al-ghurabā), popularly bū-mwāreth = abu 'l-mawārith, the collector of local taxes and market-dues (amīn al-mustafād). Lastly in the harbour and frontier towns, the customs are collected by officials called *umanā*² (sg. amīn).

Justice is administered by the kā'id or by the kādī, as the case may be. The latter deals with questions of personal law; official reports on the cases are drawn up by the ūdūl. In technical cases he appeals to experts: master-masons, agriculturalists, veterinary surgeons (mwālīn en-naḍar, arḥāb et-turka, fallāh, baīṭār). The legal opinions (fatwā) given by eminent jurists on the same question being often contradictory, the Sharīfian government has recently created a court of appeal (maḍjlīs al-isti'nāf) at Rabat.

Landed property takes a number of different forms. In the first place, there are the state-domains; they are either managed directly by the makhzen (crown-lands) or they are allotted to gish-tribes in return for the military service for which they are liable; others of these lands may be granted in temporary or definite ownership to private individuals by imperial edict (ḡahīr or tanfīḍha).

The hubūs lands may be urban or rural. In the towns, they not infrequently cover half the area. They are let out under special conditions which give the tenants special privileges, meftāḥ and ḡzā (class. Ar. ḡjazā). In the country, the hubūs lands consist mainly of fields and orchards. In all cases, the revenue from these lands is set aside for the maintenance of buildings of a religious character or of public utility (mosques, colleges, schools, fountains) and for the payment of the officials attached to these establishments.

In Morocco, there are vast tracts of land which are not the property of any one individual, either as a result of the insecurity prevailing or of the sparsity of the population. These lands belong undivided to the whole tribe; they are called common lands (blād al-ḡimā'a).

Lastly, lands which have come to belong to private individuals (mulk) by inheritance or purchase have their character confirmed by a certificate of ownership (mulkiya).

The old Muslim imposts (zakāt and uṣhr) have recently been merged into a single tax, the tertib. In addition to this tax, from which the state draws the essential part of its revenues, we may mention the duties levied at the gates of towns and in the markets (maks), unpopular with the people and not countenanced by religion, and the urban tax on buildings (darība). In addition to these, the main taxes, there is the hadiya or present offered to the sultān on the occasion of the three great Muslim festivals. The ḡizya or poll-tax paid by non-Muslims and the nā'iba or payment for exemption from military service by certain Arab tribes have been abolished.

VI. RELIGIOUS LIFE.

a. The Berbers before Islām. For lack of documents it is difficult to get any accurate idea of the religious beliefs and practices of the Berbers of Morocco, before their conversion to Islām and it is only from the survival of animistic cults which can still be observed in the country, that we can guess what the primitive religion was. The figures on two carved stones found in Morocco seem to be evidence of the existence of a solar worship. On animistic practices surviving in modern Islām in Morocco see below d. Islām in Modern Morocco.

b. Conversion to Islām. At the time of their invasion, the Arabs found that in the districts around the towns the people were more or less under the influence of Jewish and Christian teachings; but there is little doubt that they did not practise these religions in their true form. It will be more correct to think of them as professing Judaism or Christianity rather than as real Jews or Christians. It seems evident that these influences had prepared the Berber population around the mountains to adopt the new monotheistic religion, which the invaders imposed upon them. The two earliest invasions, that of 'Uḡba b. Nāfi' in 640 and that of Mūsā b. Nuṣair in 711, could result only in a very partial and superficial islāmisation, for very few Arab elements remained in the country. Islām, a town religion, was for long confined to larger centres. The Berbers generally became converted in the hope of escaping the exactions of the conquerors; but when the latter wanted to treat them simply as tributaries, they did not hesitate to apostatise, on seven different occasions, if we may believe the Arab historians. One thing is certain, that while remaining Muslims, they were not long in trying to cast off the authority of the caliphs of Baghdād by adopting the heterodox doctrines of the Khāridjis [q. v. and the article AL-SUFRIYA]. The Berbers of Morocco went even further when new local religions arose among them more or less based on Islām, with their own prophets and Qur'āns. After the attempt at rebellion by the Berber of Tangier, Maisara [q. v.], which was quickly suppressed, the Barghawāta recognised as their prophet one of their number, Ṣaliḥ b. Ṭarīf, who gave them a religion and a Qur'ān in the Berber language. This religion, the progress of which was opposed by the early Moroccan dynasties, seems only to have been finally exterminated by the Almoḥad rulers of the xiiith century. This Barghawāta movement was the most lasting; we also note that which was created by Hā-Mīm (d. 313 A.H.) among the Ghumāra, near Tetwan.

In spite of these reactions, Islām, having become the official religion of increasingly powerful dynasties, gradually gained ground and penetrated slowly into the Berber mountains, but it is only from the death of 'Abd al-Mu'min, who destroyed the religion of the Barghawāta and put an end to the rule of the "anthropomorphist" (muḡjassimūn) Almo-ravids, that we can date the complete unification of Islām in Morocco. Till then, Islām had had in Morocco champions who were soldiers rather than theologians, and who after forcing the people to adopt Islām at the point of the sword, were little fitted to instruct them in it. It required a Berber of the Great Atlas, Ibn Tūmart [q. v.], a theologian who had been educated in the east, to come back to his country and to secure the devoted support of a mass of followers in order to found the movement, which was political as well as religious, of the Almohads [q. v.] or "preachers of tawhīd" [q. v.].

If the Almohad reformation was only temporary in Morocco, it was nevertheless strong enough while it lasted to obliterate in the country all trace of schism or heresy and to establish thoroughly in it the school of Mālik b. Anas [q. v.] which it still follows.

c. Evolution of Moroccan Islām. From the time of the fall of the Almohad dynasty, Moroccan Islām rapidly acquired features of its own. Islām, defeated in Spain, was gradually driven out of it, then attacked in Morocco itself by the Christians of the Peninsula. The western frontier of the Dār al-Islām was brought back to its own territory and then thrust farther back. Islām in Morocco, attacked by Christianity and forced to djihād, became an active principle. It required all the moral forces of the country, even those of which the orthodoxy seemed doubtful; in order to utilise them, it did not hesitate to absorb them by covering them with a more or less superficial veneer of orthodoxy. It was at this period that the cult of dead and living saints, and to a certain point Sharifism, which had hitherto only existed alongside of Islām in Morocco, were adopted into it and received a kind of official recognition from the makhzen.

Before the Marinids, Islām had required the constant assistance of the temporal power to maintain itself and advance. From the time of this dynasty, sprung from a Berber nomad tribe, the roles are inverted; it is now the sovereigns who utilise Islām to increase their own power, and try to monopolise it by creating official colleges for religious instruction (madrasa); the first of these (Madrasat al-Ṣaffārīn) was founded in 679 (1280) by the Sultān Abū Yūsuf at Fās, the capital of the dynasty, which made it the great centre of Muslim culture in Western Barbary [cf. Fās]. The immediate successors of the Marinids, the Banū Waṭṭās, established in the same town the cult of their founder Idrīs II. The mausoleum in which he is said to be buried was henceforth an object of great veneration. He is the earliest in date and the most important of the innumerable canonised Muslims who are the objects of a regular cult in Morocco, even on the part of the religious leaders and the aristocracy. When the cult of Idrīs was established, his descendants — more or less authentic — claimed the title of sharif and soon played a preponderating part in Moroccan society, as a political and moral influence. The power of the Idrisid shorfā was soon reinforced by that of other shorfā descended from 'Alī through al-Ḥasan and this is the origin of the two great groups of sharifs in Morocco, the Idrisid and the 'Alid. To the latter belong the two Sharifan dynasties, the Sa'dian and Filālī, the latter still in power. From the moment of their accession to the throne, the influence of the shorfā on the destinies of the country became more and more preponderant.

The phenomenon of sharifism is closely connected on the other hand with the development of religious brotherhoods [cf. the article ṬARIQA]. Although we find evidence of their existence at the end of the Almohad dynasty (Ḥudjdjādī, Māghiriyyūn, Amghāriyyūn), it is only as a result of al-Djazūlī's (q. v., d. 1645 A.D.) campaign in favour of a djihād against the Portuguese, that we find the principles of the brotherhoods, as we know them to-day, first coming into existence.

d. Islām in Modern Morocco. Here we will only give a survey of the principal points of detail in which the people of Morocco differ from the rest of the Muslim community as regards the practice of their religion. With the exception of a few isolated groups, still little studied, who are credited with heterodox or heretical practices (Zkāra, in the neighbourhood of the Bnī Znāsen, in eastern Morocco, Bdāwa, in the Ḡharb, not far from al-Kṣar al-Kabīr), all the Muslims of Morocco are Sunnis and since the Almoravid period have followed the Mālikī rite, which prevailed in the west over that of al-Awzā'ī. It is in the towns that the population observes most strictly the duties of religion. The Beduins of the plains and the Berbers of the mountains are rather lukewarm Muslims. The Djbāla, however, between Fās and Tangier, are very devoted to Islām, show great piety, and Qur'ānic studies are very much in favour with them; it is from them that are recruited a great number of schoolmasters who practise their calling in the plains [cf. SHART]. It is also practically only among the hillmen of the north and south that we find a mosque in every village.

In spite of the great distance they have to traverse, the Moroccans like to accomplish the canonical pilgrimage. A considerable number settle in the east (there are Moroccan colonies in Alexandria and Cairo); the importance of these colonies had even induced the Sultān 'Abd al-Aziz to appoint a Moroccan consul, amīn al-Maghāriba, for Egypt.

In addition to the two canonical festivals of Islām ('id kabīr and 'id ṣaḡīr), the Moroccans celebrate the festival of the birth of the Prophet (mūlūd, class. mawlid) and that of 'Āshūrā' (10th Muḥarram). The mūlūd, established in Morocco by the Marinids, has become a kind of national festival, since the accession to power of sovereigns claiming descent from the Prophet; this festival in Morocco almost surpasses in importance the two canonical feasts.

The peculiarities just mentioned would not be sufficient to give Moroccan Islām a special character, nor would its religious brotherhoods, if the latter were confined to the practices of religion or exaltation of the faith and to satisfying the need for an elevated mysticism among their adepts. These religious brotherhoods are fairly numerous: Tidjāniya, Dārkāwa, Ṭaiyibiya-Tuhāma, Kattāniya [q. v.] etc. But alongside of these brotherhoods, whose members are almost exclusively recruited from the literate or well-to-do classes of the towns and country, there are popular brotherhoods in considerable numbers, in which preoccupation with religion gives place to charlatanish practices and sanguinary displays. Such are the Djilāla, the 'Isāwa, the Ḥmādsha, the Dghūḡhiya. Some of these brotherhoods recruit their members exclusively from a particular class of society; thus the rmā (class. rumāt) is a brotherhood of marksmen, and the Gnāwa, a negro brotherhood. All these brotherhoods have this feature in common that their founder has become a famous saint (walī).

The cult of saints is highly developed in Morocco and undoubtedly was so before the introduction of Islām, which found itself obliged to tolerate it. There are however very different categories of saints, from the venerated patron saint of a capital or of a district to the local holy man whose name is forgotten, between whom comes the saiyid whose tomb is marked by a ḥubba (chapel surmounted by a dome), more or less elaborate. The more humble saints are recognised by the circular wall (ḥawsh) which surrounds their tombs.

These venerated individuals, male and female, have attained sanctity by very different ways, some in their lifetime, by their learning, devotion, asceticism, miraculous powers (baraka), sometimes even by more or less mystic mania (madjdūb); the others, after their deaths, have been distinguished by miracles, apparitions etc. The warrior in the holy war (djihād, ribāṭ), slain fighting against the infidel is frequently beatified — hence his name of murābiṭ (pop. mrābeṭ — French and English "marabout"). But the early significance of this term was frequently lost sight of and the term murābiṭ came to be generally applied to saints, who never took part in a djihād in their lifetime. Murābiṭ thus came into general use as a synonym of the other words used for saint in Morocco: walī, saiyid, ṣāliḥ. But it is the only one applied to the descendants of a saint, who possess the baraka of their ancestor. Among the Berbers, the saint is called agurram. The names of great saints have mawlāi prefixed, the others the title sīdī, while women saints of Berber origin are called lalla.

The saint to whom sanctuaries are most frequently dedicated — modest though they are (maḥām, ḥalwa) — was not a native of the country but the famous patron saint of Baghdad, 'Abd al-Qādir al-Gilānī, popularly called al-Djilālī, who undoubtedly never visited Morocco. But the saint whose cult is surrounded with the greatest splendour is the famous Mawlāi Idrīs, founder and patron saint of Fās. Among the other great Moroccan saints may be mentioned: Mawlāi 'Abd al-Salām Ibn Mashīsh, patron of the Djbāla, buried on the Djabal al-'Alam; Mawlāi Abū Salhām, in the Gharb; Mawlāi Abū 'l-Shitā' al-Khammār (Mawlāi Būshshā), in the north of Fās; Sīdī Muḥammad b. 'Isā, patron of Meknès and founder of the brotherhood of the 'Isāwa; Mawlāi Abū Shu'aib (Būsh'ib), at Azemmūr; Mawlāi Abū Ya'azzā (Bū'azzā), in the Tādla; Sīdī Abū 'l-'Abbās al-Sabtī (Sīdī Bel-'Abbès), born at Ceuta and patron of Marrākush. All these and others less famous are the subjects of a hagiographical literature which will be dealt with later.

Devotion to individuals canonised in their lifetime or after their death is in Morocco not confined to Muslims. The Jews have also their saints, relatively as numerous as the Muslim saints. Some of the Jewish saints have acquired a reputation so great that even Muslims revere their tombs: e. g. those of the Rabbi 'Amrān in Azjen, near Wazzān and of Rabbi Ben Zmīro at Safi. On the other hand, the Jews of Morocco show a special reverence for certain of the great Muslim saints of the country.

The area, surrounding the tomb of each of the principal saints is sacred (ḥurm) and hence regarded as an inviolable asylum; among the best known are the ḥurm of Mawlāi Idrīs in Fās and that of Mawlāi 'Abd al-Salām b. Mashīsh in the mountains of the northwest. These pieces of ground are the exclusive property of the families who are descended or claim to be descended from the saint. They are exempt from state taxes; more than that, the descendants of the saints have the right to levy for their own benefit certain special dues, by a privilege officially recognised by the sultān. The levying of these dues is not the only way by which the saint's chapel benefits his descendants. The principal source of revenue is the offerings of pilgrims when visiting the tomb; this is the ziyāra. In general once a year, there is a kind of patronal festival at the tomb of the saint which is called mūsem (class. Ar. mawsim); a vast crowd, some of them from a considerable distance, gather there to pay their devotions to the saiyid and to see the display of fireworks given in his honour. On this occasion the offerings flow in and are shared among themselves by the saint's descendants.

In these circumstances, it is usual for every sanctuary of any importance to be regularly organised. The chapel which contains the tomb and the buildings attached to it, an oratory and guest-house, is called the sāwiya. It is superintended by a muḥaddam who collects and distributes the revenues. These do not come entirely from the ziyāra. The sāwiya often owns lands, sometimes extensive, which are let out and the profits shared with the tenants. They are called azīb and the tenants are called azzāb. These farms, sometimes acquired by purchase, often come from bequests or donations (ḥubūs) from pious private individuals.

We can thus see how certain famous and wealthy sāwiyas may exert a moral and political influence in the country round them, independent of their religious influence. The latter is however also very important. The great Moroccan sāwiyas are centres of orthodoxy and give life and vigour to Islām in the country. Some are centres of mysticism and they are always centres of religious instruction. This explains the enviable position occupied in Moroccan society by any group of descendants of a famous saint, or of marabouts. If their ancestor had, in addition to the virtues for which he was canonised, the honour to be a descendant of the Prophet, they are at the same time shorfa, which further increases their material privileges. The descendants of a saint who was not a sharif try to claim this origin for him by inventing more or less fictitious genealogies. The marabouts who have in this way "infiltrated" into the social category of the shorfa are very numerous in Morocco. A Moroccan sāwiya is not only a centre of hagiolatry; it is also in the majority of cases a body of shorfa and the centre of a religious brotherhood or of a branch of one, or of a secondary order affiliated to a brotherhood. The sāwiya itself may have offshoots. Many of the establishments of this name are daughters of a mother sāwiya and are sometimes at a considerable distance from it.

Hagiolatry, religious brotherhoods and sharifism thus form three special aspects of Islām in Morocco, which are profoundly intermingled, and it is difficult to study them separately. For a detailed account of the principal families of shorfā in Morocco of genuine sharīf origin or simply marabouts see the article SHORFĀ. Here we shall only mention the principal ones whose origin is considered authentic by the Moroccan genealogists. They are descended from al-Ḥasan and 'Abd Allāh al-Kāmil through the latter's three sons, Idrīs, Muḥammad al-Nafs al-Zakiya and Mūsā al-Djawn. The descendants of Idrīs or Idrīsids, are subdivided into Djūṭiyūn (Shābihiyūn, 'Imrāniyūn, Ṭālibiyūn, Ḡhālibiyūn), Dabbāghiyūn, Kattāniyūn, 'Alamiyūn (descendants of Mawlāi 'Abd al-Salām Ibn Mashish, buried on the Djabal al-'Alam, whence their name, and are themselves divided into Shafshāwaniyūn, Raisūniyūn, Raḥmāniyūn and Liḥyaniyūn). The descendants of Muḥammad al-Nafs al-Zakiya are the shorfā of Sidjilmāsa or Filāla (Filāliyyūn; nisba from Taḥilāl), i.e. those of the reigning Sharīfian dynasty; lastly, the descendants of Mūsā al-Djawn are the shorfā Ḳādiriyyūn, who take their name from the great saint of Islām 'Abd al-Ḳādir al-Gilānī. We also find in Morocco, but in small numbers, Ḥusainid shorfā, also descended from 'Alī through al-Ḥusain, the brother of al-Ḥasan; these are the shorfā called Ṣikilliyūn and 'Irākiyyūn, who came from Andalus. The great marabout families are that of the Nāṣiriya from Tāmgrūt in Dar'a, the Sharḳāwa [q.v.] in Tādla, the Darḳāwa and Wazzāniyūn to the northwest of Fās. The shorfā Wazzāniyūn (sharīfs of Wezzān), whose chief is also head of the great brotherhood of the Ṭaiyibiya-Tuhāma (cf. above), have for long played a considerable part in politics and have been the object of particular attention from the makhzen. Even more than the other representatives of the great marabout families, they have in fact rendered great services to the central power by using for its benefit the great moral and political influence which they possess among that part of the population, which is lukewarm or hostile to the makhzen. They have mediated in the most successful fashion between the sultān and the unsubjected body of the people.

The shorfā are thus at the head of Moroccan society. Some have assumed the power, others are the auxiliaries of the ruler, who in return shows them great deference. We shall see that they have occupied a very high place in the intellectual life of Morocco since the end of the middle ages. Lastly sharīfism, an important social factor, has been able still further to strengthen itself by the support which maraboutism has brought it, by incorporating itself in it, and the religious brotherhoods which very frequently spring directly from it.

2. Survivals of Berber cults. The cult of saints, accepted and even recognised, as we have seen above, by Islām, is in Morocco much earlier than the introduction of this religion. Indeed, alongside of saints of note, there are others who are essentially popular, in the country as well as in the towns. In the large cities like Fās, the great saiyids venerated by all classes of society rub shoulders with humble marabouts whose names show clearly their popular origin; these are Sidi 'l-Mukḥfi (Rev. the Hidden One), Sidi Amsa 'l-Khair (Rev. Good Evening) or Sidi Ḳāḍi Ḥādja (the reverend gentleman who procures what is wanted) and notices are given of them by hagiographers like the author of the Salwat al-Anfās (cf. E. Lévi-Provençal, Les Historiens des Chorfa,

p. 383 infra). The humble, often anonymous khalwas, which abound in Morocco, undoubtedly are to be connected with earlier mythical individuals, already worshipped in the same place before the coming of Islām. Besides this devotion to popular saints, there are the animistic cults, which we see everywhere in Morocco observed by the lower classes of the population: worship of high places, of caves, springs, trees and rocks. These cults are now being seriously studied and the results will perhaps enable us to reconstruct without too great risk of error, the type of religion practised by the Berbers before the introduction into their land of the three great monotheistic religions.

It is hardly possible to separate from these animistic cults that of Mawlāi Ya'ḳūb in Morocco, who always has a ḥubba beside thermal springs whose curative virtues are recognised.

Survivals of paganism in every case completely foreign to orthodox Islām may be found everywhere in Morocco; they are hardly distinguishable from what one finds in other parts of Barbary. The rites which accompany birth and the ceremonies connected with it (giving of the name and circumcision), marriage and death are now beginning to be well known. They constitute practices quite foreign to the prescriptions of the Sunna but they are not regarded by those who follow them as in any way heterodox.

It is especially in the life of the country people that we see most clearly traces of pre-Islamic practices. Many of them are strangely like agricultural customs of the Romans. The Moroccan peasant has retained the use of the Julian calendar, no doubt introduced into the country by the Romans; it is of course much more suitable for the needs of agriculture than the Muslim lunar calendar. The names of the months are retained in their Latin form with little change: January is yennāir from the Latin ianuar(ius). The beginning of the solar year in Morocco is the occasion of a festival celebrated, especially in the country, under the name of ḥāḡūsa; the festival of the summer solstice (anḡra) is also celebrated and on that day it is usual to have fireworks. Similarly the agrarian rites, which are still scrupulously observed by the peasants of Morocco, are completely foreign to the canonical prescriptions of Islām. They are mainly ceremonies of inauguration (of death and rebirth of the land, first day of labour, first day of harvest); rites to protect the crops from the evil eye, or to preserve the baraka which they contain while standing, finally special rites to secure rain and good weather. These various ceremonies, to which ethnographers like Biarnay and Westermarck have already devoted detailed studies to which the reader may be referred, are sometimes closely linked up with ceremonies prescribed by Islām; thus the different pagan rites for producing rain (carnival processions, a large spoon dressed in women's clothes and solemnly carried round) do not exclude the worship of saints specially noted as rain-makers like Mawlāi Būshshā, nor the celebration of the orthodox ceremony of istisḡā.

It is also in the worship of spirits (djinnī, pop. djinn, plur. djinnūn) that we find ceremonies of a strongly Islāmic stamp associated with quite profane rites. This cult is especially practised by the lower classes of society, and in the towns particularly by women. The djinns are regarded as supernatural powers, who have to be conciliated to avert their evil influence or fought when one is attacked by them. The rites which deal with them are either propitiatory or intended to overcome harm done. In spite of the many sacred formulae of Islām, which are found in the celebration of these two kinds of rites, one gets a strong impression of paganism from them; they undoubtedly remain practically what they were before the introduction of Islām into Morocco.

VII. LINGUISTIC SURVEY.

Two languages are spoken in Morocco: Berber and dialects of Arabic. Berber is the oldest language attested in Morocco and we have no evidence of an earlier language being used; as to Arabic, it was introduced by the Muslim conquest of the vith and viiith centuries. But until the arrival in Morocco of the Banū Hilāl and of the Sulaim (xith century), it seems that Arabic, the language of an essentially urban culture, was spoken mainly in the towns while the country people continued to talk Berber; it was only after the occupation of the plains by the Arab tribes that their language spread there. With the exception of the region of the Jbāla to be mentioned later, the highlands of Morocco alone have remained faithful to the Berber language, while the towns and lowlands are at the present day almost completely Arabic speaking.

In his *Annuaire du Monde Musulman*³ (p. 162) L. Massignon gives a proportion of 60% of Berber speakers (3,200,000 to 2,200,000). A. Bernard thinks this exaggerated and reduces it to 40% (cf. Arabophones et Berbérophones au Maroc, 1924, p. 278).

A. Berber.

1. Berber dialects. According to the works of E. Destaing, the Berber dialects of Morocco can be divided into two main groups.

The first is the northern group which includes the dialects of the Rif, those of the Bni Znāsen and of the Berber speaking tribes of the neighbourhood and those of the Ait Seghrūshshen, Marmūsha, Ait Warain etc. to the north of the Middle Atlas. These dialects are characterised phonetically by their strong tendency to spirantisation of the dentals and palatals. In comparing these dialects with those which in Algeria the natives call Znātiya, E. Destaing has been led to describe the group as the group of Zanāta dialects.

The second or southern group includes, according to the same author, the remainder of the Berber dialects of Morocco; he distinguishes two sub-groups:

a. that of the Tamasight, the dialect spoken by the Brāber of the Central Atlas, from the vicinity of Meknes to the edge of the Great Atlas; the dialects of the north are also distinguished from those of the south. It is with this sub-group that we should connect the dialect of the Ṣanhādja d-es-Srāir, an important highland confederation to the northeast of Fās, and perhaps also the language of the sections of the Ḡhumāra who still speak Berber.

b. Sub-group of the Tashelhit, the dialect once spoken by the Maṣmūda of the Great Atlas and by the Shlūh (usual French orthography: Chleuhs) of Sūs and the Anti-Atlas.

The three groups of Moroccan Berber dialects seem to correspond very exactly to the three main ethnic divisions of the Berbers of the country: Zanāta in the N. E., Ṣanhādja-Zanaga in the centre and Maṣmūda in the south. Going back to the old division of the Berbers given by Ibn Khaldūn, E. Destaing proposes to make the first group correspond to the Butr tribes and the two others to the Barānis tribes.

For the bibliography of Berber studies see the list of works given by E. Laoust at the beginning of his Mots et Choses Berbères, Paris 1920, p. xvii.; since that date see the Moroccan bibliography annually published by Hespéris. A map showing the division of Morocco between Arabic and Berber is given in the articles by A. Bernard and P. Moussard, Arabophones et Berbérophones au Maroc (in Annales Soc. Géogr., vol. 33, Paris 1924). For the north, there is a more accurate map by R. Montagne and Pennès published at the end of the Manuel de berbère marocain (dialecte rifain) by Justinard (Paris 1926).

There is no evidence of the existence of another language before Berber in Morocco. Very few of those "Libyan" inscriptions have been found which, although they are not yet read, are admitted to be in old Berber; one was found in the Roman ruins of Tamuda, a few miles S. W. of Tetwān, and is preserved in the museum of the latter town. Other Libyan inscriptions have been found in the region of Petitjean.

The earliest evidence of the use of Berber in Morocco is given by the Geography of al-Bakrī (xth century) who says that the prophet Ḥā-Mīm, killed in 927 A. D., had given the Berbers a Qur'an written "in their own language". This can only refer to their Berber speech; the same author tells us that the Baraghwāta had also a Berber Qur'an from their prophet Ṣālih (d. in 750). For the beginning of the Almohad period, a passage in Documents inédits d'histoire almohade, p. 67, says that at this time Berber was spoken on the Umm Rabī'. It is in the same work that we find the earliest recorded phrases in Moroccan Berber (Tashelhit dialect) transcribed in Arabic characters (cf. p. 26, 30, 36, 38, 39, 67, 117).

Ibn Khaldūn seems to have been the first to interest himself in the creation of a scientific system of transliteration of Berber into Arabic characters. Using certain graphic methods used by specialists in taḍwīd, he invented compound characters to render sounds peculiar to Berber (ḡ, ḡ [z emphatic] and ʒ). Unfortunately Ibn Khaldūn, who in his Muḡaddima gives interesting chapters on the urban and Beduin Arabic dialects, does not seem to have devoted any attention to the Berber language; one of the few passages to be noted in his book, as far as Morocco is concerned, is his reference to the existence of Berber speaking peoples among the Ṣanhādja tribes settled in the valley of the Wargha and around the fortress of Amargū (cf. Histoire des Berbères, ed. de Slane, text, i., p. 273, l. 11). For the beginning of the xvth century, Leo Africanus (p. 28) gives us more detailed information. The five Berber ethnic groups (Ṣanhādja, Maṣmūda, Zanāta, Hawwāra and Ḡhumāra) have a special language which they call aqel amarig (= awāl amasigh), i.e. "noble language" (cf. the present name of the Tamasight dialect) (ed. Schefer, i.). Berber was still the language of a part of the Ḡhumāra, for, he says, Arabic is used by almost all the people (op. cit., i. 29). It even looks as if the Shāwiya ("Soava") of the Tāmasnā still spoke Berber ("African language") like all the other Shāwiya of North Africa with the exception of some who lived to the south of Tunis (op. cit., i., p. 83).

We have to come down to the Danish Consul G. Höst, in the xviiith century, to find the first Moroccan Berber vocabulary collected from a ḡaleb of "Tamenart", a place probably in the region of Agadir (cf. Efterretninger om Marokos og Fex, Copenhagen 1779, p. 128—133).

2. Berber literature of Morocco. Although Berber was the language of the Moroccan dynasties who followed between the Idrīsids and the Sa'dians, it does not seem that, contrary to what was done in Egypt for the Turkish of the Mamlūks, Berber was made the subject of grammatical studies in Morocco, nor that it was used for the purpose of literary expression. A passage in the Ḳirṭās recalls the fact that khutbas were pronounced in Berber in the great mosque of Fās but the text of them has not been preserved. The celebrated Almohad reformer Ibn Tūmart is said to have composed in Berber theological and legal treatises which have now disappeared. The Berber Qur'āns of the Ḡhumāra and Baraghwāta have also disappeared although al-Bakrī has fortunately preserved some extracts in an Arabic translation. The only texts which we now have are translations of or commentaries on religious works of the type of the Risāla of al-Ḳairawānī or of the Mukhtaṣar of Khallī; all these Berber texts come without exception from Sūs, whether because this region had a more advanced culture or its dialect with a more occlusive consonant system and clearer vowel system was better suited than others for transcription in the Arabic alphabet. The Moroccan Berbers have a large stock of fables, legends, songs of love, war and work etc., many of which have already been collected by French and German students of Berber (on Berber literature, written and oral cf. Henri Basset, Essai sur la littérature des Berbères, Algiers 1920).

Among Arab authors the Berber language is 'adjamiya, the non-Arab language; barbariya, Berber; raṭāna, "jargon"; in the Documents inédits d'histoire almohade we several times come across the expression al-lisān al-gharbi, "the Moroccan language". In Moroccan Arabic, Berber is usually called esh-shelha.

B. Arabic.

The Arabic dialects. The Arabic language was introduced into Morocco in at least two stages: first in the eighth century at the time of the first Muslim conquest, then in the xith at the coming of the Banū Hilāl and the Sulaim. Down to the coming of the latter, who were brought to Morocco by the Almohad ruler Ya'qūb al-Manṣūr, Arabic seems to have been spoken almost exclusively in the large towns of the north, where it was used by a considerable Arab population who enjoyed a double prestige, religious and political. It was the language of religion and law. From the towns Arabic spread among the people of the surrounding country, and al-Idrisi (Description de l'Afrique et de l'Espagne, text p. 79, transl. p. 90) already notes that in the xith century the Berber tribes of the southern hinterland of Fās (Banū Yūsuf, Fandalāwa, Bahlūl, Zawāwa, Maggāsa, Ghaiyāta and Salālgūtūn) spoke Arabic.

It is this linguistic influence exerted by the towns on the country around them that explains the arabicisation of the mountainous country of the Jbāla (plur. of jebli, "highlander") while the rest of the Moroccan highlands remained Berber speaking. The land of the Jbāla, in the wide sense, stretches in the form of a crescent from Tangier to Taza. It was surrounded by a cordon of towns: Nakūr, Bādīs, Tigiṣās, Tetwān, Ceuta, al-Qaṣr al-Saghīr, Tangier, Arzila, al-Qaṣr al-Kabīr, Baṣra, Azdjen, Banū Tawudā, Walili, Fās, and Taza, which were the only ports or markets available for the tribes of the region; besides, the massif itself was traversed by the most important commercial routes of Northern Morocco: the roads from Fās to Tangier, to Ceuta, to Bādīs, to Nakūr and to Ghassāsa; it was therefore natural that being subject to the direct and indirect influences of the towns, the highlands of Jbāla should be the first region of Morocco to be arabicised. The process was further favoured by several other factors: 1. the existence in the mountains of numerous large villages, almost towns, which became secondary centres of Qur'anic culture; 2. the settlement almost everywhere in the xth century among the Jbāla of Idrisid sharifs who, driven from Fās by Mūsā b. Abi'l-Āfiya al-Miknāsī, founded independent principalities in the mountains, which became centres of Muslim urban culture; 3. the tribes of the Jbāla furnished a considerable part of the contingents which went to wage the holy war in Spain and returned home after being more or less arabicised by contact with the great Muslim towns of Andalusia; 4. lastly the rebellions and civil wars which so frequently disturbed Muslim Spain, the emigrations or expulsions caused by the progress of the Christian reconquest, brought to Africa, from the rising at Cordova (in 814) down to the xvth century, an important element which settled in the region of the Jbāla either in the towns around the mountains or in the villages of the highlands (resettlement of Tetwān, foundation of Shafshāwan) bringing there along with the Arabic language, the prestige of their cultural, intellectual and material superiority.

This rapid sketch of the spread of the Arabic language in Morocco explains why, after studying the question, three categories of Arabic dialects have been distinguished:

a. Urban dialects; b. highland dialects; c. Beduin dialects; and we may add: d. the Jewish dialects.

a. Urban dialects. In Morocco not all the town dialects are "urban dialects". There are towns like Casablanca, Mazagan, Safi and Mogador (and to a certain degree Miknās and Marrākush) the population of which is entirely or for the most part of rural origin and where the absence of an old nucleus of town-dwellers has not enabled them to become urbanised. The Moroccans however distinguish quite clearly such places from towns with a really urban culture, more or less influenced by Andalusian culture. The principal towns with urban dialects are Fās, Rabat-Salé, Tetwān, Taza, al-Qaṣr al-Kabīr; Tangier, Wazzān and Shafshāwan also have urban dialects but these are much contaminated by the surrounding highland dialects. Miknās and Marrākush have been influenced by the Beduin elements introduced by the makhzen groups into the dialects of these two old capitals. It is interesting to note the case of Azemmūr where the old town (Azemmūr al-Haḍar) has an urban dialect, while the new town, which has in recent years grown up beside it around the sanctuary of Mawlāy Abū Shu'aib (vulgo Bū Sh'aib), uses a Berber dialect. The urban dialects of Morocco form one group with those of the western part of the Central Maghrib, notably with those of Tlemcen, Nedroma and Algiers. Their phonetic characteristics are the loss of the interdentals of the classical language, the affricative pronunciation (ʕ) of tāʕ, the frequent attenuation of kāf to hamza. In Fās, b, m, k, g and ḍim assimilate the lām of the article and are treated as "solars"; the simple ḍim is pronounced like the French j (= Persian ج), but when it is geminated, it gives jj in Fās and ḍj in Tangier. The rāʕ is often pronounced very close to the French uvular r.

As peculiarities of the dialect of Fās, we may note the construction ketbetto "she has written it" for ketbet + o, and the use of an invariable relative ḍi representing the old dialectal dhī. Tangier and Tetwān have a preposition n, "to" which is used before nouns (med-dār "to the house") but not before suffixed pronouns. To translate "of", Marrākush uses t; the dialect of this town uses certain Berber adverbs: ashku "because", helli "only".

All the urban dialects use the characteristic prefix of the present indicative: ka- in the north, ta- in the south. Fās uses one almost as much as the other.

b. Highland dialects. These are at least as well known as those of the towns. In 1920 I published notes on that of the Tsūl and the Brānes in the north of Taza; in 1922, E. Lévi-Provençal published texts, prefaced by a grammatical sketch, of the dialects of the middle valley of the Wargha; since then I have had an opportunity of studying those of the Bni Hōzmar (near Tetwān), of the Mestāsa (near Bādes) and of the Ghzāwa (near Shafshāwan).

The highland dialects are of course more differentiated than the urban dialects. The tribes which use them belong to two political clans probably originally of different racial origin: the Ghumāra, the old inhabitants, and the Ṣanhādja, the invaders. In the present state of our knowledge it does not seem possible to make the dialects coincide with political or racial boundaries; but we can nevertheless recognise two main groups of highland dialects:

1. The northern dialects, extending from the Straits of Gibraltar to the south of Shafshāwan and embracing in the east the confederation of the Ghumāra; 2. the southern dialects, from Wazzān to Taza, used by two great classes of tribes: first, the Ṣanhādja tribes of the valley of the Wargha: Ṣanhādja of the Central Wargha, Ṣanhādja of the Sun and of the Shade, of Moṣbāh and of Gheddo; secondly, the Butr tribes, more or less closely related to the Zanāta and occupying the lands north of the region of Taza: Mernisa, Brānes, Tsūl, Maghrāwa and Meknāsa. It seems to be a historical fact that these Zanāta and Ṣanhādja peoples only settled in their present habitats long after the first Arab conquest; the Ṣanhādja of the Central Wargha certainly now occupy lands which before the Almoravid period were peopled by the Ghumāra. We should therefore regard these southern highland dialects as younger than those of the northern group. The slight differences noted between the two groups may then be due to two main causes: 1. an evolution of the neighbouring urban dialects which would have taken place during the period between the arabicisation of the Ghumāra and that of the Ṣanhādja-Zanāta; 2. the non-identity of the Berber substrata.

To the two main groups: Ghumāra and Ṣanhādja-Zanāta, we may perhaps add two little islands in the south: the highlanders of the region of Šefrū to the south of Fās (Bhālil, Bni Yazgha etc.), and the Ghiyyāta to the south of Taza; they probably constitute the last vestiges of a continuous Arabic-speaking bloc which stretched to the south of the Fās-Taza corridor, the existence of which in the xiith century we know from al-Idrīsī.

Phonetically, the Moroccan highland dialects are characterised by the profound changes undergone by the Arabic consonantal system as a result of the spirantisation of the dental and post-palatal occlusives. We find the interdentals ṭh and ḏh, which do not represent the classical interdentals; tā'-ṭhā' and dāl-ḏhāl have given in these dialects t and d respectively, which remain occlusive only at the beginning of the word or after a consonant or geminated; but after a vowel we have ṭh and ḏh: bent "daughter", plur. bnāṭh; after a vowel also kāf is pronounced as a spirant like the χ of modern Greek. The representative of the group ṣ-ṭ of the classical language is usually ṣ, sometimes hardened to t; but among the Ghumāra we have ḏh (= emphatic ḏhāl). The sound tsḥ is fairly common. The short vowels are commoner than in the towns; many of the short vowels i and u of the classical language are preserved; this is how we find a considerable number of imperfects iR¹ R² uR³ and a few iR¹ R² iR³.

As to morphology, the fem. personal suffixes -a (< -hā) and pl. -em (< -hum) are characteristic: they are the complement of the series begun by the masc. -u, -o (< -hu). Among the northern Jbāla we find the use of a suffix -esh marking the plural: it seems really to be a borrowing from Latin. The dual, reserved for names of parts of the body which occur in pairs and for names of various measurements (of weight, length, volume and time) is in -āyen: shahrāyen "two months", yiddāh "his hands". The relative, pronoun and adjective, is d. The classical construct state (iḏāfa) is very rare and is only found in a few stereotyped phrases: it is in general replaced by analytical constructions in which the preposition d "of" is used, expressing possession as well as the material of a thing.

Almost everywhere the prefixes of the 2nd pers. com. and of the 3rd pers. fem. of the aorist are de- (and not te-): dekteb "thou writest, she writes". The passive participle of hollow verbs is often of the type mef'āl: mebyā' "sold", meḥwās "filled up". Finally we may note a few traces of a passive of the form f'al-yef'al: kḥāṭ "to be taken". As evidence of conservatism, we may mention that in these dialects we have the word fā "mouth" which seems to have disappeared since old Arabic.

Just as the urban dialects of Morocco may be linked with a number of urban dialects of Algeria, so have the highland dialects of Morocco correspondents in the latter country. W. Marçais, who is the first to have isolated and described this group of Maghribī dialects and prefers to use the name of "parlers villageois" for them, classes along with the dialects of the Moroccan Jbāla two other similar groups, also characterised by the defacement of the Arabic consonant system (liquidation, affrication, spirantisation), by the use of turns of syntax and structural forms taken from Berber and by the juxtaposition in the vocabulary of Arabic elements sometimes strangely archaic and very abundant Berber elements. These are firstly the Oran group of the Trāra in the country which extends from Lalla Maghniya to the sea, a mountainous country traversed by the roads connecting Tlemcen, the capital of the Banū 'Abd al-Wād, with the ports of Hunain and Arshgūn. It is with the dialects of the Trāra that the dialects of these Moroccan Jbāla show most agreement.

The second group, which differs more, is that of the highland dialects of Eastern Kabylia, a mountainous region of the department of Constantine, traversed by the roads connecting Constantine with the ports of Djidjelli and Collo; this was also the old habitat of the Kutāma, whom their support of the Fātimid movement must have caused to be rapidly arabicised. Alongside of these three groups of highland dialects (Jbāla, Trāra, Eastern Kabylia), W. Marçais classes a fourth in the villages of the Tunisian Sāhel, which lie in the coast zone traversed by the roads which connect Kairawān with the ports of Sūs, Mahdiyya and Monastir. These Tunisian dialects, of which that of Takrūna, studied by W. Marçais, is a specimen, are however much arabicised and hardly seem to have been subjected in their phonetics, morphology, syntax and vocabulary to the profound Berber influences which characterise the first three groups.

In spite of their divergencies, which are due mainly to pronunciation and to the local use of words and phrases corresponding to two very distinct forms of culture, the urban dialects and the highland dialects cannot be either historically or linguistically separated. The fundamental disparity is that which exists between the urban and highland group and the Beduin group. It is the townsmen who have taught the highlanders to speak Arabic, but the urban dialects, used by individuals whose intellectual activity is greater, have evolved more rapidly. They are also more sensitive to external influence, literary and political. These facts added to the predominance of Berber blood in the highlands suffice to explain why the dialects of the Jbāla still seem coarse and quaint to the townsmen. On the other hand, the towns have been frequently repopulated, wholly or in part by people from the neighbouring hills. All this explains the family resemblance which the linguist finds between the dialects of the towns and those of the hills; perhaps the latter, being more conservative, are also the more interesting for the history of the language. W. Marçais regards them as valuable representatives of the Arabic spoken in the country district of the Maghrib before the coming of the Banū Hilāl and the Sulaim (cf. W. Marçais, Textes arabes de Takrouna, vol. i., preface, p. xxviii.).

The principal features which are common to the urban-highland group and which distinguish it from the Beduin group are the following:

- loss of the classical interdentals;
- pronunciation of kāf as k or hamza (and not g as among the Beduins);
- tendency to the syllabic grouping $R^1 R^2 e R^3$, when R^2 is not a laryngeal nor a sonant;
- rarity of the construct state;
- suffix of the 3rd pers. masc. sing. in -u, -o (and not -ah, as among the Beduins);
- relative rarity of the addition of personal suffixes, but regular use of the analytical phrase with dyāl: ed-dār dyāl-i, "my house";
- diminutive of $R^1 R^2 e R^3$ becomes $R^1 R^2 iyye R^3$: kliyyeb, "little dog";
- diminutive of adjectives of the types $R^1 R^2 e R^3$ (< class.: af'al) and $R^1 R^2 i R^3$ becomes $R^1 R^2 i R^2 e R^3$: hmimer, "a little red"; kbiber, "a little large";
- plural of the adjectives $R^1 R^2 e R^3$ (< class. af'al) becomes $R^1 ū R^2 e R^3$: kōhal, "black" (plur.);
- reductions of the plurals $C^1 C^2 ā C^3 i C^4$ to $C^1 C^2 ā C^3 e C^4$: mfālah, "keys";
- use of a verbal prefix to mark the indicative present: ka- or ʿa- in the towns and la-, ka-, a- in the hills;
- in the singular of the perfect, the feminine person is in general used for the masculine: e.g. ktebtī, "thou hast written" (m.), whence we find in Rabat for the plural, an analogous form ktebtū, "you have written";
- in the vocabulary, shhāl, "how much?"; dāba, "now"; lkā (rka, kka), "to do", are characteristic;
- in the imperfect of the defective verbs, the plural is formed on analogy of the singular: yebkūu, "they remain"; yebkūu, "they weep".

c. Beduin dialects. These are in Morocco the dialects of the plains: the Atlantic plain from Arzila to Mogador with its continuations into the interior, the valley of the Muliya, the plateaus of eastern Morocco and the region of the Moroccan Sahara (Wād Ghīr, Wād Ziz etc.); they are still little known; only that of the Hawwāra of Sūs has been studied, but only in Europe and from authorities who had already travelled a good deal elsewhere. That of the Dukkāla of the north (Ulād Bū 'Aziz, Ulād Fredj), have myself examined it corresponds in almost all its details to the dialect of the Ulād Brāhīm of Saīda (Orania) on which W. Marçais has written a monograph. There is no doubt that on examination one can divide the Beduin dialects into groups characterised by more or less conservatism; should those of the Ma'kil perhaps be separated from those of the Banū Hilāl? Perhaps a distinction should also be made between the dialects of the purely Arab tribes and those of the Atlantic regions where powerful Berber tribes (Hāha, Rāgrāga, Dukkāla, Baraghwāta) have been arabicised and more or less submerged by the Beduins. It should be remembered that in the historical period the latter have been infinitely less stable than the tribes of Berber origin (speaking Arabic or Berber); whether because they were taken to form the gish, which guards each large towns (environs of Fās, Meknes, Rabat-Sale and Marrākush) or because they were transported far from their original homes as a measure of repression (case of the Shārda), the Arab tribes of the Atlantic plains have become much broken up and mixed. The Beduin dialects which have most chance of having preserved their original character are those of the tribes of the Saharan steppes who have remained relatively stable and intact: Bni Gil, Mhāya, Dhwi Mni', Ulād Džir etc. In any case, the following are the main characteristics of these dialects: firstly the kāf is pronounced as g (= kāf ma'kūda), and it is already this pronunciation which for Ibn Khaldūn characterises the Beduin dialects of his time. The thā', dhāl and qād-qā' are retained with their interidental value. The short vowels are indistinct: the sound i is almost completely absent and many short unaccented vowels sound practically like a labial e. Characteristic are the appearance of an extremely short transitional vowel of u character, which is developed after k, g, kh and gh placed before a consonant or an ā; e.g. kūbār, "great" (plur.), igū'ed, "he sits down", khūrāfa, "tale", ghūzāl, "gazelle", shkwāra, "saddle-bag", rūgwāg, "thin" (plur.); a similar sound is found after bb, ff, mm and kk, gg, kk, kh-kh; e.g. luhgrubbwa, "the crows", nuffwākha, "a blow", rummwān, "pomegranate", sukkwār, "sugar", shukkwā, "piece (of cloth)", nukhkhkūwāl, "sound"; by analogy the combinations mw and fw when the w corresponds to a classical wāw, are reduced to mm and ff; e.g. lemmwīdā', "the (little) place", leffwād, "the entrails".

The retention of the accent on the first syllable causes "projected" syllabic forms: yékteb, "he writes", plur. yékketbu; méghgherbi, "Moroccan", múkkahla, "musket", béggerti, "my cow".

The personal suffix of the 3rd pers. masc. is -ah. The dialectal preposition translating "of" is nā' or tā', from the classical matā'; according as the word before it is feminine or plural, this preposition becomes nā't (tā't) or nāw (tāw).

It does not seem that the Beduin dialects know the use of the verbal prefix indicating the indicative present. In the plural personal forms of the defective verb, there is a reduction of the diphthong: glū-yégū, from the verb glā "to fry"; nsū-yénsū, from the verb nsā "to forget".

We may also note the use of a preposition li-, "to": gāl-līna, "he told us".

From the point of view of vocabulary, some words are characteristic of Beduin dialects: dār-idir, "to make, do", ba-ibi, "to wish", yemta, "when", yāmes, "yesterday", ḏharwek, ḏhurk, "now", from the classical ḏha'l-waqt. We may add the particle wāsh used to indicate interrogation: wāsh sheft flān?, "have you seen so and so?" and the phrase ma tlā-sh idji, "he no longer comes".

d. Jewish dialects. The Jews who emigrated from Spain have as a rule retained the use of an archaic Spanish; many have also learned Arabic for business reasons. Alongside of the Spanish Jews, we have in the Berber highlands and in the towns of the interior Moroccan Jews of unknown origin whom the former call forasteros (Span. "foreigners"); according to the district, they speak Berber or Arabic, but in the towns their dialects have not yet been studied. They have a literature in an Arabic dialect written in Hebrew characters (and called, certainly wrongly: Judaeo-Arabic): piyyutim, songs at family festivals (cf. Tadjouri, in Hesperis, iii, 1923, p. 408—420), satirical songs and songs dealing with real happenings; some of these texts have been printed at Fās and Constantine; a newspaper written in an Arabic dialect and printed in Hebrew characters called al-Hurriya "The Liberty" has been published at Tangier for a number of years.

e. Relations of the linguistic groups of Morocco to one another. Morocco appears to the philologist a wonderful field for the study of the influence of the substratum on an imported language, since the language of the substratum, i.e. Berber, is still alive alongside of the Arabic and quite well known. The results of the examination are very meagre: the phenomena actually ascribable to the action of the substratum alone are infinitesimal; this may, however, be due to the fact that Arabic, a Semitic language, and Berber, a proto-Semitic language, are not sufficiently differentiated.

From the phonetic point of view, there is hardly any sound change found in the highland dialects of the arabicised Berbers, for which a corresponding change cannot be found in the dialectal phenomena of old Arabic; only, perhaps their tendency to spirantisation should be connected with the identical tendency observed in the northern Berber dialects found in the confines of the Jbāla country.

If we consider the morphology, we see that in the highland dialects the verb has lost feminine forms of the plural of the old Arabic, which still survive in some Beduin dialects and are still found in Berber. A Berber origin has been sought for the use of the verbal prefix indicating the present of the indicative; but similar prefixes are found in Egypt and in Syria where there are very different substrata.

Certainly Berber is the scheme ta-—-t which forms nouns indicating trades (ta-bernaī-t, "trade of a mason") and names of abstract qualities (ta-ḥrāmī-t, "rogue"); it is however curious to note that in modern Berber, this scheme has not this significance and is only used to form the feminine and secondarily the diminutive.

In the syntax of the highland dialects, we find indisputable traces of Berber influence: plural treatment of singulars applied to liquids (water, urine), phrases translated or stereotyped, e.g. ḥā-in Ḳaddūr, "Ḳaddūr's brother", with retention of the Berber particle indicating belonging to, -in.

But it is in the vocabulary that the Berber sub-stratum makes its influence most felt. Whether surviving in the highland dialects or borrowed in the Beduin dialects, many of the terms relating to country life are Berber (names of plants, animals, rocks, agricultural implements and tools); they have often retained in Arabic the Berber pseudo-article a-, which, still felt to have its original value, makes them unfit to take the Arabic article also; alongside of the singular in a-, we usually have a Berber plural in a-ān also retained. It is curious by the way but intelligible to find in the highland dialects words of Arabic origin with the Berber article. These must be Arabic words borrowed and berberised at a time when the Jbāla still spoke Berber and which have been retained just as they were in their Arabic dialect after being arabicised, e.g. a-ḥfir, "ditch", plur. a-ḥefrān; in Tangier the nave of the mosque is called a-blāt; at Rabat two words imported from Europe have a Berber form: a-ṣṣīf, "the sultān's boat" and a-tāy, "tea".

Some Berber words have survived in the administrative language of the Makhzen: afrāg, "a wall of cloth surrounding the sultān's camp"; agḏāl, "a pasture reserved for the sultān's animals"; anzel, "lash to punish the guilty"; meswār, "syndic (naḳīb) of the sharifs".

The Beduin dialects naturally contain much fewer Berber elements than the urban dialects and still less than the highland dialects; their rustic vocabulary nevertheless made numerous borrowings from the technical vocabulary of the previous Berber tillers of the plains.

Within the Arabic area, the highland and urban dialects have borrowed a certain number of terms relating to the rural activities of the Beduins; they are as a rule revealed by the pronunciation of of ḳāf as g. The Beduin dialects in their turn borrow from the towns their words relating to a more advanced culture; but, for economic, political and, to a certain extent, aesthetic reasons, they give more than they borrow.

Some words, which are used in the urban and highland dialects as well as by the Beduin dialects but are unknown to the Spanish and Maltese dialects, are perhaps of "Hilālī" origin; the principal seem to be 'aud, "horse", ḥallūf, "boar" and ṣḥāf-ṣḥūf, "to see".

In addition to the Berber and Arabic elements, the Moroccan vocabulary contains a fairly important number of European loanwords. They come from the vocabulary of a higher culture and relate to the flora (in cultivation or its products), to agriculture, to food and dress, to furniture and housing, sometimes even to parts of the body. There are Greek or Latin borrowings of the oldest period, Romance or Spanish for later periods; but neither their meaning nor their phonetic treatment enables us always to be able to date accurately the time of their introduction and their origin.

These "European" loanwords are naturally found in larger numbers in Northern Morocco, which has been more subject to Mediterranean influences which, through refugees from Spain, have been felt as far as the northern part of the Middle Atlas. The Beduin dialects have escaped these influences (cf. 1. Simonet, Glosario de voces ibéricas y latinas usadas entre los Morabes, Madrid 1888; 2. Schuchardt, Die romanischen Lehnwörter im Berberischen, Vienna 1918; 3. G. S. Colin, Etymologies magribines, in Hespérus [1926 and 1927]; 4. A. Fischer, Zur Lautlehre des Marokkanisch-arabischen [chap. ii., iii. and Excurs.], Leipzig 1917).

Between the two extremes marked by the most conservative Beduin dialects and the most characteristic highland dialects lies a whole gamut of intermediate varieties, which are in the transitional stages; they include the highland dialects whose characteristic features have been reduced through contact with the plains of the southern periphery of the massif of the Jbāla, as well as certain dialects of Beduin type used in the Atlantic plains, notably in the non-ḥadriya towns. "But however extensive and deep may have been the interpenetration of the two types, it has not abolished their fundamental unlikeness" (W. Marçais).

In spite of the profound differences which separate them, the highland and Beduin dialects of Morocco (and of the Maghrib) agree in one essential and characteristic morphological feature: the forms sing. n—, plur. n—u in the first persons of the aorist. Now this fact is attested in the xiith century for Almoravid Spain and Norman Sicily, i.e. in languages from which Hilālī influence is clearly excluded; it is also found in Maltese; it must then be admitted that the two groups of dialects have independently brought about this innovation, which seems to have remained exceptional in the dialects of the east. The two groups agree also in the loss of short vowels in open syllables; this phonetic peculiarity is also found in many eastern dialects; but it is curious that it has become general in the Maghrib while the dialects of Spain and Egypt do not have it.

It is in the Documents inédits d'histoire almohade that we find the first information about Moroccan Arabic [use of bāsh, "in order that", mtā, "of", first persons of the aorist in n— (sing.), n—u (plur.)]; but we have to wait till D. de Torres to find a few phrases transcribed (cf. French transl., Paris 1636, p. 241, 323, 339). Mouëté, who was captured at sea by the Moors in 1670 and was for a long time a prisoner, has left us a Dictionnaire arabesque in French and Moroccan, in transcription (cf. Relation de la Captivité . . . , Paris 1683, pp. 330—362). The first grammatical notes were collected by Höst (cf. Efterretninger . . . , 1779, ch. 8, p. 202—210), who has also given us a Berber-Danish-Moroccan Arabic vocabulary (op. cit., p. 128—133). It is to Fr. de Dombay that we owe the first monograph on Moroccan dialects, which is also the first serious contribution to the study of Arabic dialects; the dialect which he deals with is that of Tangier (Grammatica linguae mauro-arabicae, Vindobonae 1800). Since then, there have been a number of studies: for works before 1911 see the bibliography given by W. Marçais in his Textes arabes de Tanger, p. 207—213; for later works see the bibliography in Textes arabes de Rabat by L. Brunot (now in the press).

2. Literature of the Arabic dialects. Like all popular literatures, the literature of the Arabic dialects of Morocco is essentially poetical. The only texts in prose are those which have been collected recently by European students of dialects.

In the Arabic poetry of Morocco two periods must be distinguished: the first extending down to the beginning of the Sa'dian dynasty; the first known texts are those which Ibn Khaldūn gives at the end of his Muqaddima among the specimens of the poetry of the towns. To these we may add a mass of poems composed in honour of the Prophet (Mawlidīyāt) of which numerous collections exist in manuscript. Leo Africanus (ed. Schefer, ii., p. 130) says that under the Marinids, poets used to compose verses in "vulgar African" on the Mawlid and also on erotic subjects. These poems were recited in the presence of the sulṭān, who gave prizes to the winners of the competition. From this group cannot be separated the poems which accompany classical Moroccan music, "Andalusian" music, many of which must have been composed in Morocco; these were collected and classified by al-Ḥā'ik, a musician of Spanish origin who had settled in Tetwān. All these poems belonging to this first period are written in the Spanish Arabic dialect, which after the great success of the Cordovan Ibn Kuzmān (xiith century) became the classical language of the new poetic genre called zadjal, which had this in common with the muwashshah that, while employing like it new metres, its prosody was based like the classical metre on the quantity long or short of the syllables, but the zadjal differed from the muwashshah in that it was written in the Spanish dialect and not in the classical language.

The main characteristics of the poetry of the Moroccan dialects of the first period are attention to the quantity of each syllable as in Latin and the use of the Spanish dialect.

The second period, on the other hand, is distinguished by a system of prosody founded exclusively on the number of syllables in each verse (as in French) and by the use of a special language called melhūn, a kind of rowf adapted to literary purposes, based on the Moroccan dialect but influenced partially by the Beduin dialects; it seems moreover that this poetry is of Beduin origin and it was under the beduinising dynasties of the Sa'dians and 'Alawids that it arose and flourished.

The first known author of a ḥaṣida written in melhūn appears in the xvth century: he was Abū Fāris 'Abd al-'Azīz al-Maghrawī, who was one of the poets of the Sa'dian Sulṭān al-Manṣūr al-Dhahabī (1578—1602). His fame is still great and is preserved in the proverb: Kull ṭwīl khāwī, ghēr en-nekhla u-lmeghrāwī "Nothing that is long is of interest except the palm-tree and al-Maghrawī". Other poets followed him. It was at this time that the saint 'Abd al-Rahmān al-Madjdhub al-Dukkālī (d. in 1569) wrote his mystic rubā'iyyāt, but many of the verses now attributed to him are apocryphal. After these we have the poets from Tlemcen, an important centre of melhūn poetry; first Sa'īd b. 'Abd Allāh al-Mindāsī al-Tilimsānī, author of the celebrated Aḥkīya, who left his native town to live at the court of the first 'Alawid Sulṭān Muḥammad b. al-Sharīf (d. in 1664) and al-Rashīd (d. in 1672); a pupil of al-Mindāsī, Aḥmad b. al-Turaiki, banished from Tlemcen in 1672 by the Turks, also came to settle in Morocco among the Bni Znāsen. But we have to come down to the xviiith and especially the xixth century for the coming of a whole school of poets writing in melhūn. The three principal centres of literary activity were Fās, Meknes and Marrākush. The subjects treated are most varied: love poems, mystic, erotic and satirical (discussion between a white woman and a negress, between a townswoman and a Beduin woman etc.), political (on the occasion of the French conquest and the establishment of the protectorate), didactic (manufacture of powder, target-shooting, falconry) poems or burlesques (parodies of khutbas declaimed by the students at their fêtes).

Among the numerous authors we may mention: Si Muḥammad b. Sulaimān, Si al-Tihāmī al-Madaghri, al-Gandūz, al-Hunsh; he owes humorous qaṣidas to Si al-Madani al-Turkumānī of Marrākush; Si Qaddūr al-'Alamī buried at Meknes specialised in mystical and ethical poetry. The Darḳāwī Muḥammad al-Harrāk of Tetwān (d. 1845) also wrote mystical qaṣidas in melhūn which are collected at the end of the lithographed edition of his Diwān (Tunis 1331; Fās, n.d.). At the beginning of the 20th century, al-Sa'dānī of Fās was composing political qaṣidas.

Melhūn poetry has completely replaced poetry in the Spanish dialect; it constitutes a very vigorous branch of literature, much in favour with all classes of society; we frequently find almost illiterate authors, and people say that their talent is a poetic gift given by God (mawhūb); on the other hand, even the rulers have not disdained this popular poetry and one of the last 'Alawid Sulṭāns, Mawlāy 'Abd al-Ḥafīz, wrote numerous qaṣidas in melhūn which have been collected in a Diwān lithographed at Fās.

Alongside of this men's poetry, there are the songs of the women (songs of women working at the mill, songs of gleaners, songs of family fêtes, lullabies), the children's songs which are often strangely conservative, epigrams and proverbs [cf. A. Fischer, Das Liederbuch eines marokkanischen Sängers, Leipzig 1918; C. Sonneck, Chants arabes du Maghreb, Paris 1902 (Nrs. 5, 6, 11, 12, 13, 14, 74, 84, 85, 88, 89, 94-97, 115 and 116 are Moroccan); E. Lévi-Provençal, Un chant populaire religieux du Djebel Marocain, in Revue Africaine, 1918; H. de Castries, Les gnomes de Sīdy Abd er-Rahman el-Medjedoub, Paris 1896; on the poetry melhūn in general, cf. Abū 'Alī al-Ghawthī, Kashf al-Kinā' 'an Ālāt al-Šimā', Algiers 1904, p. 49-93; S. Biarnay, Notes d'ethnographie et de linguistique nord-africaines, Paris 1924 (songs of women and children); L. Brunot, Proverbes et dictons arabes de Rabat, in Hespéris, 1928 (with Moroccan bibliography of the subject).

III. Other Languages. A sketch of the languages of Morocco which only took account of Berber and Arabic dialects would be incomplete, for three other elements of secondary importance have to be considered:

a. Classical Arabic, the official language is used only in writing, for sermons, lectures and conferences; it is never the language of conversation. But as religious studies are considerably developed in the towns (especially Fās) and also among the Jbāla (Qur'anic studies and especially ḫirā'āt), many words of classical Arabic have been introduced into the popular dialect by the educated classes. The phonetic peculiarity to notice in borrowed classical words is the retention of the short vowels of the classical language, as a result of the process of elongation; e.g. classical qahīr, plur. qahā'ir, "decree of the sulṭān", borrowed by the popular dialect in the form qāḥēr, whence a dialect plural qawāhar. Several Qur'anic expressions or phrases of exegesis hence passed into everyday language as adverbs: bellātī "guilty" (taken from Qur'an vi. 153), b-et-tāwīl "slowly", lit. "in commenting on", wa-ḫīla "perhaps". Morocco, as a whole being little arabicised, seems incapable of borrowing a part of the classical vocabulary and adapting it to its own dialect. Its borrowings from classical Arabic almost always look like borrowings from a foreign language.

b. Spanish was the only language spoken by many of the Muslims of Spain, who in the 17th century and especially in the 18th took refuge in Morocco, mainly at Tetwān and Rabat-Sale. Mouëtte, who was taken a prisoner to Morocco in 1670, says that Spanish was as common there as Arabic; his remark is probably true only of the towns already mentioned. The descendants of these emigrants from Spain later learned Arabic and forgot Spanish, under the influence of Islāmic culture. Not having been subject to the latter influence, the Jews of Spanish origin still speak an archaic Spanish, sprinkled with Arabic terms moulded to the flexions of Latin morphology.

c. At the present day, in the palace of the sulṭān, many servants of both sexes still speak Sūdānese dialects, but these seem to have had no influence on the Arabic dialects of Morocco. No trace has so far been found of the existence in Morocco of secret languages; one could hardly put in this category the argots of certain guilds (butchers) nor those of the students, the originality of which consist simply in transposing certain letters of each word of the ordinary language and in the addition of certain prearranged syllables.

VIII. INTELLECTUAL LIFE.

More especially since the end of the middle ages, Morocco has occupied a place by itself, often important, in the history of Muslim civilisation. From the point of view of intellectual life, it was for long under the tutelage, more or less marked, of neighbouring countries, and it was only from the time it became an independent state with well-defined frontiers that it began to show independence in this respect also. The great activity at the centres of learning in Arab Spain down to the end of the 13th century had undoubtedly an influence in Morocco, but it was after the return of the Iberian Peninsula to Christianity, that, owing to the migration of refugees from Spain to Morocco, where there happened to be ruling princes anxious to further Islāmic studies, it was able to preserve the last and only centres of study in the Muslim west. In any case, in spite of the relatively large number of scholars which it has produced in various branches of 'ilm, this country is far from having inherited in the eyes of the rest of Islām the reputation and intellectual prestige, which Spain enjoyed when it was a Muslim country. However, it may be said that the towns of Morocco have always held in recent centuries a large proportion of men of letters, much attached to their traditional culture. Lastly, it may be noted that this culture, to the end of the 16th century at least, never allowed the slightest place for modern sciences, the study of which, if it has gradually become more or less established in the Muslim east, has never interested the west.

The characteristic feature of this culture, which is essentially founded on religion, is that it has remained unchanging. In this country, where only a few years ago tradition strictly regulated all acts of public and private life, it is not surprising that the intellectual ideal has always remained the same. It has already been remarked that the Moroccan faḳīh of to-day, whether he be magistrate, teacher, or official of the Sharīfian government, possesses the same stock of knowledge as a faḳīh of the periods of the Marīnids or Saʿdians. The same instruction has been given him and by the same methods. He has received first of all an elementary education in the Qurʾānic school [see MAKTAB], he has learned the Qurʾān by heart, often completely, and some of the elements of grammar. Next he became a student (ṭālib), and the ṭalab al-ʿilm, which he studied, is governed by no rules or programmes other than the traditional ones. He first of all studied the "mother-works" (um-mahāt), compendia made to be memorised readily, on theology and grammar (usually the Murshīd al-Muʾin of Ibn ʿAshīr and the Adjurrumiya). It was only then that he entered upon a more thorough study of more advanced texts, usually commentaries (sharḥ) or glosses (hāshiya) on works (matn) of established reputation and exclusively Islāmic in character. The whole trend of his studies is toward a better knowledge of theology and law.

The result is that in most cases in Morocco men of learning are almost entirely jurists and that they differentiate between purely Islāmic sciences (ʿulūm) and profane learning (funūn) with some contempt for the latter. We understand also why the part played by Morocco in Arabic literature is primarily in the domain of subjects directly connected with the Qurʾān and the Sunna, theology, law and uṣūl.

The centres of learning have varied with periods and historical circumstances. The early ones seem to have been the points nearest to Spain, Ceuta and Tangier. The foundation of Fās and the building in this city of the great Mosque of the ʿKairawānis (Djāmiʿ al-Ḳarawīyīn) facilitated the establishment of a centre of culture in the interior. A little later, Marrākush, the capital of the Almoravids and of the Almohads, became by desire of its rulers the centre of attraction for Maghribī scholars and even for a certain number from Spain. But it is from the Marīnid dynasty, who saw in the development of educational centres in Morocco a means to make themselves popular in the country and to acquire prestige in the eyes of the Muslim world, that the rise of Fās as an intellectual centre dates: it was the metropolis of learning in the country from the xivth century. Not only did the Marīnid princes make it the political capital but by the foundation of a series of colleges or madrasas (in Morocco: medersa) around the Djāmiʿ al-Ḳarawīyīn and mosque of New Fās, they were able to attract to this city a host of students from all parts of the country and to give it the renown for learning, which it still jealously claims to-day. In the Marīnid period, madrasas were also multiplied outside Fās: Meknes, Salé and Marrākush had their own, which shows that regular education was given in these towns.

In addition to the part played by the madrasas, there was the activity of the zāwiyas, directly connected with the development of maraboutism and sharīfism in the country in the period when the Spaniards and Portuguese were trying to establish themselves in Morocco in the xvth century. The zāwiyas, religious centres, headquarters of the djihad, naturally became centres of teaching. At the time when Fās could only with difficulty keep its character as the principal centre of learning in the country, the zāwiyas, in which teaching was carried on, became more and more numerous; e.g. the zāwiya of al-Dilaʾ in the Middle Atlas, the zāwiya of Tāmgrūt in the land of Daʿra and the zāwiya of Wazzān in the north. The most famous scholars were frequently either heads of brotherhoods or shorfa, who taught in the mother-house of their order.

We do not intend here to give a detailed sketch of the Arabic literature of Morocco, but will be content with a few general indications and names distinguishing where possible, between Islāmic and profane sciences.

It was not till the Muslim west adopted the Mālikī rite that Morocco began to produce work in the domain of ʿilm in close accord, as already mentioned, with the school of Spain. In this period of intellectual dependence, the relations between the two countries were continued and the Maghribī students down to the xiiith century considered a sojourn in Cordova, Murcia or Valencia necessary to finish their course. The east did not yet seem to exert the attraction that it did later. At this period, besides, the islāmisation and arabicisation of the Berber masses was still too recent. Only a few names may be mentioned for this early period, Darrās b. Ismāʿīl, of whom much that is recorded is legendary; the famous reformer Ibn Tūmart [q.v.], creator of the Almohad movement and author of several risāla or ʿakīda on his teaching; the qāḍī ʿIyād [q.v.], born at Ceuta in 476 (1083), d. at Marrākush in 544 (1149), author of numerous works on Muslim learning, of which the most famous are the Kitāb al-Shifāʾ and the Mashārik al-Anwār with a collection of biographies of learned Mālikīs, entitled al-Madārik.

During the modern period, on the other hand, the number of learned Moroccans becomes more and more considerable. The best known are for ḵirāʾat: Ibn Barrī (eighth century A.H.); Ibn Fakhkhār (ninth century); the scholar of Meknès Ibn Ghāzī († 919); ʿAbd al-Raḥmān Ibn al-Ḳāḍī († 1082); ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Idrīs Mandjira († 1179); Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Salām al-Fāsi († 1214); for ḥadīth: Yaḥyā al-Sarrādjī († 808); Suḳḳain al-ʿAshīmī († 956); Ridwān al-Djīnawī († 991); Muḥammad b. Ḳāsim al-Ḳaṣṣār († 1012); Idrīs al-ʿIrāḳī († 1228); for fiqh: Abu ʿl-Ḥasan al-Ṣughaiyir, commentator of the Mudawwana; al-Djazzūlī [q.v.] and Aḥmad Zarṛūk (ninth century) commentators of the Risāla of Ibn Abī Zaid al-Ḳairawānī; al-Wansharīsi († 995); al-Mandjūr († 995); Ibn ʿAshīr († 1040); Maiyāra († 1072); for philology: al-Makkūdī († 807); Ibn Zakrī († 899). Their works have for the most part been recorded and will be found detailed either in Brockelmann, G. A. L. or in Bencheneb's work on the individuals mentioned in the Iḍāʿa of ʿAbd al-Ḳādir al-Fāsi. Only a small number have found a place in eastern libraries; but on the other hand, they all form the foundations of the collections of manuscripts formed and preserved in the imperial palaces and mosques of Morocco.

Some Moroccan scholars have written works on adab or collections of poems, in addition to books of a strictly Muslim character. None of them can claim any great originality and purely literary diwāns are rare. Poetry, as a rule — when it is not didactic (urđjūsa) —, is religious or mystic. At the courts, there were always a few literary men maintained by the princes, who were the panegyrists, often very lurid, of their patrons.

It is at the courts also, especially from the xivth century, that we find the few historians who have given us original chronicles or compilations. Their works, planned on a singularly curious conception of history, have nevertheless the merit of giving us the only detailed information about the political history of the country in the period of the author or immediately preceding it. Those which date from the Middle Ages are however much the best. The kind of work not only did not improve later, but became simply dry chronicles in which events are related in a brief and colourless fashion.

The early historians of Morocco — if we except the Berber genealogists about whom we do not know very much — are contemporaries of the Almoravid dynasty. A little later, the Almohads find a historian in the person of a companion of the Mahdī Ibn Tūmart, Abū Bakr al-Baidhāk al-Ṣanhājī, the interest of whose memoirs contrasts strikingly with many later chronicles. Alongside of the work of al-Baidhāk may be placed the chronicles of Ibn al-Kaṭṭān and of ‘Abd al-Wahid al-Marrākushī as of high value. But it was in the Marinid period that the historian found most favour in Morocco. Leaving out Ibn Khaldūn, whom Morocco is not the only one to claim, we may mention Ibn ‘Idhārī, a scholar of Marrākush, to whom we owe a history of North Africa and Spain, the Bayān al-Mughrib; that of Ibn Abī Zar’, author of a history of Fās and the Moroccan dynasties, Rawḍ al-Kirfās; Ibn Marzūk, author of the Musnad, a monograph on the sultān Abu ‘l-Ḥasan ‘Alī; Ibn al-Aḥmar of the family of the kings of Granada, author of the Rawḍat al-Nisrīn. Under the Sa’dians, the principal historians were al-Fishtālī, al-Ifrānī, author of the Nuṣṣat al-Ḥādī; finally under the ‘Alawids, al-Zaiyānī and Akenūs.

Geography is represented in modern Moroccan literature only in the form of riḥlas or accounts of the travels of pilgrims, in which the description of the country passed through only occupies an insignificant place. Nevertheless, the geographer al-Idrīsī [q. v.] and the great traveller Ibn Baṭṭūṭa were of Moroccan origin.

The biographical literature of Morocco is considerable. The collections of manāḳib [q. v.] of saints, monographs dealing with families of shorfa or religious brotherhoods are abundant, especially in the modern period. There are also collections by town or century, some of which are of a certain interest, even from the point of view of history. All these biographies have been surveyed in E. Lévi-Provençal, Les Historiens des Chorfa. The most notable biographers down to the middle of the xivth century are Ibn ‘Askar, author of the Dawḥat al-Nāshir; Ibn al-Kāḍī, author of the Durrat al-Hidjāl and the Djadhwat al-Iktibās; the historian al-Ifrānī, author of the Ṣafwāt man intaṣhar; and al-Kādirī, author of the Nashr al-Mathānī and the Ilṭikāt al-Durar.

As to medicine and natural science, Morocco down to the xivth century was closely dependent on Spain. The physicians of the Al-moravid and Almohad princes were from Spain, like Ibn Bādja (Avenpace), Ibn Ṭufail and the celebrated Ibn Rushd (Averroes) and Ibn Zuhīr (Avenzoar). In the modern period, we find at the courts of the sultāns several physicians of Moroccan origin who have left works. The chief were, in the Sa’dian period: Abū Muḥammad al-Kāsim al-Wazīr al-Ghassānī, in the ‘Alawid period: Ibn Shukrūn, ‘Abd al-Wahhāb Adarrāk, Aḥmad al-Darā’ī, ‘Abd Allāh b. ‘Azzūz al-Marrākushī, Aḥmad Ibn al-Ḥādjīdj and ‘Abd al-Salām al-‘Alamī. Finally two famous Moroccans studied the exact science of the xiiith century: Abū ‘Alī al-Ḥasan b. ‘Umar al-Marrākushī, author of a treatise on astronomical instruments, part of which has been translated by Sédillot, and Aḥmad Ibn al-Bannā’, to whom we owe several works on arithmetic, geometry, algebra, astronomy, astrology and alchemy.

At the end of the xivth century, the reign of Mawlāi al-Ḥasan was marked by a kind of renaissance in Muslim studies in Morocco, particularly characterised by the need which writers felt of getting their works printed to make them more widely known. The lithographic presses of Fās acquired a certain importance at this time and began to publish texts which had hitherto circulated only in manuscript. A little later, there appeared at Fās the three volumes of the Salwat al-Anfās of Aḥmad b. Dja’far al-Kattānī [q. v.], an excellent biographical dictionary of the celebrities of the northern capital. At the same time, there was published in Cairo the great Moroccan history of Aḥmad b. Khālid al-Nāṣirī al-Salawī [q. v.] entitled Kitāb al-Itikāṣ li-Akhbār Duwal al-Maghrib al-aḳṣā.

The establishment of the French protectorate in Morocco and the remarkable spread of French civilisation in the large towns have already profoundly modified the intellectual ideals of the younger generation in Morocco. It is however still too early to foretell the orientation that Arabic literature will take in this country in the years to come.

MORÓN, Arab. MAWZŪR, a little town in the south of Spain, on the right bank of the Guadaira and at the foot of the Sierra de Morón to the S. W. of Cordova and S. E. of Seville. It was in the Muslim period the capital of a kūra or district and an agricultural centre with numerous olive-groves. At the beginning of the tenth century, it was one of the centres of resistance of the famous rebel 'Umar b. Ḥafṣūn; its citadel was taken by the troops of 'Abd al-Raḥmān III in 311 (923). In the next century during the period of the petty kingdoms of the reyes taifas, Morón was the capital of a little Berber dynasty, the Banū Dammār, Abāḍīs from the region of Gabes in Tunisia. The first member of the dynasty to declare his independence in 433 (1041) was Muḥammad b. Nūḥ; his father Nūḥ b. Abī Tarīd had lived at Morón from 1013 without actually recognising the government of Cordova. Muḥammad b. Nūḥ soon excited the jealousy of the 'Abbāḍid of Seville al-Mu'taḍid who made an attempt on his life. He died in 449 (1057). His son Manād 'Imād al-Dawla, who succeeded him, was soon besieged in Morón by al-Mu'taḍid and in return for life and liberty surrendered the town in 458 (1066). Morón and its territory were annexed to the kingdom of Seville and henceforth shared the fate of the capital.

MOROS. [See MOORS.]

MOSTAGANEM (MUSTAḠĤĀNIM), a coast town in Algeria, eight miles E. of the mouth of the Shelif (5' E. Long. [Greenwich]) does not occupy the site of any known ancient town. There is no natural harbour here; two capes, not particularly well marked (Kharuba and Salamander), leave vessels without protection against winds from the north and west. It is therefore not as a port that al-Bakrī (xith century) mentions Mostaganem for the first time. He describes it as a town situated "not far from the sea" (it is less than a mile away) living on the produce of its rich territory, notably the cotton plantations. From this time onwards it was surrounded by a wall which strengthened its natural defences. The old town occupies a triangular plateau formed by the sharp bend of the 'Ain Sefra and the wall runs along the top of the ravine. On the point of this natural stronghold, the Almoravid Yūsuf b. Tāshfīn is said to have built in 1082 a fortress which was later called Burdj al-Maḥāl, from the name of one of the tribes of the neighbourhood, and is now a prison. Like the other towns of the coast, Nedroma or Algiers, Mostaganem was probably given a small Almoravid garrison. Thus strengthened, the town would serve as a place of refuge against an attack from the sea and one could keep at a distance the Berber tribes of the hinterland, who belonged for the most part to the Maghrāwa confederation. It must thus have developed to some extent. In the middle of the xiith century, Idrīsī tells us that it had bazaars and baths; he emphasises the abundance of the water which irrigated the gardens and orchards and drove mills.

The name of Mostaganem does not figure in history throughout all this period when the Almohads in theory held the central Maghrib. The decline of the Almohads enabled the Maghrāwa to become completely masters of the country. In 1267 and 1271 the Zaiyānīd sultān of Tlemsen Yaghmorāsān reduced these turbulent tribes and incorporated their lands in the empire which he had founded. In 680 (1281) he entrusted the government of Mostaganem to one of his cousins, al-Zā'im b. Yaḥyā, a descendant of one of the collateral branches of the family of the Banū Zaiyān, in spite of the lack of confidence he had in those relatives whom he had deprived of the throne. These fears proved well founded. Al-Zā'im, having roused the Maghrāwa to rebel, declared himself independent. Yaghmorāsān had to march on Mostaganem; he blockaded the town strictly and the rebel surrendered after obtaining permission to cross to Spain.

Like all the coast region, Mostaganem in 735 or 736 (1335—1336) passed to the Merinid Abu 'l-Ḥasan, who was engaged in the siege of Tlemsen. In 742 (1340) the victorious sultān built a mosque in Mostaganem. We have an inscription attesting this foundation of the interregnum of the Moroccan princes. Regained by the sultāns of Tlemsen, the town suffered disastrously from their weakness. The Sowaid Arabs of the great Zoghba confederation became undisputed masters of the whole district. Mostaganem led a precarious existence. Leo Africanus at the beginning of the xvith century says that it occupied only a third of its former area. He credits it with 1,500 hearths, however, tells us of the weavers and of the roadstead to which ships from Europe came. He says the river runs "through the city", which shows that in addition to the old stronghold on the left bank there were now quarters on the right bank. In the Turkish period we know of two suburbs: Tidjīt (the New) and Matmor (the Silo). In 1516 Khair al-Dīn [q.v.] considerably strengthened its defences. Shaw at the beginning of the xviiith century speaks of the citadel (the Fort of the East?) which, built on a height, commanded the town and vicinity. In 1830 the garrison consisted of some hundreds of Turks and Kuloḡlis. The French took them into their service and put them under the command of the Kā'id Ibrāhīm. Distrusting the loyalty of the latter and thinking he had an agreement with the Medjāher, an unsubdued tribe of the neighbourhood, General Desmichels occupied the town in 1833. The troops whom he stationed there were attacked by 'Abd al-Kādir. The vexatious results of the treaty signed by Desmichels with the Emīr forced Clauzel to retake Mostaganem (1835). Under Bugeaud, Mostaganem became the point of disembarkation and the centre of operations against 'Abd al-Kādir. It was there that in 1847 the first battalion of Algerian Tirailleurs (Turcos) was raised, and the town has since been an important centre for recruiting native troops.

Mostaganem has developed considerably since the early days of the French occupation; it has now over 27,000 inhabitants. Its harbour, which owes nothing to nature, has been improved by two jetties which still afford only a rather mediocre shelter to shipping.

MOSTAR, the capital of the Herzegovina in the kingdom of Jugoslavia, one hundred miles S. W. of Sarajevo, on the Sarajevo—(Mostar—) Dubrovnik railway. By the new (Oct. 3, 1929) division of Jugoslavia into nine banats, Mostar passed to the coast banat, the capital of which is Split (Spalato). The picturesque town lies two hundred feet above sea-level on both banks of the Neretva (Narenta) between the slopes of the Podvelež and the Hum. The old quarters of the town (Konak, Čaršhya etc.) are in the east, the new in the west. In 1929, the number of inhabitants was 18,038 (in 1921 a little more: 18,176). Mostar covers an area of 16 square kilometres, has 2,916 houses, 33 mosques, 2 Serbian Orthodox and one Roman Catholic church. Mostar has a district mufti and a shari'at judge (ḥādī). Its trade is considerable as is its production of fruit, wine and tobacco. The climate is warm and windy.

In the time of the Roman empire, there was a colony in the plain of Mostar, which was destroyed during the period of migrations. In the centuries following, the immigrant Slavs conquered the Zahumlye district with its capital Blagay (near the modern Mostar). According to the Dalmatian writers Orbini and Luccari (both at the beginning of the xviith century), the new town of Mostar was founded in 1440 by Radivoy Gost, a vassal of Stefan Vukčić Kosača, afterwards Duke of St. Sava. In historical documents the earliest mention is in 1452 of the two forts on the Neretva bridge (do castelli al ponte de Neretua); the name of the town itself is not found till 1499.

It was only after the Turkish conquest of the Herzegovina (1483; cf. v. Hammer, *G.O.R.*², i. 628), which resulted in the decline of Blagay that the new settlement began to develop rapidly, first as an important strategic point in the Neretva valley, then as a prosperous commercial town in addition. Since it grew up around a wooden bridge, it was called simply Most (bridge), Mosti or Mostar, properly Mostari (plur., "the bridgers"). This "place of the bridge" was by 1522 the residence of the Turkish sanjakbeg of the Herzegovina, who had previously lived in Foča. According to Ḥādjđji Khalifa, the crossing of the Neretva was exceedingly dangerous: the wooden bridge, being on chains, had no piers and swung so that "one only crossed it in fear of death". The inhabitants therefore petitioned Sulṭān Sulaimān to have a stone one built in its place. The architect sent by the Sulṭān, the celebrated Sinān [q. v.], is said to have declared it impossible to build a bridge at this spot, whereupon a local architect built the fine bridge which crosses the river in a single bold arch, thirty yards in length and sixty feet high. This is said to have been done in 974 (1566—1567). The two Turkish chronograms given by Ewliyā Ćelebi قدرت کبری actually give this date. This bridge not only gave Mostar its name but formed its chief sight, as it still is. The French traveller A. Poulet in 1658 says that its "fabrique est plus hardie, sans comparaison, & des plus d'étendue que n'est pas celle de Realte à Venise, quoy qu'elle y soit estimée vne merueille" (cf. Glasnik zemaljskog muzeja u Bosni i Hercegovini (hereafter quoted as: Gl. z. m.), xx. [1908], 49). A modern traveller regards the old bridge at Mostar as the finest in the whole world (R. Michel, Fahrten in den Reichslanden. Bilder und Skizzen aus B. und der H. [Vienna and Leipzig, 1912], p. 31). In his earlier book on Mostar he describes this bridge as a "crescent in stone". The building of the bridge was often ascribed to the Romans and indeed its foundations perhaps date from them but the modern bridge undoubtedly dates from the Turkish period and "is the work of Dalmatio-Italian architects" (J. de Asboth, An official tour through Bosnia and Herzegovina [London 1890], p. 257).

Ewliyā Ćelebi visited Mostar in 1075 (1664—1665) and gives in his diary a number of details about the town, e.g. that it has fifty-three maḥallas, three thousand and forty solidly built houses of stone, three hundred and fifty shops and forty-five mosques. Of the latter he mentions eight by name: 1. Old mosque in the Čaršhya, built in 878 (1473); 2. Ḥādjđji Mehmedbeg mosque, built in 965 (1557); 3. Masjid of Ḥādjđji 'Alīaghā in the Čaršhya, built in 1016 (1607); 4. Defterdār-pasha mosque, built in 1017 (1608); 5. Koşki (قوصقى) Mehmedpasha mosque, built in 1027 (1617); 6. Ibrāhīmāghā, built in 1044 (1634); 7. Rūznamedji Ibrāhīm-Efendi-mosque and 8. Ḥādjđji 'Alī mosque. For the two latter mosques neither the chronogram nor the year of building is given. The finest and largest of all is the mosque of Ḥādjđji Mehmed Bey, which is usually called "Karagoyzbeğova džamiya". The monograph, quoted below, by Peez gives the names of twenty-seven mosques and twenty-six vakufs (wakf) and in each case he mentions whether their foundation records are preserved or not.

It the course of the xviith and xviiith century Mostar was several times threatened by Venetian troops (1652, 1693, 1717). At a late date (1763), the Herzegovina was incorporated in the wilāyet of Bosnia and Mostar was only the residence of the musellim. This lasted till 1832, when the land was again made a wilāyet and Mostar became the headquarters of the newly appointed Herzegovinian wazīr 'Alī Paşa Rizvanbegović.

During the Turkish period Mostar produced a number of men of note in Turkish and Muslim literature and learning. Of poets we may note: 1. Dīyārī (d. 972 = 1564); 2. Derwish Paşa (Bayezidagī; 1599 and in 1601 governor of Bosnia); 3. his son Ahmedbeg Şabūhī and 4. Ahmed Rushdī (born 1047 = 1637). The following learned men were natives of Mostar: 1. 'Alī Dede b. Muştāfā (d. 1007 = 1598); 2. Muştāfā Aiyūbizāde, called Şheyuyo (d. 1119 = 1707), Mufti of Mostar, commentator of various works; 3. Ahmed Efendi Mostarī (Mostarac; d. 1190 = 1776), whose fetwās (Fetāwā-i Ahmed) were very popular in Bosnia, and 4. Muştāfā Şidkī (Karabeg), Mufti of Mostar (murdered in 1878), whose comprehensive Ḥaṣḥiya... 'alā Mir'at al-Uṣūl was printed in Sarajevo (1316).

A few days after the murder of the last-named, Mostar was taken without resistance by the Austrian troops (Aug. 5, 1878) and on Oct. 5, 1908, annexed to the Danube monarchy, in which it remained till 1918. During these forty years (1878–1918) Mostar was frequently the centre of Muslim (and of Serbian Orthodox) opposition to the government. In Mostar originated also the Muslim agitation for autonomy in religious affairs (cf. i., p. 760), which went on for ten years (1899–1909). The leader of the movement, 'Alī Fehmī Džabić, the then mufti of Mostar, had to escape to Constantinople at the end of January 1902, where he was appointed professor of Arabic literature in the University, in which capacity he published among other things his book Ḥusn al-Ṣaḥāba fī Ṣarḥ Ash'ar al-Ṣaḥāba (Constantinople 1324). In connection with the struggle for religious autonomy, there was published (from 1906) the Muslim political paper Musāwāt (in spite of its Arabic title written in the Serbo-Croat language). Shortly before the World War, a Muslim family paper Biser ("Pearl") (from 1912) was started in Mostar and a Muslimanska biblioteka (Muslim Library) which attained thirty volumes.

Since the dissolution of the Austro-Hungarian Monarchy in 1918, Mostar has belonged to Jugoslavia.

MÖŞUL (AL-MAWŞIL), the capital of Diyār-Rabi'a [q. v.] on the west bank of the Tigris, opposite the ancient Niniveh.

Whether the town already existed in antiquity is unknown. E. Herzfeld (Archäol. Reise, ii. 207, 259) has suggested that Xenophon's Μέσπιλα reproduces its old name and that we should read

Μέσπιλα* (= Mawşil); but against this view we have the simple fact that this town lay on the east bank of the Tigris (F. H. Weissbach in Pauly-Wissowa, R. E., xv., col. 1164).

The Muslims placed the foundation of the town in mythical antiquity and ascribed it to Rēwand b. Bēwarāsp Adjādhāk. According to another tradition, its earlier name was Khawlān. The Persian satrap of Mōşul bore the title Būdh-Ardashīrānshāh, so that the official name of the town was Būdh-Ardashīr (Le Strange, Eastern Caliphate, p. 87; Herzfeld, op. cit., p. 208). Lastly Bar Bahlūl says that an old Persian king gave it the name Bih-Hormez-Ḳowādh (G. Hoffmann, Auszüge aus syr. Akten pers. Märtyr., p. 178).

As the metropolis of the diocese of Āthūr, Mōşul took the place of Niniveh whither Christianity had penetrated by the beginning of the second century A. D. Rabban Ishō'yahb called Bar Ḳūsra about 570 A. D. founded on the west bank of the Tigris opposite Niniveh a monastery (still called Mār Ishā'yā) around which Khushraw II built many buildings. This settlement is probably the fortress mentioned in the Syriac chronicle edited by Guidi as Ḥesnā 'Ebhṛāyā (according to Herzfeld, "citadel on the opposite bank") (Nöldeke, S. B. Ak. Wien, cxviii., fasc. ix., 1893, p. 20; Sachau, Chronik von Arbela, chap. iv., p. 48, 1; Herzfeld, op. cit., p. 208) which later was developed into a town by the Arabs (Chronicle of Se'ert, at the end).

After the taking of Niniveh by 'Utba b. Farḳad (20 = 641) in the reign of 'Omar b. al-Khaṭṭāb, the Arabs crossed the Tigris whereupon the garrison of the fortress on the west bank surrendered on promising to pay the poll-tax and obtained permission to go where they pleased. Under the same caliph, 'Utba was dismissed from his post as commander of Mōşul and Harthama b. 'Arfadjā al-Bārīkī succeeded him. The latter settled Arabs in houses of their own, then allotted them lands and made Mōşul a camp city (miṣr) in which he also built a Friday Mosque (al-Balādhuri, ed. de Goeje, p. 332). According to al-Wāḳidi, 'Abd al-Malik (65–86) appointed his son Sa'īd as governor of al-Mawşil while he put his brother Muḥammad over Arminiya and al-Djazīra. According to al-Mu'āfa b. Ṭā'ūs on the other hand, Muḥammad was also governor of Ādharbāidjān und al-Mawşil, and his chief of police Ibn Talid paved the town and built a wall round it (al-Balādhuri, op. cit.). His son Marwān II is also described as a builder and extender of the town; he is said to have organized its administration and built roads, walls and a bridge of boats over the Tigris (Ibn Faḳīh, ed. de Goeje, p. 128; Yāḳūt, Mu'ājam, ed. Wüstenfeld, iv. 682–684). The foundation of a Friday Mosque was also ascribed to him. Mōşul became under him the capital of the province of al-Djazīra.

After Mutawakkil's death the Khāridjī Musāwir seized a part of the territory of Mōşul and made al-Ḥadīṭha his headquarters. The then governor of Mōşul, the Khuzayy 'Aḳaba b. Muḥammad, was deposed by the Taghlibī Aiyūb b. Aḥmad who put his own son Ḥasan in his place. Soon afterwards the 'Azdī 'Abd Allāh b. Sulaimān became the governor of al-Mawşil. The Khāridjīs took the town from him and Musāwir entered into possession of it. Mu'tamid appointed the Turkish general Asātagīn governor of the town, but in Djumādā I 259 the latter sent his son Azkūtagīn there as his deputy. The latter was soon driven out by the citizens of the town who chose Yaḥyā b. Sulaimān as their ruler.

Haiṭham b. 'Abd Allāh whom Asātagīn then sent to Mōṣul had to return after achieving nothing. The Taghlibi Ishāk b. Aiyūb whom Asātagīn sent with 20,000 men against Mōṣul, among whom was Ḥamdān b. Ḥamdūn, entered Mōṣul after winning a battle, but was soon driven out again.

In 261 the Taghlibi Kḥiḍar b. Aḥmad and in 267 Ishāk b. Kundaḍj was appointed governor of Mōṣul by Mu'tamid. A year after Ishāk's death, his son Muḥammad sent Hārūn b. Sulaimān to Mōṣul (279); when he was driven out by the inhabitants he asked the Banū Shaibān for assistance and they besieged the town with him. The inhabitants led by Hārūn b. 'Abd Allāh and Ḥamdān b. Ḥamdūn after an initial victory were surprised and defeated by the Shaibānis; shortly afterwards Muḥammad b. Ishāk was deposed by the Kurd 'Alī b. Dāwūd.

When Mu'taḍid became caliph in 279, Ḥamdān (the grandfather of Saif al-Dawla) managed to make himself very popular with him at first, but in 282 he rebelled in Mōṣul. When an army was sent by the caliph against him under Waṣif and Naṣr, he escaped while his son Ḥusain surrendered. The citadel of Mōṣul was stormed and destroyed and Ḥamdān soon afterwards was captured and thrown into prison. Naṣr was then ordered to collect tribute in Mōṣul and thus came into conflict with the followers of the Kḥāridjī Hārūn; Hārūn was defeated and fled into the desert. In place of Tuk-tamir, who was imprisoned, the Caliph appointed Ḥasan b. 'Alī governor of Mōṣul and sent against Hārūn, the main cause of the strife, the Ḥamdānid Ḥusain who took him prisoner in 283. The family thus regained the caliph's favour.

When after the subjection of the Kḥāridjīs, raiding Kurds began to disturb the country round Mōṣul, Muktafi again gave a Ḥamdānid, namely Ḥusain's brother Abu 'l-Haidjā 'Abd Allāh, the task of bringing them to book, as the latter could rely on the assistance of the Taghlibis settled around Mōṣul, to whom the Ḥamdānids belonged. Abu 'l-Haidjā came to Mōṣul in the beginning of Muḥarram 293 and in the following year subdued the Kurds whose leader Muḥammad b. Bilāl submitted and came to live in Mōṣul.

From this time the Ḥamdānids [q. v.] ruled Mōṣul, first as governors for the caliph, then from 317 (Nāṣir al-Dawla Ḥasan) as sovereign rulers.

The 'Ukailids who followed them (386—489) belonged to the tribe of the Banū Ka'b. Their kingdom, founded by Ḥusām al-Dawla al-Muḥallad, whose independence was recognised by the Būyids, extended as far as Tā'ūk (Daḳūḳā), al-Madā'in and Kūfa. In 489 (1095—1096) Mōṣul passed to the Salḍūḳs.

The town developed considerably under the Atābeg 'Imād al-Dīn Zangī who put an end to Salḍūḳ rule in 521 (1127—1128). Mōṣul, which was for the most part in ruins was given splendid buildings by him; the fortifications were restored and flourishing gardens surrounded the town. Under one of his successors, 'Izz al-Dīn Mas'ūd I, Mōṣul was twice unsuccessfully besieged by Saladin (1182 and 1185 A.D.); after the conclusion of peace 'Izz al-Dīn however found himself forced to recognise Saladin as his suzerain.

The town was at this time defended by a strong citadel and a double wall, the towers of which were washed on the east side by the Tigris. To the south lay a great suburb, laid out by the vizier Muḍjāhid al-Dīn Kā'imāz (d. 595). From 607 his son Badr al-Dīn Lu'lu' [q. v.] ruled over Mōṣul first as vizier of the last Zangids and from 631 as an independent ruler. In 642 he submitted to Hūlāgū and accompanied him on his campaigns, so that Mōṣul was spared the usual sacking. When however his son Malik Ṣāliḥ Ismā'il joined Baibars against the Mongols the town was plundered in 660 (1261—1262); the ruler himself fell in battle (van Berchem, Festschrift f. Th. Nöldeke, 1906, p. 197 sqq.).

The Mongol dynasty of the Djalā'ir succeeded the Ilkhāns in Baghdād and Sultān Shaikh Uwaīs in 766 (1364—1365) incorporated Mōṣul in his kingdom. The world conqueror Timūr not only spared Mōṣul but gave rich endowments to the tombs of Nabī Yūnus and Nabī Dīrdjīs, to which he made a pilgrimage, and restored the bridge of boats between Mōṣul and these holy places.

The Turkoman dynasty of the Aḳ Ḳoyūnlū whose founder Bahā' al-Dīn Qarā 'Oṭmān had been appointed governor of Diyār Bakr by Timūr, was followed about 920 (1514—1515) by the Persian Ṣafawids. After long fighting the Ottomans in 1047 (1637—1638) finally took the town from them. In 1077 (1667) it was visited by a serious earthquake, in 1156 (1743) besieged by Nādir Shāh Afshār and heroically defended by Christians and Muslims. It was then under a Pasha of the local family of the 'Abd al-Djalīl who had ruled the town for a long period, fairly independent of the Porte. In the sixteenth century Mōṣul was an unimportant provincial town of the Turkish empire. After the World War the wilāyet of Mōṣul after long negotiations was placed in the mandated territory of 'Irāq. The town has now about 70—90,000 inhabitants.

The Arab geographers compare its plan to a headcloth (tailasān), i. e. to an elongated rectangle. Ibn Hawḳal who visited Mōṣul in 358 (968—969), describes it as a beautiful town with fertile surroundings. The population in his time consisted mainly of Kurds. According to al-Maḳdisī (c. 375 = 985—986), the town was very beautifully built. Its plan was in the form of a semi-circle. The citadel was called al-Murabba'a and stood where the Nahr Zubaida canal joined the Tigris (now Iḳḳal'a or Bāsh Ṭābiya?; cf. Herzfeld, op. cit., p. 209). Within its walls were a Wednesday market (Sūḳ al-'Arba'a?) after which it was sometimes called. The Friday Mosque built by Marwān stood on an eminence not far from the Tigris to which steps led up. The streets in the market were for the most part roofed over. Al-Maḳdisī (op. cit., p. 136) gives the eight main streets of the town (discussed in Herzfeld, op. cit., p. 209). The castle of the caliph (Qaṣr al-Khalīfa) stood on the east bank, half a mile from the town and commanded Nineveh; in the time of al-Maḳdisī it was already in ruins, through which the Nahr al-Kḥawṣar flowed.

Ibn Djubair visited Mōṣul on 22nd—26th Ṣafar 580 (June 4—8, 1184). Shortly before, Nūr al-Dīn had built a new Friday Mosque on the market-place. At the highest point in the town was the citadel (now: Bāsh Ṭābiya); it was known as al-Ḥadba' "the hunch-backed" and perhaps as the synonymous al-Dafa'a (G. Hoffmann, Aussüge aus syr. Akten pers. Märtyr, p. 178 sq.; E. Herzfeld, op. cit., p. 210), and according to al-Kazwini was surrounded by a deep ditch and high walls. The city walls which had strong towers ran down to the river and along its bank. A broad highway (shāri') connected the upper and lower towns (the north-south road called Darb Dair al-A'lā'). In front of the walls suburbs stretched into the distance with many smaller mosques, inns and baths. The hospital (māristān) was celebrated and the great covered market (kaṣṣariya).

Most houses in Moşul were built of tufa or marble (from the Djebel Maḳlūb east of the town) and had domed roofs (Yāḳūt, op. cit.). Later Moşul was given a third Friday Mosque which commanded the Tigris and was perhaps the building admired by Ḥamd Allāh al-Mustawfi (c. 740 A. H.).

The site of the ancient Niniveh (Arabic Ninawā') was in al-Maḳdisi's time called Tall al-Tawba and was said to be the place where the prophet Yūnis stayed when he wished to convert the people of Niniveh. There was a mosque there around which the Ḥamdānīd Naṣir al-Dawla built hostels for pilgrims. Half a mile away was the healing spring of 'Ain Yūnis with a mosque beside it, perhaps also the Shadjarat al-Yaḳīn, said to be planted by the Prophet himself. The tomb of Nabī Djirdjis, who according to Muslim legend had suffered martyrdom in Moşul (cf. i., p. 1046 sq.), was in the east town; also that of Nabī Shūth (Seth; cf. Herzfeld, op. cit., p. 206 sq.).

Moşul takes its name from the fact that a number of arms of the river there combine to form a single stream. The town lies close beside the Tigris on a spur of the western steppe-plateau which juts out into the alluvial plain of the river. Close beside its walls are quarries in which the plaster for the buildings and for the mortar is obtained. The site of the town, almost three square kilometres in area enclosed by the already mentioned wall and the Tigris, slopes from the old fortress gradually to the south. To the southeast stretch, as in the middle ages, the suburbs surrounded by fertile plains. A little above the spot where the wall joins the river on the south-east is the bridge of boats. All the old buildings and even the court of the Great Mosque lie, according to E. Herzfeld's investigations, below the level of the streets in which the accumulation of mounds of debris from houses is a result of a thousand years of continuous occupation.

MOZARABS, the name given in the middle ages to those Christians who lived in districts under Muslim rule and bore the stamp of Spanish Moorish culture. The word comes from the Arabic musta'rib, the meaning of which is exactly that of the Spanish mozárabe; the Arabic form itself is found in documents in the archives of mediaeval Spain.

We know that in principle at the time of conquest the new subjects of the Muslim conquerors could either adopt Islām or continue to profess their own faith, in the latter case falling into the category of tributaries (dhimmī; q. v.). The early Arab rulers of Spain showed considerable tolerance in this connection and the treaties of capitulation were definite on this point, at least if we may judge by one of them of which the text has been preserved and which was concluded between the Visigoth Theodemir, lord of the district of Murcia [q. v.], and 'Abd al-'Azīz b. Mūsā b. Nuṣair. This attitude of Spanish Islām to the Christians hardly altered in the centuries following until the coming of the Almoravids and Almohads. It is true there were occasional anti-Christian reactions under the first Umayyads which found vent in persecution. But these persecutions seem to have been dictated by political considerations rather than by the fanaticism of individual rulers. The Christian communities of the large towns were the most active nurseries of the nationalist movements which broke out in Spain mainly in the ninth century. Among the most important we may mention that led by the Mozarab 'Omar b. Ḥaṣṣūn [q. v.], which passed far beyond the limits of a purely religious movement. At Cordova in particular a few illuminati had to be sent to the scaffold because they insulted the religion of the Prophet. The Muslim judges seem to have sentenced them to the supreme penalty with considerable reluctance and the central authorities took the initiative in summoning a council, so that the church itself put a stop to the demonstrations of certain mystics like Eulogio and Alvaro.

In any case in the tenth century the Mozarabs of the caliphate were living in harmony with all classes of Muslim society and were themselves considerably influenced by Arab culture. They spoke Arabic, just as the Muslims spoke the Romance language, and were acquainted with Islāmic literature. The reciprocal influences were therefore considerable and were to continue so till the end of the middle ages.

As regards administration, the Christian communities of Muslim Spain under the Umayyads were under the direct authority of officials chosen by themselves from their own number and appointed with the approval of the Muslim authorities. Their head, who is sometimes given the Latin title of defensor or protector, was most frequently called Count (Comes, Sp. Conde, Ar. kūmis). The taxes which the Christians had to pay were collected by an agent called exceptor. To settle their differences they had a special judge (Ar. ḳāḍī 'l-naṣārā or ḳāḍī 'l-'aḍjam, Lat. ensor) who administered the Visigothic code (Liber Iudicium, later the Fuero Juzgo).

The Christian communities of Cordova and Seville were among the most important but were less important than that of Toledo, which was during the caliphate the residence of the metropolitan (maṭrān) of Spain. The clergy were under bishops (usḳuf). Public worship was celebrated in the churches; there were monasteries (dair) with monks (rāhib) in the neighbourhood of the larger towns: for example that of Armilāt (Guadimellato) near Cordova.

The history of the Mozarabs of Spain is of course closely connected with the political history of Islām in Spain and with the "reconquista". But its development is mainly interesting as throwing light on the peculiar culture of Moorish Spain which remained alive even after the fall of Muslim power. The recent publication of a considerable number of documents from the archives of the cathedral of Toledo mainly of the xiith and xiiith centuries enables us to estimate how great was the arabisation of all classes in reconquered Spain, which we find influencing civil, military and economic institutions and even ecclesiastical ritual (Mozarab rite). It is similarly to the Mozarab communities and their representatives who went to the north of the Peninsula that we must attribute the origin of a special art, Mozarab art, directly derived from Cordovan art and characterized by almost regular use of the horse-shoe arch and the vault.

MSHATTĀ, a ruined palace in Transjordan.

Description of the building. The ruins of al-Mshattā (the winter camp) lie east of the Jordan about 130 miles south of Damascus and 25 east of the northern shore of the Dead Sea, near the Darb al-Hadjdj, the pilgrims' road from Damascus to Medina and Mecca. It consists of a rectangular outer wall, defended by towers at the corners, each side being 157 yards long. The entrance gateway is in the centre of the south side and is flanked by two pentagonal half-towers rising out of an octagonal base, across which runs as far as the next round towers the long frieze 16 feet high and over 45 yards long, which has for the most part been taken to Berlin and which made Mshattā a world-famous monument of early Muslim architecture and decorative art and a much discussed centre of interest in Oriental archaeology. The building of the whole area within the wall was planned in three sections of which however only the central one was carried through, at least in part. This again is divided into three parts: the entrance area, the central rectangular open court and the royal residence. The plan by B. Schulz (cf. Jahrbuch d. preuss. Kunstsammlungen, vol. xxv., 1904) shows a gateway and an entrance hall, both of which were intended to be vaulted, and a series of surrounding rooms, of which the oblong room to the right of the entrance has been said by Herzfeld and others to be a mosque because it has a niche in it which is taken to be a mihrāb. Only the foundations of the walls of this part however are still standing. In the large quadrangular court on the western side is a water-basin built of brick and traces of a second one mentioned by Tristram on the opposite side, so that Schulz thought there were originally intended to be four for the sake of symmetry. The palace consists of a great hall with three aisles, a domed chamber and the living rooms at the sides. The walls are about five feet high, of blocks of limestone and above that of brick (21 × 21 and 27 × 27, 65 cm. thick). The rooms at the sides to the left and right of the great hall with its three aisles, are all barrel-vaulted; the smaller vaultings still exist and, like the relieving arches of the doors, are remarkable for their pointed arches. Schulz was able with certainty to reconstruct the façade which had fallen and was still lying on the ground. It consisted of three round arches on pillars corresponding to the three aisles. The hall was divided into three sections by pillars of which a few shafts and a Corinthian capital with painting and remains of gilding have been found. Holes and gutters at the bases and on the shafts suggested to Schulz that the columns had originally been taken from another building and used again here. The horizontal termination of the façade also shows that this hall was intended to have a flat, and not a basilical roof, or actually had one. To give it its height the two supporting rows of pillars had a second story of pillars placed upon them, an arrangement usual in Syrian architecture also. The quadrangular hall of audience and ceremonial, entered from the oblong hall by a second door, was covered by a dome and three half domes of brick, all of which have collapsed. Dovetailing on the inside of the surrounding wall shows that it was intended to build on to the sides of the palace dwellings for soldiers and other retainers. On the evidence of these projections from the wall, Schulz has prepared his reconstruction of the plan of these wings. The quadrangular surrounding walls with the round towers had barely been half built when the half-finished work was stopped. The principal motive of the great frieze at the part of the wall containing the main gateway is a zigzag pattern in high relief which forms 44 half triangles. These triangular areas are, wherever the frieze was finished, thickly covered with tendrils in low relief. In the centres of the pairs of interlocking perpendicular and suspended triangles, bosses are set in high relief, decorated with acanthus rosettes. The socket of the frieze is in the form of a modified Attic base consisting of a plinth and two toruses. The border which frames the frieze at the sides and above consists of a leaf kyma at the foot and a second larger crowning it. According to Schulz's photograph, before the frieze was removed, the half left of the door up to the main border was finished but the right half only up to half height of the frieze.

d. preuss. Kunstsammlungen, xxv. (1904), pl. viii. The triangles A and B have within circles vines with birds picking grapes; in the apex of triangle A there is also a Chinese fabulous animal with a human head such as was very popular in Chinese sepulchral plastic art. In C the circles are interlaced and lotus flowers appear in addition to the vine-tendrils. In D—I the vines which are here more realistic grow out of vases which are flanked by lions and winged griffins; buffaloes, panthers, lynxes and gazelles also relieve the foliage. In triangle J the tendrils grow straight out of the ground; this area also has the remarkable addition of men picking the grapes. Triangle L is the first right of the door and is the last to contain animals. The areas of the triangles of the right half show a quite different style. M—T have, it is true, still vines but of the greatest, lace-like delicacy and closeness of pattern which varies from triangle to triangle. U and V lastly are filled with palm-leaves and cone-shaped figures instead of vines and crowned with spirals.

Form and purpose of the building. The plan is that of a hira, i.e. the Arab type of camp, reproduced in building materials, and so called after the Lakhmid capital, with the prince's tent or house on the central axis just as is described by Mas'ūdī in his account of Sāmarrā (cf. E. Herzfeld, Erster vorläufiger Bericht über die Ausgrabungen von Samarra, Berlin 1912, p. 39 sq.). Mshattā, Ukhaiḍir and Sāmarrā are descendants of this eastern type of palace. Just as the form could only be recognised as typical after the examination of Ukhaiḍir in the Irāk and by the excavation of Sāmarrā, so it was the investigations of H. Lammens that first elucidated the purpose of these buildings (La Bādiya et La Hira sous les Omeiades, in M.F.O.B., iv.). Following Lammens, Herzfeld explained Mshattā as a bādiya [q. v.], i.e. a country palace which was built in the form of a hira for an Umayyad as an occasional residence.

History of exploration, bibliography and date. After its first discovery by H. B. Tristram in 1872, Mshattā was explained by his archaeological adviser J. Fergusson as a Sāsānian palace, built by Khusraw II after his conquest of Syria in 614 A.D. It found a place in literature with this description in Tristram's The Land of Moab (London 1873). It was not till about the end of the century that Mshattā became a subject of archaeological study and discussion when it was visited in 1898 by A. Musil and soon afterwards examined by R. E. Brünnow and A. v. Domaszewski and published in their Provincia Arabia (1904–1909). In the meanwhile the Prussian expedition sent to take it down under B. Schulz had already been there and the Berlin publication by Schulz and Strzygowski appeared in the Fahrh. d. preuss. Kunsts., 1904. To Professor Strzygowski is due the credit of having urged W. Bode to bring the façade to Berlin. Thanks to the interest displayed by the Emperor William II in the plan and his friendly relations with Sulṭān 'Abd al-Ḥamid, the latter, with the traditional generosity of an Oriental despot, gave the German Emperor a present of this ornament of the desert. As a result of his study of the architecture and decoration, Strzygowski dated Mshattā between 400 and 600 A.D. M. v. Berchem with Clermont-Ganneau and Dussaud decided on historical grounds for the Lakhmid dating, i.e. that it was built as early as the fourth century A.D. (Aux pays de Moab et d'Edom, iv., J.S., 1909, p. 401–408) while Brünnow and Musil assumed a Ghassānid origin. On the other hand in his review of Strzygowski (Z. A., xix., 1905–1906, p. 419 sqq. and Islamstudien, p. 276 sqq.), C. H. Becker championed the Umayyad dating, which E. Herzfeld in his Genesis der islam. Kunst und das Mshattaproblem (Isl., i., 1910, p. 27–63 and 105–144) supported with evidence from the history of art, and was strengthened by the appearance at the same time in M.F.O.B., iv., 1910, p. 91–112 of H. Lammens' study Bādiya et Hira. This Umayyad dating Herzfeld tried to make more convincing in his Mshattā, Hira und Bādiya (Jb. d. preuss. Ksts., 1921) and finally crowned his work with the discovery of an inscription drawn up by Walid II himself recording repairs done by him; Walid II was murdered after a year's reign (126 = 743–744) and work on the building was not completed. This attribution found further support in a story quoted by H. Lammens (in J. A., 1915) from Ibn al-Mukaffā', according to which Walid II was murdered by a man named Ibrāhīm while building a "town" in the desert, which was to bear his name. Lammens identifies this town with Mshattā. Recently the Syrian desert palaces were again thoroughly investigated by the two fathers and teachers of the École Biblique St. Étienne in Jerusalem, Jaussen and Savignac (Mission Arch. en Arabie III. Les châteaux Arabes de Qoseir Amra, Haraneh et Tuba, 2 vols., Paris 1922). As regards Tuba and Mshattā the two students came to the same conclusion as earlier scholars, namely that they belong to the same period. As it seemed to them impossible to attribute them to the Umayyad period, they attributed them to the pre-Islāmic period; as both buildings were left unfinished, they must have been built towards the end of a dynasty or kingdom. The discovery of idols at Mshattā also, they said, prevented its being attributed to the Umayyad period (cf. Diez, Die Kunst d. islamischen Völker, 11th ed., 1926, p. 153).

Establishment of the Umayyad date of Mshattā. The archaeological material at Strzygowski's disposal when he wrote on Mshattā in 1904 was still insufficient for the proper appreciation of the historical position. It was not yet possible to have a complete conception of Umayyad art. Herzfeld who knew the lands in question by long residence and frequent travels was able six years later to approach the problem from much more solid premises. The most important monument from which deductions could be drawn was the Mihrāb of the Dījami' al-Khāssaki, discovered by Sarre and Herzfeld in the meanwhile in Baghdād, which must be either pre- or early 'Abbāsīd, and the decoration of which formed a parallel to that of Mshattā (Isl., i. 33 sq. and plate i.). The explanation of the niche in the chamber right of the gateway as a mihrāb had to be decisively rejected and indeed less emphasis had been laid on it by Herzfeld than by superficial writers on the question for whom the "mihrāb" meant an easy proof of their point. Schulz had previously ascertained on the spot that this niche is not a mihrāb, and a study of the plan and Schulz's measurements shows a piece of masonry jutting 65 cm. out of the wall, containing a niche 1.62 m. broad and 1.48 deep. The fact that the mihrāb is never in a projection from the wall (an exception would prove nothing) as well as the breadth of the niche which would be exceptional, even in very large mosques of late date (such a depth is hardly ever found anywhere), prove that this can only be a tribunal niche or something of the kind. Kaşr al-Ṭūba has in its south wall four similar semi-circular apse-like niches about 10 feet broad, which surely no Muslim archaeologist would claim as mihrābs. Mshattā, however, does not require such illusive evidence to prove its Umayyad date. The conclusive proofs are found in the variety of material used and architectural styles, in the application of the principles of the minor arts to the decoration of buildings, already noticed but not correctly interpreted by Strzygowski, and the variety of styles in the areas of the triangles which fall into four groups.

The combination of 'Irāk brickwork with Syrian stonework in the royal residence proves the co-operation of different groups of workmen working on the system of conscription which was revived by the Umayyads. The construction of the brick arches is also 'Irākian in form and, besides, they are pointed arches which were unknown before the beginning of the seventh century, so that it is impossible to put the date before 600 A. D. It was only in the early Muslim period that their use spread. We find Syrian torus profiles on the basilical building and North Mesopotamian profiles on the frieze. The pillars in the basilical hall are taken from older buildings as was the custom wherever possible in the early Muslim period. In the pre-Muḥammadan period neither wooden braces in the arches nor material from older buildings were used (Herzfeld).

On the significance of the decorative façade we may add a little to Strzygowski's and Herzfeld's observations. Two points were hardly touched on in the previous discussion: that the frieze is to be considered and understood only as the basis of a great façade which was planned but was never finished, and the origin of this system of decoration from Persian textile art, which alone could supply the foundation for it and explain the sudden appearance of this completely new world hitherto unknown in architectural ornamentation. The façade proper planned above this architectural border would have contained a pattern on a much larger scale just as we see on carpets. The thousandfold opposed groups of animals still to be found on Russian carpets and textiles influenced from Persia and the Caucasus of the xviiith—xixth centuries and the zigzag friezes filled with tendrils each with a cypress (in place of a rosette) in the centre show the popularity and wide distribution and permanence of this motive. When it was taken over for architectural decoration, the popular textilised forms, however, were translated into the traditional forms of the art of the land and time. This explains the different stylistic execution of the same plan by the stone-masons.

This historic breach with tradition, this surprising control over a differently oriented artistic tendency presupposes a radical change and reorganisation of society and outlook. An artistic creed so perfect and complete in itself cannot possibly be explained by the ambition of some upstart of a desert sheikh but it presupposes in addition to enormous wealth and far-reaching power a highly trained artistic sense, which was only possible at the time of the Umayyad Court and actually existed there, as we know from many sources. Only a passionate builder and lover of architecture could visualise such a work and only at a court filled with scholars, poets and artists from all countries could the plans for it be drawn up. This illuminating emancipation from the Hellenistic façade with its pillared niches is only to be explained as the expression of a new outlook rooted in religion and proudly conscious of its quite different ideals, as was the case with young Islām. For the first time, the new teaching was here given artistic expression, in a design on a figured ground, which was to develop into the frieze of inscriptions on the Īwān in Khārgird in the xth century (cf. Diez, Churanische Baudenkmäler, Pl. 18/2).

AL-MU'AIYAD. [See HISHĀM II.]

AL-MALIK AL-MU'AIYAD SAIF AL-DĪN, Shaikh al-Mahmūdī (so-called after his first owner) al-Khāṣṣī (member of the bodyguard), a Circassian by birth, was brought as a slave to Cairo and purchased by the Atābeg Barqūk. When the latter became Sulṭān in 784 (1382) he gave him his freedom, put him in the corps of pages (ḡamḍār, q. v.), moved him to the corps of cup-bearers (sāḡī, q. v.) and later appointed him to the bodyguard (khāṣṣī, whence his nickname). Barqūk's son, Nāṣir Farāj [q. v.], on his accession in 801 (1399) appointed him emir of a thousand and in the following year governor of Tripoli. He served as a troop commander in the battle of Damascus against Timūr, was taken prisoner, soon after his release again became governor of Tripoli and later of Damascus. The reign of Sulṭān Farāj was a period of uninterrupted fighting between the Sulṭān and his governors and Shaikh was always in the midst of intrigues; often he was on the Sulṭān's side, more often in rebellion against him. His relations with his rival, the powerful governor Newrūz, were similar. Finally the Sulṭān succumbed to the emirs, was deposed and put to death; the caliph 'Abbās b. Muḥammad al-Musta'in succeeded in 815 (1412). The governor Shaikh who was in Cairo at the time, was appointed first minister (niẓām al-mulk) and retained power by filling all available offices with his followers. A rebellion of the Egyptian Beduins gave a pretext for deposing the Sulṭān al-Musta'in. The emirs demanded that a man of vigour should occupy the throne and in Sha'bān of the same year chose Shaikh as Sulṭān. While he encountered no difficulties in Egypt, the governors of the Syrian provinces refused to recognise him. He had himself to go to Syria to bring them to reason. He gradually succeeded in taking one after the other prisoner, and after he had executed his chief enemy Newrūz his throne was secure. The last rebellion in 818 (1415) he put down with comparative ease.

The defeat of the Ottoman Sulṭān Bayazīd in 804 (1402) by Timūr and the civil strife in the Mamlūk kingdom had been utilised by the neighbouring rulers in the buffer-states between Egypt and the Ottoman empire to capture a number of towns and fortresses in southern Asia Minor up to a line Larenda-Abulustān-Darenda, which had previously been under Mamlūk rule. Sulṭān Shaikh regarded it as his duty to recapture these fortresses and again force these former vassals to recognise his suzerainty in order to give his kingdom the necessary strength to resist its enemy, the Ottoman Sultān, and to protect the northern frontiers against the plundering raids of the Turkomans. The first campaign took place in 820 (1418) because, in spite of repeated demands, the prince Muḥammad b. 'Alī of the house of Ḳaramān would not surrender the town of Tarsūs, which he had taken, although he was ready to recognise the Sultān's suzerainty on the coins and in the khutba. The Sultān set out from Cairo, receiving in Syria envoys from the families of Dhu 'l-Ghādir, Ḳaramān and Ramaḍān, who brought the submission of their chiefs. Malatīya, Abulustain, Darendā and Tarsūs were successively occupied, then Behesnā, Kaḥtā and Karkār west of the Euphrates; the citadels of the two last-named were besieged, but the siege was raised when the commanders recognised the suzerainty of the Sultān. In the following year, a dangerous enemy of the Sultān, Ḳarā Yūsuf, chief of the Black Sheep, invaded Northern Syria in his pursuit of Ḳarā Yelek, chief of the White Sheep (both called after their banners), plundered the towns in the N. E. of the Mamlūk empire but then returned to Baghdād. The Sultān's successes were rendered useless by his return to Egypt, as the Syrian governors did not succeed in retaking the citadels. The Sultān therefore sent his son Ibrāhīm with a strong army to Asia Minor. The latter reached Kaisariya, appointed friendly chiefs as governors, while several hostile chiefs were taken prisoners and put to death and others slain in their flight. Ibrāhīm himself returned to Cairo in triumph but died there in 823 (1421) to the great grief of his father (the story that the latter poisoned him out of jealousy of his fame is absurd). Ḳarā Yūsuf was threatening the eastern frontier, but he had to turn his attention to his enemies, a rebellious son and Timūr's grandson Shāh Rukh, and at the end of the year he was poisoned. The Sultān himself had suffered for years from an affection of the foot; his illness (probably inflammation) became so serious that he could scarcely leave his bed. He had installed his eighteen months' old son as his successor and three of his emirs formed a kind of regency. His death took place on the 8th Muḥarram 828 (Jan. 14, 1427). His kingdom was secure, the frontiers consolidated, but at home there was a lack of order. Beduins were plundering the country and Alexandria was not infrequently exposed to attacks from the sea by Frankish pirates. Offices were freely sold and the people suffered much from the extortions of the officials. From time to time the Sultān deprived high officials of the profits of their extortions or imposed severe punishments on them. Taxes oppressed the country. The Sultān himself was brave and to the end of his life fulfilled his duties as a ruler in spite of his painful affliction — he had frequently to be carried. Although he led a life of pomp and gave popular entertainments, fireworks and feasts with great splendour, he was outwardly a pious and humble Muslim, who in times of famine and pestilence took part in prayers in the penitential garb of the Ṣūfis on the bare ground and like a pious Muslim observed a three days' fast in times of drought. He was harsh on Jews and Christians, dismissed them from government offices where they had clerical and administrative posts, and punished them in addition. The old strict regulations about dress were again enforced and all kinds of humiliations heaped on the "unbelievers".

AL-MU'AIYAD FI 'L-DĪN, ABŪ NAṢR HIBAT ALLĀH B. ABĪ 'IMRĀN MUṢĀ B. DĀWŪD AL-SHIRĀZĪ, a Fātimid dā'i of high rank, d. 470 (1087). At the beginning of his mission al-Mu'aiyad propagated the Ismā'īlī doctrine in the East, especially in Shirāz. He succeeded in converting the Buwaihid amir Abū Ḳalīdjar [q. v.], but on account of opposition at home he went to Baghdād and Mawsil, and thence to Cairo, where he was received after some time at the court of al-Mustanṣir bi 'llāh [q. v.]. He now became chief dā'i and bāb of the Imām, and was probably in relations with the other great dā'i Naṣir-i Ḳhusraw [q. v.]. Al-Mu'aiyad was sent in command of an army to help al-Basāsiri [q. v.] against the Turkmen. With his assistance al-Basāsiri inflicted a severe defeat on the Turkmen at Sindjar, took Baghdād, and read the khutba in the name of the Fātimid Caliph. Al-Mu'aiyad was also in direct communication with the leaders of the Fātimid da'wa in Yaman. In addition to his capacities as a general he was possessed of great literary ability and a poet of no mean talent. His diwān, which consists of panegyrics on the Fātimid Imāms al-Mustanṣir and al-Zāhir, deals partly with philosophical subjects. Another important work, al-Maḍjālīs, contains 800 "assemblies", dealing with different theological and philosophical questions, including his correspondence with the poet-philosopher Abu 'l-'Alā' al-Ma'arri [q. v.] on the subject of vegetarianism (see D. S. Margoliouth, in J. R. A. S. [1902], 289 sqq.). His autobiographical work, al-Sira, gives a detailed account of his mission in Shirāz and his admission to the court of al-Mustanṣir, and is carried down to 451 (1059). Besides being one of the few autobiographies in Arabic literature, it is of considerable interest for the history of the Buwaihids and their relations with the Fātimids. The MSS. of these works are preserved in some collections of Ismā'īlī works in Yaman and India.

MU'AIYAD-ZĀDE, 'ABD AL-RAḤMĀN ĀLEBĪ, an important Ottoman theologian and legist. Born in 860 (1456) in Amasia of the family of Mu'aiyad-zāde (his father 'Alī was one of the three sons of Diwrikli-zāde Shams al-Din Mu'aiyad Ālebī [d. 851 = 1447], Shāikh of the Ya'kūb Paṣha Zāwiyesi in Amasia), he became, as a young student of theology, acquainted with prince Bāyazid, the younger son of Sultān Mehmed al-Fātiḥ and afterwards Sultān, who had been appointed wālī of Amasia as a seven year old boy, and became a member of his circle. It is to this period that his relations with the famous poetess Mihri Khatun [q. v.] belong. The relations between the gifted youth and the prince who was about 9 years older than he (born 854 = 1447), became so intimate that Mu'aiyad soon became the inseparable comrade of Bāyazīd. When Sulṭān Mehmed heard from various sources, especially from a complaint in verse by Ḥalīmī Luṭf Allāh, Qāḍī of Siwās, who had been gravely insulted by the entourage of the prince, of alleged abuses at the prince's court, especially the orgies of drug-taking (mukeyyefāt: bersh, afiṣūn, ma'djūn), he sent a commission of enquiry which arrived in Amasia when the prince was with Mu'aiyad on a pleasure trip to Ladik. The result of the enquiry was the issue of an order for the execution of the two chief culprits, one of whom was Mu'aiyad (this hük-i sherif is given in Feridūn, Medimū'a-i Münsh'e'at, Constantinople 1274², i. 270—271). From a note by Mu'aiyad in a book bought by him during his stay in Ladik in Rabi' I 882 (June 1477) (the Zidj of Shems al-Dīn) the date is exactly fixed (the date in Feridūn should therefore be altered from 884 to 883; cf. Ḥusām al-Dīn, Amasia Ta'rikhi, Istanbul 1927, iii., 230 note 1). Mu'aiyad, receiving timely warning of the fate threatening him, escaped from Amasia, provided with everything necessary by Bāyazīd, and after a short stay in Ḥalab went to Shirāz, where he completed his theological studies under the celebrated Djalāl al-Dīn al-Dawwānī.

When Mu'aiyad returned home, on hearing of Bāyazīd's accession, he received an idjāza (teacher's diploma) from Dawwānī. In 887 (1482) he reached Amasia where his father had died three months earlier. After staying six weeks here he went to Constantinople where his extensive learning soon gained him a reputation among the theologians. Bāyazīd appointed him müderres at the Kalenderkhāne-medrese in Constantinople. In 891 (1486) Mu'aiyad married the daughter of the famous legist Muṣliḥ al-Dīn Kaṣṭellānī (Mawlāna Kestellī) who was the last Qāḍī-asker-general of the Turkish empire and after the reforms by which this office was divided became Qāḍī-asker of Rumelia. Mu'aiyad had a brilliant career: in 899 (1494) he became Qāḍī of Adrianople; in 907 (1501) Qāḍī-asker of Anatolia; in 910 (1504—1505) Qāḍī-asker of Rumelia and head of all the 'ulamā'. In 917 (1511) the Janissaries who had taken the part of prince Selim plundered his house because his sympathies were with Aḥmad, the favourite son of Bāyazīd. He himself was dismissed by the now senile Sulṭān under pressure from the Janissaries. Selim I soon after his accession recalled however him to his old office as he saw in him the right man to carry through the important duties of a Qāḍī-asker. Selim took him with him on his campaign to Persia against Shāh Ismā'īl. But on the way back Mu'aiyad was deprived of his office in Čoban Köprü, as symptoms of a mental breakdown had begun to show themselves (920 = 1514). He died in 922 (1516) in Constantinople and was buried in Eiyūb.

Mu'aiyad wrote a number of treatises on law and theology especially on Qur'ānic exegesis. Brockelmann, G. A. L., i. 227 and Brusali Mehmed Tāhir, Oṭhmanī Müellifleri, Istanbul 1333, i. 355, give a list of his works that survive in MS. Under the nom-de-plume of Khātemī, Mu'aiyad also wrote poetry in Arabic, Persian and Turkish. His great service to Turkish literature lies however less in his own original work than in the magnificent liberality with which he encouraged rising young talent, like the poets Nedjātī and Zātī, the historians Kemāl-Pasha-Zāde and Muḥyī al-Dīn Mehmed, the jurist Abu 'l-Su'ūd and others. Mu'aiyad was also famed as a calligraphist. He was the first Ottoman to form a private library of over 7,000 volumes, a huge figure for the time.

AL-MU'AKHKHIR. [See ALLĀH, II.]

AL-MU'AMMĀ, anagram, sometimes charade, a kind of enigma propounded in verse and rarely in prose; its meaning is made "blind" or obscure with the object of misleading the wits and the eye. It is formed by designating one or more words by various allusions to the letters forming it or them or by allusions relating to the pronunciation: the alphabetic value, the numeral value of the letters, misinterpretation or inversion (kalb). Very frequently no notice is taken of the vowels or of letters only connected with the spelling. Good taste is the rule.

There are several varieties of mu'ammā which will be found enumerated in the works given in the Bibliography.

The invention of the mu'ammā is attributed to Khalil b. Aḥmad, the inventor of prosody, while the Persians of course attribute it to 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib.

The following is an example of a mu'ammā on the name Aḥmad: Awwaluhu ṭhālithu tuffāḥatin, wa-rābi'u 'l-tuffāhi ṭhānithi. Wa-awwal al-miski lahū ṭhālithu, wa-ākhiru 'l-wardi li-bāḥihī, "Its first is the third of [the word] tuffāḥa (apple) = A; and the fourth of [the word] tuffāḥ (apples) is its second = H; and the first of [the word] misk (musk) is its third = M; and the last of [the word] ward (roses) is the remainder of it = D".

Here is a Persian example on the word satik: Nām-i butam ān māk tīrāzi, haft ast bibārisiy u-tāzi, "The name of my idol, this [woman] fair as the moon, is seven in Persian and Arabic". The word satik divided into two, gives sat or sitt which in Arabic means "six" and ik or yek which in Persian means "one", whence we have 6 + 1 = 7.

MU'ATĪLA [See TA'TĪL.]

MU'ĀWAḌA (A.), barter, exchange.

1. Mu'āwaḍa, barter, is historically an early form of the exchange of commodities between two parties and the predecessor of buying and selling (bar'; Roman law: emptio-venditio). In course of time sale developed out of exchange when, with the coming of money, a sum was given in place of the goods which the other party had to give in return. In Muslim law we find the following four kinds of sale:

a. Exchange of one thing for another. This is the primitive method of exchange (mu'āwaḍa). Exchange is a transaction in kind. Payment takes place "hand upon hand" (yadan bi-yadīn).

b. Exchange of a thing for a definite sum (thaman). By thaman (gold or silver) a sum of money is meant. Here we have a sale in the proper sense of the word (cf. BAṬ').

c. Exchange of one definite sum (thaman) for another; this is the case of gold or silver being exchanged for each or one another. This is called ṣarf (q. v., money-changing).

d. Exchange of a claim (dain, debt) for a definite sum. The main business under this head is the salam or salaf (q. v.).

2. Mu'āwaḍa is a subdivision of the form of agreement called ṣulḥ (q. v.). According to Ibn al-Kāsim's definition, p. 338, and other fuḳahā' such an agreement is either ṣulḥ al-ibrā', reduction of debt (not wiping it out) or ṣulḥ al-mu'āwaḍa, exchange of debts. Ibn al-Kāsim thus defines the latter: "And the exchange i. e. the composition is the ceding of one's right to a third e. g. when some one claims a house or a part of it and he allows this claim and concludes an agreement with him by which the debt is paid in some definite thing e. g. clothes". In this case the creditor instead of the thing claimed by him which the debtor is unwilling to give up takes another to wipe out the disputed debt. An agreement may also be made about a legal claim instead of a thing. The following is a practical illustration: Zaid has a legal claim against 'Amr. 'Amr raises a claim against Zaid. Each of them abandons his claim in ṣulḥ al-mu'āwaḍa and the demands are cancelled.

3. Lastly Mu'āwaḍa is a technical term in the general Muslim law of contract, on which there is so far no comprehensive study taking full account of the sources. A contract ('aqd) may be based on onесided or mutual obligation (contractus unilateralis or bilateralis). The latter form, which is the basis for mutual obligations, claim and counter-claim, is called mu'āwaḍa in Muslim law. Examples of contract of this sort are those of sale, lease, marriage etc.

MU'ĀWIYA, the first Umayyad caliph, son of Abū Sufyān [q. v.] and Hind [q. v.], was born in Mecca in the first decade of the seventh century A. D. Under the training of his father, the most influential personage in, if not the actual leader of the merchant republic of Mecca, he had an opportunity to be initiated into the principles of government as the Meccans understood it. Converted to Islām in the year of the fath or surrender of Mecca, he made himself useful to the Prophet in the capacity of secretary. Here he gained an insight into the workings of the new regime and learned to know the men with whom he was later to work or struggle: the autocratic 'Omar, the presumptuous 'Alī, a whole crowd of ambitious people, like Ṭalḥa, Zubair and 'Ā'isha, sometimes redoubtable for their talents and capacity for intrigue, like 'Amr b. al-Āṣ [q. v.] and Mughira b. Shu'ba [q. v.]. This dual training early matured the young Mu'āwiya who was remarkably gifted, and prepared him from the first for his high destiny.

In the caliphate of Abū Bakr he was sent to the conquest of Syria as second in command to his brother Yazīd; in this new field he displayed an astonishing activity and distinguished himself by military successes, like the taking of Caesarea and other cities of the Phoenician coast. On the premature death of Yazīd, he took his place as governor of Damascus. In 'Omar's reign, with the advance of Arab arms, he added to this office the governorships of the other provinces of Syria. 'Othmān, who was related to him, confirmed him in these offices and still further increased his authority. Mu'āwiya gained the attachment of those under him and established in Syria during the twenty years of his governorship a model province, the best organized, and with the best disciplined troops of the young empire. Not having been able to prevent the assassination of 'Othmān, he was able cleverly to take upon himself the task of avenging him. This was to lead him to the caliphate and bring him into open conflict with 'Alī. Delaying his attack, he let his rival use up his forces and lose his prestige in civil strife and in sterile conflicts with the dissenters ('Othmāniya, q. v.) and others, who accused him of complicity in the murder of his predecessor. The indecisive battle of Ṣiffin [q. v.] resulted in the arbitration of Adhroḥ [q. v.]. In pronouncing that 'Alī should lose the caliphate, the verdict restored to Mu'āwiya liberty of movement. He had won over 'Amr b. al-Āṣ to his side and at once used this valuable supporter for the conquest of Egypt. Encouraged by his military and diplomatic successes, he allowed his troops to proclaim him caliph and continuously harassed the provinces that still recognised 'Alī. Ibn Mul-djam's crime removed the last obstacle separating him from the throne. Mu'āwiya profited by it to inaugurate his reign in Jerusalem. To him the title of caliph merely meant official recognition of a fait accompli, the result of twenty years of labour and devotion to those under his governorship in Syria. To law-abiding men, he alone seemed capable of putting an end to the anarchy in which the empire had been struggling for more than ten years. In the course of a rapid campaign in the Irāk in 41 (661), he acquired from Ḥasan b. 'Alī a definite renunciation of his family's claims. The submission of the provinces to the east of the Tigris restored the unity of the caliphate. This year is known as the year of reunion (al-djama'a).

One man continued to sustain in Persia the flag of the 'Alids, Ziyād b. Abīhi [q. v.]. Mu'āwiya won him over by istilhāk, a procedure by which he recognised him as his half-brother, son of Abū Sufyān. This bold stroke secured him the support of the ablest governor of the caliphate, a worthy rival of 'Amr b. al-Āṣ and Muḥīra b. Shu'ba, already supporters of the caliph. Against the combination of these four brains all the plots hatched by the anti-Umayyad opposition were to come to nothing. On the death of Muḥīra, Ziyād added the governorship of Kūfa to his own of Baṣra and for eight years ruled the whole of the eastern provinces. By his ability and loyalty, Ziyād showed himself most worthy of the confidence placed in him. Freed from anxiety about this half of the empire, Mu'āwiya devoted his energies to the pacification and development of the prosperity of other parts of his vast empire and to removing the traces of the long struggle from which it had emerged. He organised the Arab navy while his lieutenants actively pursued the work of foreign conquest. He took Cyprus and Rhodes and on two occasions his son Yazīd closely blockaded Constantinople. His great work was the creation of the Syrian army of troops blindly devoted to their sovereign. It formed the great military reserve of the empire for his successors, an inexhaustible nursery of soldiers and leaders. He was able to keep it in training by annual invasions of Byzantine territory: razzias on a large scale rather than campaigns with a definite plan of conquest. By thus keeping the enemy engaged at home, he managed to defend his own frontiers very efficaciously. Taken at a disadvantage during his tense struggle with 'Alī by an invasion of the Mardaite [q. v.], he did not hesitate to purchase the withdrawal of these adventurers from the emperor. If after his elevation to the caliphate he rarely left Damascus — henceforth the official capital — to lead his armies in person, he nevertheless was still the "real organiser of victory". He saw to the comfort and equipment of the troops, doubled their pay and saw that they were paid with a regularity hitherto unknown. His rival 'Alī said that on the call of Mu'āwiya the Syrian army "would take the field without demanding pay, not two or three times a year only, wherever it pleased its leaders to take them". His intuition everywhere chose the ablest administrators, the best leaders among the Kuraish and other tribes. To the names already mentioned we may add those of Ḍaḥḥāk b. Kais, Abū 'l-A'war al-Sulamī, Muslim b. 'Uḫba, Busr b. Abī Arṭāḥ, Ḥabīb b. Maslama [q. v.]. By the help of enormous subsidies and by his magnanimity he was able to keep the members of the Prophet's family, the 'Alids and the Ḥāshimis, quiet: Ibn 'Abbās and Ibn Dja'far, 'Aḳīl, the brother, and "the two Ḥasans", al-Ḥasanān, the sons of 'Alī. He used the business experience of the Sarrājids to organise the financial administration. This fiscal reform gave him the resources required to maintain his armies, carry out desirable public works and pay the subsidies necessary to secure the success of his plans. He continuously interested himself in agriculture. He paid special attention to the development of the province least favoured by nature, the Ḥidjāz. His example, which was copied by his relations and most influential contemporaries, brought this region a century of prosperity under the Umayyads such as it was never to see again. In the lands of Medina and Mecca and Ṭā'if, Mu'āwiya carried out great irrigation schemes, sank wells and built dams.

In Syria he strengthened his authority by a close alliance with the fellow-tribesmen of his Kalbī wife Maisūn [q. v.] and through them with the other tribes of Kuḍā'a and those from the Yemen; these groups formed the bulk of the Arab population of Syria. It was on these foundations that the hegemony exercised by Syria throughout the Umayyad period was built and consolidated. His policy towards Christians was a tolerant one. Lastly, he endeavoured to train his son Yazīd to be an heir capable of continuing his traditions of government, by checking certain tendencies of his well endowed but impetuous nature with its fondness for pleasure. Seeing his end approaching, he skillfully succeeded in getting Yazīd recognised as his successor, first of all in Syria and then in other provinces. These difficult negotiations were the last of his political successes. Mu'āwiya was now entering on the twentieth year of his caliphate, in 60 (Oct. 679) and probably was in the 80th year of a life which had been marked by constant success. By the year 3 or 4 — contrary to the assertion of Ibn Duraid (Kitaḥ al-Ishṭihāk, p. 256) — he must have reached manhood, for four years later he was secretary to the Prophet. In the course of the forty years of his public career, no serious check ever interrupted his progress. After the abdication of Ḥasan b. 'Alī, he had "reigned without a rival, without losing any of the conquests of Islām. Neither 'Abd al-Malik, nor Manṣūr, nor Ḥārūn al-Rashīd earned this praise, unique in the annals of Islām" (Ḍahabī). He died at Damascus in the month of Raddjab of the year 60 (April 680) and was buried in the cemetery of Bāb al-Ṣaghīr where his tomb still survives. Before his death he entrusted the regency to Ḍaḥḥāk b. Kais and to Muslim b. 'Uḫba until Yazīd should return from Anatolia. Companion and secretary of the Prophet, brother of Umm Ḥabība [q. v.], "the mother of the believers", these claims have not preserved him from the hatred of the Shī'is and the official maledictions pronounced by certain 'Abbāsīd caliphs. More tolerant to his memory than to that of his son Yazīd, orthodoxy generally agrees to recognise his right to the respect which is due to the Ṣaḥābis. The Syrians long cherished the memory of his glorious reign and even beyond the bounds of Syria he had partisans among the Ḥanbalis, called ghulāt, the enthusiasts for Mu'āwiya.

II. Mu'āwiya's policy. In the historical and anecdotal literature of the Arabs there are few collections which do not devote a paragraph to Mu'āwiya's "wise mildness and complete self-control" (Wellhausen), qualities which the Arabs include under the term ḥilm. By this supreme virtue they claim to recognise the true statesman. The Sufyānid sovereign is said to have owed the great success of his career to it. "Mu'āwiya's ḥilm" thus became proverbial. A somewhat mixed virtue, essentially opportunist in character, it may be combined with astuteness, or the less scrupulous forms of diplomacy. In our hero this quality has been found even in the most difficult trials inflicted on his amour-propre. His smiling imperturbability was able to disarm the proudest of his adversaries, who were then completely won over by his generosity. With the golden chains of pensions and rich gifts the ruler was able to hold in leash his most intractable enemies. When his friends expressed surprise at the vastness of certain donations, he would reply "a war costs infinitely more". This was his favourite method of dealing with the 'Alids and Hāshimids. He has been unjustly accused of having introduced the custom of publicly cursing the name of 'Alī from the pulpit of the mosque. There is no certain evidence of this practice before the time of the Marwānids.

The collateral branches of the Umayyad family supplied him with distinguished assistants. He was careful not to bring the more ambitious of them too much to the front or to leave them too long in one office. He was studious to inculcate into all his relations the feeling that they must stand by one another and that this consisted in the blind execution of his orders. The Umayyads formed his natural supporters. He could not do without them. But the unsettled problem, of the dynastic succession made him distrustful of relatives called upon to share the responsibilities of power. He did not fail to keep a close watch over them. With men like Ibn 'Amir, Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ, Marwān b. al-Ḥakam [q. v.], of remarkable gifts and considerable influence, who did not conceal their aspirations, he came to terms in a way that effectually discouraged them from following the dictates of their ambitions. As to the sons of the Caliph 'Othmān, they seemed to him too insignificant to cause him any disquiet. On the other hand, Marwān and Sa'īd were appointed to succeed one another at about regular intervals in the government of the Hidjāz, the cradle of Islām and of the ruling family. Mu'āwīya was unwilling to give them time to create in such an important centre a position for themselves and connections which might have compromised the future of the dynasty. Ultimately he decided to replace these two relatives by a nephew of his own, now almost grown up, the Sufyānid Walīd b. 'Uthba [q. v.]. In the important governorship of the 'Irāq, which controlled the eastern provinces, Mu'āwīya showed his preference for Thaqafī officials, Mughira, Ziyād and the latter's son 'Ubaid Allāh. He appreciated the devotion of these men, who came from the shrewd society in Ṭā'if, suspected by the other Umayyad families, compelled to rely on their sovereign, the author of their fortunes. For a moment, the extraordinary promotion of Ziyād and the confidence the Caliph showed in him suggested that he had him in view as his successor. In this attitude to his relatives, the interests of the dynasty surpassed all other considerations. The heir presumptive was young. Mu'āwīya wanted to save his Umayyad cousins from the temptation to set up as rivals of his successor. The first step was to do Yazīd rather a bad turn. If, instead of the inexperienced Walīd, Mu'āwīya had retained or restored for another period of office in the governorship of the Hidjāz the energetic Marwān, there is no reason to think that this would not have turned the incautious Ḥusain from the hopeless exploit of Karbalā'.

In the traditional view Mu'āwīya appears as the perfect type of Arab ruler. When writers, jurists, encyclopaedists and compilers of anthologies have to quote a trait or a saying illustrating kingship, or the conduct of states, they rarely hesitate to credit it to our hero. This unanimity which reflects so much to his credit has been transformed into censure by orthodoxy. Mu'āwīya is reproached with having transformed the khiṭāfat, the vicariate of the Prophet, into mulk, into a temporal sovereignty, with having, if we may use the term, secularized the supreme power, really a purely lay one, in the heart of Islām. This criticism is an attempt to throw odium on Mu'āwīya while in reality it calls attention to his great merit. In him the ruler, "the king", i. e. the organizer and administrator, appear very distinctly while they are difficult to find in his predecessors, painfully fighting against the outbursts of Beduin anarchy. This transformation of the patriarchal power had begun with 'Omar who was the first to realise the necessity for it and attempted to realize it. Mu'āwīya endeavoured to hasten its evolution towards more effective centralization, an extension of the powers and personal authority of the sovereign. To secure for the latter the advantages of external pomp, the prestige given by formalities, he gave more ceremony to the hitherto democratic appearance of the caliph at the Friday services. He appeared in the minbar or pulpit, surrounded by a shorta or guard — 'Alī had already had one — and remained seated while delivering his address, the khuṭba. Some have thought to see in this attitude a sign of pride. This is to forget the primitive nature of the minbar as the seat of the ruler, the sovereign's throne, before it became of liturgical significance as the pulpit of the mosque, after the latter had become a building for religious worship. This charge of mulk was also intended to render suspect the sincerity of the faith of the Sufyānid monarch. But austerity characterised his morals and private life. He was a good father and a devoted husband. We find him conscientiously performing his religious duties and dying at length a good Muslim.

The chroniclers unanimously find in the complex character of Mu'āwīya another trait besides ḥilm: political finesse, what the Arabs call dāhiya. To be credited with this it was necessary to have in addition to diplomatic skill, a remarkable gift of eloquence, force of decision, a resourceful nature and a conscience broad enough not to shrink from the use of trickery. Mu'āwīya was reckoned among the five best Kuraish orators of his time. He was fond of saying "I have won more success with the tongue than Ziyād (b. Abīhi) with the sword". Arab writers prefer to attribute these successes to the Machiavellian nature of the sovereign. He is said never to have shrunk from recourse to violence or the use of poison when he wished to get rid of troublesome adversaries. To support this charge the cases of 'Abd al-Rahmān b. Khālīd, Ḥasan b. 'Alī and Ashtar b. Mālīk [q. v.] are quoted. But each of the examples is capable of a more natural explanation. We would readily put Mu'āwīya in the category of those statesmen to whom useless crime is naturally repugnant, too wise to allow themselves to be tempted by violent solutions but not scrupulous enough to hesitate in such an extremity, if reasons of state seemed to advise it. One of his successors, 'Abd al-Malik, called him "the cunning (mudāhin) caliph". The pleasure-loving son of 'Alī, ruined by his easy life, forgotten and retired to Medina, did not deserve to be feared. The two other individuals above mentioned died by accident or were victims of private vengeance.

The poets, the "journalists" of the period, had an undoubted influence on their contemporaries. This influence the sovereign succeeded in controlling and subjecting to dynastic interests. Himself very susceptible to the charms of verse, he would have liked to see poetry confine itself to developing patriotism, and renouncing satire which was a source of dissension among the tribes. The restorer of djāmā'a, national unity, felt more than anyone the necessity for this concord to heal the wounds caused by anarchy. Powerless to prevent the incursions of poetasters into the field of politics he endeavoured to win them over to his side by gifts and the use of tact. To win them over was to have "a good press", and at the same time gain their tribes to the cause of order, for the tribes usually agreed with the ideas spread by their bards. He exploited his son Yazīd's relations and friendships with the poets to compromise them in favour of the Umayyads and make them less amenable to the advances of the reactionary parties. He paid for their panegyrics; he took them under his protection whenever their lack of discipline brought them into trouble with the local authorities. He did not hesitate to shut his eyes to some of their poetical outbursts, which seem to compromise the reputation of his own hearth; under the 'Abbāsids such audacity would have meant death. He further left it to these indiscreet auxiliaries to deal with abuses by officials and found in them a useful check on arbitrary exercise of authority by his lieutenants. It was at the same time a satisfaction of their amour-propre, allowed to the vanity of these rhapsodists, who were courted by all parties and intoxicated by the terror which their wit inspired. In return for this toleration, he was able to get less disinterested services from them. He imposed on them the duty of preparing public opinion in favour of the baī'a, the recognition, of Yazīd as heir-apparent. To accustom the Arabs to this step so repulsive to their democratic instincts, to give the caliph leisure to calculate its chances of success, there was nothing so useful as the intervention of these heralds with their echoing phrases. It enabled the government to remain discreetly in the background, ready to come out at the opportune moment.

The biased Mas'ūdī himself cannot help admiring the pliant ease of Mu'āwiya's policy, "his great generosity to his subjects and the benefits which he heaped upon them; winning their sympathy and seducing their hearts with such skill that they put him before their kinsmen and natural affections". Firmness in administration, skill in managing men according to their rank, cordiality, these are some of the qualities credited by this historian, the friend of 'Alī, to the successful rival of Fāṭima's husband.

Let us now deal with the charges brought against him by orthodoxy. With the object of making them more readily accepted, the indictment is carefully put in the mouth of the austere Ḥasan al-Baṣrī. "Mu'āwiya committed four crimes — one of them alone would suffice to cover him with dishonour — : he abandoned the nation to men of no repute, deprived it without consulting it (by the baī'a of Yazīd) of the control of its destinies and that in the life-time (i. e. to the detriment) of numerous Companions and virtuous individuals. He chose as his successor an incorrigible drunkard, robed in silk and playing the harp. He adopted Ziyād. Lastly he condemned Ḥudjr b. 'Adī [q. v.] to death". The impartial historian will have little difficulty in clearing the sovereign from these charges, which reveal his political flair, his instinct for rulership which raised him high above the prejudices of his contemporaries. The measures for which he is blamed secured the caliphate twenty years of peace and prosperity, the longest period it ever knew.

To sum up, Mu'āwiya appears in the series of Muslim rulers as one of the most attractive individuals and one of all round ability. In him the Arabs see the very incarnation of sovereignty. In the opinion of Mas'ūdī his successors at best could only try to copy him without being able to equal him. In spite of their little liking for the able Sufyānīd, the Marwānīds frequently appealed to his traditions and the methods of government inaugurated by him. He was, beyond doubt, the least oriental and the most modern of the rulers of Islām. He did not disdain public opinion. One must be grateful to him for not having believed in the power of force alone in the management of men, for not having sought to reestablish, as the 'Abbāsīds were to do, the old Asiatic autocracies, for having preferred that his subjects should become voluntarily attached to him by winning their sympathies, for proclaiming that "the world is more surely led by the tongue than by the sword". This conviction led him to adopt several institutions of Beduin democracy — such as the wuṣūḍ, deputations from the provinces and the principal tribes — to consult the views of such assemblies on as many occasions as possible, to associate them openly with public business by recognising their right of remonstrance. The astuteness of the sovereign knew how to direct these manifestations of the old individualism of the nomads and to bring them to cooperate with his designs. To quote the comparison of the Byzantine historians, he appeared as a πρωτοσύμβουλος in the midst of his σύμβουλοι; in the deliberations of his Syrian parliament, he posed as primus inter pares. He was gradually able to advance the political education of his subjects and to control the signs of lack of discipline. He was never perturbed by their criticisms nor by the satires of the poets. "I do not trouble" he said "about words so long as they do not lead to deeds". These liberal principles became restricted under the Marwānīds and disappeared with the coming of power of the absolute monarchy of the 'Abbāsīds.

As is frequently the case with men who have grown old in politics, a long period of power — he exercised it without interruption for 40 years — had made him a sceptic. This benevolent scepticism was revealed in a knowing smile when, with eyes half closed, he used to listen without missing a word to the petitions and recriminations of his visitors and pretended to be taken in by their customary excesses. From his youth, passed in the cosmopolitan city of Mecca, then in Medina in the very mixed society of the Companions, he had been in too close contact with his contemporaries to be under any illusions about their disinterestedness. He had not to invent, but no one managed better than he, that instrument of government, the ta'līf al-ḥulūb, the rallying of hearts, an ingenious euphemism of the Kur'ān, meaning the art of purchasing hesitating adherents. Other caliphs surpassed him in courage, in outward austerity, zuhd, in love of knowledge and other qualities that dazzle the eyes of the multitude. No one possessed to such a degree as Mu'āwiya the gifts of the founder of an empire: vision, energy and promptitude in action, breadth of view, logical thinking, absence of antiquated prejudices, skill in adapting the prestige and ceremonial of his position to Arab taste, ability to use men and to deal tactfully with their prejudices so as not to offend them directly. This rare combination of qualities enabled him to extract order out of the chaos of Beduin anarchy. If we endeavour to appreciate fairly Mu'āwiya's work with its inevitable deficiencies, one must take into account the intractable material on which he had to work and the resistance opposed by the inveterate individualism of the nomads. He succeeded not only in disciplining them but also in transforming them into conquerors, able to rule over peoples of superior culture, heirs to the oldest civilisations.

For achieving this result, the son of Muḥammad's old opponent has deserved well of Islām. In the list of those responsible for this great revolution his name should come after that of the Prophet beside the name of the caliph 'Omar. Orthodox tradition likes to exalt the latter and present him as the second founder of Islām. Of European writers, Sprenger and von Kremer have popularised this view. In it we may recognise the reply of the schools of the Ḥijāz to the 'Irāk legend woven round the memory of 'Alī. To their work we owe the fantastic proportions assumed by the personality of 'Omar; it absorbs not only Abū Bakr, but even throws its shadow upon the Prophet. 'Omar is brought into the origin of all religious and administrative institutions, especially of all those that cannot decently be credited to the author of the Qur'ān. This exaggerated admiration of the Ḥijāz was to provoke the protestations of the 'Abbāsids. The counterblast of Shi'a tradition was to place 'Alī alongside of 'Omar to direct him and if necessary to correct him. The indisputable merits of the second caliph lie elsewhere. In the midst of the terrible confusion that resulted from the conquests he was able to maintain the unity and cohesion of the empire, immeasurably enlarged, to bring the Arabs intoxicated with success under comparative control. Closely watched, harassed by the selfish claims of his Medinese senate and its disturbing element formed by the redoubtable group of the "ten mubashshara" or "the chosen" and the oldest friends of the Master, he succeeded in neutralising their restless activities, their dire passion for intriguing and in exploiting their greed and mutual jealousies. In the provinces the generals and governors showed an obedience scarcely less intermittent. 'Omar had frequently to resign himself to approving by sanatio in radice in order not to lose touch with such undisciplined auxiliaries and to remind all of the existence of the vicariate of the Prophet. The day on which he thought of a more effective centralization, of a less ideal systematization, assassination brutally delivered him from his error. The same fate was to overtake 'Othmān, when under pressure from the Umayyads, he took up his predecessor's programme where it had been interrupted. With 'Alī the caliphate relapsed into chaos and lost a quarter of a century of progress on the way to reorganization. One province alone formed an exception, Syria, which had been governed since its creation by the Umayyads.

But for the intervention of Mu'āwiya and his able lieutenants, the 'Amrs, Ziyāds and Marwāns, the Muslim empire would have been transformed — like the 'Irāk and Khurāsān — into an arena to which the Arabs came to settle their petty tribal quarrels. Once on the throne, the Sufyānid worked to extend gradually to the rest of the caliphate the methods of government which had secured the prosperity of Syria. Encouraged by the results obtained in this country, he set himself to discipline the other Beduins who, according to the idea ascribed to 'Omar, formed the "substance of Islām". From this rudis indigestaque moles, this rebellious mass, gradually broken in by the influence of Syria, fashioned by teachers trained in his school, the first Syrian caliph recruited soldiers, then formed from them the cadres of a regular army: wonderful troops always ready to play their double part, the djihād abroad, and at home the maintenance, against any threat from within, of the djama'a, the unity of the empire. Mu'āwiya succeeded in impressing on these descendants of caravan-leaders of Arabia, nomads, all obstinate landmen, the importance of the mastery of the seas. Arab thalassocracy dates from this period. Forced to use primitive institutions, the summa, tradition, sanctioned by the Prophet and the Medīna caliphs, he endeavoured to turn them to the needs of a great empire. He managed at least to suppress the anarchical working of the shūrā by regulating the dynastic succession. He organised the finances; he began by revising and reducing the enormous pensions granted by preceding governments without regard to services rendered to the state. Down to his time the central treasury of the caliphate had been supplied by intermittent and always unwilling contributions extorted from the provinces. Mu'āwiya endeavoured to settle the amount to be paid by each province and to regularise its collection. Under him the treasury ceased to be a relief fund which the conquerors claimed to use as they pleased. His predecessors had had to empty it periodically to secure assistance or neutrality important for the success of their policy. Hitherto "māl al-muslimin", the collective property of the Muslims", the treasury now became māl Allāh, the treasury of the state, intended to cover general expenses, to secure the representation and the defence of the empire. These reforms made Mu'āwiya the first sovereign, malik, of Islām, the first ruler to enjoy a definite authority, independent, unlike his predecessors, of the anarchic good-will of his subjects, and no longer at the mercy of an oligarchy interested in the maintenance of old abuses. The Medīnese vicariate which developed from the triumvirate, could not long survive this coup d'état, this drastic solution of the problem of the succession to the Prophet. Before Mu'āwiya, the caliphate had only had a nominal existence. For this figment, the son of Abū Sufyān substituted a reality; he created the Arab state: a creation seen darkly by 'Omar without having been brought to realisation.

AL-MU'AZZAM. [See TÜRĀNŠĀH.]

AL-MALIK AL-MU'AZZAM ŠARAF AL-DĪN 'ISĀ B. MALIK AL-'ĀDIL B. AIYŪB was born in 576 (1180). In 597 (1200) he became governor for his father al-Malik al-'Ādil [q.v.] in Damascus and next year was besieged by Saladin's sons Zāhir and Afdal in course of the dispute about the succession between them and 'Ādil. 'Ādil came as far as Nāblus with his army but could not relieve Damascus so that its fall was imminent. Then a quarrel broke out between the brothers as to who was to get Damascus. The majority of the emirs in the army made peace with 'Ādil and the siege was raised in the course of the year. 'Ādil was recognised as the head of the Aiyūbids and 'Isā continued to govern Damascus and the lands going with it as far as the Egyptian frontier for his father. When 'Ādil died in 615 (1216) he had the inhabitants swear fealty to him but recognised his older brother Kāmil as suzerain in the Friday khutba. He was, like his brothers, on fairly good terms with the Crusaders, but at the decisive moment he joined forces with his brothers against them and it is not least due to him, as the most important Aiyūbid leader of the period, that the Crusaders had to withdraw from Damiatta in 618 (1221). His desire to seize central Syria (Ḥims and Ḥamāt) was not fulfilled as Kāmil threatened him with war when he attacked these towns. 'Isā therefore made an alliance in 623 (1226) with the Khwārizm-Šāh Djalāl al-Dīn and mentioned him as suzerain in the Friday prayer instead of his brother. He thus felt strong enough to turn away the Emperor Frederick II's ambassador in this year while Kāmil, who did not feel too secure, negotiated with him. It did not however come to fighting between the two brothers as both feared the intervention of Frederick II. But before the latter set out for the Holy Land, 'Isā died on 1st Dhū 'l-Ḥiǧǧja 624 (Nov. 12, 1227) in Damascus of dysentery. Had he lived longer, Frederick II would probably not have taken Jerusalem. It was 'Isā's son Nāṣir al-Dīn Dāwūd who succeeded in regaining Jerusalem for the Muslims. 'Isā's rule stretched from south of Ḥims beyond Jerusalem to al-'Arīsh on the Egyptian frontier. In addition to his military ability, he is celebrated as a friend of poetry and letters and he is also said to have been an author himself. Unlike the other Aiyūbids, he followed the school of Abū Ḥanīfa.

MUBALLIGH. [See MASPĪD, I, D, e and H, 4.]
MUBĀRAK GHĀZĪ, an Indian saint. In all parts of the Sundarban, the Muḥammadan woodcutters invoke certain mythical beings to protect them from tigers and crocodiles. In the 24 Parganas it is Mubārak Ghāzī who, in the Eastern parts of the Delta goes by the name of Zindah Ghāzī, the living warrior. Mubārak Ghāzī is said to have been a faḳīr (mendicant) who reclaimed the jungle tracts along the left bank of the river Hoogly. Every village has an altar dedicated to him and no one enters the forest nor do any of the boat's crew, who might sail through the districts, pass without first making offerings at one of these shrines. The faḳīrs in these dangerous forests, who claim to be lineally descended from the Ghāzī, indicate with pieces of wood called sang the precise limits within which the forest has to be felled. Mubārak Ghāzī, so the legend goes, came to Bengal when Radja Matak ruled over the Sundarban. The saint happened to have a dispute with the chief, who thought himself to be in the right, upon which the latter agreed to give his only daughter Shushila in marriage to the former, should his own opinion be proved wrong. This the Ghāzī succeeded in doing and won his bride in consequence. Since no man saw him die, he is believed to reside in the depths of the forest, to ride about on tigers, and to keep them so obedient to his will that they dare not touch a human being without his express desire. Before entering a jungle or sailing through the narrow channels whose shady banks are infested by tigers, boatmen and woodcutters, both Hindus and Muḥammadans, raise little mounds of earth and on them make offerings of rice, plantains, and sweetmeats to Mubārak Ghāzī, after which they fearlessly cut the brushwood and linger in the most dangerous spots.

This strange myth, there cannot be any doubt, is borrowed from Hindus to suit the taste of the superstitious boatmen and woodcutters.

MUBĀRAK SHĀH, MU'IZZ AL-DĪN, the second king of the Saiyid dynasty of Dihli, was the son of Kḥiḍr Khān, the first king, and succeeded his father on May 22, 1421. The limits of his kingdom were then restricted to a few districts of Hindūstān proper and Multān, and he was obliged to desist from an attempt to establish his authority in the Pandjāb by the necessity for relieving Gwalior, menaced by Hūshang of Mālwa, who raised the siege and met him, but after an indecisive action came to terms and retired to Mālwa. From 1425 to 1427 he was engaged in attempting to restore order in Mewāt, and received the formal submission of the rādjas of Gwalior and Čandwār (Firūzābād), but Muḥammad Khān Awhadī of Bayāna, whom he had taken prisoner, escaped and took refuge in Mewāt, and the work there was to do again. Muḥammad Awhadī, on being hard pressed in Bayāna, fled to Ibrāhīm Shāh of Džawnpūr, and as the latter marched against Kālpī, Mubārak marched to meet him. Ibrāhīm, who had been plundering Mubārak's dominions, avoided a conflict for some time, but on April 2, 1428, the armies met near Čandwār and Ibrāhīm, though not decisively defeated, retired the next day to D̲jawnpūr. Mubārak then collected revenue in the neighbourhood of Gwalior and retired by way of Bayāna, which was evacuated by Muḥammad Awhādī, who had returned thither. For the rest of the year his officers were engaged in restoring order in the Pandjāb, ravaged by D̲jasrath the Khokar, and he in a similar task in Mewāt, and in collecting revenue by force. In 1430 Fūlād Turkbača successfully defied the royal authority in Bhātinda, and in 1431 a rebellion broke out in Multān and had no sooner been suppressed than D̲jasrath renewed his activity in the Pandjāb. The chronicle of the rest of the reign is a record of rebellions in the Pandjāb, Multān, Sāmāna, Mewāt, Bayāna, Gwalior, Tidjāra and Itāwa, and a rebel captured Lāhor and attacked Dipālpūr. Lāhor was eventually recovered, but the whole country remained in a disturbed condition.

War broke out between Ibrāhīm of D̲jawnpūr and Hūshang of Mālwa in connection with Kālpī, the suzerainty over which belonged to neither and was claimed by both, and Mubārak, marching thither, turned aside to inspect Mubārakābād which he was building, and then, on February 19, 1434, he was assassinated at the instance of Sarwar al-Mulk, whom he had dismissed from the post of minister in the preceding year.

MUBĀRIR AL-DĪN. [MUHAMMAD B. AL-MUẒAFFAZ.]

AL-MUBARRAD, ABU 'L-'ABBĀS MUḤAMMAD B. YAZĪD AL-THUMĀLĪ AL-AZDĪ, an Arab philologist, born on the 10th Dhū 'l-Hijjja 210 (March 25, 826) in Baṣra, was there taught by Abū 'Omar al-Djarmī, Abū 'Othmān al-Mazīnī and Abū Ḥātim al-Sidjīstānī, the pupil of Aṣma'ī. In his early works, the Kitāb Masā'il al-Ghalaṭ, he criticised the Kitāb of Sibawaih, but only a small number of his criticisms were well founded and of these only a minority were original (al-Suyūṭī, al-Mushir, i. ii. 188; ii. 232). Later he went to Baghdād where he became a very busy teacher; among his pupils were Niṣṭawaih, Ibn Durustawaih and Ibn Kaisān. His rival for favour at court was the Kūfan Tha'lab, to whom he was far superior in ability and style; the rivalry between these two scholars seems to have been the origin of the later tradition of the opposition between the schools of Kūfa and Baghdād. His epithet al-Mubarrad seems to refer to his skill in disputation, but there are a number of anecdotes explaining it in very different ways (Mushir 2, ii. 267, 11 sq.; Bughya, p. 116—117; Irshād, vii. 137, 15 sqq.). He died in Baghdād in Shawwāl or Dhū 'l-Kāda 285 (Oct. 898).

His chief work al-Kāmil fi 'l-Adab is a typical example of the work of the old philologists as developed from their teaching. Without being tied down to any fixed arrangement or even aiming at cohesion in the separate chapters, it combines traditions of the Prophet, sayings of pious men, proverbs, many poems mostly of the older period, and also historical matter like the important chapter on the Khāridjis (characteristic is the passage on p. 409 in Wright's edition: "In this chapter we shall mention something of everything in order by change to prevent the reader from being wearied and mix a little jest with the earnest so that heart and soul may be recuperated"; similarly p. 428; exceptions like the chapters on simile p. 447 or on laments for the dead and consolation p. 713 are rare). The important feature is the full grammatical and lexicographical commentary which he gives to every quotation. The work was given its final form with numerous additions and glosses by Abu 'l-Ḥasan al-Aknāsh (d. 315 = 927). Al-Baṭalyūsī wrote a commentary on it which has not survived (Mushir 1, i. 182, 8; 223, 5); there is an anonymous commentary in the possession of Ismā'il Efendi in Stambul. It was first printed in Stambul in 1286; editions: The Kāmil of El-Mubarrad edited for the German Oriental Society by W. Wright, part 1—12, Leipzig 1864—1892; reprinted Cairo 1308, 1323, 1324 (with extracts from D̲jāhīz on the margin), 1339; with two modern commentaries: Tahdhīb al-Kāmil by al-Sibā'ī al-Baiyūnī, Cairo 1341 (1923), 2 vols. and Ragħbat al-'Āmil min Kitāb al-Kāmil by Saiyid Ibn 'Alī al-Marṣafī (professor at al-Azhar), 8 vols., Cairo 345—346 (1927—1928); Das Khari-dschitenkapitel aus dem K., transl. into German by O. Rescher, Stuttgart 1922. His second collection of material, the Kitāb al-Muḩtaḩab, met with less success, because, it is said, it had been transmitted by the heretic Ibn al-Rāwandī; it is preserved with a commentary by Sa'īd b. Sa'īd al-Fāriḩī (d. 391 = 1000; see Yāqūt, Irshād, iv. 240) in the Escorial manuscript 2, p. 111 and in Stambul, Köprülü, No. 1507—1508 (cf. Rescher, in Z. D. M. G., lxiv. 197; photograph in Cairo; Fihrist 2, ii. 123). Of his numerous other works given by his biographers we only have the Kitāb al-Ta'wīz, Escorial 2, p. 534, 1, the Kitāb Nasab 'Adnān wa-Kahtān, in Stambul 'Āṭif Efendi, 2003 (*M. F. O. Wāṭḩīk on the question whether poetry is superior to eloquence, in Munich 791 and in a fragment in Berlin, Ahlw. 7177 as well as the Kitāb al-Muḩḩakkar wa 'l-Mu'annath as transmitted by Abū 'Alī al-Fārisī, in Damascus, Zaiyāt, p. 36, No. 113, 2. His other works are only known from quotations, e. g. his Kitāb al-Iḩṩiyār, which he himself quotes, Kāmil, p. 760, 4, the Kitāb Ghariḩ al-ḩadīṩh, which Ibn al-Aṩḩir mentions among his sources in the preface to the Nihāya; the Kitāb ma 'ttafaḩa Lafṩuhu wa 'lḩtalafa Ma'nāhū (Suyūṭī, Sharḩ al-Mughnī, Cairo 1322, p. 195, 20); the Kitāb al-Rawḩa, a collection of poems by contemporary poets beginning with Abū Nuwās, Aghānī 1, viii. 15, 20; 215, 1, 26, 13; al-Djurdjānī, Kitāb al-Kināyāt, p. 29, 9; Ibn al-Aṩḩir, al-Maṩḩal al-sā'ir, p. 189, 16; the Kitāb al-I'tinān on the causes of the poetical strife between Djarir and Farazdaq; 'Abd al-Kādir al-Baghdādī, Khizānat al-Adab, i. 305, 21; Kitāb al-Sharḩ (i. e. Sharḩ Kalām al-Arab), l. c., ii. 193 infra.

It has one ʿarūd and one ḍarb only: mafʿilun faʿilātun: mafʿilun faʿilātun. Mafʿilun however must become mafʿilu. The first mafʿilun may lose its ma; in that case the form is faʿilu (= mafʿulu) and faʿilu. (M. BENCHEB)

MUDĪR, title of the governors of the Egyptian provinces, called mudiriya. The use of the word mudir in this meaning is no doubt of Turkish origin. The office was created by Muḥammad ʿAlī, when, shortly after 1813, he reorganised the administrative division of Egypt, instituting seven mudiriyas; this number has been changed several times [s. KHEDIVE]. At the present day there are 14 mudiriyas. The chief task of the mudir is the controlling of the agricultural administration and of the irrigation, as executed by his subordinates, viz. the maʿmūr, who administers a markaz and the nāḡir who controls the ḡism which is again a subdivision of the markaz. Under Saʿīd Pasha the office of mudir was temporarily abolished with a view to preventing oppression. Until that time they had been without exception Turks, but under Ismāʿīl Pasha, when the function was instituted again, this high administrative position was opened also to native Egyptians.

MUʿDJIZA (A.), part. act. iv. of ʿdja, lit. "the overwhelming", has become the technical term for miracle. It does not occur in the Kurʿān, which denies miracles in connection with Muḥammad, whereas it emphasizes his "signs", āyāt, i. e. verses of the Kurʿān; cf. the art. KORAN. Even in later literature Muḥammad's chief miracle is the Kurʿān (cf. Abū Nuʿaim, Daʿāʾil al-Nubuwwa, p. 74). Muʿdjiza and āya have become synonyms; they denote the miracles performed by Allāh in order to prove the sincerity of His apostles. The term karāma [q. v.] is used in connection with the saints; it differs from muʿdjiza in so far as it denotes nothing but a personal distinction granted by Allāh to a saint.

Miracles of Apostles and Prophets, especially those of Muḥammad, occur in the sīra and in ḥadīth. Yet in this literature the term muʿdjiza is still lacking, as it is in the oldest forms of the creed. The Fīḡh Akbar, ii., art. 16, mentions the āyāt of the prophets and the karāmāt of the saints. Muʿdjiza occurs in the creed of Abū Ḥafṣ ʿUmar al-Nasafī (ed. Cureton, p. 4; ed. Taftāzānī, p. 165): "And He has fortified them (the apostles) by miracles contradicting the usual course of things".

Taftāzānī explains it in this way: A thing deviating from the usual course of things, appearing at the hands of him who pretends to be a prophet, as a challenge to those who deny this, of such a nature that it makes it impossible for them to produce the like of it. It is Allāh's testimony to the sincerity of His apostles.

A very complete and systematic description occurs in al-Idjī's Mawāḡiḡ. He gives the following definition of muʿdjiza: It is meant to prove the sincerity of him who pretends to be an apostle of Allāh. Further he enumerates the following conditions: 1. It must be an act of Allāh; 2. it must be contrary to the usual course of things; 3. contradiction to it must be impossible; 4. it must happen at the hands of him who pretends to be an apostle, so that it appears as a confirmation of his sincerity; 5. it must be in conformity with his announcement of it; the miracle itself must not be a disavowal of his claim (daʿwā); 7. it must follow on his daʿwā.

Further, according to al-Idjī, the miracle happens in this way that Allāh produces it at the hands of him whose sincerity He wishes to show, in order to realise His will, viz. the salvation of men through the preaching of His apostle. Finally, as to its effect, it produces, in accordance with Allāh's custom, in those who witness it, the conviction of the apostle's being sincere.

MUDJTAHID. [See IDJTIHĀD.]

MUDJATATHH, the fourteenth metre in Arabic prosody, has theoretically three feet, consisting of two successive faʿilātun in every hemistich; in practice there are two feet only.

It has one ʿarūd, and one ḍarb only: mustafʿilun faʿilātun: mustafʿilun faʿilātun. The foot faʿilātun of the ḍarb and also, though seldom, that of the ʿarūd, may become faʿilātun, on condition that mustafʿilun retains its n; it loses its n when mustafʿilun loses its s.

Muʿstafʿilun loses its s, when the preceding faʿilātun retains its n; it also loses its n, when faʿilātun following it, does not become faʿilātun.

AL-MUFAḌḌAL B. MUḤAMMAD B. YA'ĪLĀ B. 'AMIR B. SĀLIM B. AL-RAMMĀL AL-ḌABBĪ, an Arabic philologist of the Kufan school. By birth he was a free born Arab; the date of his birth is not known. His father was a recognised authority on the events in the wars of the Arabs on the frontiers of Khurāsān in 30—90 A.H. (quoted in Ṭabarī's Annals). It is possible that his son was born in this region. As a partisan of the house of 'Alī he took part in the rising against the 'Abbāsīd caliph al-Manṣūr led by Ibrāhīm b. 'Abd Allāh [q.v.], brother of al-Nafs al-zakiya. The rising was put down and Ibrāhīm killed; al-Mufaḍḍal was taken prisoner but pardoned by the caliph and appointed tutor to his son, the future caliph al-Mahdī, and in his train he visited Khurāsān. He then worked in Kūfa as a philologist and teacher; among his pupils was his stepson al-ʿArābī. The date of his death is variously given; the Fihrist does not give it at all while others give 164, 168 or 170.

al-Mufaḍḍal, like his contemporary Ḥammād [q.v.], bore the epithet and title of honour al-Rāwīya, and was regarded as an authority on the poetry of the Djāhiliya. In contrast to Ḥammād, he is celebrated for the reliability of his transmission. In the Kitāb al-Aghānī there are several stories illustrating this fact. While Ḥammād was reproached with having inserted verses which he had himself composed into the work of the prominent poets of the Djāhiliya, al-Mufaḍḍal is praised for handing down the old poetry pure and unfalsified. There was, of course, a great rivalry between the two rāwīs which also finds expression in the stories of the Aghānī. al-Mufaḍḍal is reported to have said that the influence of Ḥammād on Arabic poetry had been most disastrous, to a degree which could never be made good again. To the question how this was and whether Ḥammād had made mistakes in the attribution of the poems or linguistic errors, he replied: if that were all, it could be made good, but he had done worse than this. Since he was such an authority on the old poets, he was able himself to write verses in their style and he had inserted such verses of his own composition in genuine old ḥaṣīdas so that now only very good critics of the old poetry could recognise them (cf. Aghānī, v. 172 and Yāqūt, Irshād, vii. 171). It is also recorded that al-Mufaḍḍal once in the presence of the caliph caught Ḥammād passing off verses of his own as the work of Zuhair b. Abī Sulmā. The ḥaṣīda which Ḥammād was reciting began with da' dhā, and on the caliph asking for the missing nasīb he added several nasīb verses. al-Mufaḍḍal however said quite rightly that there had probably been a nasīb before the surviving verses, but no one any longer knew it. Ḥammād was thereupon forced to confess his forgery. It is interesting to learn that, as is recorded in this passage of the Aghānī, Ḥammād was rewarded for his recitation but the sum given to al-Mufaḍḍal was considerably greater. al-Mufaḍḍal was given his reward, not only for his knowledge, but also for his fidelity and honesty in transmission (cf. Aghānī, loc. cit. and Yāqūt, loc. cit.).

al-Mufaḍḍal worked in different fields of Arabic philology. He was considered an authority on rare Arabic expressions, celebrated as a grammarian and was also an authority on genealogy and on the Arab battles (Aiyām al-ʿArab). He wrote a number of books: a Kitāb al-ʿAmthāl (on proverbs), a Kitāb al-ʿArūḍ (on metres), a Kitāb Ma'na 'l-Shi'r (on the meanings of poems) and a dictionary: Kitāb al-Alfāz. His principal work, however, is a collection of old Arabic ḥaṣīdas called the Mufaḍḍaliyyāt, which he compiled for his pupil, the future caliph al-Mahdī. Al-Mufaḍḍal himself is said to have given another story of the origin of this anthology, which is one of the most valuable Arabic collections. When on one occasion Ibrāhīm b. 'Abd Allāh was in hiding in his house, he brought him some books to read at his request. Ibrāhīm marked a number of poems and these he collected in one volume because Ibrāhīm was a good critic of the old poetry. This collection was later called the Iktiyār al-Mufaḍḍal (cf. Flügel, Gramm. Schulen, p. 144, note 1).

The Mufaḍḍaliyyāt contains 126 poems, some complete ḥaṣīdas of many verses, some fragments of small size, while in Abū Tammām's collection, the Ḥamāsa, only little fragments of poems or separate verses are contained. The latter was compiled some fifty years later; at first it was much more popular than the Mufaḍḍaliyyāt and more frequently annotated. But al-Mufaḍḍal's anthology is of quite outstanding merit. The great bulk of it is the work of pagan poets and mukhaḍḍarūn, while only 6 of the 67 poets represented were born Muslims. Two of the poets whose ḥaṣīdas are contained in the Mufaḍḍaliyyāt, were Christians. The poems, the date of composition of which can frequently be deduced from events mentioned in them, are in some cases very old. The earliest are those attributed to Murākkish the Elder, which probably belong to the first decade of the sixth century A.D. al-Mufaḍḍal's anthology offers a rich selection of the old Arabic poetry, the value of which is increased by the great age of the poems preserved in it. The name of its collector, who enjoyed a good reputation among his contemporaries for his reliability, also gives us a certain guarantee that we have in the poems of the Mufaḍḍaliyyāt really genuine specimens of old Arab poetry.

AL-MUFĪD ABŪ 'ABD ALLĀH MUḤAMMAD B. MUḤAMMAD B. AL-NU'MĀN AL-ḤĀRITHĪ, also called IBN AL-MU'ALLIM, a distinguished Twelver scholar of Baghdād under the Būyids, was born at the end of 333 or 338 (945 or 950), and came of an old Kuraish family which, as his second epithet shows, had a reputation for scholarship; he himself became, as his epithet shows, the teacher from whom all "later students have derived advantage". While he took little active part in politics, he was a very prolific author. His correspondence, usually replies to queries, came from Mawṣil, Djurdjān, Dinawar, Rakka, Khwārizm, Egypt and Ṭabaristān. His literary connections with other leaders of the Twelvers are seen in the fact that the Dogmatics mentioned third below is a critical commentary on Ibn Bābūya's Risālat al-I'tikādāt (published in a collected volume, Teheran 1300) and was in turn commented on by the Baghdādī naḳīb al-Sharīf al-Murtaḍā; the work on law and tradition given second below was also the basis upon which his pupil Shāikh Ṭūsī [q. v.] wrote as a commentary his Tahdhīb al-Aḥkām, one of the "4 (5) books" of the Twelvers. Mufid wrote pamphlets against Ḍjubbā'ī, Ḍja'far b. Ḥarb, Ibn Kullāb, Karābīsī, the Mu'tazilis, Zaidīs, the followers of al-Hallādī, Ḥanbalīs, Ḍjāhīz and the 'Uṭhmāniya (for other collected titles see al-Khaiyāt, Kitāb al-Intiṣār, p. 156). The number of his writings runs to nearly 200. In addition to those preserved in European libraries, there are many other manuscripts in Shī'ī libraries, e.g. in Naḍjaf. Among them are the usual handbooks on fiḥh, on the uṣūl e.g. on iqīmā', as well as the furū' e.g. on the ḥadīdī and the law of inheritance; also treatises on fundamental philosophical conceptions such as the predicate, the state of being created etc.; but it is with specifically Shī'a problems that he mainly deals. Mufid, as the titles of several of his works and his influence on later writers show, championed the enhancement of the dogma of Prophets, dealt with the question, a painful one for the Shī'is, whether Abū Ṭālib was a believer, with the imāmate of 'Alī and the proof that the Imāms are higher than the angels. He naturally dealt also with the usual special tenets of the Twelvers, like the concealment of the Imām and the prohibition of meat butchered by the "People of the Book". He also wrote guides for pilgrims to the peculiarly Shī'ī holy places.

Mufid died on Ramaḍān 28, 413 (Nov. 26, 1022). The naḳīb al-Sharīf al-Murtaḍā conducted the funeral service; he was buried beside Ibn Bābūye [q. v.] at the feet of the ninth imām Muḥammad al-Ḍjawād in al-Kāzimain.

MUGHAL, the name given to the dynasty of Emperors of Hindustān founded by Bābur in 932 (1526), in virtue of the claim made by Timūr, the ancestor of the dynasty, to relationship with the family of the Mongol (Mughal) Čingiz Khān [q. v.]. For the detailed history of the dynasty see the articles BĀBAR, HUMĀYŪN, AKBAR, DJAHĀNGĪR, SHĀH-DJAHĀN, AWRANGZĒB, and their successors.

I. THE MUGHAL EMPIRE TO THE DEATH OF AWRANGZĒB

A. Military Organization of the Mughal Empire.

The army which Bābur led into India, and with which he defeated at Pānipat the army of Ibrāhīm Lodi, 100,000 strong, consisted of about 10,000 combatants, mainly cavalry, but comprising a corps of artillery and a small proportion of infantry, chiefly matchlockmen. Bābur's son and successor, Humāyūn, though hampered by the virtual independence of his brother Kāmran, governor of Kābul, who annexed the Panḍjāb, and thus cut him off from the best recruiting grounds of the Muslim army in Northern India, Afghānistān, and Transoxiana, was nevertheless able to lead into the field at the battle of the Ganges, near Kanawḍj, where he was defeated by Shīr Shāh, an army of 100,000 men. On his return to India in 1555 he left Kābul with an army of no more than 15,000 men, and it was his son and successor, Akbar, who was the creator of the army of the empire of which he was, in fact, the founder.

The empire was a military despotism. The governor of a province was entitled sipāhsālār, or "commander-in-chief", the governor of a pargana, or sub-district, farwājār, or "commandant", and practically all courtiers and officials, even those holding civil and judicial posts, were graded as commanders of horse. Thus we find Shāikh Abu 'l-Faḍl, Akbar's secretary, graded as a commander of 2,500; Rādjā Bir Bar, court wit and Hindi poet laureate, as a commander of 1,000; Saiyid Muḥammad, Mir-i 'Adl, a judge, as a commander of 900; and Shāikh Faiḍī, the poet, as a commander of 400 horse. A command of horse was known as manṣab ("rank" or "dignity"), and its holder as manṣabdār ("officer"). Each of these nominally commanding from 500 to 2,500 horse was classed as an amīr ("noble"), and each of those nominally commanding more as amir-i kabīr ("great noble"). These commands were nominal, conferred merely for the purpose of regulating the rank of the official holding them, and were styled manṣab-i dhāt ("personal rank"). Each of those actually exercising military authority had, in addition to his personal rank, sawār (horseman) rank. Thus, a commander of 5,000 might be described as "commander of 5,000, with 4,000 horsemen", that is to say, one ranking as a commander of 5,000, but supposed to maintain only 4,000 horsemen. In Akbar's reign, apart from the rank held by the royal princes, commands ranged from 10 up to 5,000 horsemen, but at the end of the reign two or three nobles were promoted to commands of 6,000 and 7,000. In these two high commands there was no distinction of grade, but each of the other commands was divided into three classes, viz: 1. those whose sawār rank was equal to their personal rank, 2. those whose sawār rank was half, or more, of their personal rank, and 3. those whose sawār rank was less than half of their personal rank. Thus, a commander of 5,000 with 5,000 horsemen would be in the first class of his rank, a commander of 5,000 with 3,000 horsemen in the second, and a commander of 5,000 with 2,000 horsemen in the third. A purely civil official often had no sawār rank, but the distinction between military and civil officials was less clearly marked than it is to-day, and all officials were, in theory, soldiers. The secretary, Abu 'l-Faql, served, at least on one occasion, in the field, and Akbar once entrusted military commands in the field to his court wit and to a leading physician, with disastrous results.

The lists of "commanders of horse" given in such works as the Ā'in-i Akbarī, the Tabaqāt-i Akbarī, and the Pādshāhnāma are not "army lists", but graded lists of the whole establishment of public servants, civil as well as military. Even where, as in the Pādshāhnāma, sawār rank is given as well as personal rank, the lists are no guide to the effective strength of the imperial army, for commanders with sawār rank did not maintain, and were not even expected to maintain, the number of horse indicated by that rank. Thus, Shāh-Djāhān issued an edict to the effect that commanders were not required to maintain more than one-third, and, in some cases, not more than one-quarter of the number of horse indicated by their sawār rank, and in the Balkh campaign they were not required to muster more than one-fifth of their nominal quota.

The yearly salaries of "commanders of horse" ranged from Rs 350,000 a year for a commander of 7,000 down to Rs 4,000 a year for a commander of 100, but in the commands in which there were three classes the salary varied with the class. Thus, in the 5,000 command an officer of the first class received Rs 250,000; an officer of the second Rs 242,500; and an officer of the third Rs 235,000. These salaries were attached to the personal rank, and were intended to enable the official to maintain his position at court or in the provinces, his household, his transport, and such horsemen as he might require for his personal service. For the payment of troops actually maintained separate allowances were made.

The horsemen were styled tābinān ("followers" or "troops"), and the majority of them provided and maintained their own horses and arms, and, in the field, their own transport. They were divided into three classes: three-horsed and two-horsed men, each of whom received nearly Rs 25 a month, and one-horsed men, each of whom received rather more than Rs 16½ a month. At a later date higher rates of pay than these were allowed in the Dakhān. Horsemen who could not supply their own horses were styled bārgīr, and were the servants or followers of these who supplied them. The proportion of these classes in every ten troopers was usually three three-horsed, four two-horsed, and three one-horsed troopers, or ten men and twenty horses.

The payment of the contingents maintained by the manṣabdārs was at first provided for by the grant of djāgīrs, or fiefs, so that the army was maintained on a feudal system, which, however, differed from the feudal system of Europe in that the fiefs were not hereditary, and the djāgīrdārs, or fief-holders, had no proprietary rights in them. A fief-holder might be transferred from one fief to another, or a portion of his fief, or even the whole of it, might be resumed. In 1574 an edict was promulgated by Akbar resuming all fiefs and converting them into crown lands, the payment of the troops being provided for by orders on the treasury for payments in cash. This edict caused much discontent, for the djāgīr system was, for many reasons, far more popular than the naqd, or cash-payment, system. Under the naqd system a muster-parade might at any time be made a condition precedent to the issue of a payment order; and a djāgīrdār might reap much profit by economizing in the administration of his fief, by rack-renting the landholders, and by encroachments, but the naqd system furnished him with no such means of enriching himself. The edict was immediately modified, and though the naqd system was introduced in the settled provinces of the empire, the djāgīr system was retained in the more recently conquered provinces of Bengal, Guḍjarāt, and Sind, and, after Akbar's death, was restored, in many cases, in other provinces.

Another reform introduced at the same time, the dāgh u-maḥallī, or branding regulation, was resented even more than the substitution of the naqd for the djāgīr system. It was seldom that manṣabdārs maintained their full quota of troopers; "false musters were an evil from which the Mughal army suffered, even in its most palmy days. Nobles would lend each other the men to make up their quota, or needy idlers from the bazars would be mounted on the first baggage pony that came to hand, and counted in with the others as efficient soldiers". It was to check such fraudulent practices that Akbar introduced the dāgh u-maḥallī regulation, which required the preparation of descriptive rolls of men and horses, the latter being branded on being passed as fit for service; and at muster-parades only these who produced branded horses were paid. This system originated, apparently, with the Saldjūks in Transoxiana and Persia, and was introduced into India by 'Alā' al-Dīn Khaldjī in 1312, but was not enforced after his death until it was revived by Shīr Shāh in 1541. After his death it was again abandoned, and Akbar had great difficulty in reviving it, owing to the determined opposition to any measure designed to prevent public officials from enriching themselves by defrauding the state. Even he was obliged to exempt commanders of 5,000, or a greater number, of horse from its operation, though these were required to parade their contingents for inspection when ordered. In the later days of the empire, the regulation was not enforced, and when Burhān al-Mulk joined Muḥammad Shāh at Karnāl, to meet Nādir Shāh, a historian considers it worth while to describe his contingent as mawḍūdī na kāghazī, that is, "actually present, not merely on paper"; and later, in 1750, an officer in Bengal receiving pay for 1,700 men was said not to have been able to muster more than seventy or eighty.

Besides the contingents of the princes and the manṣabdārs there were the sovereign's personal troops. His body-guard was a corps known as the Walāshāhī, composed chiefly of men who had been attached to him from his youth, and had served under him as a prince. Manucci refers to these as the emperor's slaves, and says that they numbered 4,000 under Awrangzīb. Details of their pay are not given, but they probably received more than the troopers serving in the contingents of the manṣabdārs. There was also a corps d'élite first formed by Akbar, and styled the Aḥādī corps. Abu 'l-Faql, in a characteristically foolish passage says that they were so called because they were fit for a "harmonious unity", whatever that may mean; but they seem to have been called ahādī because they enlisted singly in the personal service of the emperor, and were not brought into the service in bodies by a manṣabdār. They stood, in rank, between the lower *manṣabdār*s and the ṭābinān, and received nearly double the pay of the latter. They may be compared to "gentlemen of the life-guard", and many were seconded from the corps in order that they might hold civil appointments. The proportion of three-horsed, two-horsed, and one-horsed troopers was the same in the Ahādī corps as in the contingents of the *manṣabdār*s.

A commander of horse, whether he held a ājāgir or whether he drew the pay of his contingent from the treasury, made his own arrangements for its disbursement. He was entitled to retain five percent of the pay of his men for himself, and pay was not always allowed for a whole year; often only for six, five, or four months. Manucci, writing of the army in the reign of Awrangzib, says, "in respect of one year's service they receive six or eight months' pay. Even that is not all in coin; they are always foisted off as respects two months' pay with clothes and old raiment from the household. Over and above this, there is almost always due to them the pay for two or three years' service. The soldiers are obliged to borrow money at interest from the ṣarrāfs, or money-changers. These men lend to them, it is true, but it is hardly ever without a command from the general or officer; and these latter have an understanding with them about the profit from interest, which they share between them. Sometimes the soldiers sell their papers to these money-changers, who for a note of hand for one hundred rupees will give them twenty or twenty-five. It is by these and such-like extortions that these generals ruin the wretched soldier, who, unable to find other means of gaining his bread, is forced to remain on in his service. Speaking generally, it is impossible for them to escape such extortions, for these disorders reign throughout all the princes' establishments. If any one resigns service at his own request, they deduct two months' pay. Nevertheless service in the cavalry was socially an honourable profession; a common trooper was looked upon as being, to some extent, a gentleman, and such were, even when illiterate, often used to the highest positions".

The infantry was, in every respect, an inferior arm. With it were classed doorkeepers, watchmen, runners and spies, gladiators, wrestlers and palanquin-bearers, but the combatant branch consisted of musketeers or matchlockmen (barḳandūs), archers, and spearmen. Akbar maintained a corps of 12,000 matchlockmen, the officer in command of which was styled dārūgha. A secretary and a treasurer kept the accounts and disbursed the pay of these troops. The non-commissioned officers of the corps were graded in four classes, the first of which received $7\frac{1}{2}$, the second 7, the third $6\frac{3}{4}$, and the fourth $6\frac{1}{2}$ rupees a month. The privates were divided into five classes, the pay of which ranged from $4\frac{3}{4}$ down to $2\frac{3}{4}$ rupees a month.

Besides this corps was a number of troops styled dākhilī, of which one-fourth were matchlockmen and three-fourth archers. These were the troops allowed to the *fawājdār*s in the parganas or sub-districts, to assist them in maintaining order and collecting the revenue. The non-commissioned officers of the matchlockmen received Rs 4 a month, and the privates Rs $3\frac{1}{2}$ each. The archers were considered more efficient than the matchlockmen, for the matchlock was not an arm of rapid fire or precision, and an archer could shoot many arrows while a matchlockman was loading his matchlock. Neither matchlockmen nor archers could, as a rule, face cavalry in the field, and it was not until the emperors and their vassals were brought face to face with troops armed and drilled after the European fashion that they discovered that infantry was the queen of battles; but belief in the superior efficiency of cavalry died hard.

The artillery was divided into two classes, the heavy and the light. Bābur had an efficient corps of artillery, and used it with great effect, but the Muslims of India were not skilled artillerists, and the heavy artillery was usually officered and partly manned by 'Uḥmānī Turks, Portuguese renegades of pure or mixed blood, and occasionally by other Europeans. The light artillery consisted of field-pieces carried on bullock-carts, wall-pieces on animals' backs, and zambūraks, or still lighter service-guns, carried on and fired from the backs of camels. The heavy artillery was drawn by strings of oxen, or, occasionally, by elephants, and, as the army gradually declined in efficiency the heavy guns increased in length and calibre until they became so heavy as hardly to be mobile, so that often they could not be dragged to their destination but were left stranded by their road. A defeated army could seldom save its heavy and field artillery. All that it could do was to spike the guns and leave them. The ammunition was solid shot, sometimes of stone, sometimes of iron, and field guns and heavy guns in the field were sometimes loaded to the muzzle with the rough copper coin of the time, which took the place of case-shot, and did great execution at close quarters. The artillery also comprised a corps of rocketeers. The whole of the artillery was commanded by an officer entitled Mir-i Atush, or "lord of fire". The officers were entitled ṣadīwāl ("commander of 100") corresponding to a battery commander, and mirdaha (commander of 10), who had charge of a subdivision, or one gun. The wall-pieces and zambūraks, which were numerous, account for the enormous numbers of "guns" mentioned in accounts of armies in the field.

Akbar used elephants freely in battle, and brought them into the field in great numbers. They usually carried archers or musketeers on their backs. Their use as a fighting force was, however, soon abandoned, and would have been abandoned sooner than it was, had it not been for their imposing appearance, for it had long been established that they were more dangerous to their own side than to the enemy. "To the last some elephants protected by armour were brought into the battle-field, but their use was confined almost entirely to carrying the generals or great nobles, and displaying their standards. The baggage elephants were assembled in rear with those bearing the harem, the women remaining mounted on the latter during the battle, and protected by a strong force posted round them".

Under Akbar the elephants ridden by the emperor were called khāṣṣa ("special"), and all others were arranged in groups of ten, twenty, or thirty, called ḥalka ("ring", or "circle"). In later reigns the same classification was employed, but with a more extended meaning, khāssa then including all riding, and halka all baggage elephants. Manṣabdārs from 7,000 down to 500 were required to maintain each one riding elephant, and, in addition, five baggage elephants for each Rs 2,500 of pay. It appears that these elephants belonged to the emperor, and were not even made over to the manṣabdārs for use, except in the field. In the Ā'in-i Akbarī Abu 'l-Faḍl says that 'Akbar "put several halkas under the charge of every grandee, and required him to look after them".

The commander-in-chief of the army was the emperor himself, but at the head of the military administration was an officer entitled Bakhshī al-Mamālik, whose position may be described as that of adjutant-general and muster-master-general. He was assisted by three bakhshīs and a number of bitikīs, or clerks, and the duties of this department included enlistment, mustering, and passing the pay of both manṣabdārs and tābinān, for which purpose they were obliged to see that the branding regulations, so long as they were enforced, were observed by those to whom they applied. Manucci says, "twice a year the bakhshī holds a review of all the cavalry present at court, examines all the horses, and sees whether any of them are old and unfit for service. In the latter case he makes the owners get rid of them and buy others". These officers remained at headquarters, and from some authorities it appears that one of them had charge of the Walāshāhis, or body-guard, but the Aḥadī corps, which was commanded by one of the great nobles, had its own diwān, or paymaster and quartermaster, and its own bakhshī, both officers being assisted by bitikīs. Certificates granted by the bakhshī were recorded by the wāḳī'a-nigār, or writer of the official diary, and were by him submitted to the wazīr, or minister, who, after passing them, sent them to the office of revision and record, but pay was issued on the minister's order. "In addition to the bakhshīs at headquarters there were officers with similar functions attached to the governor of every province", their office being generally combined with that of wāḳī'a-nigār, or provincial diary-writer; and in imitation of the imperial establishments each great noble had his own bakhshī, who performed for him the same duties as those performed for the emperor by the imperial bakhshīs.

It is impossible to estimate accurately the strength of the army in Akbar's reign, for the sawār rank of the manṣabdārs is not given, either in the Ā'in-i Akbarī or in the Ṭabaḳāt-i Akbarī. He maintained 12,000 matchlockmen, and Blochmann estimates the whole strength of his army at 25,000, of which 12,000 were cavalry and the rest matchlockmen and artillery, but this seems to be much too low an estimate. Humāyūn could put 100,000 cavalry into the field, and it is not likely that Akbar, with far wider dominions, would have been content, or could have ruled and extended his empire with a smaller army. It seems probable that Blochmann's estimate included only the emperor's personal, or household, troops. In the latter half of Shāh-Jahān's reign the contingents of the princes and nobles would have numbered 425,500 if each manṣabdār had maintained the full quota of his sawār rank, but this they were not even expected to do. Fortunately a fairly exact return of the strength of the army is given in the Pādshāhnāma. There were 8,000 manṣabdārs of all ranks, 7,000 mounted Aḥadīs and barḳandās, 200,000 cavalry, exclusive of the troops allowed to ḥawdīdārs for the maintenance of order and the collection of the revenue, and 40,000 foot matchlockmen, artillery, and rocketeers, of whom 10,000 were at headquarters and 10,000 in the provinces and the forts. It is not quite clear what is meant by the mounted barḳandās classed with the Aḥadīs, for barḳandās is the word used for a matchlockman, and horsemen certainly did not carry the cumbrous matchlock, and carbines and pistols had not been introduced, but it may be that a few men carrying a lighter musket than the ordinary matchlock were attached to the Aḥadī corps. Of the army in the reign of Awrangzib Manucci writes, "ordinarily the king keeps fifty thousand horse in garrison besides those in movement every day, an almost equal number. He has twenty thousand infantry, all Rājipūts; out of them twelve thousand are in charge of the artillery; the rest are for guarding the royal palace, mounting sentry, et caetera".

The army of the Mughal emperors was not drilled. Muster parades consisted merely in the troopers passing in single file before the bakhshī, and the nearest approach to any manœuvres was the participation of the army, or part of it, in a royal hunt, when the troops, aided by the people of the country side, acted as beaters, surrounded a large tract of country, and, day by day, closed inwards until in a small area was enclosed an enormous quantity of game, which was then slaughtered wholesale by the emperor and those who were permitted a share in the "sport". Apart from this species of hunting styled shikār-i ḳamarḡha, the army was never exercised in any combined movements, or drill; but the individual trooper paid great attention to the training of his body, exercising himself with all his weapons, sabre, spear, mace, battle-axe, buckler, dagger, and bow and arrows. The bow was considered a most effective weapon, as a horseman could shoot six times before a musketeer could fire twice. The trooper also went through various exercises for strengthening his limbs and his body, both with and without apparatus, the latter consisting of dumb-bells, mugdar, or Indian clubs, and the lizam, a strong bow with a steel chain instead of a string, most effective in training these muscles employed by an archer. The horses were also trained in a sort of mandge.

B. Economics and Administration.

The Mughal Empire lived mainly by agriculture. The only metals available in quantity were iron and copper; both were relatively expensive, and local supplies of the latter were failing in the xviith century. The existence of coal was unknown, and of other minerals only lime, salt, saltpetre, and, locally, building stone were largely produced. The agricultural land was divided into areas known as villages (deh), usually, but not always, inhabited. The villages were grouped traditionally in larger areas (pargana), which were usually treated as administrative units (maḥall). Most villages, but not all, were occupied by a community of peasants, held together by the tie of common ancestry; each member of these bodies had separate possession of the land which he cultivated, but the community acted as a whole, through the headmen (muḥaddam), in the management of the village, letting surplus land to tenants, paying the revenue and other expenses, and transacting such other business as emerged.

The population was predominantly vegetarian. Meat for the officials and the army was provided where required, but its supply lay outside the ordinary course of agriculture. The products of the land were mainly food, cereals, millets and pulses, with, on a smaller scale, sugar, vegetables, and condiments. Oilseeds were grown for local needs; opium was produced largely, and tobacco, a recent introduction, had spread rapidly through the empire; cotton and some other fibres, together with indigo and other dyes, were the chief industrial crops. Holdings were usually small, and were worked largely by the peasant himself with the aid of his family and the landless labourers of the village. Oxen were used for tillage, implements were few and primitive, and there was in general a scarcity of agricultural capital, necessitating prompt sales of produce at each harvest, to the peasant's loss and the middleman's gain.

Handicrafts were numerous and varied, but weaving was by far the most important. Cotton cloth was woven all over the empire, most of it for local consumption, but near the coasts production was directed largely to supplying oversea markets, while finer goods — muslins and prints — were carried long distances by land. Most of the consuming markets were conservative, adhering closely to established styles and patterns. There was thus little scope for invention; copying was safer than designing; and such developments as are recorded were the result of either patronage by wealthy amateurs, or the extension of the European demand. Silk-weaving was locally important in Bengal and Guḍjarāt, in the latter case from imported material; jute and hemp also were only of local importance, but in the xviith century an export trade in sacks and sacking was beginning to develop.

In peaceful regions commerce was active, and, for the period, highly organised. Funds were ordinarily transmitted by bills of exchange, which could be negotiated in all the principal towns, and in some centres outside the empire. Merchants were, however, disinclined to carry large stocks of commodities, and preferred to utilise their funds in money-lending; the rate of interest in commercial transactions was commonly about 10 or 12 per cent, but the charge was much higher when the element of risk was great.

External land-trade was almost limited to the two caravan routes westward by way of Kābul and Kāndahār, though there was some small traffic with Tibet. By sea, Guḍjarāt had old-established connections with the Red Sea and the Persian Gulf, with East Africa, and with Sumatra, Malacca and further East; on a much smaller scale Sind had relations with Persia; while Bengal dealt chiefly with the south of India and with Burma and Siam.

During the xviith century all the sea routes were dominated by the Portuguese, who were concerned rather to exploit than develop; the chief extension of trade due to their efforts was the supply of cloth to Brazil and West Africa, but most of this was drawn from the Coromandel Coast, which was outside the empire until almost the end of the xviith century. After "factories" (i.e. agencies) had been established at Sūrāt by the English (1611) and the Dutch (1617), an important trade with western Europe grew up in indigo and calico. In the middle of the century the indigo-trade yielded to competition from the West Indies, while the depopulation of Guḍjarāt by the famine of 1630 transferred the bulk of the calico trade to the East Coast; Sūrāt remained, however, an important centre until its supersession by Bombay. In the second quarter of the xviith century the Dutch, followed by the English, established factories on the Hūgli in Bengal, and trade developed in silk, saltpetre, fine calico, and muslin. Towards the close of the century a change of fashions in Europe produced a great demand for muslin and prints, which was met partly by Bengal, and partly by Madras, by this time technically within the limits of the empire.

The outstanding feature of all trade with India was the need for importing gold and silver. India bought little beyond the industrial metals and luxury goods, but was eager to sell produce for cash; and, since Western Europe could not supply what was most in demand, the operations of the trading Companies were necessarily so organised as to direct streams of gold and silver to India from those countries which would part with them, notably, at this period, gold from China, and silver, and later gold, from Japan. The seaports serving the empire were thus brought into a complex but efficient organisation, which took whatever they had to sell, supplied whatever they wanted to buy, and, so far as was possible, satisfied the demand for gold and silver.

Inland transport was necessarily less efficient. The Indus, the Ganges, the D̥jūmna, and the waterways of Bengal were largely used, but the bulk of the empire depended on what were then called roads, unmetalled tracks, sometimes defined by lines of trees, with halting-places which were generally walled or otherwise defended against robbers, and usually furnished with supplies. Transport was effected by carts and pack-animals, generally oxen but in some places camels. Passengers travelled on horseback, in palanquins, or in carts drawn by fast oxen. There were excellent arrangements for the rapid transit of letters, but these were for official use, and were not ordinarily available for private persons, who hired messengers when required, or in a few cases, clubbed together to send messengers periodically.

Standards of life presented sharp contrasts. The mass of the population, peasants, artisans and labourers, lived in such extreme poverty as to excite the commiseration of European visitors. An almost equally low standard prevailed among the numerically important class of servants in the towns, whether freemen or slaves, who, however, enjoyed a more secure life than the rural population. The middle classes, comparatively smaller in numbers than now, were thrifty and frugal; and, even when wealthy, were careful to avoid any display which might lead to exactions by officials. The superior grades of officers employed by the State were exceedingly well paid when allowance is made for the high purchasing power of money, and spent their incomes freely in extravagance and display, increased by the fact that on their death their property reverted to the treasury.

The prosperity of the empire depended mainly on three factors: the character of the rainfall, the degree of internal tranquillity, and the working of the revenue administration. The seasonal rainfall was, as it still is, uncertain, and any serious defect resulted in insufficiency of food. The difficulty of transport made it impossible to afford adequate relief on the spot, the people abandoned their homes to wander in search of food, and in contemporary narratives we read again and again of the then familiar features of deaths from starvation, cannibalism, and the sale of children into slavery. Recovery from such a calamity was a slow process, and the famine which desolated Gujārāt and the Dakhan in 1630—1631 left its mark for at least a generation. Exceptionally favourable seasons might also prove calamitous, though not to the same extent. There was no local market for the surplus produce, prices fell to a ruinous level, and in official regulations low prices were treated as a calamity requiring relief on the same footing as drought or hail.

The dominance of the weather was inevitable; the other influences on prosperity were matters of administration. Here a clear distinction must be drawn between the general and the revenue administration, a distinction denoted by the current phrase mulki wa-mālī. The emperor was of course supreme in both branches, and was assisted at his headquarters by four principal officers, the Wakīl or Prime Minister, the Wazīr or Revenue Minister, the Bakhshī (see col. 629^a), and the Ṣadr, who was in charge of Islāmic law and also administered the department dealing with charitable grants and endowments. The post of Wakīl was not always filled, and when it was in abeyance the duties attaching to it devolved on the Wazīr. In practice the powers of these Ministers depended on the personality of the Emperor; under Akbar or Shāh-Djahān they were definitely subordinates, while Djahāngīr's Prime Minister was at times practically the ruler of the country.

The system of general administration to which the Mughals succeeded in Northern India was not highly developed. The great bulk of the country was held by officers in assignment (a term explained below); the assignee was responsible for keeping the peace, and in practice had a free hand in the methods employed. Under Akbar a more effective system was established, which was maintained throughout the period. The empire was divided into provinces (ṣubah), each of which was in charge of a Viceroy (Sipahsālār, Ṣubahdār), who at first was responsible to the Emperor for all branches of administration, but after 1595 was relieved of revenue work. Apart from the Viceroy, officers who may be described as Governors were stationed at selected places, with the duty of keeping the peace and putting down rebellion, a term which covered failure to pay the revenue due. The ordinary designation of these Governors was Fawjdār, but in outlying regions which were controlled by fortresses the Governor was the fortress-commander (Kifādār), while in a few large assignments the assignee exercised the powers of a Governor. Cities were governed by officers designated Kotwāl, who combined the functions of magistrate, police-commandant, municipality, and censor of morals. There was no regular police force at the disposal of these officers, who were expected to employ the troops they maintained as a condition of their rank, obtaining help when their own forces were insufficient. The efficiency of this organisation varied with that of the central administration, which depended mainly on the personality of the Emperor; by the close of the xviiith century it was definitely breaking down, and conditions of anarchy were spreading over the empire.

It is difficult to state in precise terms the relation of this organisation to the extensive portions of the empire where internal jurisdiction remained in the hands of Hindu Chiefs; but apparently the Chief was regarded officially as assignee of his territories, and was expected to maintain order within them. If he failed to do so, the Viceroy or Governor concerned might intervene, but his action would ordinarily be directed against the Chief rather than against the people.

The revenue administration was controlled by the Wazīr, sitting in the Revenue Ministry, which was known as Drwānī, as opposed to Hudūd, or the Court, whence orders were issued by, or in the name of, the Emperor. Revenue at this period meant practically Land Revenue; the Imperial Treasury had receipts from other sources — Customs, Salt, Mint, Presents, Inheritance, and, under Awrangzēb, the Capitation Tax (djizya) —, but, taken collectively, they were of little importance compared with the income obtained from the peasants. Under the system traditional in India, and embodied in Hindu law, every person cultivating land was required to pay a share of the produce to the King, who determined, within somewhat elastic limits, the amount of the share, and who also prescribed the methods of assessment and collection. The first Muslim conquerors accepted this "King's share" as the kharājī to which they were entitled under Islāmic law; the question of property in land was not raised, but occupants were ordinarily allowed to retain possession subject to due payment of the revenue.

In the Mughal period agricultural land fell into three classes: Chiefs', Reserved and Assigned. The areas governed by the more important Chiefs were not assessed to revenue (kharājī) by the Wazīr; that was the privilege of the Chief, and any payments which he made to the treasury were in the nature of a tribute, determined by negotiation. The treatment of the numerous smaller Chiefs is not on record; but the few facts which have survived are consistent with the view that assessment was made through them, and that they were allowed to retain a portion of the revenue in return for their services. In the regions which were directly administered, certain areas of land, described as khalīṣa, were reserved to furnish the treasury with cash, and were managed by the staff employed by the Revenue Ministry; at first the local staff was under the provincial Viceroy, but in 1596 a Drwān was posted to each province, to manage all revenue business directly under the Minister, and in this way emerged the dichotomy into drwānī (revenue business) and fawjdārī (general business) which henceforward characterised the local administration.

The land not reserved for the treasury was available for assignment. Every officer appointed to the Emperor's service was entitled to an income defined in cash, which represented both his personal salary and the cost of the troops he was required to maintain. For a short period in Akbar's reign, this income was paid, as well as defined, in cash, but the ordinary practice in the empire was to assign to each officer an area (dhāgīr, tuyūl, or ikṭā') estimated to yield as revenue the amount of his stated income; and the officer thereupon took charge of the area assigned to him, and assessed and collected the revenue in accordance, at least theoretically, with the general orders in force. If the yield proved insufficient, he could claim the balance from the treasury, while he could be required to account for any excess receipts; but in practice these matters seem usually to have been adjusted by bribery, for which there was also extensive scope in securing profitable assignments, and in getting rid of those which had been squeezed dry. Changes of assignment were ordinarily so frequent that an officer would have been unwise to spend money on fostering agricultural development, or do anything beyond extracting the largest income which his assignment could be made to yield. The great bulk of the land was ordinarily assigned, the reserved area being one-sixth or one-seventh of the whole.

The share of the peasants' produce claimed by Akbar was one-third; later, at some uncertain time in the first half of the xviiith century, this figure became the minimum, with a maximum of one-half, which inevitably tended to become the standard. Three principal methods of assessment were in vogue: Sharing (ghalla bakhsī), Measurement (paimāyish), and Group-Assessment (nasak). In Sharing, the produce of each peasant was ordinarily estimated (or occasionally ascertained at harvest), and the prescribed share valued to determine the cash-revenue due for that season. In Measurement, a fixed charge, varying with the crop, was made on each unit of area sown; it might be fixed in either cash or produce and in the latter case it was valued at current prices. Under both these systems payment in cash was the general rule, but payments in kind were permitted in some backward regions where currency was scarce. In Group-Assessment, the official concerned came to terms with the headmen of the village to pay a sum fixed in cash for the year, thus avoiding the necessity of detailed assessments on individuals; this system tended to pass into Farming, when terms were made, not with the headmen, but with an outsider.

Each ruler determined at his pleasure which of these methods should be employed, and in what regions. Group-Assessment was the prevailing system at the time of Bābūr's conquest, and apparently was accepted by him. After the expulsion of Humāyūn from India, Sher Shāh introduced Measurement throughout his kingdom, and his methods were at first adopted by Akbar; the revenue claimed from each unit of area was at this time a stated quantity of produce, calculated to be one-third of the average yield, and, except in the tracts where payment in kind was practised, this amount of produce was commuted to cash at prices fixed officially for each season. Practical difficulties arose, however, in regard to commutation; and in 1579—1580 the revenue was put definitely on a cash basis, the charge on each unit of area sown being a fixed number of dām (reckoned at 40 to the rupee) instead of a fixed weight of produce. Schedules of cash-rates adapted to the varying productivity of different regions were now drawn up, which remained in operation during the rest of Akbar's reign. At some uncertain period, probably under Dījahāngīr, these schedules were discarded, and a return was made to Group-Assessment, which was the standard system in the middle of the xviiith century, and survived into the British period; Sharing was now practised only in backward tracts, or in some cases where the headmen refused to pay what the assessor thought a reasonable revenue, in which case he proceeded to detailed assessment on individuals, by Sharing or by Measurement according to circumstances.

Such was the history of assessment in the heart of the empire, but the outlying provinces were not brought into rigid uniformity, local conditions determining the system applied in each; while in the Dakhan provinces a distinct and elaborate system was introduced in the middle of the xviiith century in order to promote recovery from the effects of war and famine.

It would be futile to criticise these varying institutions, for the value of all alike depended on the spirit in which they were worked. In administrative circles there was throughout the Muslim period a definite ideal of agricultural prosperity as the foundation of the State, its elements being extension of cultivation, improvement in the class of crops, and development of irrigation. Against this ideal operated the urgent need for the largest immediate revenue that could be wrung from the peasants. The course of the struggle cannot be traced in detail but the central fact is that by the middle of the xviiith century agriculture had ceased to be an attractive career, and the peasants were deserting the land for other occupations; the resulting decline in agricultural production was the chief economic factor in the eventual collapse of the empire.

The remaining branches of the administration require little description. Customs duties were formally low, but their incidence was increased by arbitrary over-valuation and unauthorised payments required to secure prompt clearance of goods. In the towns, civil justice was administered mainly by the kādī; in the country, disputes were apparently decided summarily by the executive officials. Punishments for crime were summary and drastic, and were not always in accordance with Islāmic law. By Indian tradition, local officials raised a large revenue for local purposes by a multitude of taxes and exactions of a most oppressive nature; these were prohibited en masse by Akbar, and again by Awrangzēb, but the system survived. Its worst feature was the levy of transit dues on internal trade, which were a cause of constant complaint by Indians as well as foreigners.

Special attention was given to the coinage, as being a recognised appanage of sovereignty. Gold, silver and copper were coined, all the coins circulating at their metallic value, so that the exchange rate between different denominations fluctuated; but gold was not in general circulation. The chief coin of the empire was the silver rupee, containing nearly 180 grains of almost pure silver; the principal copper coin was the dām, of nearly 324 grains; and there were various smaller coins of both metals.

The unit of weight used in wholesale commerce was the maund or man, which varied in different parts of the country. In the south of India it ranged round about 25 lb; in Gujārāt it was 33 lb, but in 1635 this was raised to 37 lb; in North India, it was 52 lb at Akbar's accession, was raised by him to 55 lb, by Djahāngir to 66 lb, and by Shāh-Djahān to 74 lb. In Bengal, it was 64 lb in the West, and 46 lb in the East. All these figures are given to the nearest lb. The unit for retail trade varied from place to place, but was ordinarily smaller than those which have been named. Measures of capacity were not used in wholesale commerce. The measure of length in the North was the gaz or yard, which was standardised by Akbar at about 33 inches, and by his successor at about 40 inches, but the smaller unit survived; in the South the hāsta, or cubit, of about 18 inches was used; in Gujārāt the unit was about 26 inches; and in Bengal about 27 inches.

II. THE DECLINE OF THE MUGHAL EMPIRE.

The decline of Mughal authority, already manifest during the reign of Awrangzēb, rapidly developed under his immediate successors. Bahādūr Shāh [q.v.] (1707—1712) was too amiable, Djahāndār Shāh [q.v.] (1712—1713) was too vicious, Farrukhsiyar [q.v.] (1713—1719) was too feeble, to revive the empire. In seven bloody battles of succession, fought within six years of Awrangzēb's death, the imperial family attested its inherent lawlessness and declining power. Then it became the sport of rival factions. For a while the two famous Saiyid brothers, 'Abd Allāh and Ḥusain 'Alī of Bārha, became the joint mayors of the palace. But they were unable to conciliate the support of the Mughal nobles. In 1720 Āṣaf Djāh Nizām al-Mulk rose in arms. Ḥusain 'Alī marched against him, but was murdered with the connivance of Muḥammad Shāh, the emperor whom he and his brother had set up in 1719. Shortly afterwards, his brother 'Abd Allāh was defeated, and, after lying in prison at Dihli for two years, was poisoned. When they fell, Nizām al-Mulk strove hard to restore something like the old order of administration. But he was unwilling to force himself upon Muḥammad Shāh as the Saiyids had forced themselves upon Farrukhsiyar. When the emperor whom he had delivered refused his advice, and the favourites of the court made fun of his antiquated dress and ceremonious manners, he preferred to retire and rule the Dakhan in virtual independence. Ironically enough, Muhammad Shāh believed that Nizām al-Mulk had been plotting his overthrow.

With Nizām al-Mulk's departure from Dihlī the last chances of a revival of the empire vanished. Never did a falling state betray greater incapacity for reformation. No phoenix could arise from those shameful ashes. Even while Nizām al-Mulk still retained the nominal control of affairs, extraordinary incidents could occur. At Dihlī itself, for example, a Hindu clerk in one of the imperial offices turned Muslim, and, when his wife and daughter refused to follow his change of faith, he laid a complaint against them, alleging that, as his daughter had not attained puberty, she was therefore of her father's religion. The case offered certain technical difficulties, was at last referred to the sadr al-ṣudūr. His treatment of the case displeased the Dihlī mob. Riots arose, the recital of the khutba at the Djahān-numā Masjid was interrupted, two or three Hindus were seized and circumcised. To pacify the rioters, the girl was imprisoned, and, a few days later, buried with Muslim ceremonial. "To cut a long story", says Kāmwar Khān who relates the incident, "she was killed; otherwise there would have been many headaches and much vexation".

Nizām al-Mulk's successors were worthy of the frivolous emperor whom they professed to serve. For twelve years the imperial councils were directed by a man called Shāh 'Abd al-Ghafūr. By origin a cotton-weaver of Tatthā, he had lived both as rogi and fakīr. Claiming magical powers and popularly believed to consort with djinn and devils, he was summoned to interpret the dreams of the emperor's mother. This led him into the imperial service, and he contrived to accumulate in his own hand a great number of offices, producing a revenue of 5,000 rupees a day, apart from the bribes which he received, said to amount to as much more. This man was pithily described as never having spent money on a good work, never having conferred a favour, and never having done a kindness. He was a miser, and at his downfall (for even at Dihlī under Muhammad Shāh such qualities at last produced their natural reaction) more than a crore of rupees was found in his private hoards. But the unpopularity which his character and habits naturally evoked were as nothing compared with the detestation with which his son and daughter were regarded. No one in Dihlī was safe who displeased them or denied them anything that they desired.

Amid such confusion and under such rulers the empire rapidly lost its cohesion. The Marāṭhās [q. v.], whom even Awrangzēb sought in vain to subdue, soon became the most formidable power in India. On Awrangzēb's death, his successor, Bahādūr Shāh, had released the Marāṭhā prince, Shāhū Rājā, in the desperate hope of reestablishing through him the form, if not the substance of imperial control. Shāhū Rājā met with influential and talented support. In 1708 he took possession of Satara and by the next year was generally recognised as ruler. A Chitpavan Brahman, Bālādji Wishwanāth, became his pēshwā or first minister, and began to develop the characteristic Marāṭhā policy, which was to play a part in the enfeeblement of the empire. This was to put forward claims to a share (under the title of ḥaṭh or a quarter part) in the imperial revenues in as many provinces as possible. In 1709 the Mughal governor in the Dakhan admitted this claim, and, although later governors contested it, it was again recognised by the Bārha Saiyids in 1719. In the next year Bālādji Wishwanāth was succeeded by his son, Bādji Rāo I, and the process was extended farther afield. Particular provinces were assigned to particular officers, who were to realise the ḥaṭh either by collecting the amount from the provincial governor, or by plundering the country. Bādji Rāo employed Pilādji Gāekwār as his chief leader in raids in Gujjarāt; Raghudji Bhonsla established himself at Nāgpur; these and other leaders spread the terror of Marāṭhā devastations in all directions, and it was no longer possible for the provincial governors to make their annual remittances to the capital. At the same time, seeing that their tenure of office was coming to depend more and more upon their own power and resources, the governors tended to become virtually independent rulers. Āṣaf Dījāh Nizām al-Mulk in the Dakhan continued to profess himself a humble servant of the emperor, but he repelled by force of arms the persons who came with imperial farmāns ordering his supersession, and when he died in 1748 he was succeeded by his son. In Bengal too the succession had become a matter of heredity or war. But the respect which the name of the empire still enjoyed and the degradation into which the empire itself had fallen were exemplified by the large gifts sent by a new ruler for farmāns of investiture and the unhesitating compliance with which they were issued.

The troubles bred by this internal dissolution were enhanced by those of foreign invasion. In 1722 the Šafawids were overthrown in Persia, and, after a short period of great confusion, the Turk-mān Nādir Kulī established himself as ruler under the title of Nādir Shāh [q. v.]. With him difficulties arose over the Kāndahār frontier. He was engaged in reducing the Ghilzais there to submission. Thrice he sent envoys to the court of Dihlī requesting that his enemies should not receive shelter in the Mughal territory. But by this time the Kābul province was falling into a like disorder with the rest. The governor spent his time in prayer and hunting. The money which had been regularly sent from Dihlī to bribe the hill-tribes into quietude and pay the troops ceased to be sent, partly because of the growing imperial penury, partly because it was believed that it never reached the governor but was embezzled by his patron at court. Large bodies of Ghilzais therefore were able without the least difficulty to take shelter from Nādir Shāh's troops in the Mughal province, while the Mughal court foolishly supposed it was evading its difficulties by neglecting to answer Nādir Shāh's repeated demands. The ineptitude of the court, therefore, rather than (as used to be supposed) any elaborate intrigue of party against party, made Nādir Shāh resolve to invade India. No effective opposition could be offered in either the Kābul province or the Pandjāb. In 1738 Kābul was occupied. In the next year Nādir Shāh's army appeared before Dihlī. The emperor went out, not to strike a blow in his own defence, but to make his humble submission. Conqueror and captive then entered the city. The Dihlī mob, grievously mistaking its strength, attempted to massacre the foreigners. As a punishment Nādir Shāh deliberately let loose his troops for five long hours — from 9 o'clock in the morning till 2 in the afternoon — during which some 20,000 of the inhabitants are believed to

to have perished; and beyond this toll of life a great ransom was exacted, including 50 crores' worth of those wonderful jewels which earlier Mughal sovereigns had heaped up for their delight. From this time onwards the annals of the Mughal empire contain nothing but dishonour. Nādir Shāh fell; but Ahmad Shāh Durrāni established on the borders of India another empire and repeatedly invaded India between 1748, the year of the ignominious Muḥammad Shāh's death, and 1761, the year in which he inflicted the severest defeat in all their history upon the Marāṭhās at Pānīpat. Until the decay of the Durrāni empire in the early years of the nineteenth century, the provinces of Sind, the Panjāb, and Kashmīr, were dependencies of the Afghān kingdom.

Europeans in India — Dutch, French, and English — had observed these events with great concern. Early in the eighteenth century the Dutch had sent a great embassy to Bahādūr Shāh, and a little later the English had sent one to Farrukhsiyar. Both had secured far-reaching farmāns by profuse expenditure; both had found that their farmāns were waste paper wherever they ran counter to the interests of local governors. But it was the Frenchman Dupleix who first sought to put into practice the conclusions to be drawn from this situation. Others were convinced that European force could easily establish itself in India; but he began experiments, and, in the hope of keeping the English motionless while he acted, he professed to be acting on behalf and in the name of the Mughal emperor. This fiction became the traditional basis of French policy in India, and down to the end of the century Frenchmen were elaborating plans (which their failure to control the sea brought to nothing) for establishing themselves in India and expelling their rivals under cover of imperial grants. With equal consistency the English adopted a political realism which squared far better with the circumstances of the time. They fought and overcame Dupleix in the name of their national interests. When they acquired Bengal, they carefully avoided all obligation to reestablish the imperial authority; and it appears that their acceptance of the diwāni of Bengal was dictated, not by any desire to mask the reality of their power (which no one in India doubted), but by the desire to take on behalf of the East India Company something which could not be taken over by the English crown as a territorial sovereignty certainly would have been. Thus it was that Prince 'Alī Gawhar, who proclaimed himself as Shāh 'Ālam II [q. v.] in 1760, on learning of his father 'Ālamgīr's murder by his wazīr, Ghāzī al-Dīn, first came under the protection of the English. He had for some years been attacking the province of Bihār with the aid of the Nawāb Wazīr of Oudh. But after the battle of Baksar in 1764 he had given up the struggle, joined the English camp, and in the following year on Clive's demand bestowed on the East India Company the diwāni of the provinces it held in return for an annual allowance of 26 lakhs of rupees. At the same time the districts of Kora and Allāhābād were assigned to him and he proceeded to reside in the latter city. Soon however, he wearied of his position of dependence, and departed to join the Marāṭhās, who, having recovered from their defeat at Pānīpat, were once more invading northern India. On this Warren Hastings decided to hand

Kora and Allāhābād over to the Nawāb Wazīr and refused to continue the payment of the 26 lakhs. From this time until the close of the century he remained under the control of the Marāṭhās, except at such times as their internal dissensions led to the recall of their forces from the north. One of their chief leaders at this time, Mahadājī Sindhiā, gradually built up a strong principality for himself, conquering the provinces of Agra and Dihli, and becoming the emperor's real custodian. So matters remained till Sindhiā's defeat by the English in 1803 transferred the guardianship of Shāh 'Ālam into the hands of the latter. They carefully refrained from entering into engagements with him, but they assigned revenues for the maintenance of the imperial family, they permitted all orders issued in the city of Dihli to run in the emperor's name, though the actual administration was conducted by an English agent, and they attempted no interference within the precincts of the palace. Gradually the traditional observances broke down. The Mughal emperor and the British governor-general met with the ceremonial of equals. The emperor's name was removed from the coinage. And it had been resolved no longer to recognise the imperial title after the death of its holder, Bahādūr Shāh II, when the Indian Mutiny, in which several of the imperial princes took an active part although they seem to have had little share in bringing it about, led to the formal trial and deposition of the emperor and the disappearance of the shadowy court which for a century had lingered on under the toleration of the real powers of India.

III. MUGHAL ARCHITECTURE IN INDIA.

The Mughal dynasts brought to India strong Central Asian predilections and a keen feeling for natural beauty. But each in succession obeyed his own instincts, education and caprices. Hence they patronised no "schools" of art, but came to employ an almost cosmopolitan body of artists, Persian, Indian, Turk and even European, who one and all had to adapt their own canons to the aesthetic moods of their employers. In general the Mughals forbade any sculpture of the human form, but like the Orthodox Greek Church, were usually less rigid towards paintings of it and even fostered portraiture till it reached a high level. Yet, with relatively few exceptions, the Mughal buildings were all religious, comprising mosques and tombs or shrines. Hence their scope was limited, though within their limits they express the religious feelings and policies of the dynasty. Even the conqueror Bābur found leisure in his brief reign of five years, 1526—1531, to build at Pānīpat the Kābul Shāh mosque, whose name commemorates at once his love of Kābul and his victory at Pānīpat in 1526. His mosque at Sambhal in Rohilkhand is marked by an ovoid dome. When he required constructive work Bābur summoned pupils of Sinān, an Albanian, from Constantinople, and avoided Indian, Hindu or indigenous standards, though he must have employed Indian workmen in spite of his disparagement of Indian skill and knowledge in design or architecture.

Humāyūn's longer but still more chequered reign produced many buildings, of which few remain. His mosque at Fathābād near Dihli is massive and well-proportioned, recalling the Tughlak or Turkish period, with domes rather more than hemispherical. It is decorated with enamelled tiles in the Persian manner, apparently the earliest example of that style now extant. His tomb at Dihli, doubtless begun, as is customary among pious Easterns, during his lifetime, is of red sandstone and also Persian in style, but in its coloured tiles are replaced by white marble, of which the dome is wholly composed, the rest of the masonry being also inlaid with that material. The main dome has a narrow neck, the first of its type to appear in India, the four corner cupolas, also a new feature, support domes of an earlier style.

Akbar (1556—1605) was versatile in his architectures as he was in his religion. In the Fort at Āgra he built the palace — one of the few secular buildings of the Mughal period which survive — called the Djahāngirī Maḥall. His other buildings at Āgra were demolished by Shāh-Djahān. This palace, built of red sandstone which has weathered badly, bears the impress of Akbar's vigour and originality. Throughout arches are used sparingly, the horizontal style of construction being the rule. Its forms also are as Hindu as its construction, but the ornamentation, carved on all flat surfaces, is of a type used by Akbar but not found in other buildings. During the early part of his reign was erected at Gwalior the tomb of Muḥammad Ḡhawth, who died in 1562. Closely resembling that of Shēr Shāh at Sahsārām, it marks a considerable advance in tomb-building during the brief period that had elapsed between the erection of the two, an advance ascribed by Fergusson to the invigorating touch of Akbar's genius, but doubtless due in great measure to the skill of the Gwalior school of architects and masons who were probably Hindus. The tomb is a square, 100 ft. each way, exclusive of the hexagonal towers, and its chamber forms a hall, 43 ft. square, with the angles cut off by pointed arches so as to form an octagon on which the dome rests. Around this square building is a wide gallery, enclosed on all sides by a screen of exquisite tracery in pierced stonework with a projecting porch on each face.

At Fathpur-Sikrī, the new capital founded by Akbar where the court resided from 1569 to 1584, the emperor's eclectic phase found its fullest expression. Its architecture is admirably illustrated in W. E. Smith's works¹), but all its significance has not yet been explained. The site was chosen because Akbar's patron saint, the Sūfī Salīm Ḡishtī, lived in a cave on its summit²). Akbar's own residence was the "House of Dreams", the Khwāb-gāh, an unpretentious structure standing on the roof of the Maḥall-i Khāṣṣ, which contains paintings attributed by Smith to Chinese artists and apparently depicting Buddha as Yamāntaka¹). However this may be, the design of his throne in the Diwān-i Khāṣṣ massive pillar symbolizes that he sat there as a Ḡakravartin or ruler of the four quarters, as Havell suggests, though it is conceivable that it signified his claim to the supreme headship of his new religion, the Dīn-Ilāhī. But it is rash to dogmatise on the symbolism of a builder who seems to have had no settled design for the plan of his new city. The Maḥall-i Khāṣṣ regarded by Fergusson as the original block of building at Fathpur-Sikrī, has two spacious courtyards and is larger than the Red Palace at Āgra, but its surrounding structures are inferior in richness of design and ornamentation. From time to time Akbar added courts and pavilions as if to compensate for this inferiority. While the Diwān-i Khāṣṣ is square, as befits a Hall of Audience, the Daftar-Khāna or Record Office is peristylar like the one erected by Akbar at Allāhābād. The Panč Maḥall, a five-storeyed open pavilion with richly carved pillars, and long colonnades and walls connecting these buildings one with another, complete this group of structures. The most characteristic and beautiful of his designs here are the three small buildings, the Maḥall or apartment of Birbal's daughter, the house of Mariam Zamānī, mother of Djahāngir, and the palace of the Rūmī Sultāna, Ruḡaiya Begam, a cousin of Akbar and his first consort. Akbar's greatness however demanded more grandiose monuments. The Djāmi^c Masjdīd or cathedral mosque, erected in 1571 (the year in which he proclaimed himself the mudjtahid of Islam) and openly claimed the spiritual headship of Islām) commemorated his victories in the Dakhan (Southern India). It ranks amongst the finest ecclesiastical buildings of India. According to its inscription, it was designed by Shaiḡh Salīm Ḡishtī himself and modelled on the Ka'ba. Though highly ornate it betrays few or no traces of Indian influence²). The tomb of the Shaiḡh, in its courtyard, is built wholly of white marble, with windows of pierced tracery of the most exquisite geometrical patterns, and a deep cornice of marble supported by brackets of a design so elaborate as to be almost fantastic. The other tomb in the courtyard, that of Salīm's grandson, Shaiḡh Islām Khān, is of sober and excellent design but eclipsed by its surroundings. The Buland Darwāzah or "lofty gateway", built in 1602, commemorates Akbar's conquest of Khāndesh and dwarfs even the Djāmi^c Masjdīd. It is the grandest gateway in India and one of the loftiest in the world, its height being enhanced by its position on the brow of the hill on which Fathpur-Sikrī stands. Its architect placed its portals at the back of a semi-dome, which thus became its porch or portico, and its dimensions impress themselves as those of the actual portal. It must be added that Akbar intended his new capital to be a school of all the arts and that he allied architecture to painting. From the fragments of interior mural paintings which survive, it is clear that he employed Persian and Indian artists, who worked independently, and some idea of their technique is doubtless to be gathered from the miniatures of this period, as mural artists were also required to illustrate manuscripts.

At Allāhābād, the city where Akbar was compelled by administrative duties to reside more than at his new but isolated capital, he built the pavilion of the Čālis Sitūn or "Forty Pillars", of which only the hall survives. Its plan is square, supported by eight rows of columns, eight in each row, making sixty-four in all; and it is surrounded by a deep verandah of double columns, with groups of four at the angles, all surmounted by bracket capitals of the richest design.

But perhaps the most characteristic of Akbar's buildings, observes Fergusson, is his tomb at Sikandra, begun in his lifetime¹⁾ but completed by his successor. Unfortunately Djahāngir, in his Tūzūk (transl. A. Rogers, i. 152), asserts that he demolished Akbar's work and reconstructed the tomb. But, seeing that the plan of the building is unique in India and has no Persian or Saracenic parallel, it is more likely that only its exterior is the work of the fastidious orthodox Djahāngir. Its original plan was modelled on the Panč Maḥall, being composed of five square terraces diminishing in size as they ascend. Thus the outline of the structure is pyramidal, not domical. Standing in an extensive garden it is approached by a single gateway and stands on a raised platform. Excluding the angle towers the lowest storey measures 320 ft. each way, and on this terrace stand three more, similar in design but more ornate, each about half the height of the lowest storey or terrace. Within and above the highest storey is a white marble enclosure, 157 ft. square, contrasting with the red sandstone of which the rest of the structure is built. The outer wall of this enclosure is entirely composed of beautiful trellis-work; and inside it is a colonnade or cloister, also of white marble, in the centre of which is placed the tomb of Akbar, resting on a platform of exquisite arabesque tracery. This doubtless typifies Akbar's celestial resting-place, for below it lie his remains under a far plainer tombstone in the basement. That Djahāngir here departed from the original plan is certain. According to W. Finch, the tomb was to have been covered with a canopy of "curious white and speckled gold richly inwrought". What Akbar planned and what he meant to express by his design must remain a matter of conjecture. Fergusson postulates a Buddhist model, and even sees in the pavilions which adorn the upper storeys reminiscences of the cells which stand on the edge of the great rock-cut rath at Māmallapuram; but these may have been intended for use as a theological college like the rooms and pavilions in the upper storey of Humāyūn's tomb. He also thought that a domical chamber over the tombstone formed part of the original design, since no such royal tomb remains exposed to the air in any Indian mausoleum — a dangerous generalization. Havell sees in the building an Indian five-storeyed Assembly-Hall, apparently a meeting-house for the royal order, the Dīn Ilāhi, the four lower pavilions (or terraces) corresponding to the four grades of the order. Even Cambodian influences have been conjectured¹⁾. Yet it is not impossible that a Zoroastrian model was kept in view, as Akbar borrowed from that faith among others.

As compared with Akbar Djahāngir contributed little to the architectural magnificence of Mughal India. At Lahore, which he made his capital, he added the Barā Khwāb-gāh or greater sleeping apartment to the Fort; and the tomb of Anārkalī was also erected in that city. Near Srinagar in Kashmir he made the Shālīmār gardens with their summer-houses; and the fine gateway to the Sarāi at Nūrmahal near Djalandhar is also ascribed to his reign. The quadrangle at Lahore was doubtless executed by Hindu artisans, as the colonnade, which surrounds three sides of its area, is supported by pillars of red sandstone with bracket capitals and carved figures of elephants, peacocks and conventional animals like those found in the Red Palace at Āgra. Djahāngir's greatest buildings were however erected at Dakka, in Eastern Bengal, where he made a new provincial capital in supersession of Gawr; but his structures there were principally built of brick, covered with stucco, only the pillars and brackets being of stone, and they have been almost destroyed by the jungle. In one respect only did Djahāngir innovate. In 1600 he built the Moti Masdjīd or "Pearl Mosque" at Lahore, the first of its kind in India. Between Akbar's style and that of Djahāngir little difference exists. The former had used colour ornamentation at Fathpur-Sikrī; its later buildings were richly decorated with wall-paintings, and marble mosaic was used in the Djāmi' Masdjīd. Djahāngir relied still more on mosaic decoration, e.g. in Akbar's tomb at Sikandra, but soon after its completion we find variegated marble mosaic supplemented by pietra dura, as in I'timād al-Dawla's tomb, and in the Tādj we still find inlay almost exclusively used. Akbar had continued the use of enamelled tiles at Fathpur-Sikrī for roofing and more sparingly for ornamentation; and they were employed by Djahāngir at Sikandra and by Wazīr Khān, his wazīr, on his mosque at Lahore. Indeed this mosque is only noteworthy on account of this decoration. Akbar had also introduced painting on interior walls.

Djahāngir's wife Nūr Maḥall or Nūr Djahān erected at Āgra the tomb of her father, I'timād al-Dawla, completed in 1628. Built almost entirely of white marble, enriched with semi-precious pietra dura patterns, it foreshadowed the finest work of Shāh-Djahān's reign. Djahāngir's tomb, at Shāh-darā near Lahore, has little architectural merit, consisting of a vast platform 209 ft. square, with a minaret at each corner. The façades are decorated with white marble let into the red sandstone and the flat roof with geometrical mosaics. The emperor's remains are probably buried beneath an opening in the roof so that the rain and dew of heaven might fall on his tomb, as his earliest chronicler says²⁾. In brief the actual grave was hypaethral³⁾.

1) This view is contested in Archaeological Survey of India, Annual Report, 1903—1904, p. 19, but it was certainly the usual custom for a Mughal emperor, like any other good Musliman of means, to build his tomb during his lifetime. The problem is fully discussed in The Tomb of Akbar, by E. W. Smith and W. H. Nicholls, published by the Arch. Survey of India, Allāhābād 1908.

3) A contrary view, that the tomb had a closed following the precedent set by Bābur. The sarcophagus is of white marble, inlaid with pietra dura, and it stands in an octagonal chamber 21 ft. high and $20\frac{1}{2}$ in diameter. This chamber is enclosed in nearly solid walls of masonry, 56 ft. thick on all sides, and access to it is afforded by two oblong apartments, one on each side, but it does not open into any of the forty other rooms behind the arches which surround the structure, each façade having a central arch with five smaller arches on each side.

Under Shāh-Djahān (1627—1658) Mughal architecture attained its zenith. One of his earliest buildings was the incomparable Tādj Maḥall [q. v.], begun the year after the death of the empress, Ardjūmand Bānū Begam, entitled Mumtāz Maḥall, or the "Chosen One of the Palace". For himself Shāh Djahān planned a corresponding tomb of equal magnificence on the opposite bank of the river Djamnā, but Awrangzēb did not carry out the scheme, probably because it savoured of paganism¹). Considerable controversy has raged over the question of its architect. Shāh-Djahān's style was essentially Persian, with an indefinable difference of expression, and it was sharply distinguished from those of Ispahān and Constantinople by a lavish use of white marble, sumptuously decorated with pietra dura. Coloured tiles had by now become rare. Spacious grandeur was combined with feminine elegance, to which inimitable open-work tracery contributed. In the mosques colour was eschewed, and the finest art is found in the Pearl Mosques at Āgra and Dihli. The former was built in 1646—1653. Meanwhile Shāh-Djahān had founded Shāh-Djahānābād, the great palace near modern Dihli, recently restored to something like its pristine beauty. A Persian engineer, 'Alī Mardān Khān, had tapped the Djamnā 6 miles above Dihli, and his canal fed the new capital with many streams. The most favoured of them was the Nahr-i Bihisht of "Stream of Paradise", which was so named by Shāh-Djahān himself. It fell in a cascade down a marble chute in a pavilion — the Shāh Burdj — and flowing along the terrace which bordered the Ḥayāt-Bakhsh ("life-giving") garden, it traversed the chain of stately edifices that lined the eastern wall of the Palace — the Hammām, Diwān-i Khāṣṣ and Khwāb-gāh — silently gliding beneath the Mizān-i Inṣāf ("Balance of Justice") across a sun-bathed court into the cool of the Imtiyāz Maḥall or "Palace of Distinction", styled later the Rang Maḥall Kalān or "Greater Colour Palace", from its elaborate painted decoration and gilding. Set on a marble terrace which formerly swept from end to end of the Fort, it overhung the Djamnā whose course then flowed along the base of the red sandstone walls. On the West an orchard separated it from the Diwān-i 'Ām. Thence, still southward, it passed through the Lesser Rang Maḥall, the Mumtāz Maḥall and other buildings of the imperial zanāna. Thus Dihli combined the Mughal love of enclosed gardens, watered by running channels, with their passion for architectural beauty. It preserved Bābur's love of nature, and perhaps added to it a sense of landscape which also found expression in the Mughal gardens of Kashmīr.

With Awrangzēb (1659—1707) set in the period of decline, due no doubt largely to that emperor's orthodox prejudice against art, but partly also to his conscientious parsimony. He declined to complete Shāh-Djahān's tomb, ostensibly on the ground of expense, but also perhaps because he regarded the scheme as savouring of paganism. Yet he constructed at Benares the great mosque with its lofty graceful minarets, built a copy of the Dihli mosque at Lahore, and at Awrangābād imitated, though on a small scale and with success, the Tādj in the tomb of his favourite wife. Awrangzib's own tomb, at Khuldābād, a hamlet just above the caves at Elūra, is mean and insignificant. But some of his buildings, in spite of their incipient decadence, are the last great examples of the Mughal style. His Djāmi' or Bādshāhi mosque at Lahore is pleasing in form, though the marble ornamentation of its great central and front façade is very inferior in detail to its prototype at Dihli. Its three domes of white marble and the imposing gateway of red sandstone and marble leading to it from the Hazūri Bāgh are its finest features.

Near Dihli the tomb (1756) of Nawwāb Safdar Djang, Wazīr of Oudh, is a passable copy of a Humāyūn's mausoleum, but its interior is marred by indifferent plaster decoration.

At Lucknow, the capital of the Nawwāb Wazīrs of Oudh, the buildings erected by that dynasty and its nobles hardly deserve to be classed as Mughal. The one exception is the vast Imāmbāra, built by the fourth Nawwāb, Āsaf al-Dawla, in 1784. Conceived on a grand scale for the celebration of the Muḥarrām according to the Shī'a rite, its details will not bear close examination, though its solidity is impressive. The buildings of the Muḥammadan dynasty of Mysore (1760—1777) have still less claim to be regarded as Mughal.

To conclude, the architecture of the Mughals was, like all their arts, a resultant of many forces.

roof and only an uncovered tombstone is maintained by J. P. Thompson in the Journal of the Panjab Historical Society, i. 12—30 (also W. H. Nicholls, in Arch. Survey of India, Annual Rep., 1906—1907, p. 12). But hypaethral shrines were not uncommon during the Mughal period (see H. A. Rose, in Journ. Panjab Hist. Soc., iii. 144—145, and Glossary of Panjab Tribes and Castes, i. 534). It is possible to reconcile the structural evidence with tradition by assuming that the tomb was originally hypaethral, but that a dome was subsequently erected over it and that Awrangzib removed the addition in order to restore the original design; but hardly, as Moorcroft states, with the intent that "his grandfather's tomb might be exposed to the weather as a mark of his reprobation of the loose notions and licentious practices of Djahāngir" (cf. W. Moorcroft and G. Trebeck, Travels in the Himalayan Provinces, London 1841, i. 108—109).

1) For twin shrines on either side of the Indus see the account of Daira Din Panāh in Muzaffargarh (Punjab) District Gazetteer, Lahore 1910, p. 71. Tavernier records this tradition in his Travels, Bk. i., Ch. vii., but he does not add the further tradition that Shāh-Djahān's mausoleum was to have been of black marble, a rarity hardly procurable in India. The Tādj was however only the central feature in a group of smaller and hardly less beautiful buildings, e. g. the four Saheli Burdjes, tombs of the empress' maids-of-honour; see Arch. Survey of India, Annual Rep., 1903—1904, p. 14 and plate iii.

But its essential distinction over Hindu art lay in its balanced use of purely Indian and imported technique; while it recognised the value of symbolism in its structures, it never made its arts merely a vehicle for symbols, as Hindu sculpture tended to do.

MUGHAMMAS or according to others MUGHAMMIS, a valley near Mecca on the borders of the sacred area. According to tradition, Abrahā [q. v.] ordered his army to encamp here when he was going to attack Mecca, but was prevented from doing so as birds slew his soldiers by dropping stones on them. In Mughammas is shown the tomb of the Tā'ifī Abū Righāl who died here after acting as guide to Abrahā. He was so hated by the Meccans for this that the custom grew up of casting stones on his grave [cf. AL-DJAMRA]. Whether this explanation is true or not is unknown, but in any case a verse of Hassān b. Thābit (ed. Hirschfeld, LXII/i.) shows that in the time of the Prophet the mention of his name was sufficient to insult the Tā'ifīs. The antiquity of the custom of stoning his tomb is shown by a verse of Djarīr: "When al-Farazdaq dies, stone him as you stone the grave of Abū Righāl".

AL-MUGHĪRA B. SHU'BA, of the sept of the Ahlāf, a subdivision of the Thakīf, further a member of the clan of the Banū Mu'attib — guardians of the sanctuary of al-Lāt — and nephew of 'Urwa b. Mas'ūd [q. v.], companion and martyr. For having attacked and plundered some travelling companions during their sleep, he was forced to leave Tā'if, his native town, and came to Medīna to offer his services to Muḥammad. The latter used him to attract the Thakīf to Islām and after the submission of Tā'if, sent him to this town to superintend the destruction of the national sanctuary and the liquidation of the treasure of al-Lāt. In the caliphate of Abū Bakr, although he never succeeded in attaining to one of the great posts which were reserved for the Kuraish, Mughīra was able to keep a position in governing circles. 'Omar, while under no illusions about his morals, appointed him governor of Baṣra. A scandalous incident temporarily interrupted his administrative career. He was accused of adultery. The evidence was overwhelming: instead of having him stoned, 'Omar only dismissed him. Mughīra holds in tradition the record for marriages and divorces: the figures of 300, 700 and 1,000 are given. In the year 21 (642), recalled to public life, he was appointed to the important governorship of Kūfa. His slave Abū Lu'lu'a, who lived in Medīna, assassinated the Caliph 'Omar. Under 'Othmān, Mughīra retired to private life. In the reign of 'Alī, he withdrew to Tā'if to watch the course of events. He went without having been invited to the conference of Adhruḥ [q. v.]. In 40 (660), taking advantage of the general confusion that followed the assassination of 'Alī, he produced an alleged certificate of appointment from Mu'āwiya and took over the control of the annual pilgrimage.

The great Sufyānid was able to appreciate at their true value auxiliaries of the stamp of Mughīra, one of the chief dāhiya of his time, the man "who could get himself out of the most hopeless difficulty": "if (it was said) he were shut behind seven doors, his cunning would have found a way to burst all the locks". Of shocking morals, free from any attachment to the 'Alid party, equally free from any claims to the caliphate, free from the jealousies of the Kuraish families, as well as the narrowmindedness of the Anṣār clans, a member of the intelligent and enterprising tribe of Thakīf, everything attracted Mu'āwiya's attention to him. In the year 41 (661), this Caliph appointed him governor of Kūfa, a region disturbed by the intrigues of the Shī'a and the continual risings of the Khāridjīs. Mughīra succeeded in not compromising himself with the former: he was content to advise them to avoid any too striking outburst. Now nearly sixty, the able Thakāfi felt the unusual ambition of remaining where he was and of finishing his troubled career in peace and honour. This opportunist, who had come over to the Sufyānids after cool calculation, felt little desire to sacrifice his own peace and leisure for the consolidation of the Omayyad dynasty; he was solely concerned with keeping on the right side of the sagacious Mu'āwiya. The sudden rising of the Khāridjī leader Mustawrid failed to disturb his equanimity. With remarkable cleverness he was able to let loose against these rebels their born enemies, "the fine flower of the Shī'a". Whichever was victorious, it could not fail to lighten his responsibilities. By setting them against one another he rendered harmless the most dangerous elements of disorder in his province. The crushing of the Khāridjīs enabled him to breathe freely.

Thanks to this combination of mildness and astuteness, and by knowing when to shut his eyes, Mughīra succeeded in avoiding desperate measures against the people of the 'Irāk, who were a continual source of trouble, and succeeded in retaining his position. He was even regretted by his former subjects after he was gone. Not quite satisfied, Mu'āwiya thought of breaking this lieutenant of his who was playing a double game. Mughīra was always able at the opportune moment to provoke troubles which required the continuation of his services. In this way he prepared the return to favour of Ziyād b. Abīhi [q. v.], destined to be his successor. He is also said to have disarmed the Caliph's suspicions by suggesting the plan of proclaiming Yazīd heir-apparent. As the general situation had considerably improved in the 'Irāk and order prevailed, on the surface at least, the Caliph left him in office till his death, the date of which is uncertain but which must be placed between 48 and 51 (668—671). Mughīra died of the plague at the age of about 70.

AL-MUGHNĪ. [See ALLĀH II.]

AL-MUHĀDJIRŪNA, the emigrants, a name often applied in the Kur'ān to those followers of Muḥammad who had migrated from Mecca to Medina with him. The word is derived from hijra, which does not mean "flight" but breach, dissolution of an association based on origin, in the place of which a new connection is formed. The term muhādjir is not applied to the Prophet himself but only to those who migrated with him and later made up a considerable portion of the population of Medina. The followers of the Prophet who were natives of Mecca were given the name Anṣār [q. v.] to distinguish them from the Muhādjirūn, because the immigrants were mainly dependent on their help and active support after they had given up their homes and livelihoods in Mecca. It now became one of Muḥammad's main objects to arouse sympathy for them, because in the early days after their migration they were for the most part in very needy circumstances. With the greatest eloquence he describes them as the particular favourites of Allāh who will receive a splendid reward for their sacrifices "when those who have adopted the faith, who have migrated and fought for Allāh's cause may hope for his grace" (Sūra ii. 215); "the sins of the emigrants and of those driven from home are forgiven" (iii. 191). Those who remained in Mecca and feared to migrate although the earth was large enough to afford them shelter are severely censured. He who emigrates finds a home on the earth and if he dies Allāh will reward him (iii. 101). This was however at first only an indication of a future which had not yet materialised, and in addition to these rosy utterances (cf. xvi. 43; viii. 75; xxii. 57) the Prophet made more practical efforts to help those who were living in difficult circumstances. A portion of the plunder taken in fighting was given to the poor emigrants who had been driven from their possessions in order to aid Allāh: "they are the trustworthy" (lix. 8). In order to make the bond between them and the Medinese as tight as possible it is announced in Sūra viii. 73 that the emigrants who had left their homes to fight for the true religion and those who gave them shelter (cf. Ibn Hishām, p. 321 sqq.) and assistance (the Anṣār) should enjoy rights of kinship with one another while on the other hand, those, who while adopting Islām had not migrated, should not have any rights of kinship. According to the usual interpretation, this passage refers to the peculiar bond of brotherhood which Muḥammad instituted between each emigrant and a Medinese believer, an explanation which is however not quite certain as the passage perhaps only expresses a general principle (cf. Fr. Buhl, Leben Muḥammads, p. 209). Besides, the usual exegesis sees in the regulations for inheritance (Sūra iv. 13, 15) a proof that this special bond was very early abolished again.

The high esteem in which the emigrants were held finds expression in Sūra ix. 20, where we read "those who believed and migrated and expended blood and treasure in fighting for the cause of Allāh, occupy a higher position (than other believers); they are the fortunate ones". Muhādjir in this way became a title of honour (cf. Sūra xxix. 25 where Lot is so called). Individuals who had migrated not to Medina but to Abyssinia also proudly called themselves muhādjir (see Fr. Buhl, op. cit., p. 172). But the real "migration" was that to Medina in which the Prophet himself took part. The number of the Muhādjirūn gradually grew as the increasing power of Muḥammad from time to time induced Meccans to leave their heathen city and go to Medina. It is to them that Sūra viii. 76 refers, where those who adopted Islām later than the first emigrants who migrated and afterwards fought alongside of the older Muhādjirūn are acknowledged as belonging to the community ("they are of you"). After the treaty of Ḥudaibiya [q. v.] in particular, we hear of Meccan women who left their pagan husbands and went to Medina where in accordance with Muḥammad's interpretation of the treaty they were not surrendered if they offered the so-called women's pledge (see Sūra ix. 11 sqq.). Thus the Muhādjirūn, later and earlier, formed an increasing element in the population of Medina, whom Muḥammad often mentions along with other sections of the community as possessing equal rights with them (e.g. Sūra xxxiii. 6, 49) in which connection it should be noted that Muhādjirūn is never, as was the case among the Anṣār, used in genealogies.

That these emigrants were specially dear to Muḥammad is easily intelligible, for they had shared his sufferings in Mecca and made the greatest sacrifices for him and included in their number men who had adopted his teaching out of pure conviction. With the occupation of Mecca, the migration ceased while the Muhādjirūn remained as a separate highly honoured body. It is natural to suppose that a certain amount of rivalry might easily arise between them and the other elements of the community, and that there was actually a certain amount of friction between the emigrants and the Medinese is evident from the fact that in the troubles after the Prophet's death the Medinese endeavoured to set up one of their number, Sa'd b. 'Ubāda, as successor to the Prophet. The attempt failed through the energetic action of 'Umar, Abū Bakr and Abū 'Ubaida, and the leadership of the community remained in the hands of the Muhādjirūn until the descendants of Muḥammad's old opponents in Mecca seized power for themselves.

MUḤĀL. [see MANṬIḲ.]

AL-MUHALLAB B. ABĪ ŠUFRA, ABŪ SA'ĪD AL-AZDĪ, an Arab general. Al-Muhallab is said to have been born two years before the death of Muḥammad. In the reign of Mu'āwiya he undertook a campaign against India and raided the country between Kābul and Multān (44 = 664—665). He next distinguished himself in the expeditions of the governors of Khurāsān against Samarkand. Then however, he left the Umayyads and joined the anti-Caliph 'Abd Allāh b. al-Zubair who gave him the governorship of Khurāsān. When he was just about to start for there, he was appointed commander-in-chief in the war against the Azraḳīs

[q. v.] on the urgent appeal of the people of Baṣra. After he had driven them from the Tigris he defeated them in Shawwāl 66 (May 686) at Sillabrā, east of the Dūdjal, whereupon they withdrew to the east. He then took part in the war against al-Mukhtār b. Abī 'Uбайд [q. v.]. On the latter's defeat and death (Ramaḍān 67 = April 687) he was sent to al-Mawṣil to defend the frontier against the Syrians by Muṣ'ab b. al-Zubair, who shortly before had been appointed governor of Baṣra. In the meanwhile, the Azraḳīs had been growing more and more dangerous and the only course for Muṣ'ab was to send al-Muhallab once again to al-Ahwāz. Here he fought the Azraḳīs for eight months; when Muṣ'ab fell at Maskin (72 = 691) he paid homage to the caliph 'Abd al-Malik. The new governor of Baṣra, Khālīd b. 'Abd Allāh b. Khālīd b. Asīd, himself then undertook the leadership in the war against the fanatical Azraḳīs, but he was not fit for this task so that the caliph found himself forced to send for al-Muhallab and give him the supreme command. Khālīd was soon afterwards dismissed and Baṣra given to 'Abd al-Malik's brother, the governor of Kūfa, Bishr b. Marwān. But since the latter out of jealousy worked against Muhallab, the latter's movements were hampered, though he succeeded in seizing the town of Rāmahumuz. On the death of Bishr, al-Ḥajjdjādī [q. v.] received the governorship of the 'Irāq and as soon as he took up his appointment, the campaign against the Azraḳīs was resumed with vigour (beg. of 75 = 694). At the end of Sha'bān 75 (Dec. 694), al-Muhallab assumed the offensive. The Azraḳīs had to retire to Kazarūn where they held out for over a year. They then left Fārs and went to Kirmān. Here they entrenched themselves in the town of Dīraft and it was some time before Muhallab could overcome them so that al-Ḥajjdjādī became impatient and tried to hurry him up. Al-Muhallab preferred however to await the favourable moment. Fortunately the Azraḳīs split into two parties, one of which, led by Kaṭārī b. al-Fudja'a [q. v.] and 'Abida b. Hilāl, fled to Ṭabaristān whereupon al-Muhallab easily overcame the rest. He then returned to Baṣra where as a reward for his services he was given the governorship of Khurāsān (78 = 697–698). From Merw he undertook two expeditions against Bukhārā; on his way back he died at Zāghūl, a village in the district of Merw al-Rūdh, in Dhu 'l-Hijja 82 (Jan.–Feb. 702). According to another statement, his death did not take place till next year. His son Yazid succeeded him in his office. By finally disposing of the fanatical Azraḳīs al-Muhallab rendered a lasting service to the caliphate and he is incontestably entitled to a place of honour among the generals of the Umayyads.

AL-MUHALLABĪ, ABŪ MUḤAMMAD AL-ḤASAN B. MUḤAMMAD, a vizier of Mu'izz al-Dawla. He belonged to Baṣra and was born in Muḥarram 291 (= Dec. 903). In 334 (945) when Mu'izz al-Dawla was marching on Baghdād, he sent him in advance to negotiate with the Caliph and on Djumādā I, 27, 339 (= Nov. 950) al-Muhallabī was appointed vizier. He was given the supreme command in the war with 'Imrān b. Shāhin [cf. MU'IZZ AL-DAWLA] and had brought him into a very precarious position when he himself fell into an ambush and could only save himself with difficulty, whereupon Mu'izz al-Dawla had to conclude peace with 'Imrān. In 341 (952–953) the ruler of 'Omān, Yūsuf b. Waḳīth, undertook a campaign against Baṣra; al-Muhallabī, however, anticipated him, occupied the town and defeated Yūsuf. In the same year, he fell into disgrace but was able to retain his office and the good relations between Mu'izz al-Dawla and his vizier were restored. A few years later, Mu'izz al-Dawla equipped an expedition against 'Omān and put al-Muhallabī in command. The latter set out in Djumādā II, 352 (= June/July 963), but soon fell ill and decided to return to Baghdād. He died on the way on 26th Sha'bān of the same year (= 19th Sept. 963) and was buried in Baghdād. On his death Mu'izz al-Dawla confiscated all his property, a measure which aroused general indignation.

(K. V. ZETTERSTÉEN)

MUḤAMMAD, the founder of Islām, was a native of the city of Mecca, out of which the energetic Kuraish had in the sixth century created a flourishing centre of commerce by exploiting the much visited places of pilgrimage there. In consequence of the unreliability of the sources at our disposal the very first question a biographer has to ask, namely when was his hero born, cannot be answered with certainty. That Muḥammad's activity in Medina covered ten years (622–632) is certain; but we have no certain data for the Meccan period. There is however no cogent reason to doubt the statement in a poem ascribed sometimes to Abū Kaīs b. Abī Anas and sometimes to Ḥassān b. Thābit (ed. Hirschfeld, N^o. 19, 1) to the effect that his prophetic activity in Mecca lasted "ten and some years". The parallelism between the two periods, which might be brought forward as a ground of suspicion, is not complete, and on the other hand, the annual recurrence of the great pilgrimage at Mecca must have made it easy for the inhabitants to reckon by them, so that a chronological statement originating there deserves more confidence than others. The Meccan period in any case must not be put too short, for according to 'Urwa's story mentioned below (Ṭabarī, i. 1181), "several years" passed after the migration of his followers to Abyssinia before they returned, after which new difficulties arose which produced the migration to Medina. — For the period before he came forth as a religious reformer we have only the indefinite expression 'umr (Sūra x. 17). The Muslim historians make him usually 40, sometimes 43 years old at the time of his call, which, taken with the already mentioned data, would put the date of his birth at about 570 A.D. When however tradition puts the date of his birth in the "year of the Elephant" (see ABRAHA and SŪRA cv.), this is a result of an unhistorical combination, for Abraha's attack on Mecca must have taken place considerably before 570. But Lammens has cast various, not unfounded doubts on the whole chronological calculation itself; in particular the fact that Muḥammad's migration to Medina and his resultant activities there do not give the impression that he was then a man already in the fifties. In reality 580 or one of the years immediately following would suit very well as the date of the Prophet's birth, so that the Qur'anic expression 'umr would mean about 30 years.

The name "Muḥammad" occurred previously among the Arabs (e.g. Ibn Durajid, ed. Wüstenfeld, p. 6 sq.; Ibn Sa'd, i/i. 111 sq.) and therefore need not be regarded as an epithet only adopted later in life by the Prophet. As to Muḥammad's descent, several old poems (e.g. Ḥassān b. Thābit, ed. Hirschfeld, N^o. 25, 7; A'shā in Ibn Hishām, p. 256, 1; cf. also on Dja'far: Ḥassān b. Thābit, N^o. 21, 8; Ka'b b. Mālīk in Ibn Hishām, p. 800; on Ḥamza: Ibn Hishām, p. 630, 7; on Abū Lahab: Ḥassān b. Thābit, N^o. 217, 3) confirm the statement of tradition that he belonged to the family of Hāshim; and that he was recognised by them as one of themselves is evident from the fact that only the protection of a fairly powerful family could have made it possible for him to stay so long in Mecca in face of the hostility of his fellow-citizens (cf. the words put in the mouth of the enemies of Shu'aib [Sūra xi. 93]: "Had we not had consideration for thy family, we would have stoned thee"). The Hāshim family related to the Banū Muṭṭalib (Ibn Hishām, p. 536, 14) was apparently one of the better class families of Mecca (cf. Ibn Hishām, p. 821 and the words of the poetess Kutaila, ibid., p. 539, which however might be interpreted merely as a polite formula; cf. Song of Solomon, vii. 2; Dalman, Palästinischer Diwan, p. 190, 255 sq.; E. Littmann, Neuarabische Volkspoesie, p. 141). On the other hand, the Meccan enemies of the Prophet say in Sūra xliii. 30 that they would believe in him more readily if he had been one of the prominent men of the two cities (Mecca and Ṭā'if). The Hāshim family in any case could not compare with the most prominent families like the Makhzūm and Umayya; and what is recorded of the needy circumstances of Muḥammad and some of his relatives suggests that the Hāshim family must have been exceedingly poverty stricken at this time. On his mother's side he had connections, which are not clear to us, with Medina [cf. AMINA and HĀSHIM]; according to Mūsā b. Uqba the Medinese called al-'Abbās their "sister's son" (cf. Ibn Sa'd, iv/i. 8, 12). We know nothing more that is definite about his ancestry, for most of what is related is legend. His father, who is said to have died before his birth, is quite a colourless figure, whose name 'Abd Allāh is perhaps only a later improvement on a heathen name. His grandfather is called Shaiba or 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib; the connection between these two names is however as obscure as is that between 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib and the oft mentioned family of Muṭṭalib (Ḥassān b. Thābit, N^o. 184, 2; Ibn Hishām, p. 230, 23, 536, 14) or the Banū Shaiba (Ibn Sa'd, i/i. 94, 6; ii/i. 124, 25).

The only thing certain from the Qur'an is that Muḥammad grew up as an orphan in very miserable circumstances (Sūra, xciii. 6 sq.). The first tangible historical figures among his relatives are his uncles: Abū Ṭālib, with whom tradition records that he found a kindly reception, 'Abbās, Ḥamza [q.v.] and 'Abd al-'Uzzā [cf. ABŪ LAHAB]. On the idyllic little story of the boy's stay with the Beduin tribe of Sa'd b. Bakr, see the article ḤALĪMA. The story of the cleansing of his breast (a similar story is related of Umayya b. Abi l-'Salt; cf. Goldziher, Abh. z. Arab. Phil., i. 213) is a materialisation of Sūra xciv. 1.

In Sūra xciii. already quoted, we are told that Allāh made the poor orphan prosperous. Corresponding to this in tradition is the marriage of Muḥammad with a rich merchant's widow, in whose service he had been [cf. KHADĪDJA]. She bore him four daughters, who play a part in later history, and several sons all of whom died in infancy; one of them at least must be historical as his pagan name 'Abd Manāf (Sprenger, i. 199 sq.; Caetani, i. 173) could not be invented by later writers; such a fiction in any case, as posthumous comfort to alleviate the disgrace of the lack of male heirs (Lammens), would be very inadequate, if it had to make the sons die again soon after their birth. The interest in business matters apparent in the Qur'an (Sūra ii. 194; lxii. 9 sq.) as well as his fondness for business expressions (cf. however similar expressions in the Wisdom of Solomon, iv. 20; Pirge Abot, iii. 16; iv. 22; Horn, Gesch. d. Pers. Lit., p. 10) are very natural if Muḥammad took part in business transactions as Khadīdja's assistant and husband. On the other hand, it would be wiser to set aside the alleged trading journeys into neighbouring lands, which he is said to have made even as a child with Abū Ṭālib and later in Khadīdja's service; in the form in which they are given, they have distinctly apologetic tendencies [cf. BAḤĪRA] and are quite unnecessary to explain his later religious development. Sūra xxxvii. 137 sq. in any case is not clear proof that he himself had passed by Lot's dwellings on a journey. Nor did Khadīdja equip trading caravans independently. Equally little confidence is to be placed in the story, which is given in the usual märchen style, of the part played by Muḥammad in rebuilding the Ka'ba.

While the questions already raised are really of no great importance, the problems which concern Muḥammad's début as a religious reformer are of the utmost importance but offer the greatest difficulties to the student in view of the insufficient material available in the sources. The main question is: whence did Muḥammad, who everywhere betrays a great receptivity for foreign matter, get his ideas? That he originally shared the religious conceptions of his milieu is in every way the most natural supposition — his uncle Abū Lahab was an ardent defender of paganism and Abū Ṭālib, who was like a father to him, died without adopting Islām — and is confirmed not only by the name of his son already mentioned but also by Sūra xciii. 3: "God found thee wandering and guided thee" (cf. also xlii. 52: "Thou didst not know what book or belief was" and the statement of Ibn al-Kalbī that he once brought a sheep as a sacrifice to al-'Uzzā). Distinct traces of his early beliefs survived in his later life. He shared the belief of his fellow-countrymen in djinn and shayāṭin, in evil omens etc. Mecca with its sanctuary was a sanctified place in his eyes (Sūra xxvii. 93; xxviii. 57; xxix.

67; cv. i sqq.; cvi. i sqq.); he admitted the sacrifices offered there into the true worship (cviii. 2) and allowed his followers to take part in the pilgrimage (vii. 29 sq.) so that it was all the easier for him later to accept it as one of the main features of his religion (see below). We shall later discuss a relapse into paganism, which however was speedily overcome, as well as the fact that he was only gradually led to attack on principle the gods of Mecca. He was also influenced by the manner of the old Arab inspired soothsayers (cf. on the modern Rwala: Musil, Die Kultur, 1910, p. 10) to the extent that he adopted their peculiar form of speech with mysterious oaths and rhymed prose (sadq; cf. Goldziher, Abhandlungen z. arab. Philol., i. 59 sqq.; Mas'ūdi, Murūdj, iii. 381 sq.) when he began to announce his revelations. All his earlier conceptions were however driven out except for such trifling residua as these, when a new world of ideas began to fill him to an ever increasing extent, until he was finally compelled with irresistible force to come forth and proclaim them. These new ideas point mainly to the religions of the "possessors of a scripture" — Judaism and Christianity — and he was conscious of this, in as much as he repeatedly emphasises the agreement between his teaching and these older religions of revelation as irrefutable evidence of its truth (cf. the significant passage: "If thou art in doubt about what We have revealed, ask them who read the scripture before thee", Sūra x. 94). The only question is, in what way did he become possessed of these new ideas. This much only is certain that he did not get them from his own reading of the holy scriptures of the Jews and Christians. The word ummī [q. v.], applied to him (Sūra vii. 156) signifies, without committing us to anything about his ability in reading or writing — as a merchant he must have had a certain knowledge of these arts — that he was an illiterate layman, who was not able to read the Hebrew or Greek Bible, and that this was actually the case, the Qur'ān shows on every page. For this explanation of the term Wensinck, Acta orient., ii. 191 and (citing the Hebrew ummōt ha-olām) Horowitz, Koranische Untersuchungen, p. 52 would put "pagan", ἔθνικός, but, although this might fit some passages, it could hardly suit Sūra ii. 73 where there is a reference to a difference between the "possessors of a scripture" and the ummīyūn among the Jews. The usual explanation suits well enough, as it is certain and it is confirmed by the Qur'ān everywhere that, while Muhammad had some notion of the books of the Bible, the Hebrew and Greek Bibles were closed books to him. Utterances like the saying that Jesus "received" the Gospels (iii. 44; v. 50; lvii. 27) and that it should be "observed" like the law (v. 70, 72) clearly show that he did not know its real contents. Sūra xxi. 105 contains a quotation from the Psalms, but this is quite an isolated instance and he knew nothing of the Psalms as a part of the Old Testament (xvii. 57). The parable of the camel and the eye of a needle (vii. 38) proves of course no literary dependence and the alleged description of Muhammad and his followers in the Gospels (xlvi. 29) shows what he could build up on a vague recollection of something he had heard. On the other hand the stories reproduced, e. g. the long account of Joseph (Sūra xii.), show that he was indirectly dependent on the Bible and not only on the Old but also on the New Testament (cf. what he relates of Mary, Joseph, Zacharia and John); the story of the Seven Sleepers (cf. Aṣḥāb AL-KAḤF and M. Huber, Die Wanderlegende von den Siebenschläfern, 1910) also presupposes Christian authorities. One therefore cannot blame his enemies when they said that he had foreign teachers (xvi. 105; xxv. 5 sq.; xlv. 13), which is certainly not refuted by the reply in xvi. 105. Further it is clear from the Qur'ān that he did not come into contact in this indirect way with the books of the Bible in their simple form, but that his authorities had drawn on Midrashic and Apocryphical works, which is easily explained by the varied and luxuriant character of the religious tendencies in Arabia. In particular what he tells of the birth and childhood of Jesus (xix. 22 sqq.; iii. 41; v. 109 sq.) comes from Apocryphal sources, and his account of the death of Jesus (iv. 156) has parallels among the Manichaeans and Basilidians.

To state exactly what religion exercised particular influence on Muhammad's ideas is hardly possible in view of the scanty information available about conditions in these days, especially as many things indicate that he was influenced from various sides, primarily by Christian sects, but later also by the Jews. There was ample opportunity to become acquainted with both these religions from caravans passing through to Syria or the lands of the Euphrates, from communication by sea with Abyssinia, and from foreign merchants visiting the great markets; and not only in the more advanced districts of South Arabia, but also among several Beduin tribes (e. g. Bakr, Taghlib, Ḥanifa, Ṭaiy), Christianity had established itself, while Jewish colonies had settled in Medina and the oases north of it. But a citizen of Mecca in particular had repeated opportunities of coming into contact with Christians and Jews. The great festivals attracted people from all districts and it is expressly recorded that Christians also took part in the pilgrimage (Snouck Hurgronje, Het Mekkaansche Feest, p. 28, 128, 159); in addition there were Christians captured in war and immigrant Ḡhassānids living in Mecca (Azraqī, ed. Wüstenfeld, p. 97, 458, 466; cf. the Christian slave in Ṭā'if: Ibn Hishām, p. 280 sq.). In the Qur'ān alongside of expressions coming from the Aramaic, several Ethiopic loanwords are evidence of religious influence from Abyssinia (cf. Nöldeke, Neue Beiträge zur semitischen Sprachwissenschaft, p. 47). Recently scholars have been fond of seeking a main source of Muhammad's ideas and their formulation in the religious development which is alleged to have taken place in South Arabia. This is certainly a possibility to be reckoned with, but so long as we know so little of South Arabian religious history and in particular so long as no intermediate South Arabian forms are found for the Abyssinian loanwords in the Qur'ān we are better to set it aside. It should also be noted that Muhammad in his stories of the prophets frequently mentions the Arab tribes of 'Ad and Ṭhamūd [q. v.] but only rarely touches on the older history of South Arabia (Sūra xxvii. 20 sqq.; xxxiv. 14 sq.; xlv. 26; l. 13, on the other hand hardly lxxxv. 1 sqq.; cf. M. Hartmann, Die arabische Frage, p. 474). In the utterance ascribed to the Prophet (Bukhārī, ed. Krehl, iii. 56): "Belief and wisdom are Yemenī", Yemenī, as the context shows, only means "of Yemenī fashion", i. e. cultured, human, in contrast to Beduin uncouthness. The main objection however, is that the hypothesis would only mean an unnecessarily circuitous route, for Muḥammad always appeals directly to his agreement with Christianity, without suggesting any remodelling of these religions through a South Arabian medium. And the stronger one endeavours to make Yemenite influence on religious matters in Mecca, the more unintelligible becomes the stubborn opposition of the Meccans to Muḥammad. Much greater weight should be given to Tor Andrae's treatment of the question of Muḥammad's dependence on Christianity. After calling attention to the wide dissemination and dominating position of Nestorianism in the Persian empire, which is of importance as it must have been much more accessible to Muḥammad than Monophysitism, he points out the close relationship between Muḥammad's ideas and the ecclesiastical writings of the Syrians: the contempt for worldly possessions, the strong condemnation of the arrogance and frivolity of the unbelievers, the warnings against laughing, joking and careless speech, the emphasis on the significance of almsgiving as an atonement for sin, the descriptions of Paradise (we even find the houris in Ephraim the Syrian) etc. Alongside of these very instructive similarities, there is however one point to be remembered in which the relationship is somewhat modified, namely Muḥammad's Christology. It is, in any case, remarkable in several respects for it is distinguished from his other accounts of prophets and approximates to the teaching of the Church in striking fashion, e.g. in the account of the birth of Jesus and his miraculous gifts and in the undeniable echoes of the doctrine of the Logos (Sūra iii. 34; iv. 169). But already in the Meccan period (e.g. xliii. 57 sqq.) Muḥammad vigorously rejects the idea of Christ being the son of God and definitely denies that he had ever asserted anything of the kind of himself. Here it is not sufficient to point to the Nestorians since they did not deny that Christ was the son of God. When Muḥammad from the first insists on the complete agreement of his teaching with the old revealed religions, i.e. with Christianity also, he seems to have been influenced by a form of Christianity where this dogma occupied a very unimportant position.

What one can deduce in this way from the Qur'ān about Muḥammad's development is supplemented in an important way by tradition, according to which he was not alone in his search for a purer religion. Various individuals are named who, dissatisfied with old Arab religion, were seeking for a more intellectual faith, in particular a cousin of Khadija, Waraqa b. Nawfal. Even if these traditions cannot be utilised in the form in which we have them, as they have been influenced by later Muslim ideas, yet they certainly have a historical basis, because they are not taken from the Qur'ān and are not intended to show Muḥammad in a more favourable light. In addition there are the Ḥanīfs [q.v.] of whom the traditions of the Arabs have preserved only a very hazy picture, and Umayya b. Abi 'l-Salt [q.v.] whose poems often have points of contact with the Qur'ān, which would be of great importance if they could even in part be regarded as genuine [cf. also the article MUSAILIMA].

While Muḥammad was in a state of great spiritual excitement as a result of contact with the religious ideas that had penetrated into Arabia, something happened which suddenly transformed his whole consciousness and filled him with a spiritual strength which decided the whole course of his life: he felt himself called to proclaim to his countrymen as a prophet the revelations which were communicated to him in a mysterious way. When Caetani wishes to see in this the result of a long development and continued reflection, this is certainly not correct. We have much rather every reason to trust the tradition which tells of a sudden outburst of conviction that he was called to proclaim the word of God. For this view we have the analogy of prophets in general, from the Old Testament prophets down to Joseph Smith; and no long drawn reflections but only an overwhelming spiritual happening could give him the unshatterable conviction of his call. This is also confirmed by several passages in the Qur'ān, which point to a deciding moment, definite in time (xliv. 2 sq.; xcvi. 1; ii. 181), in which connection it is of minor importance whether it is possible to identify the revelation of the call itself among the Sūras of the Qur'ān (according to a common opinion, xcvi. 1 sqq.; according to some, on the other hand, lxxiv. 1 sqq.), especially as one must reckon with the possibility that the very earliest revelations were not written down. If this really was the case, however, the reason certainly was not that they were deliberately suppressed, since a revolutionary change of his world of ideas into its diametrical opposite while retaining the earlier apparatus of inspiration would be quite an untenable hypothesis.

The Qur'ān gives only a few hints about the manner of these inspirations; a veil lay over them which the Prophet either could not or would not raise completely. Perhaps the wrapping up (lxxiii. 1; lxxiv. 1) refers to a preparation for the reception of the revelations in the manner of the old Arab kāhins; but we are taken further in an indirect way by the oft recurring accusation of his enemies that Muḥammad was possessed (madjūnūn), a soothsayer (kāhin), a magician (sāḥir), for they show that in his moments of inspiration he made an impression similar to those figures well known in ancient Arabia. In addition there are several traditions which describe his condition in such moments more fully and may undoubtedly be regarded as genuine, since they are the last thing later Muḥammadanism might be expected to invent, while these mysterious seizures afforded to those around him the most valid evidence for the superhuman origin of his inspirations. In Byzantine authors we find it stated that the Prophet was an epileptic (e.g. Theophanes, Chronographia, ed. de Boor, i. 334); and modern psychiatrists recognise the correctness of these descriptions of his attacks and we must of course leave it to them to define the exact nature of his condition. From the scientific point of view the fact is that the voice heard by him only uttered what he had from time to time heard from others and which now cropped up out of his subconscious. The scientific student therefore does not see in Muḥammad a deceiver but fully agrees with the impression of sincerity and truthfulness which his utterances in the older revelations make (e.g. Sūra, x. 16, 20, 113; xxviii. 85 sq.; lxix. 44; lxxv. 16 sq.; cf. vii. 202; xvi. 100; the cogent imperatives lxxiv. 2; xcvi. 1; the self-denunciation lxxx. 1 sqq. etc.) along with the fact that he unselfishly endured years of hostility and humiliation in Mecca in the unshakable conviction of his lofty task. It is more difficult with the later Medinese revelations, in which it is often only too easy to detect the human associations, to avoid the supposition that his paroxysms (e.g. at the battle of Badr: Ibn Hishām, p. 444; in the slandering of ʿĀʾisha, p. 736, 2) could sometimes be artificially brought on, and there is even a tradition which makes ʿĀʾisha say to the Prophet: "Thy Lord seems to have been very quick in fulfilling thy prayers". It must not be forgotten however that natures like this, without actually being conscious of it, are able to provoke the same states of excitation, which earlier arose without their assistance; and so probably not only were his followers in Medina (cf. Ka'b b. Mālīk in Ibn Hishām, p. 614, 9) but even he himself convinced, that the spirit was continually hovering about him to communicate the revelations to him. By this we do not of course mean that in his ecstatic condition he received the divine communications in extenso, as we now have them in the Qurʾān; only the foundations were given him, which he afterwards developed into discourses of greater length. Since in doing this he used the external forms of the old Arab soothsayers it is natural that the Meccans took him for one, but it does not follow that he was spiritually akin from the first to those soothsayers who were inspired by *djinn*s. The indignation with which he objects to being associated with them is not a proof of such a relationship of which he wished to rid himself, simply because he was conscious of the similarity, but a natural result of the fact that the enlightened Meccans saw in persons of this kind ludicrous fanatics of the lowest kind, while he was firmly convinced that he was filled with quite a different spirit, one quite unfamiliar to his enemies.

While it is in this way possible with the help of the Qurʾān and Tradition, to get an on the whole satisfactory picture of Muḥammad's development and his condition when prophesying, he himself gives in the Qurʾān quite a different interpretation of the revelations that came to him, which is based on a peculiar theory which he apparently did not invent himself but adopted from others. The fundamental idea in it is the conception of a divine book existing in heaven, al-Kitāb, a well guarded book, which only the pure may touch (lvi. 76 sqq.), a well guarded tablet (lxxxv. 21 sq.), the mother of the book (xliii. 2 sq.), on honourable leaves, exalted and pure, by the hands of noble and pious scribes (lxxx. 13 sqq.). He himself did not read this book, as E. Meyer erroneously thinks, but it was communicated to him orally piece by piece, not in its original form but in an Arabic version intelligible to him and his countrymen (cf. xii. 1; xiii. 37; xx. 112; xxvi. 192 sqq.; xli. 2; xliv. 58 and especially xli. 44: "If we had made it a Qurʾān in a foreign tongue, they would say: These are its āyāt ["signs", from the small sections of the text] not expounded intelligibly?, a foreign text and an Arab reader!"). In addition there is the fact that Muḥammad was aware that the complete contents of the book were not communicated to him, as he expressly states, e.g. of the stories of the prophets, not all of which were related to him (xl. 78; iv. 162). He received the communications orally, Allāh rehearsing to him the substance of the separate sections (lxxv. 16 sqq. etc.), while in several passages it is stated more precisely that the revelations were communicated through the Spirit (xxvi. 192 sq.; xvi. 104; xlii. 52) or the Angel (xvi. 2; xv. 8; cf. liii. 5 sqq.; lxxxi. 23 sqq.); a late passage of the Medina period (ii. 91) is even more precise in saying that they were communicated by Gabriel. References to visions are rare (e.g. the encouraging apparitions in Sūra viii. 45; xlviii. 27; the night journey must also have been a vision) and even in such cases the main thing is not what he heard (liii. 10; lxxxi. 19). These communications were the great miracle that was granted him, while he expressly and repeatedly says that the ability to perform miracles in the usual sense was denied to him (unlike Jesus).

From this book in heaven, the all-comprising contents of which are not by any means exhausted in the extracts forming the Qurʾān, also came the older religions of revelation "of the possessors of a scripture", whose religions therefore in his view coincide with his and, as he often says, were confirmed by it (cf. Ḥassān b. Thābit, N^o. 134, 5). This again is connected with a theory expounded by him of a line of prophets which began with Adam, and of which he was the last representative. His source for this idea was not Judaism, for he does not know of the great prophets who wrote books of the Old Testament; instead of them he mentions individuals, whom the Jews do not count as prophets, e.g. Lot, Joseph, Solomon, Job, etc.; on the other hand the fact that Jesus and John the Baptist are the last links in the chain of prophets clearly suggests a Christian origin, and certain parallels in more or less heretical early Christian literature can be demonstrated. Of the prophets Muḥammad relates a number of stories, which do not begin to appear in any number until the middle Meccan period when the Meccans were beginning sharply to reject his mission.

The ideas in the oldest, passionately excited inspirations, developed under a baroque power of imagination rarely reached later, are very simple. They are based not on the dogmatic conception of monotheism but on the strong general religious and moral impression which contact with older religions had made upon him, which was bound finally to lead to a breach with polytheism. In particular he was filled with the idea of the moral responsibility of man created by Allāh, and with the idea of the judgment to take place on the day of resurrection, which again points undoubtedly more to Christian than Jewish influence (cf. especially the introductory sounding of trumps, not found among the Jews). To this are added vivid descriptions of the tortures of the damned and seductive pictures of the joys of Paradise, which are further of interest because they reveal Muḥammad's strongly sensual temperament. Gradually monotheism was emphasized as an overruling basic idea and at the same time he attained a somewhat wider conception of the Deity. With all the vigour of an elemental religious nature, he points to the wonders of everyday life, especially to the marvellous phenomenon of man (in this connection cf. the poem of the Jew Samaw'al, al-Aṣma'iyāt, ed. Ahlwardt, N^o. 20, 1). The religious duties which he imposes on himself and others are simple and few in number; one should believe in God, appeal to Him for forgiveness of sins (xxiii. 11), offer prayers frequently on the model of the Jews and Christians, in the night also (xi. 116; lxiii. 20; cf. lxxvi. 25 sq.), assist one's fellow-men, especially those who are in need, free oneself from the love of delusive wealth and — what is significant for the commercial life of Mecca — from all forms of cheating (xxvi. 182 sq.; lv. 8 sq.), lead a chaste life and not expose newborn girls, as the barbarous custom of the time was (according to Sūra vi. 152; xvii. 33 from poverty, cf. al-Mubarrad, Kāmil, ed. Wright, p. 277; originally perhaps a kind of magic to procure sons, when only girls had been born, cf. Musil, Kuṣair 'Amra, p. 38; even before Muḥammad's time there had been people who fought against this barbarous custom, cf. al-Mubarrad, Kāmil, loc. cit.). This is the ideal of the truly pious man who is called by the name of muslim (lxviii. 35; xxi. 108 etc.) or ḥanīf (x. 105; xxx. 29; xcvi. 4; cf. vi. 79 and the article). Cf. in this connection the list of Muḥammad's precepts in A'shā's poem (Ibn Hishām, p. 255; Morgenländische Forschungen, p. 25 sq.).

From all this, it is quite evident that Muḥammad had at this time no thought of founding a new religion. His task was only to be a "warner" (li. 50; lxxiv. 2; lxxix. 45; lxxx. 11; lxxxviii. 21 sqq.), in view of the approach of the day of judgment, to his countrymen, to whom no prophet had yet been sent (vi. 157; xxviii. 46; xxxii. 2; xxxiv. 43; xxxvi. 51; no notice is taken here of Hūd and Ṣāliḥ) and as a result of the revelations granted him to give them, in the form of a lucid Arabic Qur'ān (see above), what the "possessors of a scripture" had in their scriptures, which were not accessible to the Arabs and thereby to save them from the divine wrath. The Jews and Christians also must therefore testify to the truth of his preaching (x. 94; xvi. 45; xxi. 7; xxvi. 197; xxviii. 52 etc.).

On account of the insufficiency of the sources, it is very difficult to ascertain in detail how Muḥammad's relations with the Meccans developed. The Qur'ān contains only vague hints, which permit no chronological arrangement, while the traditions are very full but little reliable. Only one report, which 'Urwa composed for the caliph 'Abd al-Malik (Ṭabarī, i. 1180 sq., 1224 sq.), the value of which has already been indicated by Sprenger, gives a brief but apparently trustworthy glimpse of the main events (cf. also al-Zuhri in Ibn Sa'd, i/i. 133). At first Muḥammad met with no serious opposition and in not a few cases his preaching fell on fruitful soil; indeed in the words addressed to Ṣāliḥ (xi. 64) we may find a hint that he had at first aroused considerable expectations among the Meccans. All traditions agree that Khadija was the first believer, while they differ as to who was his first male adherent. In any case Abū Bakr, the manumitted slave Zaid b. Hāritha, Zubair b. al-'Awwām, Ṭālha b. 'Ubayd Allāh, 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Awf, Sa'd b. Abī Waqqāṣ, and Muḥammad's cousin 'Alī [q. v.] were among his earliest followers. The majority of those who were won over by his preaching were however young and of no great social standing, while the well-to-do and influential held back (xix. 74; xxxiv. 30 sqq.; xxxviii. 62 sq.; lxxiii. 11; lxxx. 1 sqq.; cf. the veiled references in vii. 73; xi. 29; xvii. 17; xxvi. 111). This became still more the case when the full consequences of his ideas became clear to him and he openly attacked the religion of his native town; for the Meccans, to the majority of whom such devotional meetings had been a matter of complete indifference, now discovered that a religious revolution might be dangerous to their fairs and their trade. That this was the salient feature of their resistance to Muḥammad is evident from the fact that he frequently endeavours to calm the fears of the Quraysh on this point: the Meccan sanctuary, he said, belonged to his god Allāh, whom the Meccans also recognised as the highest god (xxxi. 24; xxxix. 39; cf. Kais b. al-Khaṭīm, ed. Kowalski, v. 14; xiii. 12 where Allāh is the lord of the Ka'ba) and he will protect and bless his sanctuary, if they submit to him (xxvii. 93; xxviii. 57; xxix. 67; cvi. 1 sqq.). In addition there was the conservative attitude of these merchants in the field of religion and their animosity to new and fantastic ideas, particularly to that of the resurrection of the dead.

Traditions record at great length the persecution and ill treatment which Muḥammad and his followers suffered at the hands of the Meccans. These descriptions are undoubtedly much exaggerated, for the object was to glorify the self-sacrifice of the believers and no doubt also to put the old patrician families of Mecca in an unfavourable light. But it is equally certain that there is some foundation for these stories. 'Urwa speaks of two persecutions (fitna) which twice forced the believers to migrate, and in the Qur'ān there is mention of "trials" which their opponents inflicted upon the believers, men and women (lxxxv. 10), and it is expressly mentioned that the influential wished to prevent Muḥammad from praying (xcvi. 9 sq.; cf. the veiled account vii. 84), while on the other hand, the complaints about what they would have liked to do should not be taken at their face value without more ado (viii. 26; xxxvi. 17; xvii. 78; cf. xi. 93). The peculiar feature, repeatedly found in stories of the prophets, that their opponents threaten them and their followers with stoning (Sūra xi. 93 and frequently) might suggest the hypothesis that Muḥammad was actually threatened in this way by the Meccans, but this would probably only have been in a momentary outburst of passion and in any case the quarrel was mainly conducted in endless wordy disputations in which the spiritual advantage lay with Muḥammad. His strength lay in the consciousness that he lived in a higher intellectual world which was closed to the Meccans and that he proclaimed ideas, "the equal of which neither men nor djinn with combined efforts could produce" (xvii. 90). Very pertinently he often points to the lack of logic in his enemies, when they recognise Allāh as the real true God but will not draw the logical deductions from this. But even his most crushing arguments rebounded from the impregnable wall of their prejudices which were based on their material interests. This circumstance now began to influence the matter of his preaching in a very remarkable way. When his opponents mocked him because the divine judgment threatened by him did not come (xxxviii. 15; lxx. 5) he began to describe in an increasing degree in his stories how the contemporaries of earlier prophets had met them with incredulity and had therefore brought on their heads dreadful punishments. That he did not use such means at the very beginning of his mission is evident from the fact that his preaching, according to the already mentioned credible tradition, at first gave no offence, and indeed this feature is lacking in the sūras which are certainly the oldest. It was the hardness of heart of his countrymen which made him take to this weapon in order to stir them. At first it proved by no means ineffective, as the Arabs knew of old trading peoples like the Thamūd [q.v.], whose destruction might well give them cause for reflection. But gradually this line of attack lost its effect. To Muḥammad however this resistance to the obvious truth was something so unintelligible that he could only find solace in an idea, which was to be of far-reaching importance in the further development of Muḥammadan dogmatics: Allāh, the immeasurably exalted and almighty, could of course not be impeded by the resistance of mortals; the unbelief of the Prophet's opponents was therefore an effect of the divine will: "Allāh makes to err whom he will and guides whom he will" (x. 99; xxxii. 12 sqq.; xxxv. 9; lxxiv. 34 etc.), a view which his enemies endeavoured not unskillfully to turn against himself (xvi. 37; xxxvi. 47).

Several episodes stand out in the Meccan period which are unfortunately more or less obscure and may be interpreted in various equally uncertain ways. It is certain, in spite of the silence maintained about it in the Qur'ān (even xvi. 43 sq. does not refer to it), that Muḥammad's community was at one time in so great distress that a considerable section of them migrated to Abyssinia. The later view was that participation in this flight became a patent of nobility similar to that conferred by the great Hidjra to Medina, which was actually granted as a titular distinction (Wellhausen, Skizzen, iv. 113); but the Prophet gave the advice to seek protection among the Abyssinian Christians only to those of his followers, of whom he was afraid that they had not sufficient strength to maintain their faith under the difficult conditions in Mecca (cf. the significant story of the cool reception which some of the exiles later received on their return to Medina; Bukhārī, ed. Krehl, iii. 128). M. Hartmann's view that the emigrants were to conduct political propaganda in Abyssinia is not capable of proof. According to 'Urwa, these emigrants (i. e. probably the greater number of them) returned to their native town, when Islām had become strengthened by the accession to its ranks of a number of individuals of position. At the same time there is a different story of their return, which it would not be difficult to combine with 'Urwa's story if we assume that they gradually drifted back. We are told that Muḥammad proclaimed in one of his sermons that the favourite deities of the Meccans, al-Lāt, al-'Uzzā and Manāt [see these articles], might be regarded as divine beings whose intercession was effectual with Allāh. This led to a general reconciliation, news of which reached Abyssinia and induced a number of the Muslims there to return home. Here however they learned to their horror that the agreement had been of short duration, as the Prophet had very soon recognised these words as interpolations of Satan and had substituted for them the words which we now have in Sūra liii. 19—23. The credibility of this story has been doubted, certainly wrongly; for in view of the absolute impossibility of such a story being a later invention, any possible objections to the reliability of the authorities cited (Ṭabarī, i. 1192, 1195; Ibn Sa'd, i/i. 137 sq.) hardly deserve consideration and passages like vi. 56, 57; xvii. 75 sq. (cf. iv. 113) amply show that the incident was quite possible from the psychological point of view.

It is much more difficult to elucidate another episode of the Meccan period, the story of the boycott of the Hāshimids. That Muḥammad's whole position during his struggle with the Meccans was only made possible by the support given him by his own family has already been indicated. All members of the family of Hāshim with the exception of Abū Lahab [q.v.], who on this account is perpetually damned in the Qur'ān along with his wife, chivalrously fulfilled their duty in this respect, although only a few of them believed in his call. It would therefore be not unnatural in itself for the Meccans in the end to attempt to make the whole family innocuous without bringing on themselves the guilt of bloodshed by an open attack. The story, however, which tells how they forced the Hāshimids to withdraw into their own part of the town and pledged themselves to refrain from intermarriage or commerce with them, is confirmed neither by the Qur'ān nor by 'Urwa, but sounds in itself somewhat suspicious and is probably much exaggerated. That the effort finally failed is conceded by the story itself. On the other hand, it is quite possible that Khadīdja's fortune may have suffered considerably from Muḥammad's obligations to his necessitous followers and from the enmity of the influential merchant princes.

To the last portion of the Meccan period most probably belongs Muḥammad's nocturnal journey, later so celebrated, to the "remotest place of prayer", to which xvii. 1 (perhaps also verse 62) briefly refers, no doubt a vision, which however made upon him an impression of reality. According to the prevailing opinion, the terminus of this journey was the temple in Jerusalem, and conclusions are drawn from this about the great significance which this city then had for him. Schrieke (Isl., vi. 1 sqq.) and Horowitz (ibid., ix. 159 sqq.) have however sought to show that masājid al-aḡṣā refers to the place of prayer of the angels in heaven (cf. vii. 205; xxxix. 75), for which view several cogent arguments can be produced, notably that the nocturnal journey is associated with the journey to heaven as early as in the tradition given by Ibn Ishāq and that in the Qur'ān there is several times a reference to an ascent into heaven (vi. 35; xvii. 92 sqq.; xv. 14 sq.).

Of other details we may further recall that Muḥammad, who, as already remarked, was firmly convinced that his preaching agreed with the religion of the "possessors of a scripture", nevertheless had already begun in Mecca to reject the christological dogmas of the church. This is certain from the conversation with his pagan opponents (xliii. 57 sqq.) which can only have taken place in Mecca. This however does not affect his idea of the fundamental identity of his with the older revelations but only the false doctrine later adopted in the church, for he makes Jesus vigorously reject the doctrine of his divinity; but this limitation of his theory was not without importance and was able to serve him as a model in his later criticism of Judaism.

The sources are somewhat fuller for the close of the Meccan period, although late tendentious historiography has coloured everything in the traditions. According to 'Urwa's account, Muḥammad did, it is true, succeed in winning a few notables in Mecca (including probably 'Umar) for his teaching, after the emigration of a number of his followers to Abyssinia. But on the whole his attempt at a religious reformation could be regarded as having failed; and when Khadīdja and Abū Tālib died, his position gradually became more and more hopeless. An attempt to establish himself in Tā'if brought him into considerable danger, according to the narrative, although the approval of his preaching expressed by some djinn (cf. xli. 28; lxxii. 1) certainly raised his drooping spirits. It was probably at this period that Muṭ'im b. 'Adi took him under his protection, which is corroborated by Ḥassān b. Thābit (N^o. lxxxviii.). He could now have consoled himself with the reflection that he had done his duty as a "warner" and could regard it as the will of Allāh that his contrymen were not to be saved (cf. x. 99; xliii. 89). But the consciousness of being a chosen instrument of Allāh had gradually become so powerful within him that he was no longer able to sink back into an inglorious existence with his object unachieved. His astonishing gift of being able to exert a powerful religious suggestion even on men who were intellectually superior to him imperiously demanded a wider sphere of activity than a small number of adherents, mostly without influence. In addition, there was a factor of which he himself was certainly unconscious but which is apparent on every page of the Meccan sūras, namely his mental exhaustion. All this brought him to the idea of looking for a new sphere of activity outside Mecca, however difficult it must have been for an Arab to break the links that bound him to his tribe and family. The congress of people from all parts at the pilgrimage gave him good opportunities to attempt to find one. After several unsuccessful negotiations he found a favourable soil for his scheme with some men from Medina. Unfortunately we know very little about conditions at this time in this town [q. v.] but we may safely assume that the large number of Jews in it had contributed to make the peasant population of Medina somewhat familiar with religious ideas (cf. Ibn Hishām, p. 178). There is however no question that the Medinese did not so much want to attract an inspired preacher to themselves as to get a political leader, who would readjust their political relations, which had been shattered in the tribal conflicts culminating in the battle of Bu'ath [q. v.]. With this we are faced with one of the most difficult problems in the biography of Muḥammad, the double personality which he presents to us. The inspired religious enthusiast, whose ideas mainly centred around the coming last judgment, who had borne all insults and attacks, who only timidly touched on the possibility of active resistance (xvi. 127) and preferred to leave everything to Allāh's intervention, with the migration to Medina enters upon a secular stage and at one stroke shows himself a brilliant political genius. That Muḥammad's eye in Mecca took in the wider political situation is evident from the prophecy in Sūra xxx. 1 sq.; but the passage is quite isolated there and in any case M. Hartmann's effort (Die arabische Frage, p. 53), to make him play the part of a far-seeing diplomat in international politics is based on fanciful arguments with no basis in the sources. Nevertheless in the despatch of a section of his followers to Abyssinia and in the attempt to reach a compromise with the polytheists in Mecca, we have hints which to some extent bridge over the gulf between the two figures. The decisive point however is that the Medinese would certainly not have thought of seeking in him a saviour from their social and political difficulties, if they had not been much impressed by his abilities in this direction.

After Muḥammad had entered into relations with some Medinese who had come as pilgrims to Mecca, the latter began to spread Islām in their native town along with men whom he had sent there and thus he was able after a preliminary conference in al-'Aḳaba [q. v.] to conclude at the pilgrimage next year (622) at the same place a formal agreement with a considerable number of Medinese, in which they pledged themselves in the name of their fellow-citizens, to take him into their community and to protect him as one of their own citizens, which, as the further history shows, was also to hold for his Meccan followers if they moved to Medina. Tradition, and no doubt rightly, here mentions only the promise of the Medinese to take Muḥammad under their protection and not any further obligations. On the other hand according to Ibn Hishām, p. 287, at the first conference at 'Aḳaba Muḥammad is said to have imposed a series of commands upon them; but this so-called "women's homage" is, as the very name shows, taken from the later Sūra lx. 12 and is clearly adapted to Meccan conditions (cf. especially the vow not to kill children). These negotiations, which could not remain unknown to the Meccans, produced great bitterness, and a second ḥina, as 'Urwa says, began for the believers, which must have still more confirmed them in their resolution to migrate to Medina. They slipped away in larger or smaller bodies, so that finally only Muḥammad with Abū Bakr and, according to the story 'Alī, was left. That the Prophet did not go with the others was certainly due to the fact that the Meccans otherwise would have prevented the whole emigration. They knew him well enough to see the danger if he were to ally himself with another tribe and there is therefore no reason to doubt Tradition when it relates, although with much legendary embellishment (cf. on David's flight: Tabarī, i. 556), how he had to be the last to flee from the town. Tradition is also confirmed by Sūra ix. 40 where there is mention of Muḥammad and his companion (Abū Bakr) stopping in the cave.

The migration of the Prophet, the Hidjra [q. v.], has been with justice taken by the Muslims as the starting-point of their chronology, for it forms the first stage in a movement which in a short time became of significance in the history of the world. According to the usual calculation, he arrived in Ḳubā', a suburb of Medina, on the 12th Rabi' I of the first year, i. e. Sept. 24, 622 and shortly after went into his new home. The tasks which awaited him placed the greatest strain on his diplomatic and organizing abilities. He could only rely with absolute certainty on those who had migrated with him (the Muhājirūna, q. v.) for their whole future existence depended entirely on him and of course only those had migrated who were firmly convinced of the truth of his mission. In addition, there were those Medinese who had already adopted Islām or did so soon after his arrival, the so-called Anṣār [q. v.] or "helpers", who however formed only a portion of the inhabitants of Medina. He only found direct opposition in a few families, like the 'Aws Allāh; but at the same time there were a number who while they did not exactly oppose him only reluctantly accepted the new relations, the so called munāfiḳūna [q. v.], who were to cause him much anxiety. Fortunately for him, they were led by a man, the Khazrajī 'Abd Allāh b. Ubayy, who possessed the munāfiq quality of irresolution to such an extent that he regularly let slip every occasion on which he might have offered successful opposition. A further danger lay in the fact that the old and bitter feud between the two chief parties, the 'Aws and Khazrajī, had by no means died down, but might easily break out again on any occasion. Finally there were the Jews (in the first place al-Kāhinānī, i. e. the Nadir and Kuraiza; cf. Kais b. al-Khaṭīm, ed. Kowalski, xx.; Ḥassān b. Thābit, N^o. 216, 19; Ibn Hishām, p. 660 and Ibn Sa'd, viii. 86, 91) and the judaicised tribes in Medina, who played an important part because of their wealth and the support they had in the Jewish colonies in Khaibar etc. For Muḥammad they were on the whole a plus factor in his calculations for, according to his theory already mentioned, he ought to expect that they would champion the truth of his preaching. His relations with the Christians in Medina (cf. Ḥassān b. Thābit, N^o. 133, 17) were no longer absolutely unstrained, since he had begun in Mecca to reject the orthodox ecclesiastical Christology; but they were insignificant and could be ignored. He also had a much greater sympathy with them than with the Jews (v. 85; lvii. 27).

Muḥammad had to form a united community out of these heterogeneous elements. The first problem to be tackled was how to procure the necessary means of subsistence for the emigrants, who were for the most part without means or work, which could for the time being only be done through the self-sacrifice of the Anṣār and certainly only very inadequately. To strengthen their claims for protection, he ordered the relationship of brotherhood to be created between each emigrant and a man of Medina. This arrangement, to which was added brotherhood between every two emigrants, was abolished after the battle of Badr by Sūra xxxiii. 6 and left only a few traces (see Ibn Sa'd, iii. xxxiv.). On the other hand, we possess for a somewhat later period, when relations between Muḥammad and the Jews had begun to be strained, a very valuable document in Muḥammad's constitution of the community which has been preserved by Ibn Ishāq. It reveals his great diplomatic gifts, for it allows the ideal which he cherished of an umma definitely religious in outlook to sink temporarily into the background and is shaped essentially by practical considerations. It is true that the highest authority is with Allāh and Muḥammad, before whom all matters of importance are to be laid; but the umma included also Jews and pagans, so that the legal forms of the old Arab tribes are substantially preserved. This scheme had however no considerable practical importance; it is nowhere mentioned in the Qur'ān (hardly even in viii. 58), because it was soon rendered obsolete by the rapidly changing conditions.

It is a proof of the Prophet's political wisdom that he endeavoured to attach the Jews to himself by taking over several features of their worship. Thus he made the 10th Muḥarram a fast-day, obviously in imitation of the Jewish fast on the 10th Tishri, the day of atonement, which is particularly obvious in its name, taken from the Aramaic (ʿashūrā). On Jewish practice are probably also based the introduction of the midday ṣalāt, which was now (ii. 239) added to the morning and evening ṣalāts and the easier rule about purification before the ṣalāt (iv. 46; v. 97). On the other hand, Friday as the day of the common ṣalāt, which probably goes back to the Jewish day of preparation (cf. Becker's correction to Ibn Sa'd, III/i. 83, 23, in Isl., iii. 519), is said to have been already introduced before the Hijra by Muṣ'ab b. 'Umayr (according to others, Asad b. Zurāra). Whether the choice of Jerusalem as the qibla [q. v.] was one of the concessions made to the Medinese Jews is uncertain as the statements about his attitude in Mecca on this point differ. But it is improbable that he should have turned towards the Ka'ba there, otherwise it is difficult to understand how the different stories could have arisen. But whether he then used Jerusalem as the qibla, which need not necessarily mean a borrowing from the Jews, as this direction of prayer was elsewhere found in the east, e. g. among the Ebionites and Elkesaites, whether he turned to the east like many Christians, or whether he had a qibla at all (the Qur'ān is silent on the point) is uncertain, but in any case the balance of probability is in favour of the Jerusalem qibla having been one of the alterations made to gratify the Medinese Jews. If some writers have seen in the immediate erection of a place of prayer (Ibn Hishām, p. 336) a copying of the Jewish synagogues, Caetani has with weighty reasons argued that this was not a building definitely assigned to the worship of God, since the alleged masjid was also used for all kinds of secular purposes, because in reality it was simply the court-yard (dār) occupied by Muḥammad and his family, while the assemblies for regular worship were held on the muṣallā [cf. MADĪNA]. But nevertheless the "mosque of opposition" so called by the Prophet with horror (Sūra ix. 108; see below) seems to have been an actual building recalling the Jewish synagogues. In spite of these concessions to the Jews, it soon became obvious that he had seriously miscalculated with regard to them. Although they undoubtedly cherished lively expectations of the coming of the Messiah (Ibn Hishām, p. 286, 373 sq.) they could not possibly recognise an Arab as the expected Messiah and he had soon reason to lament that only a few among them believed in him (iii. 106). In particular, the misunderstandings in his reproduction of the Old Testament stories or laws aroused the notorious Jewish love of ridicule and thus brought him into an unfortunate position. His conviction of the divine origin of his mission and his position among the believers would not allow him to confess that he had made a mistake and on the other hand he had too often himself appealed to the testimony of the older religions of revelation to be able to ignore this criticism. He rescued himself from this dilemma by asserting that the Jews had only received a portion of the revelation (iv. 47; cf. iii. 115) and even this included a number of special laws adapted to a particular age (iv. 158; vi. 147; xvi. 119) but they had also concealed all sorts of things in their holy scriptures (ii. 39, 141, 154, 169; iii. 64 etc.) and indeed had even falsified their scriptures (ii. 56; iv. 48; v. 16, 45; vii. 162; cf. Ḥassān b. Thābit, N^o. 96, 2; and the article TAHRIF), in short they obtained hardly more benefit from their scriptures than an ass from the books which he is carrying on his back (lxii. 5). The Jews were not able to refute these assertions for, although he challenged them to produce these scriptures

(iii. 87) neither he nor his followers could read a word of them. He therefore now poured forth the vials of his wrath upon the Jews in many speeches and awaited the time when he would be able to refute their criticism and malicious witticisms and tergiversations in convincing fashion (e. g. iii. 177 sqq.; iv. 48). As he had now already begun to regard the church doctrine of the Christians as a corruption of the true teaching of Jesus, he felt himself called upon to reform the degenerate religions of revelation, each of which asserted it was the only true one (ii. 107). As a result he now claimed a special place among the prophets: he is seal of the prophets (xxxiii. 40; a metaphorical expression which Mani among others applied to himself and which indicates the conclusion of the series), he is the last prophet, to whom Jesus himself had pointed under the name Aḥmad (lx. 6; cf. iii. 75). Still he is not thinking any more than before of introducing a new religion but only of restoring the religion proclaimed by the prophets from the beginning. But nevertheless the early years after the migration were the period when Muḥammadanism was born as an independent religion, for parallel with his criticism of the religions of revelation and in particular opposition to Judaism ran a positive shaping of Islām, through which he was emancipating himself in important points from his previous models. He gave his religion a pronounced national character by taking over various elements from the worship of the old Arabs and associating them with his religious ideas. In the second year of the Hidjra (July 623—June 624) after some hesitation, he ordered that Jerusalem should no longer be the qibla at prayer but the ancient sanctuary of the Black Stone at Mecca (ii. 136—145) for it "is a gathering-place and a safe retreat for men" (ii. 119). His native town was thus made the centre of the true religion. As a substitute for the pilgrimage which he now adopted into his religion as one of the main rites, but from which he and his followers were temporarily cut off, he had an animal sacrificed in this year on the 10th Dhu 'l-Hidjja on the muṣallā in Medina (Ṭabarī, i. 1362; according to Ibn Sa'd, i/ii., 9 he continued this after the occupation of Mecca) and in the following year he calls the ḥajjīd one of the obligations of believers towards Allāh (iii. 90 sq.). Friday retained its significance but was not to be a day of rest like the Jewish Sabbath (lxii. 9 sq.), which is connected with his rejection of the Old Testament idea of God resting after the creation (I. 37). In place of the fasting on 'Āshūrā, he substituted quite a new particular rite, according to which his followers were to fast throughout Ramaḍān, the month, in which he had received the fundamental revelation (ii. 281), as long as the sun was visible in the heavens. The Manichaeans had a similar custom; but whether he took the new revelation from them or from another sect cannot be ascertained [cf. RAMAḌĀN].

This nationalisation of Islām, which was to have so many results, gave Muḥammad a final legitimisation, which brought it into harmony with his earlier appeal to the religions of revelation, as he came forward as the restorer of the religion of Abraham (millat Ibrāhīm) which had been corrupted by the Jews and Christians. Abraham, whom Jews and Christians alike regarded as the great type of faith and whom he had himself emphatically indicated as the true ḥanīf (e. g. vi. 79), now becomes the great ḥanīf, not only in contrast to the heathen but also to the possessors of a scripture (neither polytheist, nor Jew nor Christian [ii. 129; iii. 60, 89] wherefore, as Snouck Hurgronje has shown, vi. 162 and xvi. 124 must also be Medinese). He and his son Ishmael, the ancestor of the Arabs, founded the Meccan sanctuary and the rites celebrated here, now corrupted by the heathen, which Muḥammad is to restore (ii. 118 sq.; xxii. 27 sqq.). Whether this bold idea, which according to Sūra iii. 58 met with opposition from the possessors of a scripture, was an original one and in this case a really brilliant invention of Muḥammad's or whether it was already in existence, for example among arabicised Jews, cannot be decided. The only thing certain is that he cannot have been acquainted with it in Mecca for we meet it nowhere in connection with mentions of the Ka'ba and it is actually excluded by the passages mentioned above (p. 726^a).

While his religion was being transformed in this way, Muḥammad's personal position was being gradually changed by the altered conditions. According to the already mentioned constitution of the community, all important matters were to be laid before Allāh and himself. It now became a fundamental duty of the believers to be obedient to Allāh and to himself (iii. 3, 29, 126, 166; iv. 17 sq., 62 [where it is added: "and to those among you who have to exercise authority"]; v. 93; xxiv. 51, 62; cf. also lx. 12, the "women's homage" which is inserted in the account of the second conference at 'Aḳaba, Ibn Hishām, p. 289) and those who are disobedient are threatened with the tortures of hell (ix. 64). Alongside of the belief in Allāh now appears belief in the Prophet (xlvi. 9; lxiv. 8 etc.). Allāh is his protector, as is Gabriel, and the angels are at his disposal (lxvi. 4). He claims certain privileges, which suggest a worldly mortal rather than a spiritual leader (xxiv. 62; xlix. 2 sqq.; xxiv. 63; lviii. 13 sq.; xxxiii. 53) but which however must be described as quite moderate demands.

The elevation of Mecca to be the centre of his religion imposed on Muḥammad new tasks, which were soon to lead to unexpected results. If visiting the holy places in and around Mecca was a duty of the Muslims, who were excluded from the town (xxii. 25 sq.), the result was the inevitable necessity of forcing admission to them. In addition the Prophet had an account to settle with the Meccans, for by his expulsion they had triumphed over him in the eyes of the world and the punishment repeatedly threatened them had not materialised, unlike the stereotyped punishments of the godless in the stories of the prophets. This led to a new command, that of the holy war ("war on the path of Allāh", al-djihād, q. v.), and to set such a war in motion now became the object of his endeavour, which he tenaciously pursued. There were however considerable difficulties in the way of achieving this object. The Medinese had only pledged themselves to defend him like one of their number if he were attacked, and the anything but warlike merchants of Mecca were not inclined to oblige him by beginning. The emigrants were, it is true, not bound in this way, but it went nevertheless very much against their feelings as Arabs openly to fight members of their tribe and blood relations. How much their resistance vexed him is shown by the vigorous reproaches which he makes to his followers in this connection (ii. 212; xxii. 39 sqq. etc.). He succeeded however in finding a way out of the difficulty, which might be able to pave the way for military enterprises without injuring these feelings too much. After he had sent different men with small armed forces who did not succeed in encountering the enemy, in Radjab, one of the sacred months in which all fighting was forbidden, he sent some of his followers to Nakhla, where a caravan was expected and gave their leader sealed orders in which he left it to their judgment what they should do. They did not disappoint him for they fell upon the caravan which felt secure until the end of the month and one of the Meccans was killed. The rich plunder was sent to Medina, where in the meanwhile a storm of indignation had broken out. Muḥammad however gave the people time to recover and finally calmed them, by the revelation ii. 214. The success of the coup had had such an effect in Medina that not only emigrants but also a number of Anṣār offered their services, when he appealed for followers in Ramaḍān 2 A. H. in a new raid, which he himself would lead. On this occasion chance came to his aid in unexpected fashion. He had learned that a rich caravan was on its way from Syria and he decided to ambush it at Badr [q. v.]. The very cautious Abū Sufyān [q. v.] who was leading the caravan got wind of his plan however and sent messengers express to Mecca for help. But when by a diversion to the coast he had reached safety, he soon afterwards sent other messengers to Mecca to cancel the first message. The angered Meccans had however already collected an army which was three times the size of Muḥammad's little handful of men and were unwilling to let the opportunity escape of properly chastising their troublesome enemy. They went to Badr where soon afterwards Muḥammad arrived with his men, expecting to meet Abū Sufyān's helpless caravan. When they discovered their mistake they were filled with terror (viii. 5 sqq.; cf. the continuation of 'Urwa's story: Ṭabarī, i. 1284 sq.); but the Prophet saw in the encounter the wonderful dispensation of Allāh, who wished to force them to a battle and his remarkable power of suggestion was able so to inspire his men that they completely routed the far superior enemy. A number of the Meccans, including the leader of the aristocrats Abū Djaḥl, were slain and several, including Muḥammad's uncle 'Abbās, were brought prisoners to Medina, where Muḥammad had two of them, al-Naḍr and 'Ukba b. Abi Mu'ait, put to death, while the others were held to ransom. This in our eyes very insignificant fracas, which however must be judged in light of the observation by Doughty who knew the country (Travels, ii. 378), became of the utmost significance for the history of Islām, for Muḥammad saw in the victory a powerful confirmation of his belief in the superiority of Allāh (viii. 17, 66; iii. 119; cf. Ka'b b. Mālik, in Ibn Hishām, p. 520 sq.) and in his own call, and besides the commercial city of Mecca enjoyed such great prestige in Arabia that its conqueror was bound to attract all eyes to himself. He therefore displayed even greater energy and was able to utilise the advantages he had won. After he had drawn up the programme given in Sūra viii. 57 sqq. he began to besiege the Jewish tribe of Kaīnuḳā' in their forts. The Munāṣikūna did not dare to oppose him seriously and the other Jews left their co-religionists in the lurch in shameful fashion (cf. lix. 14) so that the latter were forced to migrate to Transjordan.

In order to protect himself while fighting from attacks from another foe, Muḥammad at this time adopted a plan which is a further proof of his outstanding political ability. He concluded, as a number of letters that have been preserved show (cf. J. Sperber, Mitteilungen des Seminars für orient. Sprachen, 1916), as lord of Medina, alliances with a number of Beduin tribes in which the two parties pledged themselves to assist one another.

In the year 3 A. H. (June 624—June 625) Muḥammad continued his attacks on the Meccan caravans so that the Kuraish finally saw the necessity of taking more vigorous measures and revenging themselves for Badr. An army of 3,000 men was equipped and set out with much display for Medina under the leadership of Abū Sufyān, who was little suited for the task. Although several of his followers advised Muḥammad to make his defence within the town, he decided to go out with his forces, which, had been much reduced by the departure of the Munāṣikūna, and took up a position at the foot of the hill of Uḥud [q. v.]. In spite of the numerical superiority of the Meccans, the fighting at first went in favour of the Muslims, until a number of archers who had been placed to defend his flank joined against Muḥammad's express orders in the battle, which promised to yield rich booty and this at once enabled Khālīd b. al-Walīd to fall upon Muḥammad's flank. The tables were now turned and many of the Muslims began to flee, especially when the rumour spread that the Prophet had fallen (cf. iii. 138). In reality he was only wounded and escaped with a few faithful followers through a ravine on to the south side of the hill. Fortunately for him, the Meccans were quite incompetent to follow up their victory and as they thought that Muḥammad had been punished and their honour saved, they turned quietly back to Mecca. The Prophet was thus saved from the worst, but he had to lament many fallen friends including Ḥamza [q. v.] and his newly acquired prestige naturally also suffered. With all the eloquence in his power he endeavoured to raise the morale of his followers by exhortation and censure alike (iii. 114 sq., 133—154, 159—200) but the consequences of his reverse did not fail to materialise. The Jews who had taken no part in the fighting (according to Ibn Hishām, they were observing the Sabbath), made no secret of their delight at his misfortune, and several Beduin tribes next year (4 A. H. = June 625—beginning of June 626; the eclipse of the moon which took place in Djumādā II of this year was that visible in Medina in the night of Nov. 19—20, 625, cf. Rhodokanakis, in W. Z. K. M., xiv. 105; Caetani, i. 598 sq.) showed how much his prestige with them had sunk [cf. Bī'r Ma'ūna]. It was therefore all the more necessary to make an example and another Jewish tribe in Medina, the Naḍir, seemed a suitable object after Ka'b b. Ashraf's (q. v. and cf. Ḥassān b. Thābit, N^o. 97) murder had served as a prelude. It is made a charge against them in Sūra lix. 4 that they defy Allah and his messenger, on which account Tradition imputes all sorts of crimes to them. After a siege of several weeks (Ṭabarī, i. 1850; cf. Euting, Tagebuch, p. 111) they were forced to emigrate to Khaibar or Syria. They left behind them their weapons and their gold and silver as a rich booty, the distribution

To this period most probably belongs the prohibition of the drinking of wine which is characteristic of Islām (v. 92 sq.; cf. the instructive gradation in lxxxiii. 25; xvi. 69; iv. 46; ii. 216, where the word "great" is to be deleted as Schwally proposes). It has been connected with a number of features of life in the old Semitic east but the main reason should rather be sought in the connection with the maisir games [q. v.]. Drinking-bouts with feasting on a specially slain camel and games of chance, which were in the eyes of the old Arabs the bright spots in their hard struggle for existence, and in which they endeavoured to display their nobility and hospitality, brought the Muslims into suspicious relations with pagans and with Christian and Jewish wine-sellers, which might easily lead to their faltering in their new religion (cf. Wākidi, transl. Wellhausen, p. 100; Bukhārī, ed. Krehl, ii. 270 sq.); and this might explain why he forbade both at the same time, which of course does not exclude the possibility that forms of abstinence for other reasons may have been known to him (Musailima's prohibition of wine was obviously intended as asceticism; cf. the article). While Muḥammad was endeavouring to restore his weakened authority, a new and threatening storm came upon him and Medina from Mecca. The Kuraish, whose caravans were being continually harassed by him (cf. Ḥassān b. Thābit, N^o. 16, 6 sq.) and who were urged on by the Jews of Khaibar, recognised that the victory at Uhud had only been a blow in the air and realised the necessity of occupying Medina, which they had then neglected to do. Conscious of their slight military skill, they negotiated vigorously with various Beduin tribes and thus raised a large army — said to have been 10,000 men — with which they set out against Medina in the year 5 (June 626—May 627). The various accounts of the season of the year (sometimes a month after the barley harvest, sometimes cold winter storms, the latter in agreement with Sūra xxxlii. 9; cf. Ḥassān b. Thābit, N^o. 14, 9) may be reconciled by the possibility that the siege lasted a considerable time (cf. Doughty's description, Travels, ii. 429 sqq. of the siege of 'Anẓe, which in general illustrates this war excellently). The advance of this imposing army produced great consternation in Medina, which was still further increased by the vacillating attitude of the Munāfiqūn^a and by the discovery or perhaps only the suspicion that the Jews were conspiring with the enemy (xxxiii. 10 sqq., 26). Muḥammad in order to strengthen the defences had a ditch (khandaq, a Persian word) dug in front of the unprotected parts of the town. According to several stories, he did this on the advice of a Persian named Salmān but J. Horowitz (cf. Isl., xii. 178—183) would reject this as a later accretion. Modest as the defences were — about 150 years later 'Isā b. Mūsā bridged the ditch which had been restored by Muḥammad b. 'Abd Allāh, by throwing a few doors across it — they seem to have imposed upon the enemy who had little experience in the art of war and the siege gradually dragged on. The able lord of Medina used the time for secret negotiations with the Ghatafan and cleverly stirred up distrust of one another among his opponents and when at the same time the weather conditions became unfavourable the besiegers lost heart and gradually began to retire so that the last effort of the Kuraish to destroy their sinister foe came to nothing. For one section of the participants however, the comedy of the "War of the Ditch" was to become a bloody tragedy. Hardly had the besiegers retired than the Prophet declared war on the last Jewish tribe of any size, the Kuraiza, and began to besiege their quarter of the town. The Jews no doubt hoped to escape in the same easy fashion as the Naḍir had, especially as their allies, the 'Aws, were very actively trying to induce Muḥammad to clemency; but this time he was inexorable and carried out seriously a threat that he had previously made (lix. 3). Tradition has however endeavoured to put the responsibility for the massacre of the Kuraiza on Sa'd b. Mu'adh (cf. Ḥassān b. Thābit, N^o. clxvii., who asserts Sa'd's innocence). But there are various indications that it was the Prophet himself who made the decision and perhaps induced the Jews to surrender. On this occasion the Jews showed a strength of character and nobility of spirit which throws a redeeming light on their otherwise so ignoble history.

By these amputations, which however did not remove all the Jews from Medina (cf. Ibn Hishām, p. 895; Wākidi-Wellhausen, p. 264, 309, 393; Ḥassān b. Thābit, N^o. 133, 17), the Prophet had come nearer his goal, the organisation of an umma on a purely religious basis, which hitherto he had to keep somewhat in the background for political reasons. For the present he continued his attacks on the Meccan caravans far into the year 6 (May 627—May 628) and his raids, usually punitive expeditions, on Beduin tribes; of these expeditions, which have no particular interest, mention may be made of that against the Banū Muṣṭalik which must have taken place about this time, as it gave rise to a serious conflict between the Muhadjirūn and the Anṣār and involved 'Ā'ishā [q. v.] in the celebrated adventure which nearly cost her her position as the wife of the Prophet, until finally a revelation saved her (xxiv. 4 sq., 10—20).

Towards the end of the year 6 Muḥammad thought that his position in Medina was so firmly established that he could risk a step, which would bring him nearer the desired goal. He and the emigrants were still excluded from Mecca and its holy places, but through secret confidential agents, among whom we may certainly include his carefully calculating uncle 'Abbās, he knew that feeling in the town had been gradually coming round (cf. xlviii. 15; lx. 7). An increasing number had become tired of the hopeless wars and thought it would be much more advantageous for the commerce of Mecca to make peace with their indefatigable enemy, especially after he had adopted into his programme the pilgrimages to their fairs, the source of the city's wealth. Trusting to this revulsion of feeling he gave his followers in Dhu 'l-Ḳa'da of the year 6, i. e. March 628 (the news of the death of the Persian king Khusrāw Parwēz on the Feb. 29 of this year reached him on the way) orders to provide themselves with sacrificial victims and undertake an 'umra [q. v.] with him to Mecca, as Allāh in a vision had promised him a successful fulfilment of the visit (xlvi. 27). He probably chose an 'umra deliberately (Ibn Hishām, p. 740; Wākidi-Wellhausen, p. 249 sq., 253; cf. Sūra, xx. 30, 34) instead of the great pilgrimage which was soon due, as the consequences of an encounter with all manner of tribes, with whom he might possibly have been waging war, were too incalculable for him; but perhaps he cherished also the hope that, if all went well, he might remain there in the following month also (cf. ii. 192 which perhaps belongs to this connection). The step was nevertheless a risky one, so that he asked several Beduin tribes to accompany him in case they met with resistance. To his disappointment however, they refused (xlvi. 11 sq.) so that he decided to abandon the military character of the march and make his followers go as harmless pilgrims. In Mecca many were inclined to meet his wishes but the belligerent party was still strong enough to get a body of armed men sent to meet him to prevent him entering the town. He therefore encamped at al-Hudaibiya [q. v.] where he began to negotiate with the Meccans, and when this led to no result he sent 'Uthmān, who was protected by his family connections, into the town as his representative. But when the latter showed no signs of returning and finally a rumour got about that he had been murdered, the situation became critical and Muḥammad dropped all negotiations, collected his followers under a tree, probably one long held sacred, and made them swear to fight for him to the last, which they did with enthusiasm (xlvi. 10, 18). But soon afterwards a number of Meccans arrived and offered a compromise, which is very characteristic of the aimless Meccan policy, by which he was to retire this time but to be allowed to perform an 'umra next year. He agreed to the proposal, concluded a ten years' truce with the Kuraish and further promised to surrender all Meccans of dependent status who came to him. His followers, whom he had worked up into a state of great excitement by his promises and the taking of the oath, heard these conditions with scarcely concealed anger; but Muḥammad calmly ordered the sacrificial animals brought with them to be slain, which was to have been done at an 'umra in the town (see Lane, Lexicon, s. v. maḥill), and had his hair cut and by his authority forced his grumbling followers to do the same. Only later did they discover that he had made a brilliant stroke of policy for he had induced the Meccans to recognise the despised fugitive as an opponent of equal rank and had concluded a peace with them which promised well for the future.

He and the participants received ample compensation for the apparently frustrated 'umra at the beginning of the year 7 (May 628—April 629) by the capture of the fertile oasis of Khaibar [q. v.] which was inhabited by Jews. It was the first actual conquest by the Prophet and he instituted on this occasion a practice which became regular afterwards, when Jews or Christians capitulated: he did not put the people to death or banish them but let them remain as tenants, as it were, who had to pay dues every year. This expedition which also brought the Jewish colonies of Wādī 'l-Kurā into his power, made the Muslims rich (xlvi. 18–21).

In this period, although the exact date is variously given, tradition puts the despatch of letters from the Prophet to Muḥawḳis, governor of Alexandria, the ruler of Abyssinia, the Byzantine emperor, the Persian king etc., in which he demanded that they should adopt Islām. The alleged original manuscript of the first of these has however proved not to be genuine (see J. A., 1854, p. 482 sqq.; Zaidān, in Hilāl, 1904, p. 103 sq.; Becker, Papyri Schott-Reinhardt, i. 3). But even what is related about these epistles hardly deserves the faith most people have put in it. Even if we disregard the many apocryphal details, we must surely consider it very unlikely that so sober a politician as Muḥammad, who had at this time a very definite object, the conquest of Mecca, before his eyes, should have thought of indulging so fantastic an idea as the conversion of Heraclius or the Persian king, to whom the "lucid Arabic Qur'an" was no less unintelligible than the Bible to the Prophet and his countrymen, and whom he could neither compel by force nor entice with proffered advantages. It is very doubtful if Muḥammad ever thought at all of his religion as a universal religion of the world, as for example Nöldeke, in W. Z. K. M., xxi. 307, Goldziher, Vorlesungen über den Islam, p. 25, and T. W. Arnold, The Preaching of Islam, p. 23 sqq. hold (against them, see Snouck Hurgronje, Mohammedanism, p. 48 sqq.; H. Lammens, Étude sur le règne du calife Mo'awia, i. 422). The passages in the Meccan sūras which can be quoted in favour of this theory (vi. 90; xii. 104; xxi. 157; xxv. 1; xxxiv. 27; xxxvi. 70; xxxviii. 87; lxviii. 52; lxxxi. 27; cf. from the later period: iii. 90; xxii. 25) are limited by their context or by unambiguous parallels (like vi. 92; xlii. 5 [the mother of the city, i. e. Mecca]; cf. xxvi. 214). Besides, in the Medina period, the place of persuasion and proof ("no compulsion in religion": ii. 257; cf. xvi. 126), was taken by the spread of Islām by force of arms, which, although based on the supremacy of Islām over other religions (iii. 79; ix. 33; lxi. 4), was confined to the lands inhabited by Arabs. If after the conquest of Mecca he also declared war on the possessors of a scripture (see below) the campaigns undertaken by him prove that he was only thinking of Arabs under Byzantine or Persian rule, and it cannot be proved that he ever went beyond this in his schemes (the gift of Hebron, Balāḥūrī, ed. de Goeje, p. 129 may be confidently asserted to be a forgery; cf. the article UṢĀMA). The decisive consideration however is that Muḥammad at the height of his power never demanded from Jews or Christians that they should adopt Islām but was content with a political subjection and the payment of tribute. The correct conclusion is therefore to reject those stories and to look for the real historical basis in negotiations of a purely political nature, e. g. with the friendly Muḥawḳis (q. v. and cf. Butler, The Arab Conquest of Egypt, 1902) and to assume that the idea of a great missionary enterprise arose later under the influence of Christian traditions, notably of the miracle of Pentecost.

On the other hand, the character of the genuine letters of the Prophet to the Arab tribes changes at this time, for he was no longer content with a purely political agreement but, relying on his now consolidated power, also demanded that they should adhere to his religion, which involved performing the ṣalāt and paying "alms"; he even gave the Djudhām on the Syrian coast a respite (amān) of two months after which they were to decide (see Sperber, op. cit., p. 14 sqq.).

In March 629, Muḥammad performed the 'umra stipulated for him by the peace of Hudaibiya (the 'umra of the "contract" or "recovery"). For him who had been driven out of his native city it was undoubtedly a great satisfaction to be able to visit Mecca as the acknowledged lord of Medina;

but otherwise the significance of the occasion was more symbolical and the efforts of the practised diplomat to prolong his stay by his marriage with a sister-in-law of his secret ally 'Abbās [see MAIMŪNA] were politely but firmly resisted by the Meccans. On the other hand, it was of great significance that some of the most important Meccans, like 'Amr b. al-Āṣī and the military genius Khālid b. al-Walid, who saw he was the coming man, openly joined him, while his uncle 'Abbās and the very patriotic (Ibn Hishām, p. 275) but cautious Abū Sufyān endeavoured in secret negotiations to prepare in the most favourable way for the inevitable result. In the meanwhile he continued his military expeditions. His forces suffered a serious reverse in the first considerable effort to extend his authority over the Arabs on Byzantine soil, at Mu'ta [q. v.] in Transjordan; this is also recorded by Theophanes (Chronographie, ed. de Boor, i. 335). But several Beduin tribes now began to see what advantages they would procure not only for the next but also for this world by joining him, and large groups like the Sulaim voluntarily adopted Islām and placed themselves under his flag.

That it was Muḥammad's intention to break the truce with the Quraysh at the first opportunity may be taken as certain; for it must have been intolerable for him that the heathen should still have Allāh's sanctuary in their control (ix. 17 sq.; cf. iii. 3). The tactlessness of the Meccans now gave him his opportunity. Very much against the advice of Abū Sufyān, the belligerent party in Mecca had supported the Bakr against the Khuzā'a, who were Muḥammad's allies, and thus given a plausible casus belli (cf. perhaps ix. 12 sq.). In Ramaḍān of the year 8 (May 629—April 630) he set out at the head of an army of Muhādjirūna, Anṣār, and Beduins. The news produced considerable anxiety in Mecca where the number of those who wanted to fight shrank daily so that the more prudent now could take control. Abū Sufyān, who was sent out with several others (including the Khuzā'i Budail b. Warḳa who was a friend of the Prophet's) met Muḥammad not far from the town, paid homage to him and obtained an amnesty for all the Quraysh who abandoned armed resistance (cf. 'Urwa, Ṭabarī, i. 1634 sq.). Except for a few irreconcilables (cf. Diwan der Hudhailiten, N^o. 183; Mubarrad, al-Kāmil, ed. Wright, p. 365), they acquiesced and thus the Prophet was able to enter his native city practically without a struggle and almost all its inhabitants adopted Islām. He acted with great generosity and endeavoured to win all hearts by rich gifts (ta'rif al-kulūb, a new use of the alms; cf. ix. 60). Only he demanded ruthlessly the destruction of all idols in and around Mecca. Only Sūra cx. seems to preserve an echo of the exaltation with which this victory filled him; here as in the unusually touching passage xlviii. 1 sq., he sees in the success of his plans a sign that Allāh has forgiven him all his sins.

Muḥammad did not rest long upon his laurels for not only was Ṭā'if, which was closely associated with Mecca, still unsubdued but the Hawāzin tribes in Central Arabia were preparing for a decisive fight. A battle was fought with these Beduins at Ḥunain on the road to Ṭā'if [q. v.] which at first threatened to be a fatal disaster to the Prophet, mainly because of the unreliability of a number of the new converts, until some of his followers succeeded in recalling the fugitives and routing the enemy (ix.

25 sq.). On the other hand, his inexperienced troops were unable to take Ṭā'if with its defences (cf. the description of impregnable fortresses in Diwan der Hudhailiten, N^o. 66, 10 sq.). The people of Ṭā'if however afterwards fell in with the spirit of the time and adopted Islām. When Muḥammad, after raising the siege, was distributing the booty of Ḥunain, the Anṣār who as soon as he entered Mecca had expressed the fear that he would take up his residence again in his native town, became very indignant about the rich gifts that he made to his former opponents in order "to win their hearts", while they themselves went empty-handed (cf. Ḥassān b. Ṭhābit, N^o. xxxi.) but he spoke so kindly to them that they burst into tears and declared themselves satisfied. His conduct on this occasion reminds us to some extent of that of David towards the Jews and Ephraimites after Absalom's rebellion.

The characteristic feature of the year 9 (April 630—April 631) in the memory of the Muslims was the many embassies which came from different parts of Arabia to Medina, to submit on behalf of their tribes to the conqueror of Mecca (cf. cx. 3) and the letters which he sent to the tribes, to lay down the conditions of their adoption of Islām. In the autumn of this year, he made up his mind to conduct a campaign against Northern Arabia on a considerable scale, probably because the defeat in Transjordan required to be avenged and because the Ḥassānid king was adopting a hostile attitude (cf. Ibn Hishām, p. 911; Bukhārī, Maghāzī, b. 78, 79). But his appeal for followers met with little support. Munāfiḳūna as well as Beduins held back and even among his devoted followers, there were some who put forward all sorts of objections, out of fear of a campaign so far away in the glowing heat (cf. ix. 45; lvi. 84—91, 98 sqq.). In particular he seems to have had to face at this time a considerable opposition in Medina (ix. 58—73, 125) so that he had to have recourse to his old instrument of intimidation and his words recall in a remarkable way the period of passion in Mecca (ix. 71, 129 sq.). Matters came to such a pitch that some of the opposition, behind whom is said by one tradition to have been his old inexorable opponent, the ascetic Abū 'Amir 'Abd 'Amr, founded a house of prayer of their own "for division among the faithful and a support for those who had formerly fought against God and his Prophet" (ix. 108 sqq.). Unfortunately the expressions in the Qur'ān and in the traditions are quite insufficient to enable us to get a clear picture of this very remarkable affair. In spite of all opposition however, he carried through his plan; but when after great hardships he had reached Tabūk on the frontier (in the land of the Byzantines; cf. Ibn Hishām, p. 956), he stayed there some time and then returned to Medina. The campaign was however not without success. His prestige had now become so great that the petty Christian and Jewish states in the north of Arabia submitted to him during his stay in Tabūk, for example the Christian king Yuhannā in Aila [q. v.], the people of Adhruh [q. v.] and the Jews in the port or Makna. Khālid also occupied the important centre of Dumat al-Djandal (cf. for a criticism of the account: Caetani, lfi. 261—268; Sperber, op. cit., p. 44 sqq.; on the alleged letter from Muḥammad to the Jews in Makna, see also Wensinck, in Isl., ii. 290).

Unfortunately we do not know how the matters which were rapidly coming to a head in Medina actually developed; but we may safely assume that the death of 'Abd Allāh b. Ubayy, which took place not long after the expedition to Tabūk, must have contributed to slacken the tension. These years showed a marked increase in the prestige of the lord of Medina abroad. Mecca was in his hands and among the Beduins an inclination was noticeable in several places to submit to the will of the conqueror of this town, to be safe against his attacks and to have a share in his rich booty. This was for example the case with the group of tribes of 'Amir b. Ṣa'sa'a, with portions of the great tribe of Tamim and the neighbouring Asad and further north with the Bakr and Taghlib. Even in regions so remote as Bahrain and 'Omān within the Persian sphere of influence and among the chiefs of South Arabia, the new teaching and order of things penetrated and found ardent followers in some places. But we must not allow ourselves to be deceived by the representations or the historians, from which it appears as if all the people in these lands adopted Islām. Caetani and Sperber in particular have shown that these accounts are not in keeping with reality and that it was only little groups that submitted, while there was a not inconsiderable number who rejected the Prophet's demands. As regards open opponents the question was quite simple; when they were heathen, adhered to their paganism and would not abandon their polytheism, they were to be threatened by Muḥammad with the "holy war". He had not only to deal with such as those in Arabia, but there were also in addition to the Jews who had already felt his strength, a considerable number of Christians, and some Parsis in the eastern and southern districts. Muḥammad was thus faced with a problem which he had to solve. From his words in Sūra ix. 29 sqq. where he includes the Christians and even the Jews, the people of such strict monotheism, among the polytheists, who give Allāh a son and honour men as lords beside him, one would expect that he would have fought them like the heathen, if they did not adopt Islām (cf. also the attack on the Christians, verse 76 sqq.). But in contrast to such utterances we have another (Sūra v. 85) where he mentions the Christians very sympathetically because they, unlike the Jews, show themselves kindly towards true believers and are not arrogant, which he ascribes to the fact that they have priests and monks (cf. his judgment on monasticism: Sūra lvii. 21). These remarkable contradictions may be explained, as pointed out by Tor Andrae, by the difference between the Monophysites and the Nestorians. The former aroused his unqualified displeasure by their Christology, while the latter, who were then predominant in the Persian empire, attracted him much more, and this attitude was shared by his followers after his death, as the letter of the Catholicos Ishō'yah, quoted by Tor Andrae, shows. On the other hand, his remarks about the Jews are always very severe. It is therefore all the more remarkable that the distinction between Jews and Christians completely disappears when their position is finally settled. They were included together as "peoples of a scripture" and they were allowed to retain their religion if they recognised the political suzerainty of the Prophet by paying a tax (ḡizya, q. v.); if they did not they were to be fought without mercy.

The memory of the agreement between Muḥammad's teaching and that of the "peoples of a scripture", earlier so much emphasised, must have contributed to this rather illogical settlement and in addition there was the fact that treating the Jews as tax-paying tenants, and allowing them to practise their religion, as had been already done at Khaibar, was much more practical for the Muslims than fighting them till they gave in. A further compromise with the "peoples of a scripture" was that believers were allowed to marry the daughters of the "peoples of a scripture" and to eat food prepared by them (v. 7). It is noteworthy that the Parsis (Madjūs: xxii. 17) were included among the "peoples of a scripture" which made a difficulty for later better informed generations (Tabari, i. 1005, 19 sq.; Balādhuri, p. 79); probably Muḥammad did not dare for political reasons to demand that they should give up their religion. This extended application of the term "peoples of a scripture" is found not in the Qur'an but in a letter of Muḥammad's to the Parsis in Hajar (Ibn Sa'd, i/ii. 19) but with the limitation that the Muslims are forbidden to marry their women and eat meat killed by them.

With these exceptions, the Prophet had approached nearer the object which was always before him, although it hitherto eluded him, the formation of an umma on a definitely religious basis, for the inhabitants of a number of parts of Arabia were now actually bound together by religion. The old differences between the tribes with their endless feuds, their blood-vengeance and their lampoons which continually stirred up new quarrels, were to disappear at the will of Muḥammad and all believers were to feel themselves brethren (ix. 11; xlix. 10 sq.). There was to be no distinction among believers except in their degree of piety (xlix. 13). The Prophet certainly had an ideal before him but it was realised only in a very incomplete way. The very rapid extension of Islām had been accompanied by a considerable diminution in its religious content. Alongside of the older adherents, who were really carried away by his preaching and whose faith had been tried by privations and dangers, there were now the many new converts who had been gained mainly by fear (cf. the well-known poem of Ka'b b. Zuhair; the poem of the Hudhaili Usaid b. Abi Iyas in Kosegarten, Carmina Hudsal., N^o. 127) or by the prospect of material advantages. In spite of the teachers sent out to them there could be no question of any deep-seated conversion among these Arabs and how the old Arab spirit continued to flourish among them unweakened is shown for example by the boasting and abuse in the poems in Ibn Hishām, p. 934 sqq., which are in no way inferior to the old poems. The Prophet himself in Sūra xlix. 14 has recorded very definitely how far the Beduins were from the true faith: they cannot say that they believe but only that they have adopted Islām. Commandments relating to religion and worship, which had considerably occupied Muḥammad in the early Medinese period, give way in striking fashion to social and political regulations, a natural result of the fact that the new members were not ripe for the former. Uncertainty on these matters was still great and even at headquarters much seems still to have been in an embryonic state. This is true even of so fundamental a law as the rule for the times of daily prayer, as the five prayers later obligatory are nowhere laid down in the Qur'an (see above; cf. also the expression "morning and evening" in A'shā's poem: Morgenländ. Forsch., p. 259). That they were introduced by Muḥammad himself at the end of his life is possible, but not very probable in view of the silence on the point in the Qur'an, and in any case it is not certainly proved by the mention of the five times of prayer in a letter of the Prophet's (Ibn Hishām, p. 962) as we are not justified in expecting absolutely literal accuracy in the transmission of such documents. Only one or two religious institutions are dealt with at all fully in the Qur'an, the great pilgrimage to the sanctuaries at Mecca and the 'umra in the town itself, but the ḥajj was indeed the crown of his endeavours begun in Mecca and carried through with tenacity. The Prophet, although he was nowlord of Mecca, did not yet take part in the pilgrimage in the year 8, which was so inexplicable to later generations that they invented an 'umra unknown to many of his followers (Ibn Hishām, p. 886; Ṭabarī, i. 1670 [Urwa], 1685; Wākidī, p. 380; Ibn Sa'd, ii/ii. 1, 123 sq.; iii/i. 103, 18; cf. ii/i. 123 sq.; Snouck Hurgronje, Het Mekkaanse Feest, p. 58 sq.). Nor did he come in the year 9 to Mecca to the ḥajj; he showed his interest in it however by sending Abū Bakr as his representative and making him read a proclamation which had momentous results (Bukhārī, iii. 163, 249; according to the usual tradition, it was 'Alī who acted as his deputy; but this is probably a tendentious alteration; cf. Ṭabarī, i. 1760 sq. where Abū Bakr complains about being passed over and is comforted by Muḥammad; there is also another tradition, according to which Abū Bakr commissioned Abū Huraira to proclaim the exclusion of the heathen from the pilgrimage (Ibn Sa'd, ii/i. 121 sq.). This was what is known as the barā'a [q. v.] in which Muḥammad, who had been for so many years excluded from the pilgrimage, forbade all heathen any participation in it and gave them a period of four months, after the expiry of which they had the choice between the adoption of Islām and merciless warfare (Sūra ix.). This explains his absence from the celebration in the two preceding years; he wished to wait until he could celebrate it as sole ruler and completely in agreement with his intentions or, as he said, with the ceremonies introduced by Abraham (ii. 119 sq.). Finally all was prepared and at the end of the year 10 (April 631–March 632) he was able to carry through the first reformed pilgrimage (the "Farewell Pilgrimage" or the pilgrimage of Islām), which became the standard for all time. It is remarkable that the regulations for the ceremonies of the ḥajj, the object of which was to remove all that was too obviously pagan in the old ceremony (cf. e.g. the awthān in Minā in Farazdaq, in Z.D.M.G., lix. 604; Azraqī, ed. Wüstenfeld, p. 402) and to give it an Islāmic colouring, are found mainly in traditions, where later details can of course easily have been inserted, and only in fragments and more or less incidentally in the Qur'an; but broadly speaking, the later form is undoubtedly based on what the Prophet laid down on this memorable occasion [cf. the article ḤAJJ].

The Farewell Pilgrimage, at which an effective address, of which somewhat variant versions have been handed down, is put in the Prophet's mouth, marks the culminating point in his career. His feelings at this time are probably expressed in Allāh's words in Sūra v. 5: "To-day I have perfected your religion, and completed my favours for you and chosen Islām as a religion for you". There is therefore a touch of the dramatic in the fact that his career closed a few months later. He himself hardly expected this, for only a month before his death he was preparing an expedition, which was to set out under the leadership of the young Usāma [q. v.] against Transjordan (not as in some traditions to West of the Jordan, cf. the article USĀMA) in order to avenge the death of his father. The situation was such in other directions also that it required a man in full vigour to deal with it; in several places the appearance of different "prophets" had provoked disturbances [cf. AL-ASWAD, ṬULAIḤA and MUSAILIMA]. Then Muḥammad suddenly fell ill, presumably of the ordinary Medina fever (Farazdaq, ix. 13); but this was dangerous to a man physically and mentally overwrought. He rallied a little but then died on the 13th Rabi' I of the year 9 (i.e. June 8, 632; only this date suits the statement in Ḥassān b. Thābit, N^o. cxxxiii. and all traditionists that it was a Monday) on the bosom of his favourite wife 'Ā'isha, according to the story with the words: "The highest friend" (rafīq, for which Goldziher once proposed raḥīq, "the vault of heaven") of Paradise!". He left — fortunately however for his community — no legal successor, for even the little Ibrāhīm whom the Coptic slave Māriya bore to him had died shortly before (on Jan. 27, 632, if the statement is right that there was an eclipse of the sun on the day he died; cf. Rhodokanakis, in W. Z. K. M., xiv. 78 sqq.; Mahler, op. cit., p. 109 sqq.). The wild confusion which party passions let loose on Mecca when his death became known had the remarkable result that his corpse remained neglected for a whole day until it was finally buried under 'Ā'isha's hut (Ṭabarī, i. 1817; Ibn Sa'd, ii/ii. 57, 2, 58, 28, 59, 1, 71, 6).

The great difficulty which the biographer of Muḥammad feels on every page is this, that the real secret of his career, the wonderful strength of his personality and his power of influencing those around him by suggestion, is not recorded in the early sources and indeed could not be recorded. From the Qur'an, it is true, one becomes acquainted with his earliest remarkable inspirations, which even now are not without effect, and with his eminent political gifts later in Medina. We do of course find instances in the battle of Badr or the agreement of Ḥudaibiya where his intellectual superiority is overwhelmingly evident; but these are only isolated flashes and for the most part we have to read the essentials between the lines and be content with instructive analogies, among which the influence of Joseph Smith on the intellectually far superior Brigham Young is a particularly striking example. The really powerful factor was his unshakable belief from beginning to end that he had been called by Allāh, for a conviction such as this, which does not admit of the slightest doubt, exercises an incalculable influence on others; and the certainty with which he came forward as the executor of Allāh's will gave his words and ordinances an authority which proved finally compelling. His real personality was revealed quite openly with its limitations; his strength and his knowledge were limited, the ability to perform miracles was denied him and he speaks quite frankly of his faults (vi. 69; xxxiv.

49; xl. 57; xlvii. 21; xlviii. 1 sq.; lxxx. 1 sqq.; ix. 43). Apart from the revelation with which he was favoured, he is a man like any other and several times refers to the fact that he will die (xxxix. 31; xxi. 35 sq.; iii. 138; the episode in Ibn Hishām, p. 1012 sq. is not historical but a tendentious story directed against the tendency becoming apparent to apotheosise the Prophet). This is exactly the field in which later ages have felt dissatisfied, so that they quite early, driven mainly by their disputations with the Christians (see M. Schreiner, in Z.D.M.G., xlii. 594), wove around the person and life of the Prophet a network of superhuman features (see Tor Andrae's work quoted below). Apart from the traditions which are clearly confirmed by the Qur'an we can only have certainty in the strictest sense of the word in cases where the stories place the Prophet in an unfavourable light, not only from our point of view but also from that of the Muslims, e.g. in the story of his temporary recognition of the three Meccan goddesses or of his being censured by 'Umar for putting off the ihrām between the 'umra and ḥajj on the Farewell Pilgrimage, for it is quite incredible that such features should be later inventions and as a rule in such cases the compromising stories are confirmed by the existence of variant traditions which endeavour to dispose of the offensive features by glossing them over or altering them.

If the biographers of Muḥammad must for these reasons impose a very considerable restraint upon themselves, there is nevertheless one essential aspect of his activity, which ought to be very strongly emphasised, particularly as justice is not always done to it in modern treatments of his life. There is a tendency in some recent writers not only to emphasise all that is unfavourable but also to neglect his real religious importance. If he had really only been an oversexed man, anxious for worldly profit and quite unscrupulous in the choice of his means, Islām, which had been created by him and developed after his death, would have been an effect without a cause. It is impossible for the unbiased historian to deny that he aroused the religious instinct of his countrymen, and gave expression to a body of religious and moral conceptions which not only satisfied his fellow countrymen but supplied the needs of the people of lands which had old civilizations conquered by the Muslims and served them as foundations for a vigorous and far-reaching intellectual activity. Although as a result of his singular theory of inspiration, his direct dependence on the older religions of revelation remained concealed, he was able in his own way to communicate to his countrymen a part of the spiritual wealth of the "peoples of a scripture" and how he touched the soul of the Arabs is best seen by the efforts of the Wahhābīs at a reformation. In lands of ancient culture, Islām, it is true, was only able to carry out its task by a sometimes radical remoulding and the intellectual activity already mentioned developed also under the influence of Christianity and mysticism, but yet it was Muḥammad who set the whole process in motion and he could not have gained this influence if he had only been what the writers mentioned profess to have found in him.

MUHAMMAD I-III. [See UMAIYADS II.]

MUHAMMAD I, according to the current view, the fifth Sultān of the Ottoman Empire, reigned, after the Empire's restoration in 1413, as sole acknowledged ruler until his death in 1421. Like many details of the first century of Ottoman history, the year of the birth of this Sultān is unknown; Sidjill-i 'Othmānī, i. 66 gives 781 or 791 (1379 or 1389). It is commonly agreed, that he was the youngest of the six sons of Bāyazid I, which probably has made von Hammer accept the later date. At the time of Timur's invasion, Muḥammad resided at Amasia, but he was present at the battle of Angora (end of July 1402). From here he escaped with the help of the vizier Bāyazid

Pasha and was able to maintain himself in Amasia and Tokat against Timur's governor in Niksār and against Turkoman bands. Soon after Bāyazid's death in 1403, having found support with the dynasties of Karamān and Dhū 'l-Kadr, he conquered Brusa from his brother 'Isā, who had fled there after the battle of Angora. Then followed the struggle with his other brother Sulaimān, who had escaped to Adrianople but reappeared in Anatolia on account of his dealings, friendly as well as hostile, with the İzmir Oghlu Djunaid. Sulaimān was able to take Brusa but was soon obliged to return to Rūm-ili, where Muḥammad had sent their brother Mūsā (who, after Angora, had been prisoner for some time with the Germiān Oghlu). When in 1410 the struggle between Sulaimān and Mūsā ended in the latter's victory, Muḥammad, whose position in Anatolia was now strengthened, had to face Mūsā himself. At first the conquest of Rūm-ili did not seem hopeful, but after some high functionaries, like the Djandar-oghlu Ibrāhīm Pasha (cf. Täschner and Wittek, in Isl., xviii. 95) and representatives of the old nobility, like Ewrenos, had gone over from Mūsā to his side, and after he had made the Byzantine Emperor Manuel his ally, Muḥammad was able to crush Mūsā in the battle of Čamurlu in Serbia (July 1413). By this battle the unity of the Ottoman state was re-established; nevertheless one gets the impression that, even after the battle of Angora, the supremacy of the house of 'Othmān over the other Muḥammadan and Christian chiefs in Anatolia and the Balkan Peninsula was never seriously questioned. The hereditary enemy in Asia, Karamān Oghlu Mehmed, who in the meantime had gone as far as besieging Brusa, was subdued at Djānik in 1414 and at the same time the turbulent İzmir Oghlu Djunaid was finally driven away from Smyrna. In 1416 the Ottoman power in the Aegean Sea was strengthened by the battle of Gallipoli against a Venetian fleet. That same year witnessed the extremely serious derwish revolt in Aidin and the peninsula of Kāra Burun, connected with the name of Simawna Oghlu Badr al-Dīn (cf. Babinger's monograph on the subject in Isl., xi. 1—174 and, as to the date, p. 62 sqq.); its suppression required the levying of troops from all parts of Anatolia under Bāyazid Pasha. In the European part of the Empire the Sultān kept up friendly relations with the Byzantine Emperor. The Turks intervened, however, in Wallachia where the succession was disputed and they built there the fortress of Djurdjewo (Turk: Yer Kōkü) on the northern bank of the Danube; at the same time (1419), the raids of the Turkish troops reached Hungary, Bosnia and Styria. On the Asiatic side large parts of the possessions of the prince of Kaṣtamuni, including Tosia and Kaṅgheri, were incorporated into the Ottoman possessions. From 1416 Muḥammad had moreover to face a pretender to the throne who claimed to be his brother Muṣṭafā; this Dōzme Muṣṭafā found an ally in Djunaid. Both were defeated near Selānk and had to fly to Constantinople. The Sultān died in 1421 in Adrianople, shortly after his return from Anatolia. His death was kept secret from the army during forty days, until the heir to the throne Murād had arrived at Brusa.

Muḥammad I has won the reputation of a mild and benevolent ruler; he often occurs with the surname of Čelebi (as also do his brothers). Another surname is Kūrūshdji, the "Wrestler", which takes unrecognizable forms in the European sources ("Crixia" in the Ragusan documents cited by Babinger on p. 63 of his article in Isl.). Important administrative measures are not recorded under his reign; the political and religious unification and pacification occupied all his forces. Some famous edifices are connected with his name; he finished the Ulu Djāmi' in Adrianople and the mosque of the same name in Brusa. A new building of this Sultān was the well known Yeshil Djāmi' at Brusa (cf. Ewliyā Čelebi, Travels, ii. 15).

MUHAMMAD II, with the surname Abū 'l-Faḥ, or, more popularly, Fātiḥ, seventh ruler of the Ottoman Empire, reigned from 1451 until his death in 1481. He was born, according to Sidqill-i 'Othmān, i. 67, in Rādjab 832 (April 1429) and resided during his father Murād II's lifetime as governor in Magnisa; after the death of his brother 'Alā' al-Dīn in 1444 he became heir to the throne. Before his final enthronement Muḥammad had twice resided in Adrianople as sultān, on account of the abdication of Murād II; the first time in June 1444, after a ten years' peace had been concluded with Hungary. When, notwithstanding this treaty, Hungary and her Christian allies again took the offensive in July, Murād came back from Magnisa, to which he had retired, and won the battle of Varna (Nov. 10, 1444). Then Murād abdicated a second time, but a menacing revolt of the Janissaries in Adrianople made the grand vizier Khalil Pasha call him back again, after which Muḥammad was relegated once more to his Anatolian governorship until his father's death.

On Febr. 9, 1451 this new sultān arrived at Adrianople and seemed at first peacefully inclined. In reality his reign was to become a period of untiring and continual conquest under the personal leadership of Muḥammad himself, who, especially in the beginning of his reign, took part in nearly all the important campaigns. His conquests did not very much enlarge the boundaries already reached at Murād II's death, but consisted more in a bringing under immediate Turkish rule of a large number of countries, regions and towns that were still held by local rulers under the Ottoman suzerainty. In this way Muḥammad's conquests made possible the enormous expansion of the Ottoman empire in the xvth century.

The first, and at the same time most conspicuous military achievement of his reign was the conquest of Constantinople, where, by the grace of Murād II, the Palaeologue Constantine was still reigning. The preparations for this memorable siege had begun in 1452 with the construction of the castle of Rūmili Hışār (in which an inscription by Zaḡhanos Pasha, one of the builders, of 856 [1452], is found; cf. Khalil Edhem, in T. O. E. M., ii. 484—497) and other military preparations, e. g. the casting of an enormous siege gun. Constantinople was taken on May 29, 1453 and Galata surrendered soon afterwards [cf. CONSTANTINOPLE]. In the next year, the sultān obtained successes against Serbia, while Turākhān [q. v.] intervened in Morea, where the last Palaeologue despots were at war with the Albanians. Immediately after the taking of Constantinople the grand vizier Khalīl Pasha had been deposed and executed by order of the sultān, who had personal and political causes of complaint against him (cf. Taeschner and Wittek, in Isl., xviii. 105 sqq.); he was replaced after nearly a year by Maḥmūd Pasha [q. v.], who for the next twelve years was to be a no less energetic supporter of Muḥammad in the achievement of the programme of conquest. The year 1455 saw both of them in Serbia and on the Aegean coast, where the principal conquests were Ainos and the island of Lemnos [q. v.]. In 1456 they were unsuccessful in the siege of Belgrad. During the years 1458 and 1459 Serbia was made a direct Ottoman province (Semendra taken in 1459 by Muḥammad), and in the same year and in 1460 the sultān took part in several campaigns in the Morea, the northern part of which was conquered from the Paleologues. About the same time a temporary understanding was reached with Skanderbeg [q. v.] in Albania.

Then came the amazing Asiatic campaign of 1461. Amasra (Amastris) was taken from the Genoese and Sinub [q. v.] from the last Isfandiār Oghlu; the fall of Trebizond immediately followed [cf. TARABZUN], after the beginning of a conflict with Uzun Ḥasan of the Ak-Koyunlu. In the next year the sultān's army drove the famous Wallachian woiwod Wlad Dracul from his principality, which was given to his brother Radul, and at the end of the year Muḥammad and Maḥmūd made an end to the rule of the Genoese dynasty of Lesbos. The years 1463 and 1464 were mainly occupied by the annexation of the kingdom of Bosnia. In 1463 began a war with Venice, which was to last seventeen years; the main theatre of hostilities was the Morea, but also in the islands of the Aegean there were continual encounters with Venetian fleets.

The death of the Ḳaraman Oghlu [q. v.] Ibrāhīm in 1464 had first provoked the sultān's intervention and soon nearly all the towns of this once powerful principality were conquered during Muḥammad's campaign of 1466 (battle of Larenda). In that same year Muḥammad was successful in Albania, where he fortified the town of Ilbašan [cf. SKANDERBEG].

Maḥmūd Pasha had been deposed as grand-vizier after the Ḳaraman campaign and replaced by Rūm Muḥammad Pasha. But it was Maḥmūd who as governor of Gallipoli and Kapudan Pasha, helped Muḥammad in the conquest from Venice of the islands of Negroponte (Euboea) in 1470. In the same year began again a series of campaigns under Rūm Muḥammad and Gedik Aḥmad Pasha against the last towns held by descendants of the Ḳaraman Oghlu, who were supported by Uzun Ḥasan [q. v.] and by Christian fleets on the sea side. When Uzun Ḥasan had even taken the offensive by conquering the town of Tokat, great preparations were made for a new Asiatic campaign of the sultān, and Maḥmūd was again made grand vizier. The sultān's army won in 1473 the great victory of Erzindjān, which put an end to danger from that side. In this campaign a part was played by prince Muṣṭafā, the heir to the throne, who completed in 1474 the conquest of İč İli (Cilicia) but died soon afterwards. Maḥmūd Pasha had been deposed again from the grand vizierate and executed in August 1474; Gedik Aḥmad Pasha took his place.

In the following years, until 1480, the sultān's chief attention was given to conquests in Europe. He built in 1471 the fortress of Sabacs (Bögürdelen) in Syria, near Belgrad, while his troops in these and the following years made incursions into Hungary and far into Austrian territory; the war with Venice continued and in 1474 the Albanian Skutari (Shkodra) was in vain besieged. The year 1475 brought the great success of the conquest of Kaffa from the Genoese and, as a result of the establishing of the Ottoman power in the Crimea, the submission of the Tatar Ḳhānate of the Crimea to Ottoman suzerainty. In 1476 the sultān himself was successful in Moldavia, but in the next years the Turkish armies had less success against the Venetians in Albania and southern Morea; finally in 1478 Muḥammad himself went to Albania and took Croia; Skutari was besieged a long time, but surrendered only on account of the peace negotiations with Venice, which led to a peace treaty (confirmed January 26, 1479) leaving a certain number of towns in Albania and Morea to Venice. The Ionian islands, however, were conquered in 1479 by a fleet under Gedik Aḥmad, who, at the same time, went so far as to take Otranto in southern Italy. An endeavour to conquer the island of Rhodes in the same year was not successful.

Muḥammad's last campaign took place in 1480, when he intervened in the dynastic disputes of the dynasty of Dhū 'l-Ḳadr [q. v.], which intervention gave rise to the first difficulties with Egypt. In the next year, 1481, he had already set out for a new military enterprise in Asia, the aim of which was yet unknown, but may have been connected with the same difficulties, when he died, rather suddenly, in the place called Tekfur Çayırı or Khunkiār Çayırı between Skutari and Gebze (May 3, 1481). His body was transported to Constantinople and buried in the türbe of the Fātiḥ Mosque.

Besides being a great conqueror, Muḥammad II was the builder of many important edifices, in the first place of the Fātiḥ Mosque in Constantinople and the mosque of Eiyüb (*Ḥadīkat al-Djawiāmi*², i. 8 sqq.; 243 sqq.) and further of the castles on the Dardanelles and other works of naval and military importance. In the army administration he succeeded in restoring discipline among the Janisaries by incorporating in them the corps of the Segbans; further his name is connected with the first Ottoman Kānūn-nāme (printed as an appendix to T.O.E.M., iii.). He encouraged scientific studies and showed an interest in literature and poetry (he pensioned thirteen Turkish poets), even for the Renaissance arts in Italy (he summoned Gentile Bellini to Constantinople, who made his portrait; cf. also Tschudi, Vom alten Osmanischen Reich, Tübingen 1930, p. 18).

Bibliography: Among the early sources, the Byzantine historians (Phranzes, Ducas, Chacondyles) are by far the more important. The Greek description of Muḥammad's life by Critobulos was translated into Turkish (appendix to T.O.E.M., i. and ii.). The old Ottoman chronicles (Neshri and others) often treat the beginning of Muḥammad's reign in their last part; the later historical sources (Sa'd al-Dīn, 'Āli, Feridūn) are far from being reliable for this time. MUHAMMAD III, thirteenth ruler of the Ottoman Empire, was born on May 16, 1567, the son of Murād III and the Venetian lady Baffa, and reigned from January 27, 1593 until his death, December 22, 1603. He was the last sultān who, as crown prince, had resided as governor in Maghnisa. During his short reign he does not seem to have exercised any great influence on the policy of the Empire, being mostly under the influence of his mother who, as wālide sultān, intervened in affairs of state through her protégés within and without the palace. Much against her will but on the insistence of a large part of the troops and of the high dignitaries, Muḥammad took part in one campaign, namely that of 1596, in which the Hungarian town of Erlau (Egri) was taken by the Turks (September 1596). This campaign was a part of the war against Austria that lasted during all his reign and occasioned every year a military expedition to Hungary or to Wallachia. The grand vizierate was changed not less than twelve times under this sultān; the most conspicuous grand vizier was Dāmād Ibrāhīm Pasha [q. v.], his brother-in-law and the protégé of the wālide. Ibrāhīm three times held the sultān's seal, three other titularies ended their office by being executed. In the same year as the conquest of Erlau, the Turks won the battle of Keresztes over the Austrians and Hungarians; the severity of the then grand-vizier Čighala Sinān caused a great number of the troops to desert and to appear some years afterwards as firāris or djelālis, provoking dangerous revolts in Asia Minor which lasted thirty years and began with the taking of Urfa by Ẓāra Yazıdī [q. v.] in 1599. A third memorable feat of the Hungarian war was the conquest of Kanizha in 1600 by Ibrāhīm Pasha. In other parts of the Empire the situation was relatively quiet; only in the Crimea was there a war between two rivals to the khānate, in which the Ottoman government had to intervene. Relations with the European powers were peaceful. France began already to exercise considerable influence through her ambassador; with Persia there was peace until September 1603, when a war began with the taking of Tabriz and Nakḥcawān by Abbās I.

The Empire was still supported by the traditions of Suleimān's time, but the lack of strong government had introduced a lot of abuses, notably in the administration of the timārs and of the finances. One of the consequences was the dangerous revolt in January 1603 of the sipāhis in Constantinople, who demanded the abolition of the harem régime in the capital and the restoration of the authority of the government in Anatolia. Two high harem functionaries fell as victims of this revolt; the grand vizier Yemişdji Ḥasan was able to oppose the sipāhis with the aid of the Janissaries, thus creating an everlasting feud between the two corps, but in October of the same year this nefarious policy caused his own fall and execution.

Muḥammad III was buried in a türbe of the Aya Sofia; a short time before his death, he had ordered the execution of his eldest son Maḥmūd. He is said to have made a great show of piety, and had some excellent councillors in his environment, such as the khwādja Sa'd al-Dīn (died 1599), who had determined him to accompany the army in 1596; but on the whole his mother's influence prevailed by keeping him mainly confined to the harem in the palace.

MUHAMMAD IV, nineteenth Sultān of the Ottoman Empire, was born on December 30, 1641 and was placed on the throne on August 8, 1648, after the deposition, soon followed by the execution, of his father Sultān Ibrāhīm. The power in the state was at that time divided between the court, where the old wālide Kösem [q. v.] and Sultān Muḥammad's mother, the wālide Tarkhān, held the reins, and the rebellious soldiery of the Janissaries and the Sipāhis. The lack of stability in the government at this time is shown by the fact, that, until the nomination of the grand vizier Köprülü Muḥammad in 1656, there were no less than thirteen grand viziers. In 1651 the old wālide Kösem was assassinated and at the same time the resistance of the Janissaries was broken; the régime of the court party that followed under the sultān's mother did not improve the situation. The grand vizierate of Ibshir Pasha (1654—1655), who at first seemed to be the strong man needed, was brought to an early end by his rival Murād Pasha, and in the meantime the Cretan war against Venice was exhausting the resources of the Empire. In March 1656 a military rebellion forced the sultān to allow the execution of several of his favourite courtiers.

The real strong man proved to be Köprülü Muḥammad Pasha [q. v.] (Sept. 15, 1656—Oct. 31, 1661) who eliminated immediately the influence of the harem on state affairs and became until his death the real ruler of the Empire. His régime began with a Turkish maritime defeat by the Venetians at the Dardanelles, but already in the following year he obtained as ser'asker successes in Transylvania and succeeded at the same time in establishing firmly the Turkish authority in the Danube principalities; the collaboration with the Crimean Khān was here of great value. In 1658 and 1659 he was able to suppress rebellions in Asia Minor, and in the Venetian war a great fleet of Venetian ships and other Christian allies did not succeed against the Turkish forces on Crete. After his death (Oct. 31, 1661), he was succeeded in his office by his son Köprülü Aḥmad Pasha, who completed the work of his father by carrying through the final conquest of Crete (surrender of Kandia on Sept. 4, 1669) followed by peace with Venice. In 1661 the war with Austria had begun again, where Sultān Muḥammad took part in several campaigns, notably that of 1663 in which Újvár (Neuhäusel) was taken. In 1664 took place the famous battle of St. Gotthard, where the Turks were beaten by an allied army, a part of which was formed by French troops; still the peace concluded with Austria in 1665 was favourable for Turkey. In 1672 the sultān took part in the campaign against Poland, after the Ukrainian cossacks had invoked Ottoman aid against the Polish king; the Polish war, ending in a peace treaty of 1676, strengthened still further the Empire's position in the north. Köprülü Aḥmad Paşa died Oct. 30, 1676. Though the sultān, who had developed in the meantime a morose and capricious character, never showed him the same deference as to his father, Aḥmad had been easily able to maintain himself against enemies in the interior, not least by forming new troops (the beṣli and the gönüllü), who were far more reliable than the Janissaries and Sipāhis. He had not been able, however, to put an end to the extravagant luxury of the court, which wasted enormous sums. The sultān had an abnormal liking for big hunts, that were organized at enormous cost in the environment of Adrianople, which town he preferred as a residence to Constantinople.

After Aḥmad's death the sultān did not himself take the affairs of state in hand; he appointed Kara Muṣṭafā Paşa [q. v.] as his grand vizier. The latter continued in an unnecessary way the tradition of warfare; in 1677 and 1678 he obtained successes against the Cossacks, behind whom the Muscovite power now began to gain in importance in Turkish affairs. In 1682 war broke out again with the Austrian monarchy and led to the second Turkish siege of Vienna (July 13—Sept. 12, 1683), ending in a Turkish débâcle, thanks to the intervention of the Polish king Sobiesky. This disaster cost Kara Muṣṭafā his office and his life and at the same time the influence of the Serail became again predominant. The grand viziers now following proved unequal to their task and in the years 1685—1687 nearly the whole of Hungary was lost to the Austrian armies (Turkish defeat at Mohács on June 22, 1687). At the same time the hostilities with Venice had been reopened in the Morea and in the Archipelago.

All these disasters caused a revolt of the troops in the field; they marched on the capital in September 1687 under Siyawush Paşa of Aleppo. This time the sultān himself fell a victim to them; he was deposed on November 8, 1687 by the kā'im-makām Köprülü Muṣṭafā Paşa and lived in seclusion in Adrianople until his death on December 17, 1692. He was buried next to his mother in the Veñi Djāmi'.

MUHAMMAD V RESHĀD, thirty-fifth Ottoman Sultān, was born on November 2, 1844 as a son of Sultān 'Abd al-Madīd. During the reign of his brother 'Abd al-Ḥamīd II he lived in seclusion; his very existence inspired 'Abd al-Ḥamīd with such terror that even the mentioning of persons with the name Reshād had to be avoided in his presence (cf. Snouck Hurgronje, Verspreide Geschriften, iii. 232). He was a man of mild character, who owed his accession to the throne (April 27, 1909) only to the victory of the Young Turks; moreover he was the first constitutional ruler of Turkey, but he was unable to give direction to the very disparate political tendencies that manifested themselves within and without the Parliament during the years after the Revolution, and, after the final victory of the Unionist party in January 1913, Muḥammad V had to submit, much against his will, to their government.

At the very beginning of his reign, Turkey lost her last vestige of authority over Bosnia and Herzegovina by Austria-Hungary's annexation, and over Bulgaria by the declaration of its independence (Oct. 5, 1909). The cabinets under Husein Hilmi Paşa (until January 18, 1910) and İsmā'il Ḥakki Paşa (q. v.; until Sept. 29, 1911) were not able to bring about a peaceful situation in the interior (revolts in Albania). Ḥakki Paşa had to resign on account of the declaration of war by Italy. Under the grand vizierate of Sa'īd Paşa [q. v.] the Italian war led to the loss of Tripoli, confirmed by the peace treaty of Ouchy (Oct. 15, 1912). The peace was signed under the anti-unionist cabinet of Aḥmad Mukhtār Paşa, but in the same month began the so-called Balkan War against the confederated Balkan States. The reactionary cabinet of Kāmil Paşa soon showed an inclination to conclude a disastrous peace through the intermediary of the European powers (Conference of London); then on January 23, 1913 the Unionist coup d'état brought again a Unionist government under Maḥmūd Shewket Paşa. The result was a reopening of the hostilities and, after the failure of Bulgaria, the recapture of Adrianople (July 22, 1913). In the meantime Maḥmūd Shewket had been murdered (June 28) by adherents of the liberal opposition, but this did not bring about a change in the political course; his place was taken by Sa'īd Ḥalim Paşa, whose government signed the peace-treaties with Bulgaria (Sept. 29, 1913), Greece (Nov. 14) and Serbia (March 14, 1914). From this time on, the Committee of Union and Progress, which from the beginning of Muḥammad Reshād's reign had not ceased to work behind the scenes, became all powerful and its leaders Tal'at Bey and Enver Bey came more and more to the front. Afterwards, when at the beginning of the Great War, the Ottoman Government had decided to remain neutral, it was the unionist sympathies with Germany that brought about a gradual estrangement between Turkey and the Allies (the "Goeben" and "Breslau" incident), culminating in the entrance of Turkey into the war on the side of the Central Powers (the Turkish fleet in the Black Sea on October 29 and 30, 1914). Tal'at Paşa himself became grand vizier in February 1917. The Allied endeavour to force a way through the Dardanelles was definitely abandoned in January 1916 and in the meantime Turkish troops fought on the Egyptian front, in 'Irāk and on the Russian and Persian frontiers. Before the end of the war Muḥammad V died unexpectedly on July 2, 1918.

MUHAMMAD VI WAHĪD AL-DĪN, last Sultān of the Ottoman Empire, was born on January 14, 1861, as son of Sultān 'Abd al-Madjīd. He was called to the throne on July 3, 1918, after the death of his brother Muḥammad V Reṣhād, the former heir to the throne Yūsuf 'Izz al-Dīn, son of 'Abd al-'Azīz, having died in 1916. When on October 30, 1918, nearly four months after his accession, the armistice of Mudros was signed, he was the ruler of an empire that seemed to be at the mercy of its former enemies, whose military forces occupied the capital and other hitherto unconquered parts of Turkey. On the other hand, the power of the Committee of Union and Progress was broken, but, since in the beginning of 1919 there began in Anatolia an increasing opposition against the foreign occupation, joined with an aversion to obey the Constantinople government, Muḥammad VI seemed to have no other choice than to throw in his lot with the Allies and, together with his grand vizier Dāmād Ferīd Pasha, he collaborated with the Allies in the endeavours to suppress the nationalist forces (beginning of 1920); this anti-nationalist action was even sanctioned by a fatwā of the Shaiḫh al-Islām. As the nationalist movement grew ever stronger, the Sultān's authority could only be upheld in Constantinople by the support of the Allies. His government had to sign the Treaty of Sèvres (August 10, 1920) and the Tewfīk Pasha cabinet (since October 21, 1920) tried to summon the Parliament for its ratification. But in 1921 things had already gone so far that Tewfīk Pasha recognized the powerlessness of his government to represent Turkey. The final success of the nationalists against the Greeks (seizure of Smyrna, September 9, 1922) brought about the armistice of Mudania (October 11, 1922), to which the Sultān's government was not a party. It was still invited to represent Turkey in Lausanne, together with the Angora government. This was not accepted by the Great National Assembly, which, on November 1, 1922, declared the Ottoman sultānate abolished from March 16, 1920 (occupation of Constantinople); Tewfīk Pasha's cabinet resigned accordingly (November 4) and Muḥammad VI remained as Khalīfa in Constantinople, where, on November 10, he appeared at his last selāmīk. When, however, the National Assembly decided some days afterwards to try Wahīd al-Dīn on a charge of high treason, this last Ottoman Sultān left Constantinople as a fugitive on a British ship (November 17, 1922) and the very next day the Angora government declared him divested of the caliphate. Having gone first to Malta, the ex-sultān proceeded to Mecca as the guest of king Ḥusain. From here he launched a proclamation to the Islāmic world, in which he maintained that the separation of the caliphate from the sultānate was contrary to the sharī'a (text in Oriente Moderno, ii. 702—705). This appeal found hardly any response in the Islāmic world. The last Ottoman Sultān left Mecca again and went to live in San Remo, where he died on May 16, 1926. In 1924 he had even recognized king Ḥusain's claim to the caliphate.

MUHAMMAD, MU'IZZ AL-DĪN B. SĀM, was the fourth of the Shansabānī princes of Ghūr to rule the empire of Ghaznī. His name was originally Shihāb al-Dīn, but he assumed that of Mu'izz al-Dīn. His elder brother Ghiyāth al-Dīn succeeded his cousin Saif al-Dīn in 1163 and made Muḥammad governor of Herāt, entrusting to him also the duty of extending the dominions of the house in India.

Muḥammad led his first expedition into India in 1175, expelled the Ismā'īlian heretics who ruled Multān, placed an orthodox governor in that province, and captured Učch. In 1178 he rashly led an army into Guḍjarāt, was defeated by the rādjā, Bhīma the Vāghela, and returned to Ghaznī with no more than the remnant of his army, but in the following year he took Peshāwar, and in 1181 Lāhor, taking prisoner Khusrāw Malik, the last of the Ghaznawids, and adding the Panḍjāb to his brother's dominions. In the winter of 1190—1191 he invaded the Cāwhān kingdom of Dīhli and captured Bhātinda, but the rādjā, Prithwī Rādj, marched against him and defeated him at Tarāwri, near Karnāl. He was wounded, but escaped, and in 1192 returned to India, defeated and slew Prithwī Rādj at Tarāwri, captured Hānsi, Sāmāna, Guhrām, and other fortresses, and plundered Adjmer. On returning to Ghaznī he left Kuṭb al-Dīn Aibeg [q. v.] in India as viceroy, and at the end of 1192 Aibeg took Dīhli and made it his capital. In 1197 Aibeg was beleaguered in Adjmer and Muḥammad sent a relieving force which enabled him to defeat Bhīma of Guḍjarāt and to plunder his capital, Anhilvāra.

Muḥammad was now employed with his brother in recovering Khurāsān. On the death of Takash Khān Khwārizmshāh [q. v.] in Marw, on July 3, 1200, Muḥammad Čurbak was sent to Marw, which he captured and occupied for Ghiyāth al-Dīn, and Ghiyāth al-Dīn and his brother besieged and took Nishāpūr. Muḥammad was then sent in command of an expedition to Raiy but the misbehaviour of his troops earned a rebuke which led to the only quarrel between the brothers.

On the death of Ghiyāth al-Dīn in 1202 Muḥammad succeeded to the great empire which he had helped his brother to build up, but Muḥammad Khwārizmshāh [q. v.] took Marw from Muḥammad Čurbak, recovered Nishāpūr, but failed to capture Herāt. Mu'izz al-Dīn Muḥammad marched against him but suffered a crushing defeat near Andkhūi and fled to Tālakān. He was besieged by the army of Gūr Khān of Karā-Khitāi and purchased a safe retreat only by the surrender of the whole of his baggage and material of war. On his arrival before Ghaznī in this plight his slave İldigiz refused to admit him, and he passed on to Multān where the governor likewise refused him admittance, but he attacked and defeated him and appointed Nāsir al-Dīn Qubāča [q. v.] to the government of the province. He returned to Ghaznī and established himself there, sparing the life of İldigiz. By the treaty which he concluded with Muḥammad Khwārizmshāh he was permitted to retain Balkh and Herāt, but not Nishāpūr and Marw.

On Oct. 20, 1205, he marched from Ghaznī for India and, with the help of Kuṭb al-Dīn Aibeg, defeated the Khokars, but on returning towards Ghaznī was assassinated, on March 15, 1206, on the bank of the Indus, either by Ismā'īli heretics or by some Khokars. He was succeeded in Ghūr by his nephew Maḥmūd, son of Ghiyāth al-Dīn, but the viceroys of the provinces, Aibeg in Dihli, Kūbācha in Multān, Tādī al-Dīn Yildiz in Kirmān, and İldigiz in Ghaznī, became independent.

MUHAMMAD, TUGHLUQ, the second king of the Tughluq dynasty of Dihli, was the eldest son of Ghiyāth al-Dīn Tughluq, its founder. During the short reign of the usurper, Nāṣir al-Dīn Khusraw, he was in some peril, but escaped and joined his father, who was marching on Dihli. He was known at first as Djawna Khān, but received the title of Ulugh Khān and was sent in 1321 to Warangal, to reduce to obedience the rādja, Pratāpa Rudradeva II. In this distant region he attempted to rebel, but his army refused to believe his story of his father's death at Dihli and to accept him as their king, and he was obliged to return in haste to the capital, where he either persuaded his father of his innocence or gained a pardon, for, though his accomplices suffered cruel deaths, he was again sent, in 1323, into Telingāna, and on this occasion compelled the rādja to surrender and sent him to Dihli. In the following year he acted as regent during his father's absence on an expedition into Bengal, but his conduct aroused suspicion, and his father rebuked him in letters sent from Bengal. He received the king, on his return, in a temporary kiosk of wood, so constructed that the dislodgement of a beam would bring the whole structure down, and by this device crushed the old man to death, and ascended the throne in February 1325. The delineation of a character so complex and contradictory as that of Muḥammad Tughluq is no easy task. He was one of the most extraordinary monarchs who ever sat upon a throne. To the most lavish generosity he united revolting and indiscriminate cruelty; to scrupulous observance of the ritual and ceremonial prescribed by the Islāmic law an utter disregard of that law in all public affairs; to a debasing and superstitious veneration for all whose descent or whose piety commanded respect a ferocity which when roused respected neither the blood of the Prophet nor personal sanctity. Some of his administrative and most of his military measures give evidence of abilities of the highest order; others are the acts of a madman.

The chronicle of his reign is largely a record of rebellions punished with gross barbarity. In the second year his cousin Gurshāsp rebelled in the Dakan and was flayed alive. In 1327 he rebuilt Devagīr, named it Dawlatābād, made it his capital, and two years later drove the whole population of Dihli thither. In 1328 Kishlū Khān rebelled in Multān and was defeated and slain, and in 1329 India was invaded by the Mughul, 'Alā' al-Dīn Tarmāshirīn, who, however, was driven from the country. In the same year the enhancement of the land-tax in the Gangetic Doāb drove the inhabitants into rebellion, and the measures taken to suppress the rising depopulated the country. At about the same time Muḥammad issued his famous fictitious currency, decreeing that his brass tokens should be accepted as equivalent to silver tangas. No precautions were taken against counterfeiting, and when the experiment failed and the tokens were recalled the treasury was obliged to purchase mountains of brass at the price of silver.

In 1331 a rebellion in Bengal was crushed by Bahrām Khān, but in 1338 he died, and a second rebellion separated the province from the kingdom of Dihli, and in 1334 Saiyid Djalāl al-Dīn Aḥsan established his independence in Madura. Muḥammad marched to punish him, but a pestilence in his army compelled him to retreat, and on his return he established in the Dakan the pernicious system of farming out the revenue for extravagant sums, the result of which was to drive both the impoverished cultivator and the defaulting farmer into rebellion. Hūshang of Dawlatābād, believing a report of the king's death, rebelled, but was captured and pardoned, a rare instance of clemency, but a rebellion in the Panḍjāb was crushed with great severity.

An enormous army raised for the conquest of Persia melted away for want of funds to maintain it, and in 1337 a heavy calamity fell on northern India, a famine of unusual severity which lasted for seven years. The king's measures to combat the famine were, on the whole, well conceived and well executed. Grain was plentiful in Awadh, which proved that the famine was largely due to artificial causes, and he built a temporary city, Sarga-dwārī (Swarga dwāra, Sansk. "the Gate of Paradise"), on the western bank of the Ganges, transferred thither the citizens of Dihli, and with the assistance of 'Ain al-Mulk, governor of Awadh, fed them from the granaries of that province. In the following year he committed one of the greatest of his many follies in assembling an army of 100,000 horse for the invasion of Tibet and sending it into the Himālaya, where it perished.

In 1339 a rebellion in the Dakan was crushed and even the faithful 'Ain al-Mulk was goaded into rebellion, but, in consideration of his services, was imprisoned instead of being put to death. Almost immediately afterwards Shāhū the Afghān rebelled in Multān, but fled before the king's wrath into Afghānistān. The famine was now at its height, and the people were eating human flesh. Muḥammad set himself to the framing of regulations which should improve and extend agriculture and obviate future famines. By their means, says the contemporary historian, with conscious or unconscious irony, agriculture would have been so promoted that plenty would have reigned throughout the earth, had they been practicable. They included the extension of the system of farming the revenues, and bred confusion and rebellion, which reacted on the king until he regarded his subjects as his natural enemies and waged war against them with all the weapons of despotic power. The tale of executions is recorded, with sickening details, by Ibn Baṭṭūṭa. Rebellions in Sunām, Sāmāna, Kaithal, Guhrām, Kara, and the Dakan were all traceable to the king's revenue system, but he attributed the discontent in the Dakan to the disaffection of his officers and sent to that province a wretch who slew ninety officers in cold blood, and was himself slain in the rising which his barbarity provoked. Muḥammad marched into Guḍjarāt and personally undertook the collection of arrears due to the treasury, so alarming the officials in the Dakan that they seized the fort of Dawlatābād and proclaimed an Afghān, Ismā'il Mukh, as their king. The king marched to Dawlatābād, captured the city, and besieged the rebels in the citadel, but was recalled to Guḍjarāt by a serious rebellion headed by a man named Taghī. He pursued the rebel in Guḍjarāt and Kāthiāwār for three years, drove him into Sind, and followed him thither, and on March 20, 1351, died within a few miles of Thatha, where the rebel had taken refuge. "The king", as a historian says, "was freed from his people, and they from their king".

His empire, at its greatest extent, included the whole of India except the small kingdoms of the Čolas and the Pāṇḍyas, in the neighbourhood of Cape Comorin and the principality of Gīrnār in Kāthiāwār. Before his death he lost Bengal, the Dakan, the Peninsula, and Sind, and left the remnant of his dominions seething with discontent.

MUHAMMAD III, the sixth king of the Tughluḳ dynasty of Dihlī, was the son of Firūz, at whose death the son of Faṭḥ Khān, his eldest son, was raised to the throne on Sept. 20, 1388, as Ghīyāth al-Dīn Tughluḳ II, but was slain on Feb. 19, 1389, and was succeeded by his cousin Abū Bakr, son of Zafar Khān, the second son of Firūz. Muḥammad, the third son, contested the succession and, after suffering more than one defeat, occupied Dihlī and ascended the throne on Aug. 31, 1390. Abū Bakr took refuge with Bahādur Nāhir in Mewāt but was pursued and defeated, and was imprisoned in Mirāth, where he shortly afterwards died. The old servants of Firūz, men of Eastern Hindūstān, who had been the principal factors in all the troubles of the kingdom, were put to the sword, after being tested by a shibboleth which distinguished them from the natives of Dihlī.

A rebellion in Guḍjarāt was suppressed in the same year by Zafar Khān, who in 1396 became independent in that province, and in 1392 Muḥammad crushed a serious rebellion in the Doāb, captured Itāwa, ravaged the districts of Kanawḍj and Dalman, and built near Ḍjalesar a fort, which he named Muḥammadābād. In the same year, he put to death his minister, Islām Khān, who was meditating rebellion, and appointed in his place Khwādja Ḍjahān. Another rebellion was crushed in the southern Doāb, and in August 1393, Muḥammad invaded and plundered Mewāt and returned to Ḍjalesar, where he fell sick. Bahādur Nāhir took advantage of his illness to plunder some villages in the neighbourhood of Dihlī and Muḥammad marched into Mewāt, defeated him, and put him to flight, but on his return to Muḥammadābād his disorder increased, and on Jan. 20, 1394, just as he had ordered his son Humāyūn Khān to march against the Khokars, who had captured Lāhor and were ravaging the Panḍjāb, he died.

MUHAMMAD I, the second king of the Bahmanī dynasty of the Dakan, was the eldest son of Ḥasan, 'Alā' al-Dīn Bahman Shāh, usually, but incorrectly, styled Ḥasan Gangū. On succeeding his father, on Feb. 11, 1358, he carefully organized the government of the four provinces of the kingdom and the administration of the army. The pertinacity of the Hindū bankers and money-changers in melting down the gold coinage which he introduced led to a general massacre of the community and the measure involved him in hostilities with the Hindū states of Warangal and Viḍḍayanagar. He invaded the dominions of Kānhaīya of Warangal three times, put his son Venāyēk Deva to death, and compelled him to pay heavy indemnities and to surrender the town and district of Golkonda. After this success he grossly insulted Bukka I of Viḍḍayanagar by paying some dancing girls with a draft drawn by him on Bukka's treasury. Bukka invaded the Rāičūr Doāb, captured Mudgal, and massacred its garrison. Muḥammad marched against him, attacked him with great impetuosity, defeated him, and recovered Mudgal, where he rested during the rainy season. In 1367 he met Bukka at Kawthal, again defeated him, and carried out an indiscriminate massacre of his subjects. The Hindūs were cowed by the slaughter of 400,000 of their race, and Bukka was compelled to sue for peace. He honoured the draft and paid an indemnity, and received in return a guarantee that non-combatants should be spared in future wars, and the agreement, though sometimes violated, mitigated to some extent the horrors of the long period of intermittent warfare between the two states. On returning from Viḍḍayanagar he completed, in 1367, the great mosque at Gulbarga, and then turned against his cousin Bahrām Khān Māzandarānī, who had for some years been in rebellion at Dawlatābād, defeated his army, and drove its leaders into Guḍjarāt. He died in 1377 and was succeeded by his elder son, Mudjahid.

MUHAMMAD II, the fifth king of the Bahmanī dynasty of the Dakan, was the son of Maḥmūd Khān, the youngest son of 'Alā' al-Dīn Bahman Shāh, the founder of the dynasty, and was raised to the throne on May 20, 1378, after the assassination of his uncle, Dāwūd Shāh. Firīšta's statement that this king's name was Maḥmūd has misled all European historians, but is refuted by inscriptions, legends on coins, and other historians.

Muḥammad II was a man of peace, devoted to literature and poetry, and his reign was undisturbed by foreign wars. He invited Ḥāfiẓ to visit his court, and the great poet set out from Shīrāz in response to the invitation, but was so terrified by a storm in the Persian Gulf that he disembarked and returned to Shīrāz, whence he sent to Muḥammad his excuses in a well known ode.

Between 1387 and 1395 the Dakan was visited by a severe famine, and the king's measures of relief included the free importation of grain, the establishment of schools at which children were taught, fed, and lodged at the public expense, and special allowances to readers of the Qur'an and the blind, but only those of his own faith profited by his benefactions. He died of a fever on April 20, 1397, and was succeeded by his elder son, Ghiyāth al-Din.

MUHAMMAD III, LASHKARĪ, the thirteenth king of the Bahmanī dynasty of the Dakan, was the younger son of Humāyūn Shāh, and succeeded his elder brother, Nizām Shāh, on July 30, 1463, at the age of nine. His minister was the famous Maḥmūd Gāwān, Malik al-Tudjīdār, Khwādja Djahān. A campaign against Mālwa in 1467 was unsuccessful, but between 1469 and 1471 Maḥmūd Gāwān conquered the southern Konkan. In 1472 Malik Hasan Bahri, Nizām al-Mulk, a Brāhman who had been captured in Viḍjayanagar and educated as a Muslim, led a successful expedition into southern Uṛiṣa and was rewarded with the government of Telingāna. Faṭḥ Allāh 'Imād al-Mulk, another Brāhman with a similar history, was made governor of Barār, and Yūsuf 'Adil Khān, a Turk, was appointed to Dawlatābād. In the same year Muḥammad captured the fortresses of Bankapūr and Balgānw, and his conduct at the siege of the latter earned for him the title of Lashkari, "the Soldier". In 1474 the Dakan suffered severely from a famine which lasted for two years, and in 1476 a rebellion in Kondawir led the king into Telingāna. He relieved Malik Hasan, who had been besieged in Rādjamahendri, invaded Uṛiṣa and punished the rādjā, who had supported the rebels, and on his return, in 1478, captured Kondawir and assumed the title of Ghāzī.

He then set out to invade the eastern Karnātak, but first divided the great province of Telingāna into two governments, mortally offending Malik Hasan, the governor. The partition was part of a scheme, devised by Maḥmūd Gāwān, to be applied to all the provinces of the kingdom.

Muḥammad made Kondapalli, in the Karnātak, his headquarters, and returned thither after carrying out a daring raid to Kāndjeveram. From Kondapalli he issued an edict dividing the other three provinces of his kingdom, Barār, Dawlatābād, and Gulbarga each into two governments. The measure was intensely unpopular, but it was only the vindictive Malik Hasan that actively resented it. He regarded Maḥmūd Gāwān as the author of all the unpopular reforms, and by means of a forged letter persuaded the young king that his minister was in league with the foreign enemies of the state. Muḥammad, when under the influence of drink, summoned his faithful minister, and on April 5, 1481, without any inquiry into the circumstances of the case, caused his head to be struck off. Maḥmūd's innocence was established immediately after his death, and from the day of his unjust execution may be dated the collapse of the authority of the Bahmanī kings. Of the two parties in the state all the foreigners, led by Yūsuf 'Adil Khān, who established himself in Bidjāpūr, and the respectable portion of the Dakanis, led by Faṭḥ Allāh 'Imād al-Mulk of Barār, avoided intercourse with the king, who was thrown into the arms of the assassins, led by Malik Hasan. The amirs accompanied Muḥammad to Bidar and subsequently on an expedition to Balgānw, but encamped apart from the royal troops, and always saluted the king from a distance, refusing to enter his presence. Muḥammad attempted to drown his grief and humiliation in drink, from the effects of which he died at Bidar on March 22, 1482, crying out in his last moments that Maḥmūd Gāwān was slaying him. He was succeeded by his son Maḥmūd, who was never a king but in name.

MUHAMMAD B. 'ABBĀS [See KADJAR.]

MUHAMMAD B. 'ABD ALLĀH, great-grandson of Hasan, the eldest son of 'Alī and Fātima, was one of the 'Alids who did not spend their time passively awaiting the fulfilment of their aspirations, but endeavoured to realise them by personal effort. He and his brother Ibrāhīm had, according to Wāqidi, been brought up as future rulers and Muḥammad was called al-Mahdī by his father. As early as the reign of the Umayyad caliph Hishām, the two sectarians al-Mughīra [q. v.] and Bayān [q. v.] who did not recognise Muḥammad b. 'Alī al-Bākīr [q. v.] endeavoured to make propaganda for him. When signs of the imminent collapse of Umayyad rule became apparent after Walid's death, 'Abd Allāh's family by his command paid homage to Muḥammad with the exception of al-Bākīr's son Dja'far. Wider circles also recognised him as the legitimate heir, including the Mu'tazilis, who in those days had a distinctly ascetic character. Abū Dja'far, later the 'Abbāsīd caliph, was at this time attached to this school and it is several times recorded that he was among those who paid homage to Muḥammad. This is in itself by no means improbable and well explains his hostile attitude to him, although it remains remarkable that Muḥammad later nowhere, even in his polemical letters to him, refers to this important fact. The Umayyad governor Ibn Hubaira also thought of joining him when he was besieged in Wāsiṭ in 132 (750) but dropped the matter when he received no answer to his letter.

When finally the 'Abbāsīd Abū 'l-'Abbās in the same year won the caliphate and ousted the 'Alids, the two brothers disappeared and showed thereby that they would not recognise him. There now began for them a period full of adventure and danger, especially after Abū Dja'far became caliph in 136 (754). They went secretly from place to place to gain adherents; nowhere could they feel safe from the caliph but the people were on the whole favourably disposed to them and at least would not betray them. In this way they reached not only Basra and Kūfa but even went as far as al-Sind via 'Aden; as a rule however, they stayed in Arabia, most securely among the Djahāna, in whose territory lay the hill of Raḍwa, which so often appears in the history of the 'Alids. The caliph was very uneasy at the continued lack of success of his search for them; more and more angrily he demanded of his governors in Medina that they should be produced and he dismissed several in rapid succession, when they appeared, perhaps not without reason, ineffective and lukewarm in their efforts. He himself took very active steps but with as little result. On his pilgrimage in 140 (758) he had Muḥammad and Ibrāhīm's father thrown into prison because they would not betray their place of concealment, and on a later pilgrimage (144 = 762) the same fate met the sons and grandsons of Hasan, 'Abd Allāh's brother. They and 'Abd Allāh were taken to Kūfa, treated most brutally and thrown into prison, where most of them died. The same thing happened to Ibrāhīm's father-in-law Muḥammad b. ʿAbd Allāh, a descendant of ʿUthmān, whose head the caliph sent to Khurāsān with a certificate on oath that it was the head of the ʿAlid Muḥammad in order to intimidate his followers there. Shortly before (Dec. 761), he finally found a governor after his own heart, Riyāḥ b. ʿUthmān, who conducted the search with the necessary vigour. But he was soon able to save himself the trouble for in Radjab 145 (Nov. 762) Muḥammad appeared in Medina and began the revolution while his brother Ibrāhīm went to Baṣra to do the same. It is not clear whether they did this because in Muḥammad's opinion the time was ripe or whether they were forced by circumstances to hasten their plans. In any case, the enterprise was not sufficiently prepared, for although they had a large number of followers in Kūfa, Baṣra, Egypt, where however Muḥammad's son ʿAlī was arrested by the ʿAbbāsīd governor, in Khurāsān and even in Sind, to which another son ʿAbd Allāh al-Ashtar was sent, there was no question of any organisation, and, as so frequently, the enthusiasm for the ʿAlids was like a fire of straw which blazes up quickly but dies down as soon. In Medina where Riyāḥ was completely taken by surprise, Muḥammad in keeping with his character acted with great mildness; he opened the prison, forbade all bloodshed and was content with arresting Riyāḥ. The best elements in the town came over to him after the jurist Mālik b. Anas declared invalid his oath taken to the ʿAbbāsīds; Mecca also surrendered to the new ruler. The outbreak of the revolt was really a relief to Abū Djaʿfar for he had now, as he said, enticed the fox out of his hole. He hurriedly left Baghdad, with the building of which he was busy, and went to Kūfa, the point of danger. With keen instinct he saw that the weak point of the rebellion lay in Medina which must be attacked first, for in this remote spot there was a lack of materials of war and the roads thither could easily be barred. But he first of all offered a complete amnesty to Muḥammad, which however only led to a characteristic exchange of letters, in which one reproached the other with the weaknesses of his family. He then sent his relative ʿIsā b. Mūsā against him with 4,000 men, with instructions however to settle the matter peacefully if possible. His arrival had a sobering effect upon the Medinese, of whom a number seized the opportunity to get out of their difficult position. Muḥammad however remained undismayed. He rejected the well meant advice of several men to abandon Medina as an insult to the town but left his people free to stay with him or not. He trusted in Allāh "from whom victory comes and in whose hand the matter lies", and imitated all that the Prophet had done in his time in romantic fashion. For example he restored the ditch which the Prophet had dug round Medina when it was besieged by the Kuraish; he used Muḥammad's sword and his battle-cry was the same as that at the battle of Hunain; even the old single combat before the battle proper was revived. The result in these circumstances was easily foreseen. ʿIsā, after offering a free pardon in vain for a few days, laid a few doors over the ditch, entered the town and began a battle in which Muḥammad's supporters became less and less in numbers until their leader finally fell (Monday, 14th Ramaḍān 145 = Dec. 6, 762). Muḥammad's head was cut off and sent to the caliph. For the further course of the rebellion see the article IBRAHĪM B. ʿABD ALLĀH.

Muḥammad is described as tall and strong with a very dark skin, on which account the caliph sardonically called him al-Muḥammam, the "Blackened". He was rightly called "the pure soul" (Ṭabarī, iii. 200) for he was an ideal character, gentle in spite of his personal bravery, but he lacked those qualities which are required of a pretender in times like his.

MUḤAMMAD B. ʿABD ALLĀH, a Ṭāhirid, governor of Baghdād. Born in 209 (824—825) Muḥammad in 237 (851) was summoned by the Caliph to Baghdād and appointed military governor in order to restore order in the chaos then prevailing. In spite of the great power of the Ṭāhirids, who ruled Khurāsān as independent sovereigns in practice, although they nominally recognised the suzerainty of the Caliph, his task was by no means a light one. After al-Mustaʿīn had ascended the throne (248 = 862), he confirmed Muḥammad in his office and also gave him the governorship of the ʿIrāq along with the two holy cities of Mecca and Medina. In the following year troubles broke out in Baghdād and Sāmarrā. The Arabs were defeated by the Byzantines and the rage of the people was turned against the Caliph. The vizier Uṭamīsh however finally succeeded in restoring order with the help of the two Turkish generals Waṣīf and Bogha the Younger. The ʿAlids also gave the government trouble on several occasions. A descendant of ʿAlī named Yaḥyā b. ʿOmar rebelled in Kūfa and drove out the governor of the town. After he had routed an army sent against him by Muḥammad, he was attacked by the ʿAbbāsīd general al-Ḥusain b. Ismāʿīl while another division took him in the rear and he finally fell in the battle (Radjab 250 = Aug. 864). Another ʿAlid, al-Ḥasan b. Zaid, had more success. Two prominent men in Ṭabaristān, who were dissatisfied with the rule of the Ṭāhirids, appealed to him in 250 and very soon he was acknowledged as lord of the whole of Ṭabaristān. The Ṭāhirid governors of al-Raiy and Qazwīn were driven out and replaced by ʿAlids; Muḥammad b. Ṭāhir, governor of Khurāsān, a nephew of the governor of Baghdād, then sent an army against al-Raiy. The ʿAlid governor was defeated and captured and the town had to surrender, but again fell into the hand of the ʿAlids. When the former governor of Ṭabaristān, Sulaimān b. ʿAbd Allāh, invaded this province and conquered it completely, al-Ḥasan b. Zaid had to flee to Dailam where he was defeated by Muḥammad b. Ṭāhir (351 = 865—866); after some years (257 = 870—871) however, he inflicted a defeat on the latter's troops in Djurdjān and in 259 (872—873) he again became lord of Khurāsān, where he founded an ʿAlid dynasty which lasted about sixty years. Arabia also did not escape the 'Alid plots. A descendant of 'Alī named Ismā'il b. Yūsuf raised trouble there in 251 (865), plundered Mecca and Medina and killed so many pilgrims that he received the epithet of al-Saffāk, "the Bloodshedder". There was also continual trouble in the capital. In Muḥarram of the same year (= Feb. 865), al-Musta'in left Sāmarrā and went to Baghdād. Al-Mu'tazz [q. v.] was then taken by force from his prison in Sāmarrā and proclaimed Caliph; he then appointed his brother Abū Aḥmad, later co-regent with the Caliph al-Mu'tamid, commander-in-chief in the war against al-Musta'in and his governor. When all negotiations failed, the latter had to take to arms but was several times defeated. Fighting took place in and around Baghdād with varying success during almost the whole year, while anarchy in the provinces increased and when Muḥammad finally began negotiations with Abū Aḥmad, he was accused of treason, so that the Caliph had to protect him against the troops who were furious with him. But when Muḥammad's friends told him that al-Musta'in intended to sacrifice himself, he made peace with Abū Aḥmad. The Caliph had reluctantly to confirm the treaty and abdicate in favour of his rival al-Mu'tazz (Dhu 'l-Hijja 251 = Jan. 866) and the latter thereupon ascended the throne. Muḥammad died in Dhu 'l-Ka'da 253 (Nov. 867).

MUḤAMMAD B. 'ABD ALLĀH ḤASSAN AL-MAḤDĪ, the well known Somali Mahdī called by the British "the Mad Mullah". He was a Somali belonging to the Ogadēn Bah Geri tribe, section Rēr Ḥamar. He was born about 1860 A. D. and had been from his youth devoted to religious and mystic studies; in 1895 A. D. he performed the pilgrimage and during his stay in Mecca became acquainted with Saiyid Muḥammad Ṣāliḥ [cf. SOMALILAND] of whom he became an eager follower. After his return to Somaliland he first settled in the Dūlbahanta tribe's territory and began a vigorous propaganda on behalf of the Ṣāliḥiyya ṭarīqa and to call Somali Muslims to a more strict rule of life. As he was a learned, eloquent man and a skilful impromptu composer of poems (the ancient and best way to propagate one's ideas among the Somali Beduins), he was easily able to attain a great popularity among the Dūlbahanta in British Somaliland and his Ogadēn countrymen in Abyssinia. His influence brought him to the knowledge of the government of Berbera, and British officials had sometimes recourse to him to settle through his mediation disputes arising between Beduin groups. In March 1899 however, the Mullah suddenly changed his former attitude to an openly hostile one towards the British Government. In August 1899 he assembled his followers in Bura'o and declared himself to be the Mahdī and proclaimed the holy war against the infidels. A first expedition was sent against him by the Abyssinians to prevent a further extension of the rebellion in Ogadēn; but Grāzmāč Bānti, the leader of this force, retired to Harar after a violent pillaging razzia led by him against the Rēr 'Alī, an Ogadēn tribe. In 1901 Colonel Swayne drove back the Mullah as far as the boundaries of Italian Northern Somaliland and defeated him at Farḍiddīn on July 16, 1901. A second British expedition in 1902 won another victory in the fight at Ēragō on October 6, 1902. In 1903 it was decided to send against the Mullah a great expedition in three columns: a British one departing from Hōbya according to a British-Italian agreement concluded in the same year to that effect; another British column departing from Berbera; and a third, an Abyssinian force departing from Harar. The British forces were placed under the command of General Manning. But the first column fell into an ambush and was defeated by the Mullah at Gumburi on April 17, 1903; the second column suffered heavy losses in a fierce fight at Daratola on April 22, 1903; the Abyssinian column made only, as usual, a razzia against Ogadēn groups in the valley of the Shabēlla. In 1904 a fourth British expedition defeated the Mullah at Dīdbālī on January 9, 1904 and again, after the landing of a naval force on the shore of the Indian Ocean, at Ilig in Italian territory on April 21, 1904. In the meantime, Saiyid Muḥammad Ṣāliḥ on the invitation of the British and Italian Governments had directed a letter to the most influential Muslim learned men in Somaliland, which contained a declaration against the Mullah, who was said to have violated the rules of the Ṣāliḥiyya ṭarīqa and thus to have become worthy of the curses of the true followers of the Ṣāliḥiyya. The victories of the British, however, as they could not be followed up by a permanent occupation of the interior, had not been sufficient to subdue the rebellion. It was therefore attempted to conclude an Anglo-Italian agreement with the Mullah and this was carried through by offering to the Mullah the concession of the Italian portion of the Nūgāl valley with Ilig as his seat. The Mullah subscribed to these conditions in Ilig on March 5, 1905; but added to his signature the clause "wa 'l-kunṣil ya'rifu ḥālī" (and the Consul knows my condition), which was explained in Europe as meaning a close trust in the Consul, but otherwise in Somaliland, as he (the Mullah) was a Sūfī, and therefore by no means obliged to execute any arrangement he might have concluded with infidels on account of temporary political conditions. In January 1908 the Mullah actually began again to lead razzias against British and Italian subjects. No great expedition was however sent against him by the British, who even retired from the interior of their colony; a Camel Constabulary Corps was raised as a mobile force to be employed in raids and swift operations against the Mullah's parties. But after many successful and gallant raids the Camel Constabulary Corps was met by an overwhelming enemy force at Dulma-dōba on August 9, 1913 and the Commandant of the Corps, Sir Richard Corfield, was killed in the fight. In the meantime, the Italians had almost entirely occupied the interior of Southern Somaliland through a very successful policy, which avoided any considerable military action; in this way they brought about in Northern Somaliland the subjection of the two Sultāns (the Sultān of the Madjertēn and the Sultān of Hōbya) to the Italian Government, and further they organised the Sultān's forces to employ them against the Mullah, thus assuring the defence of the northern frontier of their colony. There then began a series of raids led by Somali auxiliary bands, especially against the Mullah's followers in the northern valley of the Shabēlla and towards Nūgāl, where Djirriban and Gar'ad were occupied by the Sultān of Hobyā. These energetic actions which took place even during the Great European war, besides wearing down the Mullah's army, caused him to lose political control of a very large zone where the population concluded peaceful agreements with Italy and forced him to be continually ready to defend his territory from the south also. However, after the end of the Great War, the British Government decided to attack the Mullah from Berbera and to finally overthrow him. In January-March 1920 after violent bombardments of the Mullah's defences by the British airmen, a British force advanced to Talēh, the Mullah's last camp; he, rapidly pursued by the Camel Corps and Somali auxiliaries, fled to Ogadēn and then into the Karanlā tribe's territory, where he died on November 23, 1920.

The Mullah's career is a very typical one for the study of the Somali mind. He had begun his movement as an agent of the Ṣālihiya ṭarīka, then his increasing popularity tempted him to a more ambitious sphere and, accordingly, after placing his propaganda on a severely religious basis, he tried to become the leader of all the Somali by making the ties of the common faith prevail over the tribal bonds. This is really the only way to lead such a movement in Somaliland where Islām may be regarded as a tie of brotherhood among tribes otherwise deeply divided by their secular history of wars and revenge. Therefore Muḥammad b. 'Abd Allāh Ḥassān said in a famous poem: "Have I not put my prayer-mat on this sea to join together the Muslims who were not brothers?" alluding also to his relations with the Ṣālihiya in Arabia. He desired for the same reason that his followers should call themselves "Darāwish", forgetting even the name of their original tribe. Therefore he affected to become angry when he was referred to in official correspondence as "Muḥammad 'Abd Allāh, the Ogadēn Bah Geri" while he used to add to his signature only the nisba: al-Ḥāshimī (alluding to the origin of the Somali from 'Aqīl b. Abi Ṭālib [see the art. SOMALILAND]).

Further, instead of the tribal forces he raised special armed corps, often with a new name, like the Ḥagattu ("the scratchers") recruited among the Habar Gidir, the Dūgād recruited among the Mikāhīl ("Dūgād" means "shooter"), the Kaīyād recruited among the Dūlbahanta. But he did not pursue this policy to the end: the hostility of the greater part of the Isāk tribes, which was a strong appeal to the old rivalry between Isāk and Dārōd; Muḥammad Ṣāliḥ's letter, which was undoubtedly a severe blow to him, since he had already provoked the hostility of the Qādiriya and so had to rely entirely on Ṣālihiya support; the necessity of getting booty for his soldiers who otherwise would have hardly remained with him; all these things and his very nature caused the religious prestige of the Mullah as the Mahdī of Somaliland to decline and he gradually became merely the chief of a tribe; a powerful chief indeed of a large tribe as the Darāwish were, formed from various elements and therefore very similar to the federations well known in the Somali customary law. It was obvious that, when he began to regard himself in this light (that is regarding himself as a chief of a Somali tribe rather than "the brother born from the same father and the same mother of all the Muslims"), it was very difficult for him to restrain himself and his followers from exaggerating those tendencies so familiar to their own national character; and therefore they came back gradually to the ancient Somali custom of guerrilla warfare conducted in the traditional way, even to defying the tribes of the enemy in insulting or scornful poems or designating them with typical ironical nicknames or giving to every razzia a special name ("the razzia smashing the bones" was the name given to the fight at Dulmadōba; cf. the Aiyām al-'Arab).

It may therefore be concluded that the Mullah's attempt to avail himself of Islām to conquer the old rivalries between the tribes and combine the Somali to drive the Europeans out of the country, failed both on account of the strength of the European armies and the fierce resistance, often unconscious, opposed by the Somali on behalf of their ancient tribal organisation and customary law.

MUḤAMMAD B. 'ABD AL-MALIK, ABŪ DJA'FAR, called Ibn al-Zaiyāt, vizier to several 'Abbasids. Ibn al-Zaiyāt began his career as secretary in the chancellery in Baghdad and when the caliph al-Mu'taṣim noticed his ability and learning he appointed him his vizier (219—220 = 834—835). He also filled this office in the reign of al-Wāthiq; but as he treated the latter's brother Dja'far, the future caliph al-Mutawakkil, with a lack of respect he earned his hatred. After the death of al-Wāthiq in Dhū 'l-Hijja 232 (Aug. 847), Ibn al-Zaiyāt wished homage to be paid to his son Muḥammad; the latter, however, was thought to be too young by the Turkish general Waṣīf and in his stead Dja'far was proclaimed caliph under the name al-Mutawakkil. The vizier was at first allowed to remain in office but in Ṣafar of the following year (Sept. 847), he was arrested, deprived of his possessions and subjected to a cruel form of torture which he himself had invented. After enduring the most horrible cruelty he died in Rabī' I 233 (Nov. 847).

MUḤAMMAD, a son of Abū Bakr and one of his wives, Asmā' of the tribe of Khath'am. He was born in the last year of Muḥammad's life so that his father could not have exercised any influence on him, while the memories of Abū Bakr's great friend which were kept alive in his family must have had all the more influence on the passionate nature of the boy, which receives important confirmation from the fact that Ibn Kūtaiba describes him as one of the "pious" (nussāk) among the Quraysh. When in the reign of 'Uthmān the bitterness at the preference of the Umayyads in combination with a reaction against the strong secularisation of Islām provoked a movement which grew in strength, he took part in it with great vigour and began along with 'Uthmān's ungrateful foster-son Muḥammad b. Abī Hudhaifa to stir up the people of Egypt against the Caliph. He later went with other revolutionaries to Medina where his equally ardent but much wiser half-sister 'Ā'isha in vain advised him to go with her to Mecca and leave others to carry through the crime; but he was one of those who broke into the Caliph's room where he ill-treated the helpless old man although it was Kinānā b. Bishr who dealt the death-blow. He was one of the few Quraysh who joined 'Alī and the latter apparently cherished a real affection for the young man, which his enemies of course interpreted as further evidence of his friendship with the murderers of 'Uthmān. Muḥammad took part in the battle of the Camel, at the conclusion of which the chivalrous 'Alī commissioned him to escort his half-sister to Baṣra. The sources give somewhat different accounts of the last phase of his life in Egypt. According to Wākidi in Balādhuri, Abū Mikhnaḥ (Ṭabari, i. 3392 sq.) and Ya'kūbī, 'Alī at once appointed him governor of Egypt after unwisely recalling Kais b. Sa'd; but as he soon discovered how foolish it was to appoint a youth inexperienced in war to this difficult post, he sent for his ablest follower al-Ashtar [q. v.] and gave him command in Egypt while he appeased Muḥammad's rightly injured feelings by a kind letter. The attempt to make good the mistake failed, however, for al-Ashtar was poisoned on the way in al-Ḳulzum at the instigation of Mu'āwiya. Al-Zuhri's account (Ṭabari, i. 3242) shows 'Alī in a somewhat more favourable light. After the recall of Kais he sent al-Ashtar as governor to Egypt and only after he was poisoned did he send Muḥammad. Finally there is a third story (Ibn al-Kalbī and Mas'ūdi) according to which al-Ashtar was sent to Egypt only after the death of Muḥammad, but this must be due to some misunderstanding of the first version. In any case, the choice of Muḥammad was an unfortunate one, for the inexperienced youth, who had no authority and was besides insufficiently supported by 'Alī, was not fit to meet experienced opponents like Mu'āwiya and 'Amr b. al-'Āṣī, as anyone but 'Alī would have seen. 'Amr b. al-'Āṣī came with an army and a battle was fought at al-Musannāt (the dam). When the actual murderer of 'Uthmān, Kinānā b. Bishr, had fallen after a brave resistance, the Egyptians lost heart and Muḥammad, abandoned by all, was captured and killed while trying to escape (38 = 658).

MUḤAMMAD B. ABI 'L-SĀDJ ABŪ 'UBAID ALLĀH, son of Abū 'L-Sādj Diwdād, an Eastern Iranian (not Turkish) noble from Ushrūsana in Ma-warā' al-Nahr (see Barthold, Turkestan, G. M. S., p. 169). For his early career see the article SĀDJIDS. After his rupture with Khumārawaih he returned to Baghdād (276 = 889) and appears to have remained there (cf. Ṭabari, iii. 2122) until his appointment as governor of Ādharbāidjān in 279 (892). Though on his arrival he had entertained friendly relations with the Bagratid king of Armenia, Sembat (acc. 891), after seizing Marāgha in 280 (893) he made a first incursion into Armenia, but without success. At the same time he had strengthened his position at Baghdād by giving his daughter in marriage to al-Mu'taḍid's confidant, the general Badr al-Mu'taḍidī. Having been rejoined by his khādim, the general Waṣīf, who had defeated the Dulafid 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz in al-Dijbāl in 281 (894—895) but did not succeed in annexing his territory, he made a second expedition into Armenia in 282—283 (895—896) and captured Kars, Dwin and Waspurakan. Subsequently he came to terms with Sembat, but his son Diwdād remained as governor of Dwin until Muḥammad's death. In 284 (897—898) Muḥammad declared his independence, but finding himself unable to withstand al-Mu'taḍid made prompt submission, was pardoned, and in the following year officially recognized as governor of Armenia in addition to Ādharbāidjān. About the same time he appears to have adopted the title of al-Afshīn, which appears on his coinage, and which was evidently intended as a claim to descent from the old princely family of Ushrūsana (see the article AFSHĪN and Justi, Iran. Namenbuch, s. v. Pišina). In 287 (900) he made a further indirect attempt to extend his rule over the territories which were slipping from the grasp of the Ṭūlunids by encouraging Waṣīf to seize Malatya and to apply to the caliph for investiture with the government of Cilicia. Al-Mu'taḍid, however, learning that this was only a preliminary step towards the seizure of Diyār Muḍar by Waṣīf and al-Afshīn, put an end to their design by a swift and unexpected campaign against Waṣīf, who was himself captured. Al-Afshīn died a few months later (Rabī' 1, 288 = March 901) at Bardha'a.

MUḤAMMAD B. 'ALĪ, a grandson of Husain the son of 'Alī; his kunya was Abū Dja'far. On account of his learning he was given the honorific name of al-Bākīr (the investigator, who goes deeply into things). He was a recognised authority on Tradition and a number of pious utterances are also recorded of him; he had at the same time the characteristic fondness of his family for embroidered silk garments and colours. That he did not escape the usual fate of his family of being celebrated by a section of the Shī'is as an imām is shown by a poem of the 'Idjlī Abū Huraira; but he lived contentedly in Medina and apparently played no part in politics although he was treated, for example by 'Umar II, with respect. He was expressly disowned by extreme Shī'is like al-Mughīra and Bayān. When the party which had hitherto paid homage to his brother Zaid, abandoned the latter, they transferred his privileges to him, or rather, since he was dead, to his son Dja'far [cf. DJA'FAR B. MUḤAMMAD]. The reason of the breach is said to have been that Zaid would not insult the memory of the two first Caliphs as his followers demanded but this does not agree very well with the fact that Muḥammad in Ibn Sa'd's obviously much retouched account emphatically declares his fondness for Abū Bakr and 'Umar. The date of his death is variously given as 114, 117 or 118 A.H.

MUḤAMMAD B. 'ALĪ AL-RIDĀ, ninth imām of the Twelver Shī'a, was born in Ramaḍān 195 (June 811) in Medina. As, according to Abū 'l-Faraḍj al-Isfahānī, Maḳātil al-Ṭalibiyin (Teheran 1307), p. 195, 18, he was of negroid appearance, it may be true that his mother, a slave-woman, variously called Sabika, Durra and Khair-zurān, was a Nubian; to give her an honourable pedigree it was added "of the family of Maria the Copt". When al-Ma'mūn attached 'Alī al-Ridā to his court, he married the boy to one of his daughters, Umm al-Faḍl, who was taken to him in 215 (830). Al-Mu'tasim on his accession summoned him to Baghdād. He arrived there at the beginning of 220, but was dead already by Dhu 'l-Ḳa'da (Nov. 835). According to the Shī'is and in keeping with their scheme of martyrdom, he was poisoned at the instigation of al-Mu'tasim by Umm al-Faḍl who remained childless; but even the already mentioned Maḳātil, which record every murder of an 'Alid, know nothing of this. This Muḥammad is, generally speaking, only occasionally mentioned outside the Shī'a, along with his father, e.g. in Ibn Wāḍih al-Ya'qūbī, Ta'rikh, ed. Houtsma (Leyden 1883), ii. 552 and in Tabarī, Annales, iii. 1029, 1102; according to al-Mas'ūdi, Murūdj al-Dhahab (Paris 1861 sqq.), vii. 117, Muḥammad died in 219, according to vii. 171 not till the reign of al-Wāḥik, i.e. after 227. Even within the Shī'a, his role is quite a passive one. After his father's tragic end, those with Zaidi views who had hoped some day with him as Caliph to put into force their activist 'Alid political programme, went their own ways again, while of those who held Imāmī views, one group, as usual in such a case, became "standfast" Wāḳifiya and another chose Aḥmad, a brother of al-Ridā, as Imām; for Muḥammad was only seven at the time. For those who remained faithful to him, there arose in the Shurūf al-Imāna the question of the child Imām's knowledge. The case was repeated with the following three Imāms. But the authority to teach was in the hands of men whose activity extended through several imāmates; with Maḍjlisī (s. Bibl.), xii. 125 infra cf. Mirzā Muḥammad al-Asterābādī, Manhaj al-Maḳāl (Teheran 1306), p. 217; Abū 'Amr al-Kashshī, Ma'rifat Akhbār al-Ridā (Bombay 1317), p. 353 sq., 374 sq.; Tūsi, Fihrist Kutub al-Shī'a (Bibl. Ind., No. 60), No. 124, 150, p. 289, note 1. The gradual development of the dogma in question, which is associated with the child Jesus teaching in Sūra xix. 30 sqq., is not quite clear, as regards its apportionment to the various Imāms. Heresiographers including al-Nawbakhtī, Firaḳ al-Shī'a (Bibl. Isl., No. 4), p. 74 sqq., quote the doctrines anonymously. Besides, there is the confusion of names (which has also entered European indices); for Muḥammad b. 'Alī was also the name of one of his grandchildren, who died before his father, the 10th Imām 'Alī al-Naḳī, but left issue; his adherents continued the imāmate further than the Twelvers through these children, while they deny the existence of the twelfth Imām Muḥammad al-Mahdī as son of his brother, the eleventh Imām Ḥasan al-'Askarī. Shī'a works avoid confusion by giving the ninth Imām the kunya Abū Dja'far al-Thānī; his official title is al-Taḳī, "the God-fearing"; a common epithet is al-Djāwād, "the liberal": he is said to have paid his father's debts. As wakil or bāb, he had, like al-Ridā before him, 'Uthmān b. Sa'īd al-'Amrī, called Sammān or Zaiyāt. Among the usual miracles of the Imāms, Abū Dja'far al-Ṣaffār (d. 290) in Baṣā'ir al-Daradījal (in Maḍjlisī, xii. 108) relates that the ninth Imām carried a worshipper at night from Syria to the holy sites of Kerbelā', Kūfa and Medina as well as to Mecca. The fact that his memory has been kept so green to the present day is due to the fact that he was buried beside the tomb of his grandfather, the seventh Imām, Musā al-Kāzīm [q.v.]; thus arose the double Meshhed al-Kāzīmāin.

MUḤAMMAD B. AL-ḤANAFĪYA, a son of 'Alī and Khawla, a woman of the tribe of the Banū Ḥanifa, who had been brought a prisoner to Medina after the battle of 'Akrabā' [q. v.] and came into 'Alī's possession (cf. Saiyid's poem Kitāb al-Aghānī, vii. 4: "she was a servant in the house"); he was born in 16 A. H. Although he did not, like Ḥasan and Ḥusain, have the blood of the Prophet in his veins, he became involved not only in the political turmoils but also in the schemes which the boundless fancies of the extreme Shī'īs built up around the family of 'Alī. He was not to blame for this, for he was of a retiring disposition and acted very cautiously. But when Ḥasan had sold his rights and Ḥusain had fallen at Kerbelā' in 680, many turned their eyes to him as the natural head of the family. This aroused the suspicion of 'Abd Allāh b. Zubair who, after the death of Ḥusain, appeared more and more openly as a pretender; the fact that MuḤammad had no sympathy with the efforts of the opposition in the Hīdjāz is evident from the interesting statement of Balādhūri that he definitely declared the accusations brought against the Caliph Yazīd I by the Medinese to be false. The matter only became serious when the adventurer Mukhtār [q. v.] after several vain efforts to get others to join him stirred up a movement on a large scale in the 'Irāq in 66 (685), as champion of MuḤammad's rights. Even now MuḤammad acted with great restraint and declined the significant title "al-Mahdī" with which they wished to greet him (cf. Ṭabarī, ii. 610 and Ibn Sa'd, v. 68, which has certainly been misinterpreted by Lammens). He obviously did not care for Mukhtār at all, and he had every reason to doubt the genuineness of his enthusiasm for him; but in view of the many dangers which surrounded him and probably also from a want of decision he did not wish to break with him openly. Therefore when some people came to him from Kūfa to clear up his attitude to Mukhtār, he only gave them a diplomatic answer which was non-committal (cf. the somewhat different versions: Ibn Sa'd, v. 72; Ya'qūbī, ii. 308; Ṭabarī, ii. 607 and thereon Kāmil, p. 598) but which they interpreted as a kind of approval, as it did not definitely disown him. As a result the revolutionary movement spread in extent and much blood was shed to avenge Ḥusain and other 'Alids. MuḤammad was against this also (cf. Ibn Sa'd, v. 72 sq., 77); but when Ibn Zubair's attitude became more and more hostile and he finally imprisoned MuḤammad and several relatives, including 'Abd Allāh b. 'Abbās, at Mecca near the Zemzem well, he saw nothing else for it but to appeal for help to Mukhtār. This was what the latter wanted and he sent a body of cavalry at once to Mecca and released MuḤammad and the other prisoners in the nick of time but by the latter's express orders avoided conflict with Ibn Zubair's troops, as the town was not to be desecrated by bloodshed. MuḤammad then sought shelter with his family at Minā (cf. Kāmil, p. 554, 597; Kitāb al-Aghānī, viii. 33; Kumait, ed. Horowitz, i. 78) and later went to Ṭā'if. He made no further use of Mukhtār and was therefore not compromised when the revolution failed and his champion fell in 67 (686—687). In spite of the threats of Ibn Zubair and the demands couched in more friendly language of 'Abd al-Malik and although a safe place of residence was granted him neither in Hīdjāz nor in Syria, he defined his attitude by paying homage to neither of the two pretenders and adhered to the principle that he would only recognize a ruler around whom the Muslim community were united. He therefore appeared in the noteworthy pilgrimage of the year 688 along with the Zubairids, Umayyads and Khāridjīs, as an independent head of a party, although only under an armed neutrality. Only when, after the fall of Ibn Zubair (73 = 692), the unanimity of the vox populi which he had demanded, became a reality, did he finally recognise the Marwānīd as the legitimate ruler and visited him in 78 (697—698) at Damascus. He returned however to Medina, where he died in 81 (700—701). His strict passivity in the political field is always attributed to purely religious motives in the traditions; not human force but Allāh's help alone should assist 'Alī's family to their rights; but there is no doubt that a further reason was his lack of enterprise and self-confidence, a trait common to a number of 'Alids. That, like his whole family, he at the same time liked the good things of this world is evident from the heavy demands which he sent to 'Abd al-Malik for the payment of his debts and annual pensions for his children, relatives and clients; there is also evidence that he had the family fondness for fine clothes and cosmetics. It is all the more remarkable then that the more fanciful and extravagant school of Shī'īs seized upon him at once after his death and spread the belief that he was not dead but lived in a kind of fairy kingdom on the hill of Radwā west of Medina, whence he would return as the victorious leader of an army (cf. Kitāb al-Aghānī, vii. 4 sq., 9 sq.; viii. 32). This was the idea of raḍī'a which 'Abd Allāh b. Sabā [q. v.] had associated with 'Alī (cf. Friedländer, in Z.A., xxiii. 309 sqq.) and which was now transferred to him; and in fact it was now easier to bring him into the forefront than it had been while he maintained an attitude of stubborn passive resistance in his lifetime.

MUHAMMAD B. HUSAIN, an Ottoman dignitary and historian, who at the request of the first Wālī of Baghdad, Derwīsh Mehmed Pasha (Thuraiyā, Sidjill-i 'othmānī, ii. 33), translated into Turkish the history of 'Alī b. Shihāb Hamadhānī, written in 10 bāb in Persian; he added two bāb to it and gave it the title Tuhfat al-Ma'mūn. The work only exists in manuscript.

The MUHAMMAD KHALIFA (محمد خلیفہ کنہکار), who was a dignitary of the court and flourished under three sultāns (Murād IV, 1032—1049 = 1623—1640, Ibrāhīm, 1049—1058 = 1640—1648, and Mehmed IV, 1058—1099 = 1648—1687), was not identical with him. He wrote a chronicle of his time entitled Ta'rikh-i Ghilmānī which covered the years 1060—1075 = 1650—1665. The work which consists of 3 bābs and a khātima (of which the second bāb contains two and the third 13 faṣl) was published by Aḥmad Rafīk as supplement 11 to T.O.E.M., parts 78—83, Istanbul 1340 (1924).

A certain Muhammad Khalifa b. Husain is perhaps the same person; he also was a dignitary of the court of the same three sultāns and wrote a history of his time which covered the years 1043—1070 (1633—1659). The only known manuscript is in Vienna.

MUHAMMAD B. IBRĀHĪM 'ĀDIL SHĀH (1035—1070 = 1626—1660) succeeded to the throne of Bidjāpūr after the death of his father. In the year 1044 (1634), the armies of the emperor Shāh Djahān invaded the Dakan and laid waste the country of Bidjāpūr. After the subjugation of Dawlatābād and other forts, Muhammad b. Ibrāhīm 'Ādil Shāh agreed to pay a considerable tribute to the emperor of Delhi. He was the last king of Bidjāpūr who struck coins in his own name. In the latter part of his reign, his vassal Siwādjī, son of Sāhū Bhuslā, by stratagem and treachery obtained great power, and the foundation of the Bidjāpūr monarchy became weakened. He died in 1070 (1660) and was buried in Bidjāpūr where his tomb is called "Gul Gumbaz" (circular dome).

MUHAMMAD B. KĀSĪM, a cousin of Walid I (86—96 = 705—715) and son-in-law of al-Ḥadjđđādj b. Yūsuf, was the governor of Baṣra; in 92 (711), he was sent to conquer Sind. Having defeated and killed the Rādjā of the place called Dāhir, he took possession of that country in 93 (712) and finally penetrated as far as Multān about 500 miles from the sea and even reached the foot of the Himālayas. Various accounts are given of the death of this general. The common story is that Muhammad b. Kāsim was falsely accused by the two daughters of the Rādjā of Dāhir, whom he had sent to the harem of Sulaimān (96—99 = 715—717), the brother and successor of Walid, of having violated their chastity, and that he was therefore sewn up alive in a raw cow-hide, by order of the enraged caliph. Others say that Muhammad b. Kāsim, with other members of his family, was tortured and put to death by Šālīḥ b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān, governor of 'Irāk, in revenge for the murder of his brother by Ḥadjđđādj.

MUHAMMAD B. MAHMUD ABU SHUDJĀ' GHĪYĀTH AL-DUNYĀ WA 'L-DĪN, a Saldjūq Sultān 547—554 (1153—1159), born 522 (1128), like his brother Malikshāh was educated with the atābeg Buzaba, who set them up as claimants to the throne against their uncle Mas'ūd. When Buzaba in 542 (1147—1148) was taken prisoner in a fierce battle and executed, Mas'ūd adopted his nephew and married Muhammad to his daughter. He probably intended him to succeed him and not Malikshāh, as Ibn al-Athīr and others say, because after his death (547 = 1152) the latter was actually raised to the throne. Muhammad was away at the time but within three months he was recognised as sultān by the powerful Khaṣṣbeg, after he had come to Hamadhān, because Malikshāh proved quite incompetent. The new sultān showed his gratitude by treacherously putting Khaṣṣbeg to death and sent his head to the emīrs of Marāgha and Ādharbāidjān in the hope that he would win them over. But he was disappointed for, although they hated Khaṣṣbeg, their horror at the cruel deed made them prefer to pay homage to Muhammad's uncle Sulaimān, who had escaped from years of imprisonment on Mas'ūd's death. Muhammad therefore fled to Iṣfahān, but because Sulaimān was an inveterate drunkard, he could not hold out in Hamadhān and when he had gone away Muhammad returned and was henceforth recognised as sultān by the emīrs. In the meanwhile Sulaimān succeeded in escaping to Lihf and entered into relations with the Caliph al-Muṭtafi li-Amr Allāh. The latter was endeavouring not without success to make himself independent of the Saldjūqs and let Sulaimān come to Baghdād (550 = 1155) to use him against Muḥammad. He was also able to win Malikshāh over and to collect an army, which was however scattered in the following year by Muḥammad with the help of Mawdūd, lord of al-Mawṣil, and Sulaimān was again made prisoner. Muḥammad now thought himself strong enough to attack the Caliph himself and to besiege him in Baghdad. 'Imād al-Dīn, who was in the town, gives a full account of the siege (Rec. Hist. Crois., ii. 246 sqq.). Muḥammad hurriedly raised the siege when news reached him that Ildigiz had occupied Hamadhān with Malikshāh and Arslān (552 = 1157). By the time the sultān arrived there they had retired, but he was at war with them till his death in 554 (1159).

MUHAMMAD B. MALIKSHAH ABU SHUDIA'
GHIYATH AL-DUNYA WA 'L-DIN QASIM AMIR AL-MU'MININA, a Saldjuk sultān (498—511 = 1105—1118), was born on the 18th Sha'ban 474
(Jan. 20, 1082) of a slave, who was also the mother of Sandjar, and was given the Turkish name of Tapar. After his father's death, he stayed at first with Turkan Khatun but then joined his brother Barkiyaruk who granted him the town of Gandja. Arrived there, he also seized Arrān and allowed himself to be seduced by Mu'ayyad al-Mulk
b. Nizam al-Mulk into dropping his brother's name out of the khatba. The two brothers fought one another with varying success in the following years until finally in 497 (1104) Barkiyaruk withdrew from the western provinces of the empire to Isfahan and left Muḥammad to enforce recognition as sultān from the governors in these lands. When Barkiyaruk died soon after, at the end of 1104, Muḥammad turned first to Baghdad because he was sure of the homage of the Caliph, who had already received him and his brother a few years before in ceremonial audience (cf. the account in Ibn Khallikan, Bulak 1299, ii.
444, had the emir Ayar, who had at first had the khatba read for Malikshah b. Barkiyaruk, treacherously put to death and sent the king of the Arabs Ṣadaqa back to his capital al-Hilla with orders to restore peace in Basra and among the Arab tribes of the neighbourhood. He then hurried to Isfahan, where the Batiniya had achieved great successes in the troubled reign of Barkiyaruk and had established themselves in several hill-fortresses in the neighbourhood. One of their leaders, Ibn Attash, had by a ruse secured possession of the fortress of Diz-Kuh or Shah-Diz built by Malikshah. The Sultān regarded it as his first duty to subdue and root out if possible these unbelievers; he sent his troops to besiege the fortress and, when it was taken, razed it to the ground and had the captured Batiniya executed in cruel fashion (500 = 1107; cf. the text of the report sent by him to the Caliph's vizier in Ibn al-Kalanisi, ed. Amedroz, p. 152 ff.). Nor did he hesitate to have his own vizier, Sa'd al-Mulk Abu
'l-Mahasin al-Ati, executed at the gate of Isfahan;
he was suspected, according to Anushtarwan wrongly, (cf. Rec. Hist. Crois., ii. 91) of having had dealings with the Batiniya.

While Muḥammad was still in Isfahan, the emir Ḍawali Saḳawu, who ruled between Fars and Khuzistān, made his submission to him; the sultān had frequently tried in vain to bring him to obedience through the emir Mawdūd. The sultān was so pleased that he granted him the town of al-Mawṣil where Djekermish, who had only paid homage to him under compulsion, was in command. The latter was not inclined to submit to the arrangement, but was taken prisoner in an encounter with Ḍawali. The latter however was not yet lord of al-Mawṣil, for the followers of Djekermish now supported his son Zangī and appealed for help to Aksonkor al-Bursuki, the governor of Baghdad, to Ṣadaqa and to Kildj Arslān, the Saldjuk of al-Rūm. The last-named alone answered the appeal and came with his troops to al-Mawṣil where he had homage paid to himself as sultān, but soon afterwards, after an unsuccessful encounter, he was drowned in the Khābūr on his retreat. Ḍawali now had little difficulty in taking the town and going on to his further task, the war against the Crusaders. It would take us too far here to sketch the course of this war, and the reader may therefore be referred to Weil, Gesch. der Chal., iii. 191 sqq. During his absence he again fell into disgrace with the Caliph, who had in the meanwhile returned to Baghdad and sent his troops to attack Ṣadaqa, with whom he was also dissatisfied. Ṣadaqa fell in battle in 501 (beg. of 1101). The sultān sent Mawdūd to al-Mawṣil and granted him the same dignity as he had previously given Ḍawali. The latter after some time made his peace with the sultān and was appointed as atābeg to Fars, where he fought the unruly elements in the population with great energy (cf. Ibn al-Athir, ed. Tornberg, x. 361 sqq.). The Batiniya however gave Muḥammad no peace, so long as they were able to hold their strong mountain citadel of Alamūt; Abū Naṣr Aḥmad, a son of Nizam al-Mulk, who after Sa'd al-Mulk acted as the sultān's vizier, was therefore given orders to take this fortress and when he did not succeed, he was dismissed in 504 (1109—10). In the meanwhile the sultān was being urged more and more from different sides to prosecute the war with the Crusaders seriously, and he succeeded in persuading the various governors of the western provinces to combine and attack the Christians under the leadership of Mawdūd accompanied by the young prince Mas'ūd. After Mawdūd's assassination (507 = 1113) Aksonkor al-Bursuki took command and after him Bursuk assumed the supreme command but on account of the strife among the Turkish emirs, the valour of the Crusaders and the complicated situation in Syria, decisive successes could not be attained. For the course of the campaign we again refer the reader to Weil, op. cit., p. 194 sqq. and the historians of the Crusaders. In the last years of his life, the sultān sent the emir Anushtegin Shīrgir against the Batiniya in Alamūt, but he died on the 24th Dhu 'l-Hidjja 511 (Apr. 18, 1118) before the fortress was taken. He was only 36 years old and this is why Weil suggests that the Batiniya had a hand in his death, but there is nothing to support this hypothesis in the oriental chronicles. On the contrary, individuals in his immediate entourage, notably the Great Hādijb 'Alī Bār, seem to have been not quite innocent, because they, apparently to avert suspicion from themselves, accused the sultāna Guhaz Khatun and the famous poet al-Tughra'i of having caused the sultān's illness by magic arts. The former was blinded and strangled on the day Muḥammad died. The reason given by Matthias of Edessa for this (Docum. Arm., i. 120) is wrong. The sultān deserves credit for having, with the assistance of his brother Sandjar who ruled in Khurāsān and the adjoining lands, restored the fortunes of the Saldjuk kingdom, which had declined since the death of Malikshah and for having vigorously fought infidels and sectarians in his zeal for Sunnī Islām and the 'Abbāsīd caliphate. He was, as Rec. Hist. Crois., ii. 118 has it, the perfect man of the Saldjūks and their strong he-camel.

MUḤAMMAD, ABŪ AḤMAD, DJALĀL AL-DAWLA WA-DJAMĀL AL-MILLA, ABŪ AḤMAD MUḤAMMAD, second son of Sultān Maḥmūd of Ghazna, was born about 387 (997). He was married to a daughter of Abū Naṣr Muḥammad b. Abu 'l-Hārith Aḥmad b. Muḥammad, the Farīghūnī ruler of Djūz-djānān. After the death of Abū Naṣr Muḥammad in 401 (1010—1011), Sultān Maḥmūd assigned to his son Muḥammad the government of the province of Djūz-djānān. In 417 (1026), at the instance of Sultān Maḥmūd, the 'Abbāsīd Caliph al-Qādir bi 'llāh conferred on him the titles of Djālāl al-Dawla wa-Djamāl al-Milla. Towards the close of his life, Sultān Maḥmūd divided his empire between his sons, giving Ghazna, Khurāsān and India to Muḥammad and Raiy, Djbāl and Isfahān to Mas'ūd, and took solemn vows from both to respect this division. When Maḥmūd died in Rabi' II, 421 (April 1030), Muḥammad ascended the throne at Ghazna, but Mas'ūd, disregarding his vows, marched from Isfahān to take possession of Ghazna. In the meantime, the nobles at Ghazna deposed Muḥammad on 3rd Shawwāl 421 (October 2, 1030) and read the khutba in the name of Mas'ūd. Muḥammad was then deprived of his sight by orders of Mas'ūd and imprisoned in a fort. His reign had lasted only 6 months.

In 431 Sultān Mas'ūd suffered a crushing defeat at the hands of the Saldjūks, and resolved to settle in India. In the beginning of 432 (September 1040), leaving Ghazna in the hands of his son Mawdūd and his wazīr, he marched to India with all his treasures, but on 13th Rabi' II, 432 (December 24, 1040) his slaves deposed him and raised Muḥammad to the throne. Shortly after this, Mas'ūd was put to death. Hearing this, Mawdūd advanced with a large army to avenge the death of his father, defeated Muḥammad near Dūnpūr on 3rd Sha'bān 432 (April 1041), and put him to death. The second reign of Muḥammad lasted only 4 months.

Muḥammad was obedient to his father and was a man of amiable temperament. He resembled his father in appearance.

MUḤAMMAD B. MARWĀN, an Umayyad governor. In 65 (684—685) he was sent by his father, the caliph Marwān I, to Mesopotamia, and in the battle of Dair al-Djāthālīk in 72 (691) in which his brother, the caliph 'Abd al-Malik, defeated Muṣ'ab b. al-Zubair, he commanded the advanced guard of the Syrian army. In the following year 'Abd al-Malik gave him the governorship of Mesopotamia and Armenia which carried with it the command in the war with the Byzantines. On account of climatic conditions the Arab expeditions always took place in summer. In 73 (692), the emperor Justinian II was defeated at Sebaste or Sebastopolis in Cilicia. In 75 (694) Muḥammad again took the field against the Byzantines and was successful against them at Mar'ash, and in the following year he invaded Armenia. Along with his nephew 'Abd Allāh b. 'Abd al-Malik he was sent to al-Ḥadjjdjād in the year 82 (701), to support him against the rebel 'Abd al-Rahmān b. Muḥammad b. al-Ash'ath, and in the negotiations with the 'Irākīs before the battle at Dair al-Djamādjim the caliph was represented by Muḥammad and 'Abd Allāh. In the same year, Muḥammad led an expedition against Armenia, and again in 84 (703) and 85 (704). After the accession of al-Walid (Shawwāl 86 = Oct. 705) Muḥammad fell gradually into the background while Maslama, the caliph's brother, was the actual commander; but the former retained his governorship for some time until in 91 (709—710) he was replaced by Maslama here also. Muḥammad died in 101 (719—720).

His association with the reformer Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Wahhāb [cf. WAHHĀBĪYA] began in 1157 (1744). Thereafter until his death (end of Rabi' I, 1179 = Sept. 1765) the history of his reign consists of an unceasing and on the whole indecisive struggle against the neighbouring settlements and tribes and his former suzerains, the Banū Khālid of al-Ḥasā. He took little active part in these operations, and his personality is overshadowed by the figures of the Reformer himself and of his own son 'Abd al-'Aziz. Nevertheless his talents as a diplomatist more than once saved the Wahhābī state from being crushed by a coalition of its enemies, notably after the disastrous defeat by the forces of Naḍjirān at Ḥa'ir in 1764.

MUHAMMAD B. TĀHIR, governor of Khurāsān. After the death of his father, Muḥammad received the governorship of Khurāsān (Radjab 248 = Sept. 862). In 250 (864—5) the 'Alid al-Ḥasan b. Zaid rebelled, which led to a long and serious struggle [see MUHAMMAD B. 'ABD ALLĀH]. When 'Abd Allāh al-Sidjī rebelled against Ya'qūb b. al-Laiṭh al-Ṣaffār and appealed for help to Muḥammad, who appointed him governor of al-Ṭabasain and Kūhistān, Ya'qūb found a welcome pretext to invade Khurāsān. Muḥammad sent an embassy to him; but as Ya'qūb had already found a following among discontented Khurāsānians, all negotiations were in vain. In Shawwāl 259 (Aug. 873), or according to another statement in 258, he entered Nisābūr without striking a blow, put an end to the Ṭahirid dynasty and took Muḥammad prisoner. But when he rebelled against the Caliph al-Mu'tamid, he was defeated in Radjab 262 (April 876) by the latter's brother al-Muwaffāq and Muḥammad, whom he had with him in chains, escaped. The Caliph restored the latter to his former office in Khurāsān; the exiled Ṭahirid however never found an opportunity to exercise his functions. He was further appointed — probably not till 270 (853—4) — by the vizier Ṣā'id b. Makhlad as his deputy as military governor of Baghdad. He held this office until the accession of al-Mu'taḍid (279 = 892). He died in 296 (908—9).

MUHAMMAD B. TĀHIR [See IBN AL-KAISARĀN.]

MUHAMMAD B. TAKASH [See Khawārizmshāh.]

MUHAMMAD B. TUGHDIJ B. DJUFF (or Djaff) B. YALTAKIN B. FURĀN B. FURĀ B. KHAḲĀN, Abū Bakr, known as AL-IKSHID, from the title granted to him by the Caliph al-Rāḍī in 327 (939), was the founder of the Egyptian dynasty of the Ikshidids [q. v.].

He was born in 268 (882) at Baghdad and must have spent his youth in Syria, as his father, who joined the service of the Ṭulūnids at about the same date, was appointed governor of Damascus and Ṭabariya c. 276, a post which he held for some fifteen years, and he himself acted for a time as his father's deputy for Ṭabariya. In consequence of the overthrow of the Ṭulūnid dynasty in 292 (904), he was imprisoned at Baghdad. He was released in 294 (907), attached to the wazir al-'Abbās b. al-Ḥasan, and being implicated in his murder, had to fly when the conspiracy of Ibn al-Mu'tazz [q. v.] failed in 296 (908). He escaped to Syria and found himself reduced to a humble station. Next year he passed on to Egypt, where Takin, its governor, took him into favour, so that he kept him with himself, both in Egypt and in Syria in which he was transferred thither to act as governor at intervals (302—307 and 309—311), and promoted him to appointments of importance.

At this period Muḥammad came into contact with the powerful Mādairī family, and also attended Mu'nīs [q. v.] when he was brought to Egypt by the Fātimid invasions. He had already attracted some attention at Baghdad by an exploit in 306. In 316 (928), through influence at the capital, he became governor of Ramla, quitting Takin abruptly. In 319 he obtained a transfer to Damascus, where he became powerful, and in consequence of his defeat of Bushrā in 321 extended his rule over the whole of Syria. In the same year (March 933) Takin died, and Muḥammad b. Tughdj succeeded in obtaining the appointment as governor of Egypt in his place, but only nominally and for one month (Sept. 933). Two years later, by means of a large army and fleet, he entered Fustāt and took possession of the country, overcoming the resistance of al-Mādairī (Muḥammad b. 'Alī), who by appointment from Baghdad was then in control of Egypt, the governor being under his direction (taḥta tadbirihi). Superior to al-Mādairī, however, was al-Faḍl b. Dja'far b. al-Furāt [for whom see the article IBN AL-FURĀT], the inspecting minister (wazir kashf) of Egypt and Syria, who had been specially granted full executive powers. Muḥammad b. Tughdj had acted with the authorization of al-Faḍl and later (324) obtained the confirmation of al-Rāḍī to the addition of Egypt to the province of Syria already held by him. Probably at the same time he was granted the suzerainty over al-Yaman and the Holy Cities of Mecca and Medina, for in his letter of the following year to the Emperor Romanus he boasts of these places as part of his kingdom. Until the death of al-Faḍl in 327 (March 939), he seems to have been subject, at least in theory, to some control by him.

In 324 a decisive victory by the troops of Muḥammad b. Tughdj near Alexandria (battle of Ablūḳ, March 31, 936) crushed the third Fātimid invasion of Egypt and led to overtures from the Fātimid Caliph al-Kā'im, which in the end came to nothing. Muḥammad did indeed decide three years later to recognize the Fātimid, and had given the order that al-Kā'im should be proclaimed in Egypt, out of indignation at the 'Abbāsid government at Baghdad, but was induced to reconsider his decision.

Only a month after he had received his title al-Ikshid from al-Rāḍī (Ramaḍān 327 = June—July 939), he found himself threatened from Raḳqa by Ibn Rā'ik [q. v.] and learnt that his provinces had been granted to this rival. Baḍjkam [q. v.], as amir al-umara' at Baghdad, gave no answer to his appeal but that the question must be decided by the sword; the powerless Caliph could say nothing. Ibn Rā'ik rapidly possessed himself of Syria, driving back the forces sent to oppose him, and had soon captured Ramla (Oct. 939). Muḥammad b. Ṭughdj himself confronted him with an army at Faramā, and with no fighting beyond some skirmishing entered into negotiations, ending in an agreement to cede Syria from Ṭabariya to the north on condition that Ramla and the rest were restored to him. Ibn Rā'īk soon broke this treaty and again advanced. This time Muḥammad b. Ṭughdj encountered him at al-ʿArīsh and routed him (15th Ramaḍān 324 = June 24, 940), but as he followed him into Syria, met with a reverse in his turn, one of his detachments being surprised and badly defeated at Ladjdjūn (18th August). Peace was then renewed on the same terms as before, and Muḥammad b. Ṭughdj undertook to pay an annual subsidy of 140,000 dinārs. He was back in Egypt in October.

The death of Badjkam in 329 (April 941) drew Ibn Rā'īk back to Baghdād, and Muḥammad b. Ṭughdj was soon relieved of him completely, for he was murdered a year later by the Ḥamdānids. Muḥammad lost no time in recovering Syria, marching thither himself (June 942) and remaining in the country about six months before coming back to Egypt. It must have been at about this period that he succeeded in dispersing some minor encroachments on Syria from the direction of Raḳḳa that are alluded to without details, those of ʿAdl (al-Badjkamī) and Badr al-Kharshani. He had to meet more serious attacks from the Ḥamdānids. One of them, al-Ḥusain b. Saʿīd, took Ḥalab from him in 332 (March 944), and in May he set out to recover it. The Caliph al-Muttaḳī, moreover, insecure under the protection of the Ḥamdānids from Tūzūn, the amīr al-umaraʾ, had appealed to him for help. His enemy retired at his approach and having regained the town he proceeded to Raḳḳa, where he met the Caliph (Sept. 7, 944). At this time he had thoughts of becoming amīr al-umaraʾ himself. He urged al-Muttaḳī to come with him to Syria and Egypt, and even offered to go with him to Baghdād. He begged him not to trust himself to Tūzūn, but could not dissuade him. After receiving flattering marks of honour he departed. Before he reached Fuṣṭāṭ on his return the Ḥamdānid Saif al-Dawla [q. v.] had retaken Ḥalab (Oct. 944). The Egyptian army sent to meet this new aggression was severely defeated at Rastan near Ḥimṣ, and Saif al-Dawla advanced to Damascus and entered it (April–May 945). Muḥammad b. Ṭughdj, coming from Egypt with his army, obliged him to retreat, pursued him, brought him to battle at Kinnasrīn (May–June 945), and defeated him. Again Muḥammad made easy terms when victorious. Saif al-Dawla retained Syria north of Damascus and was also given a subsidy. The treaty was concluded in Rabīʿ I, 334 (Oct.–Nov. 945), and Muḥammad then went back to Damascus, remaining there until he died a few months later (21st Dhū l-Ḥijja 334 = June 24, 946), just after the arrival of a Byzantine envoy concerning an exchange of prisoners for which he had opened negotiations.

Next to nothing is recorded of the internal events of Egypt during his reign; the country was doubtless quiet. Its revenue, said to have amounted to two million dinārs annually, was no longer accounted for to Baghdād, and no regular payments were made from it to the central treasury. But he sent large occasional gifts to the Caliphs, so that al-Rāḳī considered him an exemplary vassal.

He left seven million dinārs at his death besides considerable other property. No constructional works of much importance are credited to him. At Fuṣṭāṭ he rebuilt the shipyard on the mainland, and on its site on the island of Rawḍa made a garden called al-Mukhtār; he enlarged the government house in which he resided, a Ṭūlūnid building that was situated near the still existing tomb of al-Ḳāḍī Bakkār, and added a maidān; he also made another garden known later as al-Kāfūrī, afterwards the site of the western Fāṭimid palace of Cairo. His armies at times seem to have been large. At the battle of Ablūḳ the Egyptians are said to have had 15,000 horsemen, at that of Kinnasrīn 50,000 men. Such numbers would have been reached by means of levies for particular emergencies, which he is known to have raised more than once. On one occasion his personal retainers (ghulāms), on whom he more especially depended, numbered 500. The constantly repeated and universally accepted figures of 400,000 for his army and 8,000 for his bodyguard can be dismissed as ridiculous, notwithstanding that they rest on the early authority of al-Tanūkhī (d. 384), and with them the accompanying myth as to his habit of concealing his sleeping places when on campaign.

The most renowned of his followers was Kāfūr [q. v.]. Another of his ghulāms, Fātik, rose to some eminence. ʿAlī b. Muḥammad b. Kalā was his secretary both at Damascus and in Egypt. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī al-Mādarāʾī was his wazīr for a few months (328–329), Muḥammad b. ʿAlī b. Muḳāṭil, previously secretary to Ibn Rā'īk, was his wazīr at his death. His four brothers were all younger than himself; al-Ḥasan was in command at the battle of Ablūḳ, and represented him in Egypt during all his absences, al-Ḥusain was in command at Ladjdjūn and killed there, ʿUbaid Allāh acted for him in Syria, ʿAlī disappears early.

Notable Egyptian authors who flourished during his reign were the historian Ibn al-Dāya (d. 334), al-Kindī (d. 350), and ʿAbd Allāh al-Farghānī (d. 362), who came to Egypt in 329 and was in his confidence at Raḳḳa in 333. Al-Masʿūdī moreover visited Egypt in 330. Al-Mutanabbī, just rising to fame, recited once in his presence in Syria and addressed a verse or two to him and to his brother ʿUbaid Allāh (d. 333 at Ramla).

Muḥammad b. Ṭughdj was strong physically, but subject to occasional fits of melancholia. His character is illustrated by a number of incidents that have every appearance of being authentic. He was strict, but in no way vindictive or cruel. He often brought his officers to account, and then after punishing them by arrest or fine would restore them to favour. Hardly any executions are heard of in his reign. He would not allow torture and the maltreatment of accused persons, so common in his time. His tact and sagacity were conspicuous. He was decent in his life and liked by his men and the people. On the other hand, he was certainly oppressive and unfair in some of his money exactions, and though at times not ungenerous was inclined to be mean and miserly in minor matters. The two great faults attributed to him, even to his face in his lifetime, parsimony and timidity, are not altogether without foundation. As to the latter, his own defence in a particular instance looks valid.

His career was closely parallel to that of Aḥmad b. Ṭulūn [q. v.], even as regards several fortuitous occurrences. It leaves no doubt of his capacity, and if admitting of occasional overcaution, will not allow of anything like cowardice. He did not make the same mark as his predecessor, but was a milder and perhaps a better ruler.

Bibliography: Ibn Sa'id, al-Mughrib (ed. Tallqvist, Leyden 1899) contains the text of the principal authorities, a list including subsidiary authorities, and a full biography in German carefully worked out from both sources. By far the most important authority is the long and detailed biography of Muhammad b. Tughdj which forms part of Ibn Sa'id's work, and appears to consist of the life composed by Ibn Zūlāk between 350 and 355, reproduced almost but not quite verbatim. The other principal authority is the Kitāb al-Wulāt of al-Kindi, ed. Guest, Little, if anything, can be added from books published after al-Mughrib.

MUHAMMAD B. YĀKŪT, ABŪ BAKR, a chief of police in Baghdād. In 318 (930) Muhammad, whose father was chief chamberlain to the Caliph al-Muqtadir was appointed chief of police. The maintenance of order in the capital at this time was much neglected and the praetorians conducted a regular reign of terror. In a fracas between infantry and cavalry Muhammad intervened on behalf of the latter; their opponents were cut down, some driven from the city and only a small contingent of negroes, who at once surrendered, remained unscathed (Muḥarram 318 = Feb. 930). Some months later these mutinied and demanded more pay; but they were driven out of the town by Muhammad and then routed by the chief emīr Mu'nīs [q.v.] near Wāsiṭ. The confusion was increased by the breach between Mu'nīs and Muhammad. At the instigation of Mu'nīs, Muhammad was dismissed in Djumādā II 319 (June—July 931). Mu'nīs was nevertheless not satisfied but demanded that his hated rival should be banished. The Caliph at first refused to grant his request; but when Mu'nīs threatened him with force, he had to yield, whereupon Muhammad went to Sidjistān (Radjab 319 = July 931). Soon afterwards the Caliph quarrelled with Mu'nīs and recalled Muhammad. In Muḥarram 320 (Jan. 932) the latter returned to Baghdād; the Caliph then sent him with an army to al-Ma'shūk in the region of Takrīt. But when Mu'nīs advanced from Mošul, the Caliph's troops under Muhammad and Sa'id b. Ḥamdān retired to Baghdād without striking a blow. After the victory of Mu'nīs and the murder of al-Muqtadir in Shawwāl of the same year (Oct. 932) the latter's son 'Abd al-Wāhid fled with Muhammad and his other supporters to al-Mada'in and then to Wāsiṭ where a number of his generals abandoned him. When the forces of the new Caliph al-Kāhir approached under the command of Yalbak, 'Abd al-Wāhid and Muhammad fled to Tustar. Muhammad was not popular on account of his arrogance and selfishness, so that one after the other laid down his arms and finally 'Abd al-Wāhid surrendered. Muhammad entered into negotiations with Yalbak and the Caliph pardoned him. He then returned to Baghdād where he gained a great influence over al-Kāhir. On the accession of al-Rāḍi in Djumādā I, 322 (April 934), Muhammad became the real ruler in a short time; the Caliph appointed him chief chamberlain and also made him his commander-in-chief while the vizier Ibn Mukla played a more subordinate part. When al-Muqtadir's cousin Hārūn b. Ghārib, whom al-Kāhir had appointed governor of Māh al-Kūfa, al-Dinawar and Māsabadhān rebelled, Muhammad was sent with an army against him. In the resulting battle, Muhammad suffered a defeat (Djumādā II 322 = May 934); soon afterwards however, Hārūn fell from his horse and was killed by one of Muhammad's slaves. With the death of their commander the resistance of Hārūn's followers collapsed; Muhammad was nevertheless unable long to retain his position of power. On the advice of Ibn Mukla who feared his ever increasing power, al-Rāḍi had him arrested along with his brother al-Muza'far and the secretary Abū Ishāk al-Karāriti on the 5th Djumādā I, 323 (April 12, 935). Muhammad died in prison in the same year.

MUHAMMAD B. YŪSUF [See ABŪ HAIYĀN.]

MUHAMMAD 'ABD AL-KARĪM 'ALAWĪ, better known as 'Abd al-Karīm Munshī, a Persian historian of the middle of the sixteenth century. His best known work is the Tārīkh-i Ahmad or Ahmadshāhi composed for 'Abd al-Rahmān b. Hādjdī Muhammad Rawshan-Khān, a history of the founder of the Durrāni dynasty in Afghanistan, Ahmad Shāh. After 'Abd al-Karīm had finished a history of Shudjā' al-Mulk Durrāni and the conquest of Khurāsān in 1235 (1820), he decided to write a complete history of the Durrānis and began his Tārīkh-i Ahmad. The work is based on the Tārīkh-i Husainshāhi of Imām al-Dīn Husaini (Rieu, Cat. Pers. MSS. Brit. Mus., iii. 904b) and is really only a paraphrase of it. It begins with the story of Ahmad Shāh which he continued to the year 1212. Then follows a description of the Pandjāb and the roads between Kābul, Harāt, Pashāwar and Kandahār and a chapter on Turkistān under Narbūta Bey. The work concludes with the accession of Shudjā' al-Mulk. In addition to this book, 'Abd al-Karīm in 1263 (1847) wrote the Muḥārabāt-i Kābul wa-Kandahār, which describes the war with the English down to General Pollock's expedition (Sept.—Oct. 1842). It again is not original but based on the poem Akbar-nāma of Kāsim Djan. According to Beale, Oriental Biographical Dictionary (London 1894, p. 5), he also wrote a history of the Sikh war entitled Tārīkh-i Pandjāb Tukhsatan li 'l-Aḥbāb, but there is no mention of a manuscript or lithograph of any such work in any of the European catalogues. It is possible that there is some confusion with the Pandjāb section of the Tārīkh-i Ahmad. In the Catalogue of the Persian printed Books in the British Museum (London 1922, p. 19), E. Edwards ascribes to the author a dictionary of English and Persian homonyms entitled A Dictionary of Anglo-Persian homogeneous words being a... Collection of... Words having nearly the same Sound and the same Meaning, Bombay 1889; it is however unfortunately not possible to be certain that the author of the book is the same 'Abd al-Karīm Munshī.

Muḥammad 'Abduh belonged to an Egyptian peasant family and was born in 1849 in Lower Egypt. He spent his childhood in the little village of Maḥallat Naṣr in the mudiriya of Buḥaira. When Muḥammad 'Abduh had learned the Qur'ān by heart, he was sent in 1862 to the theological school of Tanṭā but he left this after a year and a half discouraged and was only induced to resume his studies through the influence of a grand uncle who aroused in him an interest in mysticism. In 1865 he returned to Tanṭā but the next year proceeded to Cairo to the Azhar mosque. There at this moment the first movements of a new spirit were becoming apparent in the beginning of a return to the classics and an awakening interest in natural science and history, which agreed with mysticism in a lower estimation of the old traditional studies. In this milieu Muḥammad 'Abduh at once devoted himself entirely to mysticism, practised asceticism and retired from the world. It was again his grand uncle who persuaded him to give this up. About the same time, 1872, Muḥammad 'Abduh came into contact with Saiyid Djamāl al-Dīn al-Afghānī [q. v.] who had just arrived in Egypt and was destined to exercise a profound influence upon him. It was he who revealed traditional learning to Muḥammad 'Abduh in a new light, called his attention to European works accessible in translations and attracted his interest finally to Egyptian and Muslim problems of the day. Muḥammad 'Abduh soon became his most ardent disciple and in his very first work of a mystic nature (Risālat al-Warīdāt, 1290 = 1874) enthusiastically described Saiyid Djamāl al-Dīn as his spiritual guide. The influence of Saiyid Djamāl al-Dīn is still more marked on the matter of Muḥammad 'Abduh's second work, notes on dogmatics entitled Hāshiya 'alā Sharḥ al-Dawānī li 'L-Aḳā'id al-'Aqūdiyya [1292 = 1876]. The influence of Saiyid Djamāl al-Dīn and the development of affairs in Egypt towards the end of the reign of the Khedive Ismā'il caused Muḥammad 'Abduh in 1876 to take to journalism, which he practised henceforth. After concluding his studies at the Azhar mosque and acquiring the certificate of an

'ālim (scholar), he first of all gave private tuition; in 1879 he was appointed as teacher in the Dār al-'Ulūm, which had been founded a few years before to modernise instruction in religious learning. In the same year, shortly after the accession of the Khedive Tawfīk, Muḥammad 'Abduh was dismissed for reasons that have not been clearly explained and sent to his native village, while Saiyid Djamāl al-Dīn was banished from Egypt; but a liberal ministry very soon recalled Muḥammad 'Abduh (1880) and appointed him chief editor of the official gazette al-Waḳā'id al-Miṣriya, which not only contained official announcements but also endeavoured to influence public opinion; under Muḥammad 'Abduh's control it became the mouth-piece of the liberal party. In spite of a common ultimate goal: the liberation of the Muslim peoples and a renaissance of Islām by its own strength, there was an essential difference between Muḥammad 'Abduh's programme and that of Saiyid Djamāl al-Dīn; the latter was a revolutionary who aimed at a complete upheaval; Muḥammad 'Abduh, on the other hand, held that only gradual reform could be successful, thought that no political revolution could take the place of a gradual transformation of mentality and regarded a reform of education, especially moral and religious, as the first preliminary to progress. His interest gradually became concentrated on Islām and its position in the modern world. 'Arābī Pāshā's rebellion put an end to Muḥammad 'Abduh's activity on these lines. His part in this movement has not yet been sufficiently elucidated; although it is certain that he neither shared the optimism of military circles nor approved their use of force, he put himself on the side of the nationalist opponents of absolutism and endeavoured to exert a moderating influence on its leaders. After the suppression of the rebellion he was condemned to banishment from Egypt at the end of 1882. He first went to Bairūt and then to Paris where in the beginning of 1884 he met Saiyid Djamāl al-Dīn. The two founded a society called al-'Urwa al-wuthqā and published a paper with the same name, which had to cease publication after eight months but exercised a very profound influence on the development of nationalism in the Muslim east. In Tunis Muḥammad 'Abduh continued propaganda for the society, but then cut himself off from it and settled in Bairūt at the beginning of 1885. The 'Urwa expressed the views of Saiyid Djamāl al-Dīn entirely. In Bairūt he taught at a theological school and engaged in Muslim and Arabic studies. In this period he produced his translation from the Persian of the Risālat al-Radd 'alā 'L-Dahriyyin, the only considerable work of Saiyid Djamāl al-Dīn (1302 = 1886), and two valuable philological treatises (Sharḥ Nahḍ al-Balāgha [1302 = 1885] and Sharḥ Maḳāmāt Badī' al-Zamān al-Hamadḥānī [1306 = 1889]). When in 1889 he was allowed to return, he at once went to Cairo. His wish to resume teaching again was not at once granted; instead he entered the judiciary and was immediately appointed a judge on the Tribunaux Indigènes, two years later Conseiller at the Cour d'Appel; in 1899 he attained the highest clerical post in Egypt, that of state mufti, an office he held till his death. One result of his work in the courts was the publication of his verdicts in Taḳrīr fī Iṣlāḥ al-Maḳākim al-Shar'iya (1318 = 1900) which gave the stimulus to important reforms in the administration of the shari'a, and the foundation of the College for Qādis goes back primarily to his efforts. In the same year, 1899, he became a member of the Conseil Législatif, which marked the first stage in the representation of the Egyptian people. Finally he was allowed to resume his interest in education; in 1894 he became a member of the governing body of the Azhar, which had been constituted at his suggestion, and in this capacity not only acquired great renown by his reforms in the university but himself took an active part in the teaching. In addition to this many-sided activity in the fifteen years after his return he found time to publish a number of works, including his most important: the Risālat al-Tawhīd (1315 = 1897), his principal theological work based on his lectures in Bairūt; the publication of a work on logic (Sharḥ Kitāb al-Baṣā'ir al-Nāṣiriya, Taṣnīf al-Kāfi Zain al-Dīn [1316 = 1898]); a defence of Islām against Christianity in the field of knowledge and civilization entitled al-Islām wa 'l-Naṣrāniya ma'a 'l-'Ilm wa 'l-Madaniya (1320 = 1902; first published in al-Manār). Muḥammad 'Abduh was not able to finish his commentary on the Qur'ān, on which he laid great importance and of which he had published portions in al-Manār; it was revised by his disciple and friend Shaikh Muḥammad Rashīd Riḍā and published first of all in al-Manār. Of Muḥammad 'Abduh's numerous articles by which, along with his lectures, he most influenced public opinion, two (of 1900) were published in a French translation entitled L'Europe et l'Islām by Muḥammad Tal'at Harb Bey (1905). The advanced ideas put forward by Muḥammad 'Abduh provoked the most vigorous hostility in orthodox and conservative circles which manifested itself not only in serious refutations but also in attacks on and intrigues against him, as we see from a whole literature of lampoons. But his teaching met with remarkable support among all seriously minded Muslims. The principal organ of his views was the monthly al-Manār, which had appeared since 1897 under the editorship of Sheikh Muḥammad Rashīd Riḍā, who has also produced an extensive literary monument to his master (but his views and the tendencies of his periodical must not be identified offhand with those of Muḥammad 'Abduh). Muḥammad 'Abduh died in 1905; but his teaching has retained its influence steadily to the present day.

Muḥammad 'Abduh's programme according to his own statement was: 1. the reform of the Muslim religion by bringing it back to its original condition, 2. the renovation of the Arabic language, 3. the recognition of the rights of the people in relation to the government. His political activity was dominated by the idea of patriotism, which he was the first to champion enthusiastically in Egypt. As an opponent equally of the political control by Europe and of Oriental despotism in Muslim lands he favoured an inner assimilation of western civilization, without abandoning the fundamental Muslim ideas and a synthesis of the two factors. From this programme, which assures Muḥammad 'Abduh an important place among the founders of modern Egypt, must be distinguished his effort to carry it through in the field of theology. Muḥammad 'Abduh is in the first place a theologian; his life was devoted to the attempt to establish and maintain Islām, at least as a religion, against the onslaught of the west, while he abandoned without a struggle those aspects of Muslim-Oriental life in which religion was of less moment. However great a stimulus he may have received from progressive western thought, the actual foundations of his teaching came primarily from the school of Ibn Taimiya and Ibn Ka'ayim al-Djawiya, who favoured reform on conservative lines, and from al-Ghazzālī's ethical conception of religion. Deeply convinced of the superiority of true Islām, unaffected by the vicissitudes of time, Muḥammad 'Abduh wished to get rid of the abuses which falsified the Muslim religion and made it out of keeping with the times, and to adapt Islām to every real advance by going back to its true principles. Muḥammad 'Abduh was thus brought to attack the madhāhib and taqlīd [q. v.], to demand freedom for idjtihād [q. v.] and a new idjma' [q. v.], in keeping with modern conditions, based on the Qur'ān and the true sunna, for the establishment of which he laid down strict criteria; he was also brought to reject the hairsplitting of the fuḥahā', the worship of saints and all bid'as, and to the endeavour to create a more ethical and deeper religion instead of a mechanical formalism. The antiquated system of Fiqh, against which Muḥammad 'Abduh claimed full freedom, was to be replaced by new laws capable of development, in which consideration for the common good (maṣlaḥa) and the times should, in keeping with the true spirit of Islām, have if necessary preference to the literal text (naṣṣ) of revelation, just as in any conflict between reason and tradition in settling what is laid down by religion, the verdict of reason should be followed. Alongside of the belief in the sublimity of revelation there was in Muḥammad 'Abduh the conviction that knowledge and religion, properly understood, could not come into conflict at all, so that reason need not recognise a logical impossibility as a religious truth; religion was given to man as a thread to guide him against the aberrations of reason; reason must therefore, after it has tested the proofs of the truth of religion, which it is qualified to do, accept its dogmas; Muḥammad 'Abduh's object was a cooperation between religion and science. In dogmatics he adopts essentially the most rational conception that could still be reconciled with orthodoxy. At the same time he interiorises the conception of revelation (to him it is intuitive knowledge caused by God and provided with the consciousness of this origin, but this kind of religious experience is limited to the prophets) and deflects that of religion (to him it is an intuitive feeling for the paths to happiness in this and the next world, which cannot be clearly grasped by the reason). The task of prophecy for him is the moral education of the masses. Religious teaching and commandments are therefore intended for the masses and not for the élite. Muḥammad 'Abduh regards the Qur'ān as created and endeavours to weaken the rigidly opposed point of view of orthodoxy. The saints he does take into his system but is sceptical regarding belief in miracles. In spite of the denial of causality and laws of nature by orthodoxy, he finds a basis for explaining nature by causal laws but by quite scholastically formal reasoning. As regards the duties of religion, Muḥammad 'Abduh adheres to the four main duties: ritual prayer, the almstax, fasting and pilgrimage; only he shifts them, as usual in mysticism, from the sphere of worship to that of religion and morals. On the old question of free will Muḥammad 'Abduh decides for indeterminism; he thereby opens the way to build up a moral system for society, which, excluding all fatalism, preaches vigorous activity by every one and, following the ethics of the mystics, mutual support. His view of the substance of Muslim teaching Muḥammad 'Abduh defends not only against traditional orthodoxy but against Christianity also by a kind of philosophy of history of religion; the sending of prophets was a gradual process of education of step by step; the last and highest stage, that of absolute religion, is the sending of Muḥammad; if the Muslim peoples of the present do not correspond to the Muslim ideal, this is only the result of the fact that they have lost the old purity of the teaching; an improvement is possible by return to it. This primitive Islām of Muḥammad 'Abduh is however not the historical Islām but a very much idealised one. The superiority of Islām over Christianity in substance lies, according to Muḥammad 'Abduh, in its rationalism and its closeness to reality and its avoidance of unattainable ideals of life.

In this theology, the religious content consists of humility before God, reverence for the Prophet, enthusiasm for the Qur'ān. The basis of this Islām is the recognition of a not too retrogressive system of dogmatics, its object is the observance of an ethical system which is favourable to progress, and both are influenced by a strongly marked rationalism, which is genuinely old Muslim but for Muḥammad 'Abduh is no indifferent inheritance but the main weapon of defence of Islām and actually takes the place of a deepening of religion so that his theology has the character of an apologetic compromise.

MUḤAMMAD AḤMAD B. 'ABD ALLĀH, the Mahdī of the Sūdān, was born about 1258 (1843) on the island of Darār in Dongola among the Argū islands north of el-'Orde. A member of the Kuntiz family of the Nubian Arab Berābera, in later life when Mahdī to prove his kinship and mystical relationship with 'Alī and the Prophet, he traced his genealogy on his father's side to Ḥasan and on the mother's to Ḥasan and 'Abbās. He was the second son of a ship's carpenter and had an older sister and three brothers. Mystic tendencies early revealed themselves in him; after the usual early education he therefore in 1277 (1861) entered the order of the Sammāniya with Shaikh Muḥammad Sharif; after a seven years' noviciate Muḥammad Sharif appointed him a shaikh of the order. After a short stay in Khartūm where he married, he went to the island of Abbā (in the White Nile, north of Kosti), built a djāmi' there and a khatwa and collected pupils around him.

His master Muḥammad Sharif, with whom he maintained a constant connection, settled near him in 1288 (1872), which seems to have been unwelcome to Muḥammad. Shortly after this event there awoke in Muḥammad the consciousness that he was the Mahdī al-muntaḡar, under the influence of the traditional ideas of the Mahdī, which brought about a breach between him and his master. He now joined the enemy of his former leader, the Shaikh al-Kurashī, and in 1297 (1880) became his successor. In his wanderings (siyāḥa) from Dongola to Sennār, from the Blue Nile to Kordufān, he convinced himself of the discontent of the people, who were oppressed by the Egyptian government; the turbulent, mixed population of the Sūdān, the religious fanaticism, the dissension between Turks and Arabs, the old opposition of the Shī'a to the Turkish ruling official classes, all formed a fruitful soil for his claims to be the Mahdī; the movement begun by Muḥammad Aḥmad which, as his letters and proclamations show, was based on a religious experience in which he earnestly believed, became from the first mixed up with political and social ideas, which in the east cannot be separated from religion, and in which finally deception and cunning played an evil part. According to the traditional formula, Muḥammad Aḥmad felt himself called "to purify the world from wantonness and corruption". For this purpose he summoned the people to fight in the first place against "the infidel Turks". He had previously bound a number of chiefs in Kordufān and Dārūr to him by ba'i'a (oaths of fealty, after the model of the Prophet; for the text see Dietrich, in Islām, 1925, p. 39) and had been cleverly able to attach men of action like the unscrupulous 'Abd Allāh al-Ta'ayishī, later his Khalifa, to him; at the same time he practised a shameless nepotism. He further incited the people by numerous pamphlets and edicts, which contained his visions of the Prophet, who had appointed him Mahdī, of al-Khidr, Gabriel, the aḥqāb, summons "to purify religion", to "emigrate", to swear fealty, to imitate the Mahdī, to the djihād etc. The hill of Gadir in Dār Nūba became the centre of this secret propaganda; in Sha'bān 1298 (July 1881) he made his first public appearance as Mahdī. Negotiations begun by the government in Khartūm with Muḥammad Aḥmad proved fruitless. Two companies sent against him under Abu 'l-Sa'ūd were destroyed; this secured further victories for him. The Egyptian government was moreover prevented by the rebellion of 'Arābī Pāshā from taking vigorous action. The expeditions of the governor of Fashōda, Rashid Pāshā, Yūsuf Pāshā al-Shallālī (at Gadir, May 1882) and of Hicks Pāshā (at Shaikān or Kashgil), all ended unsuccessfully. The Mahdiyya thus spread unhindered from Kordufān via Baḥr al-Ghazāl to the eastern Sūdān; there in Sawākin, 'Othmān Digna, a former slave dealer, soon to be the ablest Mahdist general, entered Muḥammad Aḥmad's service. Attempts by the Mahdī to extend his power to the west and with this object to conclude alliances with Muḥammad al-Sanūsī in Djaghbūb and with Morocco came to nothing. At the height of his power the campaign of 1301 (1884) took him to Khartūm, which after a heroic defence by Gordon fell into the Mahdī's hands on Jan. 30, 1885. Gordon was killed. Muḥammad Aḥmad did not however long survive his victory; he died, probably of typhus, on 9th Ramaḍān 1302 (June 22, 1885) at Omdurmān near Khartūm, where a ḡubba was erected to him by his successor, the Khalifa 'Abd Allāh; it was henceforth the Mahdist capital until Kitchener put an end to 'Abd Allāh's rule and to the Mahdiyya in 1898.

The organisation of the Mahdiyya under Muḥammad Aḥmad, which was primarily to follow the sunna of the Prophet, was early developed; it was quite military in character, for the djihad was considered more important than the ḥadj. He had four khalifas beside him, of whom al-Ta'ayishi was the most intimate and undoubtedly had the most pernicious influence on him. Particular attention was devoted to the distribution of booty and to the administration of the treasury (bait al-māl).

Muḥammad Aḥmad's teaching shows some of the features of the extreme popular Ṣūfism and some of those of an idealised primitive Islām. His asceticism was hostile to progress; the contempt for learning in the Mahdiyya and the order to burn all books on sunna and tafsir alienated the educated classes from him. The only things that had validity in addition to the Qur'ān were the proclamations of the Mahdī, the Ratib (a collection of dhikr exercises) and the Maḡlīs, a work that contained Muḥammad Aḥmad's own sunna as a substitute for the previous one but remained incomplete. In the abolition of the four madhabs we see the ikhṭilāf tendencies frequent among the Ṣūfis. Wahhābī influences are very probable in a number of regulations, for example in the prohibition of adornment, music, extravagance at weddings, tobacco and wine; particularly however in the zeal against the worship of saints and sorcery; as a matter of fact Muḥammad Aḥmad himself became an object of worship among his followers even before his death.

The only really new thing in Muḥammad Aḥmad is the addition to the shahāda: "...wa-anna Muḥammadan Aḥmadan 'bna 'Abdi 'llāhi huwa Mahdiyyu 'llāhi wa-khalīfatu rasūlihi. Where the traditions of the Mahdī did not suit him, he did not hesitate to alter them. He laid down the following 6 arkān instead of the arkān of the sunna: 1. ṣalāt, on the congregational performance of which the greatest stress was laid; 2. djihad, in express opposition to the sunni practice and in place of the ḥadj; 3. obedience to God's commandments; 4. the extended shahāda; 5. recitation of the Qur'ān and 6. of the Ratib.

A few extremist ideas, like that of equality between rich and poor, come partly from the revolutionary character of the old Shi'a, partly from the political and social conditions of the time; the social ideas were however not his central ones but only incidentally used cunningly to attract the masses. In practice the Mahdiyya had an exceedingly unifying and equalising effect: slaves and slave-dealers fought under one banner, the humblest often rose in a short time to the highest offices.

Muḥammad Aḥmad's eschatology centres round the world domination of the Mahdī. The conquest of the Sūdān was to be followed by that of Egypt, Mecca, Syria and Constantinople.

The formation of legends around Muḥammad Aḥmad's personality began very early, sometimes deliberately encouraged by him and his immediate followers and sometimes actually believed by them. Under pressure from him his court chronicler Ismā'il 'Abd al-Ḳādir composed a highly coloured sira entitled Kitāb al-Mustaḥdī ilā Sirat al-Imām al-Mahdī. It covered the years 1298 to 1302 A. H. but was burned in the time of the Khalifa 'Abd Allāh. The Egyptian writer Shuḡair (see below) claims to have had in his hands a copy that was said to have survived.

MUḤAMMAD 'ALĪ PASHA (in European sources often Mehemed Ali or Mehemet Ali) was the well-known powerful viceroy of Egypt during the years 1805—1849 (which period comprises the entire reign of Sultān Maḥmūd II q. v.); and the founder of the khedivial, later royal dynasty of Egypt. Seen in the light of history his life-work fully entitles him to the epithet of "the Founder of Modern Egypt".

Muḥammad 'Alī was born in 1769, possibly of Albanian extraction, in the town of Kawāla [q. v.] in Macedonia; he was engaged in the tobacco trade until he joined, as biṣ bashi in a corps of Albanian troops, the Turkish army that landed in Egypt in 1799 and was beaten by Bonaparte at Abū Ḳīr (July 25). In 1800 he was one of the two chiefs of the Albanian troops in Turkish service who were left behind in Egypt; this secured him an influential military position when, after the final departure of the French in 1801, Turkey began to try to recover her authority over Egypt. At the end of 1801 he fought as a general against the Mamlūks, but in the troubled years that followed he was alternatively on the side of the Mamlūk Beys (headed by al-Bardisi) and of the Turkish governors sent from Constantinople. He intrigued against Khuraw Pasha [q. v.], who had to leave Egypt in May 1803, and was, already in the same year, appointed titular governor of Djidda. Under the following governorship of Khurshīd Pasha, Muḥammad 'Alī succeeded in winning the favour of the inhabitants of Cairo and their spiritual leaders, and used them with success in his intrigues against Khurshīd, whose Turkish troops — composed of delis — were a scourge to the population, while his own Albanians were ordered to behave well. The result was that Khurshīd had to withdraw in August 1803, leaving the citadel of Cairo to Muḥammad 'Alī. The Turkish government, though sending several emissaries and trying to remove the Albanian troops, failed to keep Egyptian affairs under control and ended by recognizing Muḥammad 'Alī's self-assumed position (November 2, 1805); he was solemnly installed in April 1806.

The internal and external difficulties of the Sublime Porte did not allow her to interfere any further for the moment and the new governor had soon occasion to show himself a loyal vassal when the English — then at war with Turkey [cf. SELİM III] — landed in Alexandria in March 1807. At that time Muḥammad 'Alī had already undertaken the struggle against the Mamlūk Beys al-Bardisi and al-Alfī, the latter of whom was strongly supported by the English. He came back hastily from Upper Egypt, fortified Cairo, and gained a victory over the English army at Rashīd (Rosetta) in April. Soon after the departure of the British fleet in September the viceroy began the execution of his far-reaching administrative and economic measures, which were to restore Egypt's economic strength and consequently to assure for himself a more powerful position than any Turkish governor had had for the last two centuries [cf. MAMLŪKS]. In the meantime the Beys (whose two leaders had died in 1807) continued their opposition (no doubt increased by the viceroy's land policy), which was finally broken by the massacre of about 300 Mamlūks in the citadel of Cairo on March 1, 1811, on the occasion of a festival. The persecution of the Mamlūks was at the same time extended to the other parts of the country. Muḥammad 'Alī now could send, without danger to his own position, his Albanian troops in the campaign against the Wāḥḥābīs in Arabia, to comply with a request of the Porte. The Wāḥḥābī war began in September 1811 and was conducted, until 1816, by Muḥammad 'Alī's son Ṭusun; after the latter's death the command was taken over by his elder brother Ibrāhīm Pasha [q.v.]. Muḥammad 'Alī himself took part in an expedition to Yaman, but had to return before the end of the war, because his position as governor seemed to be in danger.

The military successes of the Egyptian troops against the Wāḥḥābī power immensely increased Muḥammad 'Alī's authority all over Arabia and in a larger sense in the entire Near East; European policy began to look for the first time on Egypt as a factor of political importance. This importance was further increased by the expeditions to the south that followed immediately on the Arabian campaign: Egyptian power was established for the first time in the Sūdān [q.v.], where Muḥammad 'Alī's third son Ismā'īl found his death in 1822, the year in which the town of Khartūm [q.v.] was founded. At this time Egyptian power was also extended in the direction of the Red Sea, which made an end to the hitherto continuous plague of the incursions of nomadic Arabs into the Nile valley; the ports of Sawākin and Massawa (Maṣwā') came under the Egyptian sphere of influence, although the direct authority of the Porte was maintained.

A new phase in the development of Muḥammad 'Alī's power began by his participation in the military repression of the Greek revolt by the Turks. Only through Egyptian aid was the submission of the whole of Greece with the exception of Nauplia obtained; first by the conquest of Crete by Ibrāhīm Pasha (1823) and then by the Egyptian army that landed in 1825 in Morea. When in 1827 England, Russia and France intervened in the Greek question, the combined Turkish-Egyptian fleet was destroyed in the bay of Navarino (October 20, 1827); in the following year the Egyptian troops evacuated the peninsula, after a convention had been concluded between Muḥammad 'Alī and the British admiral Codrington (August 6, 1828). Crete remained under Egyptian administration until 1841.

Muḥammad 'Alī's power was now such that he could conclude international agreements without the sultān's cognizance; at the same time the two Mediterranean naval powers, France and England, were endeavouring to win him over as an independent political factor. In 1829 France had almost induced Muḥammad 'Alī to undertake the conquest of the Barbaresque states of Algiers and Tunis; the viceroy, however, was more inclined to seek territorial expansion in the east, the more so as the four governorships of Syria had been promised him by the Porte as reward for his participation in the Greek war, a promise that had never been fulfilled. At the end of 1831 there arose difficulties between Muḥammad 'Alī and the Porte on account of the governorship of 'Akkā, which he claimed for himself. The conflict soon brought about the sending of an Egyptian army under Ibrāhīm Pasha into Syria. On May 27, 1832 'Akkā was taken. In the following month the army that was sent by the sultān was repeatedly defeated and finally beaten near Konya (December 21, 1832). The Egyptian army, continuing in the direction of Constantinople, reached Kutahia. Here at last an armistice was concluded between the Porte and Ibrāhīm as representative of his father, thanks again to the intervention of the European powers, of whom Russia had already sent military aid to Constantinople. Muḥammad 'Alī was granted the governorship of Syria and Adana by the definite peace of April 6, 1833.

During the following six years the viceroy's power was at its height. While Ibrāhīm administered Syria, severely but on the whole to the prosperity of the country, Muḥammad 'Alī continued his administrative programme in Egypt and inaugurated a pan-Arabian policy, the aim of which was to be the union of all Arabic-speaking peoples under his leadership. In Arabia his influence was still considerable since the Wāḥḥābī war; he now tried to extend Egyptian influence as far as the 'Irāk. This policy, while at the same time constituting a threat to the ambitions of the European powers in the Near East, was to bring him again into conflict with the sultān, who, having succeeded at last in subduing two independent vassals in other parts of his empire, was waiting for an opportunity to crush his most powerful vassal in Egypt. The latter, in 1838, had even made known his intention of declaring himself independent of the Turkish government.

Not long after the outbreak of hostilities the Turkish army under Ḥāfiẓ Pasha was completely defeated at Naṣīb in North Syria (June 24, 1839), while the Turkish fleet under the Kapudan Pasha Aḥmad sailed to Alexandria and went over to Muḥammad 'Alī's side. In this desperate situation the authority of the Porte was saved by the intervention of the five European powers, in defence of the integrity of the Ottoman Empire. The Egyptian question had thus produced an international political crisis, which was aggravated by the opposition of France, which had long been the best intentioned towards Muḥammad 'Alī among the European governments. By the convention of London (July 5, 1840) England, Russia, Austria and Prussia agreed with the Porte upon the terms to be imposed upon Muḥammad 'Alī. When the latter did not accept, there followed military demonstrations against the coastal towns in Syria ('Akkā taken on November 4, 1840). Soon afterwards a British fleet appeared in Alexandria, where Admiral Napier on November 27 concluded an agreement with Muḥammad 'Alī. The viceroy consented to the return of the Turkish fleet and renounced his governorship of Syria, Adana and Crete, while on the other hand he was to keep the hereditary governorship of Egypt as a part of the Turkish Empire. These terms were confirmed by an imperial firḡān of February 13, 1841, completed by another of May 23, in which the mutual relations of sultān and viceroy were definitely regulated. The chief points were the right of succession according to seniority in Muḥammad 'Alī's family, the payment of a tribute and the permission to maintain an Egyptian army of 18,000 men, the higher officers of which were to be appointed by the sultān.

Muḥammad 'Alī's last years were passed in peace. In 1846 he visited Constantinople and Ḳawāla; in 1848 he lost his son Ibrāhīm to whom so many of his military successes were due. On August 2, 1849 he himself died in Alexandria, to be succeeded by Ṭusun's son 'Abbās Pasha [q. v.]. He was buried in the new mosque which he had had erected in the citadel of Cairo.

Still more amazing than the career of this once obscure Turkish officer are the enormous changes brought about by his work in the condition and the international position of Egypt; they have made him a hero in the history of the Near East. His reign is an era by itself in Egyptian history. Muḥammad 'Alī's latest biographer says: "He began by seeking only to raise money. He ended by seeking, however mistakenly, to develop and civilise the country" (Dodwell, p. 220). His work indeed did not at all mean a break with the government traditions prevailing in the Turkish Empire, but the political aim that Muḥammad 'Alī had set himself, seconded by his persevering energy and the continuous supervision of his autocratic individuality, led at last to a result which, in similar conditions, would otherwise have been difficult to attain, as is shown by the state of things prevailing at the same time in other provinces of the Ottoman Empire.

As the measures taken by Muḥammad 'Alī in the field of administration, land policy and the industrial and commercial mobilisation of the country have been briefly sketched in the art. KHEDĪW, it is unnecessary to enter here into the same details. It is sufficient to point to the fact that all these measures had as their first object to make the pasha himself the sole proprietor and administrator of the riches of Egypt. He certainly listened to the advice of European and other councillors and valued European institutions as examples to follow to a certain extent. But he followed oriental methods and made as good as no use of Europeans as officials in the home administration.

This was not the case in Muḥammad 'Alī's newly created army. The pasha himself had not been entirely able to keep his mercenary troops under control (mutiny in Cairo in 1816). So he decided to form a new army, moved by the same motives that had led Sultān Selim III to create new regular troops (nizām-i djedid). From 1819 this enterprise was confided to and brought to a successful end by the French captain Sève, who, after having embraced Islām, served Muḥammad 'Alī as Sulaimān Pasha. A first attempt to use negro slaves from the Sūdān as soldiers having failed, the fallāḡs of Egypt itself were recruited; the officers were mainly taken from among the young Mamlūks, besides whom there were not a few Europeans. With this army were won the military successes in Morea and Syria. The recruitment met with exceedingly strong opposition among the people of Egypt and later in Syria, and the methods used to get the required number were sometimes cruel, but the pasha's energy prevailed. At length this military organisation proved to be a means of education for the people and prepared the growth of national feeling among the generations to come. As has been said already, the final Imperial firḡān of 1841 limited the Egyptian army to 18,000 men in time of peace.

Muḥammad 'Alī's attempts to create an Egyptian fleet go back as far as 1815. At first he had ships built in France and Italy and in Bombay, but soon Alexandria itself got its yards. After the destruction of the Egyptian fleet at Navarino ship-building began again and quite a number of French and Italian officers were employed in the Egyptian navy after 1831. The Egyptian fleet, however, did not long survive its founder.

On the whole, Muḥammad 'Alī's rule wore a Turkish character. Most of the responsible posts in the administration and in the army were held by Turks and by descendants of the Mamlūks. Thus the Ottoman ruling system, with some modifications applied after the European model, was imposed on Egypt most completely at the time when the country itself was politically loosened from the empire. It may be called an exception that the Armenian Boghos Bey, who was for a long time Muḥammad 'Alī's minister of finance and of foreign affairs, came to this exalted position, although the use of Christians (Armenians and Copts) in more subordinate offices had always been a government practice in Turkey as well as in Egypt. The viceroy himself is said never to have spoken well any language other than Turkish.

Muḥammad 'Alī was not a great builder of magnificent architectural monuments. He erected a mosque after the Turkish fashion in the citadel of Cairo, but he never built costly palaces for himself. Most of his works were of public utility, such as the improvement and the enlargement of the irrigation system in the Delta, including the Nile Barrage below Cairo. This last work was undertaken in 1847, but failed.

The judgments on Muḥammad 'Alī's personality were very divergent evnn during his life-time. Most of his admirers were found amongst the French; in view of the on the whole friendly attitude of the French government this is of course not strange. British opinion was less favourable, but all those who came into contact with the viceroy were impressed by his personal charm. Now that his era belongs to the past, the impression remains of a great man in many respects, possessed of considerable personal courage and trustworthy and loyal in a high degree. His methods were sometimes cruel and in the beginning of his career he often had recourse to intrigues, but in the circumstances it is hard to understand how it could have been otherwise. As years passed by and the prosperity of the country increased, his methods of government grew more lenient, so that, at the end of his reign, he had become decidedly popular with his subjects. An equestrian statue of Muḥammad 'Alī now commands the chief square of Alexandria and one of the largest thoroughfares in Cairo is called after him.

MUHAMMAD 'ALĪ B. MUẒAFFAR AL-DĪN. [See KADJAR.]

MUHAMMAD BAIRAM (MUHAMMAD B. MUṢTAFĀ B. MUHAMMAD B. MUHAMMAD B. MUHAMMAD B. HUSAIN B. AḤMAD B. MUHAMMAD B. HUSAIN B. BAIRĀM), a Tunisian patriot and man of letters, born in Tunis in Muḥarram 1256 (March 5—April 3, 1840) and died on Wednesday, 25th Rabi' II, 1307 (Dec. 18, 1889) in Egypt, at Ḥulwān, and was buried in Cairo near the tomb of the Imām al-Shāfi'.
Belonging to the family of the Bairams whose ancestor Bairam, at the head of a body of soldiers, took part in the capture of Tunis by Sinān Pāshā on 25th Djumādā 981 (Sept. 24, 1573) and of which several members had held the office of grand mufti of Tunis, Muhammad Bairam studied at the Djamī' al-Zaitūna and had as teachers al-Ṭāhir b. 'Āshūr, al-Shādhilī b. Ṣāliḥ, Aḥmad Bairam, Muṣṭafā Bairam, the Shāikh al-Islām Muḥammad b. Mu'āwiya and others. At the age of 17, he compiled a kunnāsh in which he recorded the ordinances, decrees and administrative regulations which the emir Muḥammad Pāshā ordered the authorities to enforce.

On the death of his paternal uncle Bairam IV, he was given charge of the Madrasat al-'Unukiya on 9th Djumādā I, 1278 (Nov. 10, 1861) and on the 9th of the following month (Dec. 13) of that of the Djamī' al-Zaitūna. Soon after this, troubles provoked by the despotic régime began to disturb Tunisia and resulted in the closing of the representative assemblies in which Bairam was interested. He published in the Rā'id, the official gazette, the two first political articles that ever appeared in Tunisia and in them he condemned the tyranny of the authorities, preached the love of liberty and begged the government to be liberal and to grant its subjects representative assemblies.

On Ṣafar 17, 1291 (April 6, 1874) he was appointed to administer the awḡāf, which he hastened to reorganise. The hard work ruined his health and forced him to take a journey in Europe to recuperate; this caused him to begin his Ṣafwat al-'Itibār. He left in Shawwāl 1292 (Oct. 31—Nov. 28, 1875) and visited Paris. In the same year the Ṣādiḳi College was founded; Bairam shared in the preparation of the regulation and programme of studies, modelled on those of European institutions, and was one of the first to enrol his son so as to encourage his compatriots to take advantage of such innovations.

On 1st Djumādā II, 1292 (May 7, 1875) he was put in charge of the government printing works which he at once reorganised, and securing eminent assistants like Muḥammad al-Ṣanūsī of Tunis and Ḥamza Faṭḥ Allāh of Cairo he produced the Rā'id regularly. It was at this time also that he reorganised the Maktabat al-Ṣādiḳiyya alongside of the Djamī' al-Zaitūna.

In 1293 (1876) he assisted Turkey in the war with Serbia and Montenegro by sending money, horses and camels, political considerations preventing the despatch of help in men.

In the summer of 1295 (1878) he went a second time to Paris, visited the Exhibition and was received with great consideration by President MacMahon. He took the opportunity to visit London and England and, on his way back, Algiers. He took a very prominent part in the reorganisation or rather the creation of the Ṣādiḳi Hospital which was opened on Ṣafar 18, 1296 (Feb. 1879). At the same time he was one of the two arbitrators appointed by the Tunisian government in the case of Henshīr Saiyidī Ṭhābit and the French government. In the middle of the same year, he was appointed by the vizier to go to Paris, to receive medical attention, it was said, but in reality to ask Gambetta to remove the French consul, who was interfering in the domestic affairs of the country and even managing them. The consul thwarted the plans of Bairam and the vizier. On his return he told the vizier that France intended to annex Tunisia. Tired of the vexatious pestering of the vizier Muṣṭafā b. Ismā'il he obtained, after many attempts, permission to make the pilgrimage to Mecca and left Tunis, never to return, on Shawwāl 16, 1296 (Oct. 4, 1879). He went via Malta, Alexandria and Cairo, where he was received by the Khedive Tewfīḳ Pāshā, and thence to the Ḥijāz, visiting Mecca and Medina. He then went via Yambu' and the Suez Canal to Bairūt, where he was much honoured by the people and by Midḥat Pāshā, the governor of Syria, and on to Constantinople. He wrote a ḥaṣida in honour of Sulṭān 'Abd al-Ḥamid. The Tunisian government at the instigation of the French consul, who feared the establishment of closer relations between Turkey and Tunisia, demanded his return but the Sublime Porte diplomatically did not receive the request.

It was in Constantinople that he began to prepare the Ṣafwa for publication and finished the first two volumes. The penetration of France into Tunisia was a rude shock to Bairam, who in collaboration with the former vizier of Tunisia, Khair al-Din, was appointed by the Sublime Porte to prepare a report on the situation created by France. Despairing of returning to his native town he went to Leghorn and was joined by his family; he then went to Geneva, where he left his son to finish his education, and to Vienna and Bucharest and then settled in Constantinople. The Sulṭān, wishing to send some horses as a present to the Emperor Frederick III of Germany, Bairam was appointed to write the letter conveying the gift. During the eighteen months which he spent in the Turkish capital, Bairam drew a pension of £ T 25 per month. It was during this stay that he prepared the third volume of the Ṣafwa.

His health being undermined by an illness which grew worse daily and being unable to meet his expenses and fearing the machinations of his detractors, who saw in him a man to be removed, he left Constantinople on 1st Muḥarram 1302 (Oct. 21, 1884) to go to Egypt, where his letters of recommendation secured him the esteem of the Khedive Tewfīḳ Pāshā, who gave him a pension.

On the 25th Rabi' of the same year (Jan. 13, 1883) he produced al-'Ilām, a political and scientific journal.

Two years later, he went to London to attend the Jubilee celebrations of Queen Victoria, had medical attention in Paris and returned to Egypt via Berlin and Vienna. He then completed a work which he had begun in Constantinople entitled Taḍjīrid al-Sinān li 'l-Radd 'ala 'l-Khaṭīb Rinān (Renan), in which he refuted the arguments which Renan had advanced at a conference in the Sorbonne on March 29, 1883 on Islamisme et la Science (Paris 1883), in which he alleged that religion was an obstacle to the diffusion of science among Muslims. He also published a Risāla in which he declared that it was permitted to purchase bonds or shares in a Muslim government loan so that Muslim money should not leave the country, and that this had no character of usury. He wrote a report on the compulsory use of the Arabic language in the teaching even of modern sciences. He finished the fourth volume of the Ṣafwa and had begun the fifth which death prevented him from finishing.

On 12th Djumādā I, 1306 (Jan. 14, 1889) Bairam was appointed a judge in the Tribunal de 1^{er} Instance in Cairo. Going to Ḥulwān for a change of air, he took pleurisy and died after 25 days' illness.

He had a vast knowledge of Ḥadīth, law, history, ancient and modern, and historical and political geography.

In addition to the works already mentioned and numerous risālas which it would take too long to enumerate, we may mention the following: 1. Tuḥfat al-Khawāṣṣ fī Ḥill Ṣaid Bunduḡ al-Raṣāṣ, printed at Cairo in 1303 in which he claims that the law regards as permitted the flesh of game killed with fire-arms; 2. a treatise on prosody; 3. a risāla in which he says that it is permissible for men to let their hair hang down and float in the air, contrary to the opinion of several faḥīhs; 4. al-Taḥkīk fī Maṣ'alat al-Raḥīk, a study in which he shows what slavery among Muslims is according to the law, points out the motives of slavery and the rules regulating it, and concludes by saying that slaves who are sold at the present day are free men and that Muslim governments which forbid the sale of slaves are acting in accordance with the law; 5. Ṣafwat al-Ittibār bi-Mustawḍa' al-Amṣār, published in 6 vols. in Cairo in 1302—1303, 1303, 1304, 1311, the sixth volume being devoted to the biography of Muḥammad Bairam and edited by his son of the same name; it is perhaps the best treatise yet written in Arabic on political geography.

MUḤAMMAD BAKĀ', son of Shaikh Ghulām Muḥammad, born in 1037 (1627), was first taught by his father and then by Shaikh 'Abd Allāh, called Miyān Ḥaḍrat, and Shaikh Nūr al-Ḥaḡḡ b. 'Abd al-Ḥaḡḡ Dihlawī. After a few years he himself began teaching in his native country. He first became a murīd or disciple of his father, and after the latter's death attached himself to the famous saint, Muḥammad Maṣūm Sarhindī. He was persuaded by Iftikhār Khān, Mir Khānsāmān, to come to the court of Awrangzēb and accepted the duties of Bakhshi (pay master) and Wākī'ah-nigār (writer of the official diary), but by special favour he enjoyed much leisure, which he devoted to literary work. He died in 1094 (1683) at Sahāranpūr. He is the author of 1. Mir'āt Dīhān Numā (a general history compiled under Awrangzēb), 2. Riyāḍ al-Awliyā' (life of saints), 3. Tadhkirat al-Shu'arā' (biographies of the poets).

MUḤAMMAD BAKHTIYĀR KHALDĪ was an inhabitant of Ghūr [q. v.]. He was of a very mean appearance and amongst other deformities of his person it is said that when he stood upright the end of his fingers extended considerably below his knees. When he reached the age of manhood he went to Ghazna [q. v.] and offered himself as a volunteer to the officers of Muḥammad Ghōrī, but they refused to enrol him. He, therefore, repaired to Dihli and was appointed by Kuṭb al-Dīn Aibeg [q. v.] to command an army destined for the conquest of Bihār about 596 (1199). Here he was very successful. He was next ordered to invade Bengal. In 600—601 (1203—1204) he proceeded to Nadyā, the capital of Bengal, and captured it without any bloodshed. His last attempt was directed towards the invasion of Bhūṭān and Tibet, but he met with reverses which compelled him to retreat. He succeeded in reaching Dēvikōt in Bengal where he died, but his body was carried to Bihār and buried there in 602 (1206).

MUḤAMMAD BEY ABŪ DHĀHAB. [See 'ALĪ BEY.]

MUḤAMMAD BEY 'OTHMĀN AL-DJALĀL was born in Egypt in 1829, the son of a judge in the Court of Appeal, named Yūsuf al-Ḥasanī. When a boy he learned English, French and Turkish at the school of languages (Madrasat al-Asun) and when only 16 was given an appointment in the government translation bureau. His patron, the engineer Clot Bey, had him appointed to the Conseil de Médecine. In 1863 he entered the War Ministry and five years later the Ministry of the Interior. In 1879 the Khedive Tewfiḡ Pasha appointed him to his civil cabinet and several times took him to accompany him on journeys. After the death of the Khedive he was appointed a judge in Cairo. In 1895 he was pensioned and he devoted himself to literary work till his death at the end of 1898.

In collaboration with Clot Bey, he published a sketch of the history of Muḥammad 'Alī and an elementary grammar of the Arabic and French languages and also a description in rhyme of his journey with the Khedive Tewfiḡ. He then devoted himself to the translation of poetry: first of the fables of La Fontaine, the novel Paulet Virginie, and of Racine's tragedies Alexandre le Grand, Esther and Iphigénie. All these he translated into classical Arabic. But his real importance lies in his endeavour to translate Molière's comedies into the modern Arabic vernacular of Egypt, freely adapting them to Arabic conditions:

a. Tartuffe under the title Shaikh Matlūf, which Vollers edited under the title Is sēh Matlūf (cf. Z. D. M. G., xlv. 71 sqq. and thereon Socin, ibid., xlv. 131 sqq.); b. Madrasat al-Aẓwāj (L'École des Maris), transcribed and translated by M. Sobernheim, Berlin 1896; c. al-Nisā' al-'ālimāt (Les Femmes Savantes), transcribed and translated by Fr. Kern, Berlin 1898; d. Madrasat al-Nisā' (L'École des Femmes); e. Riwāyat al-Thuḡalā' (Les Pêcheurs), 1897. His collections of popular poems were also lithographed: Ḥiml Zadjal.

The Egyptians were not much attracted by these comedies translated into the vernacular. The language did not appear cultured enough to the Egyptian public. They were hardly ever produced and the rich vocabulary which the comedies contain has not been noticed or utilised by students of modern Arabic.

MUHAMMAD ÇELEBİ. [See GHĀZĀLĪ.]

MUHAMMAD DAMAD PAŞHA, grand-vizier, also called ÖKÜZ MUHAMMAD PAŞHA, was the son of a farrier of Constantinople and was educated (rather unusual at that time for a boy from Constantinople) in the imperial palace for a military career. He left the palace as silihdār, but we do not know his career until he was appointed, in 1016 (1607—1608), governor of Egypt. Here he was successful in the energetic suppression of a Mamlūk revolt and when he returned in 1610 to the capital with two years' tribute, he was appointed Kapudan Paşa, being at the same time married to sultān Aḥmad's seven years' old daughter Gawhar Khān (married afterwards to Rādjāb Paşa and Siyāwush Paşa; cf. Sidjill-i 'othmānī, i. 147), which assured him the qualification damad. As Kapudan Paşa he was made responsible for a defeat inflicted in 1613 on a part of his fleet, off the island of Chios, by a small Spanish-Sicilian fleet; this blow prevented the landing of Turkish ships in Syria on an expedition against the Druses. Damad Muḥammad was dismissed from the post of Kapudan, became, however, second vizier and, after Naṣūḥ Paşa's execution (October 17, 1614) he was appointed grand-vizier. In this office he commanded in 1615 as ser-āsker in a new campaign against Persia, the peace negotiations having ended unsuccessfully a short time before. Nothing was undertaken, however, that year, partly owing to astrological calculations. The grand-vizier remained that winter in Aleppo. The next year the Persians were attacked in Armenia, where they had made some progress; Eriwan was beleaguered and capitulated beginning of July 1616 after a 25 days' siege. The Turkish army was obliged, however, to withdraw with heavy losses occasioned by the rude climate and the insufficient food supplies. Damad Muḥammad was dismissed in January 1617 to be succeeded by Khalil Paşa [q. v.]; in the Venetian Relazioni Khalil Paşa and Muḥammad Paşa are described as the only members of the Imperial Diwān that really count. The next year, after the accession of 'Othmān II, he became Khalil's kā'im-makām during that year's Persian campaign and, after Khalil's disgrace, was appointed a second time grand-vizier (January 18, 1619). This dignity he held only a year, in which peace was concluded with Persia; the reason of his dismissal was a dispute with the Kapudan Güzelde 'Alī Paşa [q. v.], a favourite of the sultān (January 1620). Damad Muḥammad went as governor to Aleppo after having been deprived of all his wealth by the extortions of his successor. He died soon after his arrival in Aleppo and was buried in the tekke of Shaikh Abū Bakr, where he had a türbe made for himself.

MIRZĀ MUHAMMAD DJĀFAR KARADJĀ-DĀGHĪ, Munshī of the Qādjār prince Djalāl al-Dīn Mirzā and translator into Persian of the famous comedies of the Ādharbāidjānī playwright Mirzā Faṭḥ 'Alī Aḥundzāde. After they had been published (1859) Mirzā Faṭḥ 'Alī sent a copy of his plays to the above-mentioned Qādjār prince in the hope that he would take notice of it. But the book lay unheeded for years in the prince's library until Muḥammad Djāfar opened it by chance. The munshī, delighted with the plays, at once decided to translate them into Persian. As no one would help him, he was forced to print the translation at his own expense, which brought him into considerable financial difficulties. The translation appeared in lithograph in Teherān in 1874 under the title Tamthilāt. When the work was finished, Muḥammad Djāfar corresponded with the author and found out that they were related. The Persian translation is of the greatest importance for the history of Persian theatre as it gave the stimulus to the composition of original works. The influence of Aḥundzāde on the work of Malkum-Khān and even on more recent dramatists, such as Maḥmūdī, is quite apparent. From the artistic point of view however, Muḥammad Djāfar's translations cannot be called successful as their language is very clumsy and filled with countless Ādharbāidjānisms. It is remarkable that European orientalists first became acquainted with Aḥundzāde's works in their Persian dress and published a considerable number of these translations (see Bibl.) as textbooks for the study of spoken Persian, although, in view of their linguistic defects, the translations cannot by any means be regarded as models of the living Persian language.

MUHAMMAD ES'AD. [See ES'AD EFENDI.]

MUHAMMAD GHAWTH GAWĀLIYĀRĪ,

an Indian saint. He was a descendant of the famous saint Shaikh Farid al-Dīn 'Attār [q. v.], his full name being Abū 'l-Mu'ayyad Muḥammad b. Khaṭīr al-Dīn b. Laṭīf b. Mu'īn al-Dīn Kaṭṭāl b. Khaṭīr al-Dīn b. Bāyazīd b. Farid al-Dīn 'Attār. Some say that his great-grandfather Mu'īn al-Dīn Kaṭṭāl came to India and died at Djawnpūr. One of his brothers, Shaikh Bahlūl, who was attached to the service of Humāyūn, fell in battle and lies buried at the gate of the fort in Bayāna. According to his own statement, Muḥammad Ghawth was born in 906 (1500). He was a pupil of Shaikh Zuhūr al-Dīn Hādīdjī Hudūr, and belonged to the Shaṭṭāriya sect of Sūfis. He and his eight brothers were disciples of Shaikh Hādīdjī Hamīd, khalifa of Shāh Kāḍan, the disciple and khalifa of Shaikh 'Abd Allāh Shaṭṭārī. After leading a solitary life for more than thirteen years in the mountains of Cūnār, he came to Guḍjarāt, where he became acquainted with the popular saint and scholar Shaikh Wadji al-Din Guḍjarāti. He went to Āgra in 966 (1558) and was treated with high regard by Akbar. Subsequently he returned to Gawāliyar, where he died in 970 (1562). Humāyūn is also said to have been a faithful follower of Muḥammad Ghawth.

He was the author of several Sūfi works, the most popular of which is Djawāhir-i Khamsa, in Arabic, which he completed in 956 (1549), and which he subsequently rendered into Persian with additional improvements. His other works are Kalid-i Makhāsīn, Bahr al-Hayāt, and Mī'rādī Nāma. It is related that his ecstatic sayings in the Mī'rādī Nāma were condemned by the 'ulamā' of Guḍjarāt, who passed orders for his execution, but that he was saved by the timely intervention of the above-mentioned Shaikh Wadji al-Din.

MUHAMMAD GURDJĪ PASHA. Two Turkish grand-viziers are known under this name.

1. The one who is also called KHĀDIM MUHAMMAD PASHA began his political career after having been a eunuch in the imperial palace; in 1604 he became wālī in Egypt, where he was able to establish some order; after that he was twice kā'im-makām of the grand-vizierate in the capital, in 1611 and in 1615; in the meantime he had held governorships in Erzerūm, Bosnia and Belgrad. He was called to the grand-vizierate in the days of Sulṭān Muṣṭafā I's second reign, when the Janissaries and the Sipāhis were dictating their will at Constantinople (September 1622). Khādim Muḥammad owed his nomination to the Sipāhis — who had obtained the dismissal of Mīr Ḥusain Pasha, the leader of the Janissaries — but also to the confidence of the wālīde and to his well-earned reputation of a wise and experienced politician. He succeeded indeed in the abolition of abuses in the army administration by convoking a large council of dignitaries, where the reinforcement of the kanūn was decided. When, however, in several parts of the empire, there arose opposition against the Janissary regime, especially the action of Abāza Pasha [q.v.] in Erzerūm, the grand-vizier was unable to oppose the Janissaries in Constantinople. Their leader Mīr Ḥusain was intriguing again, while at the same time the soldateska was crying for revenge for Sulṭān 'Othmān II; as a result of these riots the former grand-vizier Dāwūd Pasha was killed in January 1623. On February 5 of the same year the rebellious Janissaries, declaring that a eunuch could not be their grand-vizier, obtained his dismissal in favour of Mīr Ḥusain. Gurdjī Muḥammad went into exile, but after the enthronement of Murād IV he came back to the capital as vizier and acted for the third time as kā'im-makām in May 1624 when the then grand-vizier went on an expedition against Abāza. He died on March 26 and was buried in a türbe in Eiyūb. His age is not given in the sources. In the opinion of the English resident Roe, Gurdjī Muḥammad was one of the few personalities that were able to lead the affairs of the empire.

2. One of the grand-viziers of the first period of Muḥammad IV's reign, when the state affairs were really governed by the wālīde Kösem [q.v.] and the kızlar aghas Suleimān. This Gurdjī Muḥammad had already a long career as governor of Syria and other provinces behind him when, at the age of 94 years, he was called to the highest dignity in the beginning of November 1651 as successor of Siyāwush Pasha, who had shown too much independence towards the court. During his grand-vizierate he is said to have shown fully his lack of capacity, taking the alarming revolts in Asia Minor of Abāza Pasha, Ipshir Pasha and Kaṭırdjī Oḡlu with the greatest equanimity. He was especially anxious to remove from the capital all possible rivals to the grand-vizierate, amongst them Muḥammad Köprülü, which brought him, as Na'imā says, the nickname of habb al-salāṭin "the pill of the sulṭāns". On June 19, 1652 he was deposed again by the court party. After having been exiled he lived some time at Eiyūb and died in 1664, at the age of 110 years, in Temesvár.

MUHAMMAD HASAN KHAN, a Persian man of letters, who died on 19th Shawwāl 1313 (April 3, 1896). His honorific titles were Sanī' al-Dawla and later I'timād al-Saltāna.

Through his mother he was related to the Kādījars [q.v.] and through his father he claimed descent from the Mongol rulers. His father, Ḥājjī 'Alī Khān of Marāgha, was a faithful servant of Nāsir al-Dīn Shāh (in 1852 he discovered the conspiracy of Sulaimān Khān) and the son from his youth upwards was in the service of the court.

Muḥammad Ḥasan Khān was one of the first students at the Dār al-Funūn founded in 1268 (1851) and spent 12 years there. Later he went with his father when he was appointed governor of 'Arabistān. In 1280 (1863) he was appointed second secretary to the Paris Legation and spent three and a half years there. On his return to Ṭeherān he was appointed interpreter to the Shāh and in this capacity accompanied him on his travels. In 1288 (1871) he was appointed head of the dragomanate (dār al-tarjūma) and of the press bureau (dār al-ṭibā'a) as well as director of the official Rūnāma-yi dawlati. In 1290 he was appointed superintendent of the palaces and assistant to the minister of justice and henceforth continually rose in rank.

E. G. Browne criticises severely the work of Muhammad Ḥasan Khān and accuses him of having put his name to books alleged to have been written for him by indigent scholars. On the other hand, Joukovsky speaks with much respect of his works and shows that he inspired a great many literary undertakings (e.g. the printing of the Qur'ān with an inter-linear Persian translation, concordance and index; the foundation of a press for printing in Roman characters; the establishment of the Mushiriya school; encouragement of the daily press etc.) although after the appearance at Bombay of a satirical work by Shaikh Ḥashimī Shīrāzī the censorship was established on the suggestion of Muhammad Ḥasan Khān.

The fact is that the number of works — often very useful — bearing the name of Muhammad Ḥasan Khān, is very large. Without the help of "secretaries" some of these books could not have been undertaken. To Muhammad Ḥasan Khān is in any case due the honour of having suggested them. His principal works deal with the history and geography of Persia and are often in the form of almanacs. They are: Mir'āt al-Buldān, i., two editions (1293, 1294, a dictionary of geography: letters ا — و); ii., 1295 (history of the years i.—xv. of the reign of Nāṣir al-Dīn and calendar); iii. (years xvi.—xxxii. of the reign of Nāṣir al-Dīn and calendar); iv., 1296 (geography: letters ث — ج and history of 1296). In the geographical portions we find quotations from Yāqūt and European travellers along with notes specially prepared by the local authorities (an extract from the Mir'āt al-Buldān: Tārīkh-i Bābul wa-Ninawā was published at Bombay in 1311); Tārīkh-i muntazam-i Nāṣiri, 3 parts, 1298—1300 (history from the time of the Hijra; vol. iii.: history of the Qādjar 1194—1300); Maṭla' al-Shams, 3 vols., 1301—1303 (description of the journey to Khurāsān with important archaeological data; ii. 165—213 contains the autobiography of Shāh Tahmāsp, and ii. 469—500 a list of books in the library of the sanctuary of Mashhad); Kitāb Ḥidā'ija al-Sa'ada fi Ḥadīdja al-Shahāda, Tīhrān 1304, Tabriz 1310 (history of the martyrs of Karbalā); Khairātun ḥisānun [cf. Sūra lx. 70], 3 vols., 1304—1307 (biographies of famous women of the Islām); Kitāb Durar al-Tijān fi Tārīkh Bani Ashkān, 1308—1310, 3 vols. (history of the Arsacids); Kitāb al-Ma'āthir wa'l-Aṭhār, 1309 (historical almanac for the 40th anniversary of the reign of Nāṣir al-Dīn Shāh); Kitāb al-Tadwin fi Ahwāl Djabal-i Sharwīn, 1311 (history and geography of Sawād-kūh in Māzandarān).

In the field of literature Muhammad Ḥasan Khān was only a translator (Swiss Family Robinson, romances of Jules Verne, discovery of America, Tārīkh-i Inkishāf-i Yangi Dunyā, Tīhrān 1288, Memoirs on the Indian Mutiny of 1857). He also wrote a number of text-books on geography and on the French language.

MUHAMMAD ḤUSAIN TABRIZI, a famous Persian calligrapher, pupil of the celebrated Mir Saiyid Aḥmad Maṣḥḥadī and teacher of the no less famous Mir 'Imād. His remarkable command of the art of calligraphy, so popular in Persia, brought him the title of honour Mihīn Ustād (greatest master). His father Mirzā Shukrullāh was Mustawfī al-Mamālik to the Ṣafawid Tahmāsp I (1521—1576), the master himself, according to the Oriental sources, was vizier to Shāh Ismā'īl II (1576—1578) but lost the favour of the sovereign and was forced to fly to India where he remained to his death. Rieu says he died about 950 (1543), but this does not agree with other biographical details and is indeed improbable. That he spent the remainder of his life in India is evident from the fact that most of the manuscripts known to have been written by him were finished in India. The inscriptions on the masjids and khānqāhs of Tabriz are said to have been his masterpieces but unfortunately they have been almost entirely destroyed by earthquakes. After completing these inscriptions he made the obligatory pilgrimage to Mecca and on his return devoted himself exclusively to copying the masterpieces of Persian poetry. A Diwān of the Persian poet Amīr Shāhī from his pen is in the Cambridge University Library.

MUHAMMAD ISMĀ'IL B. 'ABD AL-GHĀNĪ AL-SHAHĪD MAWLĀNĀ was born on the 28th Shawwāl 1196 (1781), of a Dihlī family that traces its origin to the Caliph 'Umar. He was a nephew of the famous Mawlānā Shāh 'Abd al-'Azīz (d. 1239 = 1823). Having lost his father early, he was brought up by his uncle Mawlānā 'Abd al-Qādir (d. 1242 = 1826). In childhood he was inattentive to his studies and fond of swimming in the Djamna, but thanks to a retentive memory and a keen intellect he later on became a learned man.

Being shocked at the shirk or idolatrous tendencies, then prevailing among Indian Muslims, he zealously preached the doctrines of Islām. Impressed by the religious sanctity of Saiyid Aḥmad al-Mudjaddid, he became his disciple and his constant companion. In 1236 (1820) they went to Mecca and then to Constantinople, where they were received with marked consideration. Six years later, on their return to Dihlī, they gained many followers. In 1243 (1827) they with many disciples went to Peshāwar and declared a religious war against the Sikhs. But owing to some innovations upon the usages of the Afghāns, their power declined and during a retreat they perished in a skirmish with the Sikhs in 1247 (1831).

He is the author of the following works:

1. Risāla Uṣūl al-Fiqh, a treatise on the principles of Muhammadan law according to the Ḥanafī school;
2. Manzab-i Imāmat, a Persian treatise on the Imāmat;
3. Taḳwīyat al-Imān, an Urdu treatise on theology (printed 1293, translated into English by Mir Shāhāmāt 'Alī, cf. J. R. A. S., xiii. 316);
4. Shirāt al-Mustaḥḥim, a treatise in Persian on the doctrines of Islām.

MUHAMMAD KĀZIM B. MUHAMMAD AMİN was a *munshi*² or secretary to Awrangzēb. He was entrusted with the compilation, from official records, of the history of the emperor's reign and was ordered to submit it to him for correction. He accompanied the emperor on his journey to Adjmir where he fell ill and was consequently sent back to Dihli and died there shortly after his return in 1092 (1681).

The history which he composed is known as Ālamgir Nāma; it begins with the departure of Awrangzēb from Awrangābād in 1068 (1657) and is brought down to 1078 (1667). It has been printed in the Bibliotheca Indica, Calcutta 1865–1868.

MUHAMMAD KHALĪFA. [See MUHAMMAD B. HUSAIN.]

MUHAMMAD KHĀN BANGASH, Nawwāb styled Ghādanfar Djang, was a Rohila chief of the tribe of Bangash. The city of Farrukhābād was founded by him in the name of his patron the emperor Farrukhsiyar. When Muhammad Shāh became emperor of Dihli, he appointed him governor of Mālwa in 1143 (1730), but as he could not stop the repeated attacks of the Mahrattas he was removed in 1145 (1732) and appointed governor of Ilāhābād. Muhammad Khān intended to reduce the Bundēlas of whom Rādjā Chātursāl was chief. He captured several places but as he did not know the roads, Chātursāl with the help of Peshwa Bādji Rāo, surrounded him suddenly with an army. The Nawwāb took refuge in the fortress of Djaigarh; whereupon his son, Kāsim Djang, having collected an army of Afghāns marched to Djaigarh and escorted his father in safety to Ilāhābād. The imperial ministers then removed him from the governorship. He died in 1156 (1743).

This treatise on the cultivation of tulips was composed in the reign of Sultan Aḥmad III (1115–1143 = 1703–1730), who had given the author the title Shūkūfepervverān on the suggestion of the grand vizier Ibrāhīm Pasha between 1718 and 1730.

MUHAMMAD MUHSIN AL-ĤĀDJIDJ, son of Ḥādjidj Faḳd Allāh, son of Āghā Faḳd Allāh, a rich merchant of Irān who came to India in the early part of the xviiith century, was born at Hügli in 1143 (1730). For a time the Āghā resided at Murshidābād and carried on there an extensive mercantile business, but finding the rising port of Hügli a more convenient centre, he finally settled there with his son Ḥādjī Faḳd Allāh.

Already settled at Hügli was one Āghā Muṭahhar, who, coming originally from Persia like Āghā Faḳd Allāh, had won his way at the court of Awrangzēb [q. v.]. That monarch had conferred upon him extensive djāgirs in Djisūr and other places in Bengal, and Āghā Muṭahhar, eager to take possession, finally himself set out from Dihli for the Eastern province. So well did he manage his newly acquired lands that he soon became one of the wealthiest men in the province. He selected Hügli as his headquarters. Āghā Muṭahhar for many years remained childless and it was only in very old age that a daughter was born to him. Round this only child, named Mānū Djān Khānam, all his affections centred, and dying when she was only seven years old he left her all his property. The widow of Āghā Muṭahhar was displeased with the conduct of her husband and subsequently married Ḥādjidj Faḳd Allāh, the son of Āghā Faḳd Allāh, her late husband's friend. The fruit of this marriage was Ḥādjidj Muhammad Muhsin. He was eight years younger than his half-sister, Mānū Djān Khānam. Muhammad Muhsin was first brought up at Hügli, afterwards he completed his education in Murshidābād. After finishing his studies at Murshidābād, he returned to his sister's house at Hügli. Later, he started on a long journey and for twenty-seven years he continued his travels in India, Arabia, Persia and Central Asia. It was not until he had reached his sixtieth year that he finally decided to terminate his travels and return home. Making his way slowly across Northern India he came at last to Lucknow. Thence he came to Murshidābād in 1216 (1801), with the intention of settling there. But during his long absence his sister, Mānū Djān Khānam, had married her cousin, Šalāḥ al-Dīn Muhammad Khān, nephew of Āghā Muṭahhar; her husband died in the prime of life and she was anxiously waiting for the arrival of her step-brother. At last at the solicitation of his sister, Muḥammad Muḥsin came to Hūglī, and when she died at the age of eighty-one in 1218 (1803), she left a will bequeathing to Muḥammad Muḥsin the whole of her property.

It was thus not until Ḥādjī Muḥammad Muḥsin had reached the age of seventy-three that he became possessed of the great wealth which greatly helped his co-religionists in Bengal in the pursuit of education. He had never married and the death of his half-sister left him without near relatives. He was anxious that his great wealth should be put to good use after his death and consequently on the April 26, 1806 (1221 A. H.) he signed a Deed of Trust, setting apart the whole of his income for charitable purposes in perpetuity.

Ḥādjī Muḥammad Muḥsin lived for six years after making this noble disposition of his property. For his own personal use he had reserved only so much property as would bring him in about one hundred rupees a month. In 1227 (1812) he died at the age of about eighty-two and was buried in the garden adjoining the Imāmbārā which he had so splendidly endowed.

MUHAMMAD MURTAḌĀ B. MUHAMMAD B. MUHAMMAD B. 'ABD AL-RAZZĀQ ABU 'L-FAIḌ AL-ḤUSAINĪ AL-ZABĪDĪ AL-ḤANAFĪ, an Arabic scholar, born in 1145 (1732) in Bilgrām in Ḳannūdj in N. W. India, settled, after travelling for many years in pursuit of knowledge, in Cairo on 9th Ṣafar 1167 (Dec. 7, 1753). There he succeeded in reviving an interest in the study of Tradition by giving lectures to specially invited companies. In Upper Egypt also he was always a welcome guest with the Arab Shaiḫ Humām and in the Egyptian country towns, and his fame spread to the Sūdān and even to India. From the year 1191 (1777) he drew a pension from the government. He died in Ṣaḥbān 1205 (April 1791) in Cairo of the plague.

His principal works are two great commentaries. He wrote the Taḏj al-'Arūs on Firūzābādī's Ḳāmūs, finishing it in 1181 (1767) after 14 years' work; although in the preface he quotes over a hundred sources used by him, he takes most of the additions to the Ḳāmūs bodily from the Lisān al-'Arab of Ibn Manẓūr. It was printed incompletely in 5 vols. in Cairo 1286–1287 and in 10 vols. in Cairo 1307. He wrote a commentary, also very extensive, on Ḡhazzālī's Iḥyā' 'Ulūm al-Dīn, entitled Ithāf al-Sada al-muttaḳin, in which, in addition to explaining words he devotes special attention to establishing traditions quoted by al-Ḡhazzālī; it was printed at Fās in 1301–1304 in 13 vols., at Cairo in 1311 in 10 vols. He also composed a number of smaller works on lexicography and Tradition and also on the genealogy of the 'Alids: 1. Nashwat al-Irtiyāḥ fī Bayān Ḥaḳīḳ al-Maisir wa 'L-Ḳidāḥ, ed. by Landberg, Primeurs arabes, i. 40–55; 2. al-Ḳawl al-mabṭūṭ fī Taḥḳīḳ Lafẓ

MUHAMMAD PASHA. [See MUHAMMAD DAMAD PASHA, MUHAMMAD GURDJĪ PASHA, ḲARAMĀNĪ MEḤMED PASHA, ṢOḲOLLĪ.]

MUHAMMAD PASHA, BALṬADJĪ, grand vizier, was born about 1660 in the town of 'Oṭmāndjīk, and, after an education in the imperial palace, entered the corps of the balṭadjīs. On account of his beautiful voice he acted for some time as müeddhin; later on he became a scribe and rose rapidly in this career. In 1703, at Aḥmad III's accession, he became mir-āḳhor and was made Ḳapudan Pasha in November 1704. In December of the same year he obtained the grand vizierate as successor of Ḳalaylī Aḥmad Pasha, against whom, although he had been at one time his fellow balṭadjī, he had used all his power of intrigue, for which he was especially notorious, according to the historiographer Rāshid. On May 3, 1706 he was dismissed — on account of his lack of capacity, as Rāshid says — and sailed to Lemnos, but his friends obtained for him the nomination to the governorship of Erzerūm. In January 1709 he became governor of Aleppo and from here he was called, in August 1710, a second time to the grand vizierate, after Köprülü Nu'mān Pasha had proved unable to restore stability in the way that had been expected from him. At that time the first great conflict with Russia was drawing near; Charles XII of Sweden, after the battle of Poltawa, remained in Turkey. The beginning of Balṭadjī Muḥammad's second grand vizierate was therefore filled with preparations for the war with Russia, which had been decided upon at a great state council in November 1710, and approved of by a fatwā of the Shaiḫ al-Islām. The grand vizier was made commander of this memorable campaign, which quickly was ended by the battle near Falcīu (Falksen, Turk. Falci) on the Pruth (July 21–22, 1711). Peter the Great's army was left in a desperate position, but his generals succeeded in concluding a truce with the grand vizier, by the terms of which the Russian army was allowed to withdraw, while Azof was restored to the Turks. The general feeling in the Ottoman historical tradition is that Baltadji Muhammad had been bribed; his enemies at any case intrigued against him in Constantinople so that, even before his return to the capital, he was informed of his dismissal at Adrianople (Nov. 1711). The conclusion of the armistice of the Pruth was also much against the wishes of Charles XII who, on his remonstrances to the grand vizier, is said to have got the insinuating reply that, in case Peter had been taken prisoner, there would have been nobody to govern his country and that, in general, it was not good that sovereigns should leave their country (Voltaire, Histoire de Charles XII et de Pierre I). Baltadji was exiled to Lesbos and then to Lemnos, where he died in 1712, aged over fifty.

The bad reputation which this grand vizier has in Turkish history, and which is also given him by von Hammer, does not seem to be confirmed by western sources (Jorga, iv. 308).

MUHAMMAD PASHA, ELMAS, grand vizier, was born about 1660 in a village near Sinub as son of a ship's captain. After having been attached to the service of the pasha of Tripolis, he was educated in the khāssa of the palace and became in 1687 silāh'dār; soon afterwards he became nishāndji and obtained the rank of vizier. In Ahmad II's reign he was pasha in Bosnia, but did not yet play a prominent part, though he is said to have been one of that sultan's favourites. After Mustafā II's accession he was appointed kā'im-makām of the imperial stirrup and, when a revolt of the Janissaries had cost the grand vizier Sürmeli 'Alī Pasha's life, he was appointed in his stead (April 1695). He accompanied the new sultan during the campaigns against Austria of the years 1695, 1696 and 1697. On September 11, 1697 the Turkish army was attacked by the Austrians under prince Eugène, while it was passing the Theiss near Zenta in order to march on Szegedin. The sultan had already reached the left bank, but the grand vizier, together with a number of high military chiefs, was killed that day in the battle, which meant a heavy loss for the Turkish troops. Elmas Muhammad had been against this military enterprise, but the other members of the council had persuaded the sultan to the contrary. He is said to owe the surname Elmas "diamond" to his accomplishments and handsome physique.

MUHAMMAD PASHA KARAMANĪ. [See KARAMANĪ MEHMED PASHA.]

MUHAMMAD PASHA, LALA, grand vizier under Ahmad I. He was a Bosnian by origin and a relation of Muhammad Sokolli Pasha. The year of his birth is not given. After having had his education in the palace, he was mir-akhor and became in 1595 agha of the Janissaries. Two years later he took part in the Austrian wars as beylerbey of Rüm-ili and was commander of Esztergom (Gran; Turkish: Usturghon) when this town capitulated to the Austrian army in September 1595. During the following years Lala Muhammad was several times ser-asker in Hungary and when, in July 1604, the grand vizier Yawuz 'Alī had died in Belgrad, on his way to the Hungarian theatre of war, the sultan sent the imperial seal to Lala Muhammad. Although peace negotiations were continually being resumed, the new grand vizier took in that year Waitzen (Turk. Wād) but besieged in vain Esztergom. During next year's campaign Esztergom was taken by Lala Muhammad (Sept. 29, 1605) and in November he crowned the Hungarian Bocskay as king of Hungary (without the regions occupied directly by the Turks) and Transylvania. In that same year the Turkish eastern army under Cighale Pasha was beaten by the Persians, while the troops sent to subdue the revolt in Anatolia were routed at Bulawadin. After his return it was decided that the grand vizier should remain next year in the capital and lead the war on the two fronts and, if possible, bring to a successful end the long-drawn peace negotiations with Austria. The young sultan, however, changed his mind in keeping with the wishes of the Kapudan Pasha Derwish, who was intriguing against Lala Muhammad. Accordingly the latter was ordered to take command of the army against Persia. He had already put up his tent in Üsküdar, when overcome by sorrow because of the frustration of his plans, he was seized with an apoplexy and died three days afterwards (May 23, 1606). He was buried near the türbe of Sokolli Pasha.

MUHAMMAD PASHA, RUM, vizier and, according to some sources, grand vizier under Sultan Muhammad II. As his surname indicates he was a Greek renegade. After having had an education in the palace he was destined for a military career and became at one time beylerbey. The dates of his birth and of his military advancements are not recorded. He had taken part in the final campaign of Muhammad II against Karamān in 1466 and was charged by the sultan with the transfer of parts of the population of the conquered regions to Constantinople, instead of the grand vizier Mahmūd Pasha [q. v.] who executed these measures in too lenient a way, as the sources say. On the way back to Constantinople Mahmūd was dispossessed of his dignity in favour of Rüm Muhammad. The latter remained grand-vizier until 1470, during which time Muḥammad II went on his campaigns in Albania [cf. SKANDER BEG] and Negroponte. Rūm Muḥammad Pasha does not seem to have taken part in these expeditions, but, as a critical perusal of the sources has shown, he was especially charged with the problem of the repopulation of Constantinople; his commissionership for the transfer of the Ḳaramānian population had been connected with the same problem.

As the measures taken to make the new capital again inhabited must have been unpopular in Muslim circles — the Greeks and other Christian elements were granted as favourable conditions as the Muḥammadans to settle in the town — the historical tradition of the early Ottoman chronicles is rather against Muḥammad Pasha. They ascribe to him the reestablishment of the house-rent in Constantinople called mukāṭaʿa, which was considered as an injustice to the new Muslim settlers. The mukāṭaʿa is said to have been instituted by the sultān, then abolished and again instituted by this grand-vizier. But, as F. C. Giese has shown by an analysis of the text of 'Ashīk-Pasha-Zāde and Tursun Bey (cf. Isl., xix., 1931, p. 268 sqq.), these measures were part of the policy of the sultān himself and were probably only executed by the temporary grand vizier, who, being a Greek, must have had special qualifications for the difficult task. This last circumstance, however, makes him the more suspect in the eyes of the historiographers and for this reason we may perhaps assume that his reported cruelty towards the population of the Ḳaramānian towns has been exaggerated by the sources, in order to add glory to his predecessor Maḥmūd Pasha, whose memory has survived as that of a national hero. It is not even beyond question that Rūm Muḥammad was ever really grand vizier (Sidjill-i 'othmānī). The Ḥadīkat al-Wuzarā' of 'Othmān-Zāde (p. 10) ascribes Maḥmūd Pasha's fall to Rūm Muḥammad's intrigues, but makes Ishāk Pasha his immediate successor in the grand-vizierate. So do other historians.

He was dismissed in 875 (1470) and was afterwards (according to the Sidjill-i 'othmānī in 879 [1075]) appointed wālī of Ḳonya with the mission to pacify the newly conquered territory. He was defeated, however, by the tribe of the Warsak in the Cilician passes; soon afterwards he died, probably killed by order of the sultān (according to 'Ashīk-Pasha-Zāde, ed. Giese, p. 133). The chronological order of these events is not certain.

Rūm Muḥammad Pasha was buried in a mosque which he had founded in Üsküdar.

MUHAMMAD PASHA, SOĞOLLI [See SOĞOLLI].

MUHAMMAD PASHA, SULTĀN ZĀDE, grand vizier under Sultān Ibrāhīm, was born about 1600 as son of 'Abd al-Raḥmān Bey, son of the former grand vizier Aḥmad Pasha (under Murād III), and by his mother a grandson of a princess of the imperial house, whence his surname Sultān Zāde. After having been kapıdār bashī in the palace, he adopted a military career, became already in 1630 ḳubbe veziri and was appointed in 1638 governor of Egypt. In 1642 he was made commander of the expedition against Azof [q. v.] which town he rebuilt after it had been burned by the Cossacks before its surrender. On his return he formed with the silāḥdār Yūsuf Pasha and the sultān's favourite Djindji Khwādjā a triumvirate, supported by the wālīde Kösem [q. v.]; they intrigued against the grand vizier Ḳara Muṣṭafā Pasha, who sought to remove the danger by sending Sultān Zāde Muḥammad in 1643 to Damascus as wālī. After Ḳara Muṣṭafā had been executed on January 1, 1644, Sultān Zāde Muḥammad was made grand vizier. One of his most conspicuous characteristics in this office seems to have been his ability to flatter the sultān and to satisfy his very extravagant wishes by obtaining money from all possible sources and by giving sandjaks to many of Ibrāhīm's favourites. At this time the Empire was at peace with Austria (which sent in August 1644 an extraordinary embassy to confirm the peace) and with Persia, although Rakoczy, the prince of Transylvania, did his best to involve Turkey in a war with Austria. There was, however, a strong desire to go to war with Venice and to conquer Crete. The grand vizier was against this undertaking, but his former confederates drew the sultān to their side. Accordingly Yūsuf Pasha sailed as serdār to Crete in the spring of 1645 and took Canea (August 17). The bad feelings that arose after Yūsuf Pasha's return led to Sultān Zāde's dismissal from the post of grand vizier (December 1645). After Yūsuf Pasha in January 1646 had fallen a victim to Sultān Ibrāhīm's cruel capriciousness, Sultān Zāde himself was made serdār against Crete. He departed in April 1646, drove the Venetians from Tenedos, which they had taken by surprise, and died shortly after his arrival in Canea (July 1646). He was buried in the teke of Hudā'i in Üsküdar.

MUHAMMAD PASHA, TIRYAKI, grand vizier under Maḥmūd I, was born about 1680 at Constantinople. His father was a Janissary. He began his career as a scribe and rose to important posts; in 1739 he played a role in the peace negotiations at Belgrad with Austria. He had been kiaya of the grand vizierate, viz. minister of the interior, when the sultān, under influence of his new kızlar aghası, the so-called Beṣhrī the Younger, dismissed his predecessor Ḥasan Pasha and called him to the grand vizierate (August 1746). The twelve months of his period of office were not filled with war but with important diplomatic negotiations, in which he was supported by the new kiaya Muḥammad Sa'īd, later grand vizier, and the re'is efendi Muṣṭafā, both of them equally well versed in European diplomacy. During Tiryākī Muḥammad's grand vizierate peace was concluded with Nādir Shāh of Persia (September 4, 1746) and the peace treaties with Austria and Russia were renewed. As the reason for his dismissal (August 24, 1747) is given his addiction to the use of drugs

(hence the surname Tiryākī) and his quarrelsome, vindictive character, by which he had made enemies, especially in the ranks of the 'ulemā'. After his fall he was governor in different eyālets, as İč lli, Mōsul, Baghdād, Djidda, and he died in July 1751 at Rethymo in Crete, where he lived, probably in involuntary retirement. According to the Sidjill-i 'othmāni, he was a capable official before his coming to the grand vizierate; afterwards he was a failure in every office.

MUHAMMAD PASHA, YEGEN, grand vizier under Maḥmūd II. He was called Yegen "the Nephew" because he stood in that relationship to Kel Yūsuf Efendi, a high official in the financial administration (Sidjill-i 'othmāni, iv. 659); he also began his career by holding different financial offices, and was also kapı kīyası of the grand vizier Topal 'Othmān Pasha (1732). In 1737 he became kā'im-makām in Constantinople during the absence of the grand vizier 'Abd Allāh Pasha. The latter was successful that year against the Austrians on the Danube frontier (taking of Feth İslām), but was nevertheless dismissed, after his return, through the influence of the kızlar aghası Beshir. Yegen Muḥammad was appointed in his place (December 1737) and had to continue the peace negotiations with Austria and Russia, which were made especially complicated by the rivalry between France (represented by de Villeneuve) and the Sea Powers in offering their good services as mediators. The grand vizier himself was rather in favour of continuing the war and, being of a proud and arrogant character, made the negotiations still more difficult. In June 1737 he went as serdār to the Austrian front and was successful in recapturing Semendra and Orsowa (August). He was back in the capital in November. At the end of the year the Russians retired from Očakow and Kilburnu, which placed Turkey in a favourable position in the never ceasing peace negotiations, in which Poland also had become involved. But not even this grand vizier was to bring the war to an end; the same influence that had disposed of his predecessor obtained his dismissal in March 1739. After that Yegen Muḥammad was governor of Crete, Bosnia, Aidin and Anadolu. When in this last office he was called to the post of serdār on the front of Kaṛş (March 1745) against the Persians. He received large reinforcements from different quarters and thought himself strong enough to attack Nādir Shāh in his encampment near Eriwan. This battle resulted in disaster for the Turks, owing mainly to a mutiny among the irregular lewends. Yegen Muḥammad was killed, probably by the mutineers, in August 1745.

MUHAMMAD (MEHMET) RA'UF, an important Ottoman author and poet who plays a very prominent part in the development of the Turkish moderns and of the written language.

Born on Aug. 12, 1291 (1875) in Constantinople, the son of an Anatolian, who came from Kutāhya, and a Circassian mother, he received a good education. He attended the Naval School and became a naval officer but he only spent eighteen months in the navy, mainly in Crete. When quite a boy, he displayed an irrepressible love for the theatre and literature and began to write at the age of 10, taking as his models the novels of Aḥmad Midḥat and the translations of French romances of adventure. This first production was a drama, Denā'et yakḥod Gaskonya Kursanları ("Baseness or the Corsairs of Gascogne"). As his knowledge of French, and later of English, increased, he extended the scope of his reading and of his interests, so that at school he received the nick-name Roman okuyan Efendi (the novel-reader) and later Romanđi (the novel-writer). His literary activity proper only began in the Naval School where he became acquainted with Georges Ohnet, Octave Feuillet, Alphonse Daudet, Emile Zola, Flaubert, the French realists and naturalists and endeavoured to imitate them. His story Djanfezā is the most notable of his efforts at this period.

When he became acquainted with the works of the modernist 'Ushaḳi-Zāde Khālīd Ziyā [q. v.] he came completely under his influence, especially after entering into correspondence with him and having his story Düşmüsh published by him in the periodical Khidmet. Through Ziyā who remained his model and Hüsein Djāhid, whose friendship he made soon afterwards, he adopted the career of letters completely and became an author. When Djenāb Shihāb al-Din had to go to the Hıdjāz as medical officer, he left the editorship of his periodical Mekteb in the hands of Ra'uf. In 1312 (1896) Ra'uf at the suggestion of Ziyā published his novel Gharām-i Shebāb ("Youthful Passion") in İhdām, but it did not meet with any special success. He only began to be famous as an author with his cooperation in the periodical Serwet-i Fünūn in 1312 (1896), which was of great influence in the development of modern Turkish literature. Here he worked with Ziyā and the poet Tewfik Fikret [q. v.], to whom he had become related by his marriage. In 1901 the Serwet-i Fünūn came to an end and with it his literary activity till the Revolution of 1908.

His first contributions to the Serwet were Na-kāhatda ("In Convalescence") and Uzakdan. In the 19th volume was published in serial form his most celebrated novel: Eylül ("September") which then appeared in book form like most of his works in the collection, so important for the development of Turkish literature: Edebiyāt-i ājedide Kütüb-khānesi, vol. vi., 1317 (1901). This novel, which was reprinted several times and which remained unique of its kind and represents a height of achievement never again reached by Ra'uf, had great influence and won general approval. In vivid, moving, although unequal language he describes in impressively realistic fashion the development and tragic end of a noble, innocent love. The exhausting verbosity in which Ra'uf revels here was aptly compared by Ziyā to a gimlet which always turns at the same spot.

Of his novels we may also mention Ferdā-i Gharām ("The Morning of Passion"), Edebiyāt-i ājedide, No. 28; Genđi Kız Kalbı ("A Young Girl's Heart"); Menkeshe ("Violet") and Kābūs ("Nightmare").

More important are his collections in the prevailing fashion of short sketches, tales and long stories. Among these is his second most famous work: Siyah Indjiler ("Black Pearls"), a collection of poems in prose modelled on Ziyā's Mansūr Shīrler and Beaudelaire's Fleurs du mal (Edebiyāt, No. 11, 1317); also the collection of long stories 'Ashikāne ("Enamoured")' (Edebiyāt, No. 16, 1325 = 1910); İhtisār ("Death Agony") (Edebiyāt, No. 12, 1325); Son Emel ("The last Hope") (Edebiyāt, No. 29, 1329 = 1913) and Bir 'Ash-kin Ta'rikh-i ("History of a Love Affair") (1330 = 1914); further Üç Hikāye ("Three Tales"); Eshar ("Flowers"); Perwāneler gibi ("As butterflies") etc.

Ra'uf was no less successful as a dramatist. He wrote the following pieces: Pençe ("The Talon"), a drama (oyun) in four acts (faşl) (Edebiyāt, No. 14, 1325 = 1909); Ferdi we-Shūrekāsh ("Ferdi and Co.") in 3 acts, a dramatisation of the novel of the same name by Ziyā (Edebiyāt, No. 17) and Djidal ("Battle") in 5 acts (Edebiyāt, No. 30, 1327 = 1911); also İki Kuwwet ("Two Powers"); Yaghmurdan doluya.

Ra'uf died on Dec. 23, 1931 at Constantinople.

Numerous contributions by him are in the Serwet-i Funūn; the finely produced women's periodical Me-hāsin of which he edited the only volume that appeared. Contributions by him, some his own work, especially poems (Ra'uf possessed not inconsiderable poetic talent and was regarded as the Turkish Baudelaire), also essays and criticisms, of which his analyses of the contemporary novel are valuable, were published in different collections, periodicals and newspapers in vast numbers. His Zambak ("Lily") brought him trouble. It was confiscated on account of its sensuality and the author was imprisoned. He wrote other things in the same style which were not printed.

In his works he appears as a very artistic, rather sentimental nature; even what he writes in prose is pure poetry. His prose is as good as that of Ziyā, the leader of the Serwet-i Funūn movement. He is one of the most important personalities in this group of men of letters, although his marked merits in form and style are counter-balanced by equal defects, which became worse as he paid no attention to the cultivation of his style; in him we find a reversed process, from the more perfect to the less. He would have been held in higher repute generally, if he had ceased to write after his first works. — Owing to the identity of the name and the parallel literary activity Muhammad Ra'uf was often taken for M. Ra'uf, the son of Fariq 'Ātif Pasha, who died on Febr. 23, 1918 and was buried at Haidar Pasha. M. Ra'uf was editor of the Resimli Kitāb. He was a dramatist and wrote: Perwāne; Nigāhda Kerāmet ("Wonder in sight"); a comedy Ātesh ile Bārūt arasında ("Between Fire and Powder") and a piece entitled Tirāze written jointly with Rā'if Nedjdet, one of his most intimate friends. The following dramas were never printed: Şalāh al-Din-i Eyyūbi, Nerimān and a number of adaptations. From the English he translated Saiyid Ameer Ali's The Life and Teachings of Mohammed or the Spirit of Islam in 2 vols. entitled Mūsawwer Ta'rikh-i İslām.

Besides being an author, M. Ra'uf was also a teacher, a task for which his extensive knowledge of languages qualified him (in addition to French and English, he knew Arabic, Persian, German, Italian, Greek and others). He lectured at the University on mythology and Greek and Italian literature, on which he wrote two text-books: Yūnān i kadīm Ta'rikh-i Edebiyāt and İtaliya Ta'rikh-i Edebiyāt. He was also for a time teacher of western literatures, Turkish literature and French at various secondary schools.

MUHAMMAD SA'ID (MİR DJUMLA), minister of 'Abd Allāh Kutb Shāh of Haidarābād during the xviii century, was originally a diamond merchant, and was famous in the Deccan for his wealth before he became minister. After the defeat of his master 'Abd Allāh by Awrangzēb, Mir Djumla took service under the latter, and was made Governor of Bengal from 1071—1075 (1660—1664). He defeated Shāh Shudjā' when the latter fought against his brother Awrangzēb. Mir Djumla was afterwards employed in the conquest of Cooch Bihār and Āssām in 1072—1073 (1661—1662). He overran both these countries but owing to the rainy season and the spread of disease among his troops, he was compelled to return, only to die of dysentery contracted during his campaign, shortly after his arrival at Dacca in 1073 (1663).

MUHAMMAD SA'ID. [See KHALIL EFENDI ZADE.]

MUHAMMAD SHAH (1131—1161 = 1719—1748), emperor of Dihli, surnamed Muhammad Rawshan Akhtar (or, the Brilliant Star), was the son of prince Djahān Shāh, one of the three brothers who perished in disputing the crown with their eldest brother, Djahāndār Shāh, son of Bahādur Shāh. He was born on Friday the 24th Rabi' I 1114 (August 7, 1702), and was crowned by the two Saiyid brothers, Saiyid 'Abd Allāh and Saiyid Husain, after the death of Rafi' al-Dawla on the 25th Dhu 'l-Kā'da 1131 (September 29, 1719). Muhammad Shāh reigned for about 30 years and died one month after the battle of Sarhind, which his son fought against Ahmad Shāh Abdālī [q.v.]. His death took place on Thursday the 27th Rabi' II 1161 (April 16, 1748). He was buried in the court before the Mausoleum of Nizām al-Dīn Awliyā' at Dihlī. This emperor may be called the last of the Timūrid line, who reigned in Dihlī and enjoyed any power. The few princes of that sovereign's family who were raised to the throne after Muḥammad Shāh were mere puppets in the hands of the nobles of the court.

MUHAMMAD SHĀH I, 'ALĀ' AL-DĪN KHALDĪJĪ (695—715 = 1295—1315), was the nephew and son-in-law of Sulṭān Djalāl al-Dīn Firūz Shāh II, Khaldjī, whom he murdered by treachery at Karā Mānikpūr, in the province of Ilāhābād, in 695 (1295), and ascended the throne of Dihlī in the same year. He re-conquered Guḍjarāt (697 = 1297), took Čitor and temporarily subdued the Rādjpūts (703 = 1303). His eunuch general, Malik Kāfur, seized Deogir and Warangal, and founded a Deccan province of the Dihlī kingdom. The empire is said to have flourished during his reign. Among contemporary poets Amir Khusrāu and Khwādja Ḥasan held the first rank; Shaiḫ Nizām al-Dīn Awliyā', one of the greatest saints of India, flourished at the same time. He died in 715 (1315) and was buried in the tomb which he had constructed in his life-time in Old Dihlī.

MUHAMMAD SHĀH BAHMANĪ. [See MUHAMMAD I—III, above p. 664 sq.]

MUHAMMAD SHARĪF AL-NADJAFĪ was born in the Deccan where he spent the first twenty-five years of his life. He afterwards visited in an official capacity Guḍjarāt, Mālwa, Adjmir, Dihlī, Āgra, the Panḍjāb, Sind and Kashmīr. He went to the last country in the train of Dījahāngir and under the command of Kāsim Khān (1031 = 1621). He is the author of Madjālis al-Salāṭin, a short history of the kings of Dihlī and of the Deccan dynasties from the Muḥammadan conquest to the accession of Shāh Dījahān, completed in 1038 (1628).

MUHAMMAD ṬĀHIR AL-FATANĪ AL-GUḌJARĀTĪ, was born at Patan in Guḍjarāt in 914 (1508); after completing his education in his native land, he proceeded to Mecca, where he studied traditions with eminent scholars such as Ibn Ḥadjār al-Haitamī al-Makkī and others. He acquired much learning from 'Alī b. Ḥusām al-Dīn al-Muttaḳī (d. 975 = 1567) and also became his disciple in the Kādirī and Shādhilī orders. After his return to his native country he tried his utmost to spread learning and to uproot the doctrines of Muḥammad al-Djawnpūri who had claimed to be the Mahdī of his time and had a considerable following among the Bohorās [q. v.], a community to which Muḥammad Ṭāhir himself belonged.

In 980 (1572) Akbar went to conquer Guḍjarāt. After its conquest he conferred honour on Muḥammad Ṭāhir by tying with his own hands a turban on his head, saying that it was incumbent on him (Akbar) to spread the true principles of Islām. Khān A'zam 'Aziz Muḥammad Kūkalṭāsh was appointed governor of Guḍjarāt and he helped Muḥammad Ṭāhir in uprooting the new doctrines of Mahdism. But when 'Abd al-Raḥīm Khān Khānān succeeded him as governor, Muḥammad Ṭāhir suffered much at the hands of the followers of the Mahdī, and proceeded to the court of Akbar in Akbarābād for redress. On his way at Ujdjain he was murdered by some followers of the pretended Mahdī in 986 (1578).

Among his various compositions the following may be mentioned:

1. Madjma' Biḥār al-Anwār fī Ḡharā'ib al-Tanzil wa-Laṭā'if al-Akhbār, a copious dictionary of the Qur'ān and the Traditions, lithographed, Lakhnaw 1248, 1284 and 1314;

2. al-Mughnī, a dictionary of proper names of Muḥammadan traditionists, lithographed on the margin of Takrīb al-Tahdhīb by Ibn Ḥadjār al-Asḳalānī (Dihlī 1290);

3. Tadhkirat al-Mawḍū'āt, a treatise on traditions that have been incorrectly attributed to the Prophet.

MUHAMMAD ZA'IM, a Turkish historian. All that we know of his life is gleaned from his works. He was born in 939 (1532) for he tells us that at the accession of Sulṭān Murād III, i. e. in 982 (1574), he was 43. At the early age of eleven he took part in the campaign of 950 (1543) along with his elder brother Perwāne Agha, who at that time was Kapudjī Bāshī to the Sandjak Beg of Lepanto, Yaḥyā Pasha Oghlu Aḥmad Beg. When the latter, after the capture of Stuhlweissenburg, was appointed Sandjak Beg there, the brothers seemed to have remained in his service, probably till 952 (1545) when Aḥmad Beg was summoned to Stambul, in connection with the plundering of the Stuhlweissenburg churches. In 961 (1554) when Sulṭān Sulaimān took the field against Shāh Tahmasp of Persia, Muḥammad Za'im was a secretary in the service of the governor of Syria, Teki Oghlu Meḥmed, and a year later he was secretary to the powerful grand vizier Meḥmedmed Soḳolli and in this capacity compiled the official report of the death of Selīm II and the accession of Murād III which was sent to the governors of Diyarbakr, Aleppo and Baghdād. This office, to which he perhaps succeeded on the promotion (978 = 1570) of the famous Ferīdūn Aḥmed Beg [q. v.], he must have filled till the death of Meḥmedmed Soḳolli in 987 (1579); we hear nothing further about it. He held a great fief (zi'amet); hence his epithet Za'im; he himself says: zu'amā-i 'atebe-i selāṭin-i āl-i osmāniyeden Meḥmed ile müte'aref we-şehir. Friends requested him to write a history and he finished it within a year. He began the work in Muḥarram 985 (beg. March 21, 1577) and had completed it in Dhū 'l-Hijja of the same year (beg. Feb. 9, 1578). The date of his death and the site of his tomb are not known but he is said to have left charitable endowments in Karaferia near Salonika.

He called his book Humā-i Djamī al-Tawārīkh and dedicated it to his master Mehemmed Sokolli. As his sources he mentions eleven historians from Firdawsi and Ṭabari down to the anonymous Tawārīkh-i Selāfin-i Āl-i Osmān and gives as his main source Behdjet al-Tawārīkh, from which, as has been proved, he copied out whole pages without a qualm. The book, which is not yet printed, is divided into a preface and five large sections (aksām, subdivided into guruh and then again into maḳālāt) and concludes with an epilogue. Rieu and others have given an account of the contents from the manuscripts. In the fourth guruh of the 5th ḵism he deals with the Ottomans and here alone do we have statements of any value, when the author describes from his own experience events from 1543 onwards. He brought his story down to the time of writing and the last event that he mentions took place in the month in which the book was finished.

The passages in the book relating to Hungary have been dealt with by Thury (Török történetirök, ii. 364—389) who also collected the above data for his life; the earlier from 1390 to 1476 are given in extracts and the later from 1521 to 1566 translated in full. Of the other less valuable parts of the book Diez (Denkwürdigkeiten von Asien, i. 212 sqq.) has edited a portion of the very early history, dealing with Cain and his descendants, while v. Hammer (Sur les origines russes, lxi. 120) edited and translated a portion on the tribal divisions of the Turks, where the Rūs appear as the ninth Turkish tribe. Of the later Ottoman historians, Ibrāhīm Pečewī utilised and quoted from the work of Muḥammed Za'im from the year 1542 onwards.

AL-MUḤAMMADĪYA, a name of several heretical schools, notably the ultra-Shi'i Muḥammadiya.

As the example of the Kaisāniya [q. v.] shows, at an early date some Shi'is transferred the imāmate to 'Alids who were not descendants of the Prophet's daughter Fāṭima and then to those who were not 'Alids at all. The Manṣūriya revered such an one in Abū Manṣūr al-Idjlī, whom Yūsuf b. 'Omar al-Thakafī, governor of the 'Irāk, executed in the reign of the Caliph Hishām, i. e. before 125 (743). Abū Manṣūr, rejected by the Imām Dja'far al-Ṣādiq for Shi'i exaggeration, thrust the 'Alids aside by still further increasing this tendency: Muḥammad's family, he said, was heaven, the Shi'a the earth and he himself the "fragment falling from heaven" mentioned in Sūra lii. 44, as he had been personally touched and taught by God on a journey to heaven; he is said to have abolished the religious laws. While one group, the Ḥusainiya, recognised the Imām in his son al-Ḥusain after the death of Abū Manṣūr, another, the Muḥammadiya, recognised Muḥammad b. 'Abd Allāh b. al-Ḥasan b. al-Ḥasan b. 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib. He is the pretender celebrated as al-Nafs al-zakiya ("the pure soul"), who in 145 (762) fell at Medina fighting the troops of the 'Abbāsid Caliph al-Manṣūr. The Muḥammadiya quoted as authority for the recognition of an 'Alid again an alleged testamentary disposition of Abū Manṣūr and compared the following order of succession: testament of the Ḥusainid Muḥammad Bākīr for Abū Manṣūr and of the latter for the Ḥasanid Muḥammad b. 'Abd Allāh, with the Jewish line: first Moses, then Joshua, son of Nun, then the sons of Aaron (the later priesthood is meant). This arrangement was chosen in both cases so that conflict might not arise between the two lines of brothers (baḡnān). — We cannot be certain that the Muḥammadiya formed a definite sect. The name rather records the fact that the rising of al-Nafs al-Zakiya, which was of great extent, attracted all circles of the Shi'a to its ranks, even those who belonged to the Ḥusainid camp; and members of the Mughiriya, the followers of Mughira b. Sa'īd, killed in the year 119 (737) by Yūsuf b. 'Omar's predecessor Khālīd b. 'Abd Allāh al-Kaṣrī, probably under the leadership of Djabir b. Yazid al-Djufī, supported al-Nafs al-Zakiya with their good wishes at least.

Quite a different group is the ultra-Islāmic Muḥammadiya or Mimiya. It took its name from the belief in the divinity of the Prophet Muḥammad in reply to an 'Ulyāniya or 'Ainiya who regarded 'Alī as God. Its principal representative al-Faiyād b. 'Alī was executed between 279 (892) and 289 (902).

The Khāridī Muḥammadiya was a separate party within the strictly Khāridī sub-group of the 'Adjārida; it is called after a certain Muḥammad b. Zurāk.

MUḤAMMARA, a town and port at the head of the Persian Gulf and in the Persian province of 'Arabistān. It lies on the right bank of the Ḥaffār channel (formerly called Nahr Bayān) which connects the Kārūn river with the Shaṭṭ al-'Arab. The original village from which the town grew appears to have lain on the left bank of the channel, on the island of 'Abbādān [q. v.], and Muḥammara is probably therefore not to be identified with the town of Bayān, though it now lies on the same site. Further, Bayān was included in 'Irāk 'Arabī by the geographers, whereas Muḥammara, lying on 'Abbādān island, was a part of Persia until the shifting of a channel threw the possession of the town into dispute between that country and Turkey. By the treaty of Erzerum (1847) it was assigned to Persia, but though the government was nominally directed from Shushtar, it remained in reality in the hands of the Arab shaikh of the Čāb (or Ka'b) tribe, who were Shi'is. From the fact that the Arab geographers ignore the town, at any rate under its present name (for references to Bayān see G. Le Strange, below), it may be inferred that the place (? Muḥrizī) was either of minor importance or of comparatively recent origin. At the present time the port is of some importance for the trade of Persia, its principal article of commerce being dates, though it is also connected with the oil trade.

MUḤĀRIB, the name of several Arab tribes (Wüstenfeld, Register zu den geneal. Tabellen, p. 320 gives five of this name) of which the most important is that of the Muḥārib b. Khaṣafa b. Ḳais 'Ailān (Wüstenfeld, Geneal. Tabellen, D, 8). They do not however seem to have been of very great importance either in the D̲j̲āhiliya or in Islām; Ibn al-Kalbī only gives them two pages of his D̲j̲amharat al-Ansāb (Brit. Mus. MS., Add. 23,297, fol. 163^b—165^b) but these add considerably to the very meagre information in the Tabellen especially as regards the lines of 'Alī b. D̲j̲asr b. Muḥārib and of Badhāwa (sic) b. D̲h̲uhl b. Ṭarīf b. Ḳhalaf b. Muḥārib. A typical Beduin tribe, the Muḥārib lived in the mountainous region of southern Naḍjd between Medina and al-Yamāma (Wüstenfeld, Register, p. 320 following Ibn Ḳutaiba, Kitāb al-Ma'ārif, ed. Wüstenfeld, p. 41); several places in their territory are recorded in Yāqūt's geographical dictionary (cf. the index of tribes, s. v.). We know very little about their history before Islām; they were closely connected with other tribes of the great group of the Ḳais 'Ailān, like the Hawāzin, with whom they are said to have shared the worship of the idol D̲j̲ihār (Yāqūt, Mu'jam, ed. Wüstenfeld, ii. 167, l. 2—3 = Wellhausen, *Reste*², p. 65; cf. Taḍj al-'Arūs, iii. 115, l. 7 from below), and especially the G̲h̲atafān (notably their clan Ṭha'laba b. Sa'd b. D̲h̲ubayn) alongside of whom the clan of the al-Ḳhuḍr b. Ṭarīf b. Ḳhalaf b. Muḥārib (the genealogy of the Tabellen is to be rectified in as much as al-Mālik is the name of al-Ḳhuḍr and not that of his father) fought the war known as the yawm al-ḥuraka or yawm D̲arāt Mawḍū' alluded to by the poet of the D̲h̲ubayn Husain b. al-Ḥumām in some of his poems (cf. al-Mufaḍḍaliyāt, ed. Lyall, Nrs. xii. and xci. and the commentary of Ibn al-Anbarī, with the passages quoted in the notes).

The Muḥārib at the beginning of Islām were hostile to Muḥammad; this hostility was perhaps only the continuation of that which prevailed between the nomad tribes of the 'Āliya of al-Naḍjd and the citizens of Madīna. Thus we find, in the early years of the Hidjra, that Muḥammad sent against them (and against the G̲h̲atafān) a series of expeditions, of the nature of raids and counter-raids rather than regular military enterprises (our sources give 30 or 40 men as the total of the Muslim forces); the details of their fighting are given in Caetani, Annali dell' Islām, i., p. 537—538 (3 A. H. § 6), 596—597 (5 A. H. § 3), 689—690 (6 A. H. § 1), 694 (6 A. H. § 6) with reference to the sources utilised (we may add Ibn Sa'd, ii/i. 23—24, 43—44, 61—62). One part at least of the tribe must however have been attracted within the growing sphere of Muslim influence since we find Muḥāribis in the cavalry led by al-Zubair at the taking of Mecca (Caetani, Annali, ii. [8 A. H. § 390]). But it was only in 10 A. H. that the Muḥārib sent their ambassadors to Muḥammad and gave their formal adhesion to Islām (Ibn Sa'd, ii/i. 43; cf. Caetani, Annali, ii. 344—345); even on this occasion they were conspicuous by their uncouthness, quite Beduin, of which another example is given in the anecdote of the Muḥāribī (he is said to have been called Suwā' b. al-Ḥārith or b. Ḳais) who dared to doubt the Prophet's word in connection with the purchase of a horse (cf. Ibn Sa'd, iv. 2, 90—91 etc., and Caetani, Annali, ix. 627—628).

The Muḥārib abandoned Islām during the Ridda but were easily brought back to obedience (Annali, ii., p. 594, 596, 11 A. H. §§ 115, 118); they took part in the conquest of the 'Irāk (Ibn Ḥaḍjar, Iṣāba, Cairo 1325, iv. 20—21: biography of 'A'idh b. Sa'd, who fought at al-Ḳādisiya and D̲j̲alūlā and again, in 36 and 37, at the battle of the Camel and that of Ṣiffīn, where he was slain); they were encamped at Kūfa in the same quarter as the Usad and G̲h̲atafān, not far from that allotted to the Tamīm (Ṭabari, i. 2490, 2495).

The contribution of the Muḥārib to the politics and literature of Arabia is practically nil; we need only mention the name of Laḳit b. Bukair b. al-Naḍr (d. 190), who belonged to a branch of the Banū 'Alī b. D̲j̲asr b. Muḥārib, a poet (cf. Ṭabari, iii. 540), ascetic and historian (Fihrist, p. 94 and Yāqūt, Iṣṣād, ed. Margoliouth, vi. 218—220, give a list of his works, relating mainly to literary history).

Of the other tribes bearing the name of Muḥārib the best known is the Meccan tribe of the Muḥārib b. Fihri to which al-Daḥḥāk b. Ḳais belonged [q. v.]; the Muḥārib lampooned by al-Farazdaq and celebrated by D̲j̲arir (Naḳā'id, ed. Bevan, p. 817 l. 4, 1039 l. 2) are difficult to identify: it is not certain, although they are so identified in the index, that they were the Muḥārib b. Khaṣafa.

AL-MUḤARRAM (A.), the first month of the Muḥammadan year. The name is originally not a proper name but an adjective, as the article shows, qualifying Ṣafar. In the pre-Muḥammadan period the first two months of the old Meccan year were Ṣafar [q. v.] I and II, which is reflected in the dual "a potiōri" al-Ṣafarāni for al-Muḥarram and Ṣafar; in the old Arab year the first half year consisted of "three months of two months each" (Wellhausen), as the two Ṣafars were followed by two Rabī's and two D̲j̲umādās. The first of the two Ṣafars, as the one that belonged to the sacred months, was given the adjectival epithet al-muḥarram which gradually became the name of the month itself. As D̲h̲u 'l-Ḥidjdja also belonged to the sacred months, three of the four sacred months came together except in leap year. The month intercalated to equate the year to the solar year was inserted after D̲h̲u 'l-Ḥidjdja and was not sacred. It thus came about that learned Muslims described the intercalation as renaming the Muḥarram concerned Ṣafar, i. e. as making Muḥarram not sacred; they mean that the month after the pilgrimage, which they consider as al-Muḥarram, following the custom, is not sacred i. e. is 'Ṣafar' and the second month i. e. in their view Ṣafar, is "al-Muḥarram". In doing this they of course overlook the fact that Ṣafar proper now only comes third; but when the intercalary month was abolished in Islām, the proper conception of the state of affairs was lost [cf. Nasī'].

In the early period when an attempt was made to equate with the solar year by inserting intercalary months, — which was not successful on account of the ignorance of the old Arabs in astronomical matters — al-Muḥarram introduced the winter half year as the names of the first six months show. The Arab year began, like the Jewish, in autumn. After Muḥammad had forbidden the insertion of the intercalary months in Sūra ix. 37, 1st Muḥarram, the beginning of the year, went through all the seasons as the year, which now consisted of 12 lunar months, had always only 354 or 355 days, as it still has. Whether the first month of the year was originally marked by a festival we do not know. Wellhausen has endeavoured to show that the ḥaǧǧ originally fell in the first month of the year, so that Muḥarram was ḥarām in its quality as “Dhu ‘l-Ḥiǧǧja”. This also suggests that there was originally only one sacred month, but it was observed at different times in different parts of Arabia. Muḥammad in the Qurʾān always speaks only of the sacred month (ii. 194, 217; v. 2, 97); only in Sūra ix. 36 in laying down the method of reckoning time does he speak of four sacred months, in which it was sought to recognise a later declaration of the equal sanctity of four different sacred months of different districts, which was however illusory, as within Islām the peace of God reigns without this and, according to Sūra ii. 217, the defence of the faith takes preference over the sacred month. What the sacred month referred to in the Qurʾān is, we do not know; in Sūra v. 2, at any rate, the month of the pilgrimage must be meant, which fits Wellhausen’s theory excellently. The commentators think Rādjab or Dhu ‘l-Ḳa‘da is meant, at any rate not al-Muḥarram.

Al-Muḥarram has 30 days of which, in addition to the 1st as the beginning of the year, the following are specially noted: the 9th as the fast-day of the Shī‘ī ascetics; the 10th as the anniversary of Kerbelā’ (60 = 680), on which al-Ḥusain b. ‘Alī b. Abī Ṭālib [q. v.] fell fighting against the Caliph Yazīd b. Mu‘āwīya and therefore the great day of mourning of the Shī‘a (on the significance of the 10th Muḥarram for the Sunnis see ‘ĀSH‘URĀ), celebrated by pilgrimages to the sacred places of the Shī‘a, especially to Kerbelā’ [see MESHHED ḤUSAIN], in which the passion play, representing the death of ‘Alī’s sons [see TA‘ZĪYA], plays the most important part; also the 16th as the day of the selection of Jerusalem as the Ḳibla [q. v.] and the 17th as the day of the arrival of the “people of the elephant” (Sūra cv.).

MUḤĀSIBĪ ABU ‘ABD ALLĀH ḤĀRITH B. ASAD AL-‘ANĀZĪ, called Muḥāsibī, i. e. “he who examines his conscience”, was born in Baṣra; he died in Baghdād in 243 (857). A legist of the Shāfi‘ī school, a theologian who advocated the use of reason (‘aql), using the dialectic vocabulary of the Mu‘tazilis, which he was the first to turn against them, he finally adopted a life of ascetic renunciation after a moral conversion long meditated which is described at the beginning of his Waṣāyā. Involved with the Mu‘tazilis in a general persecution as a result of Ibn Ḥanbal’s attack on the dialecticians, he had to give up all teaching in 232 (846) and died in retirement.

His principal works are: Ri‘āya li-Ḥuḳūḳ Allāh, Waṣāyā (more accurately: Naṣā’ih), Kitāb al-Tawakkum, Mā‘iyat al-‘Aql wa-Ma’nāhu, Kisālat al-‘Aẓama, Fahm al-Ṣalāt; none of them is yet printed. The Dawā’ dā’ al-Nufūs, which Sprenger attributes to him, is of an earlier date; it was arranged by his chief teacher Aḥmad b. ‘Āṣim Anṭākī.

Muḥāsibī is the first Sunni mystic whose works reveal a complete theological education; they combine in a very original way a keen concern for exact philosophical definitions, and a fervid reverence for the most naive traditions with the rigorous search for an increasing moral purification.

In his Ri‘āya he discards the foundations of that “method” of introspection which Anṭākī had envisaged; he shows that a correlation is possible between two series of human happenings, the external actions of the members and the intentions of the hearts (against this: ‘Allāf and the majority of contemporary mutakallimūn); he proves in detail that the enchainment of the states of conscience (aḥwāl) can be guided progressively towards a perfect purity, provided an ascetic and moral rule of life is observed, the true raḥbāniya mentioned in Sūra lvii. 27.

His adversaries (muḥaddithūn), especially Hanbalis, attacked him for having differentiated the concepts of ‘ilm and ‘aql (parable of the “sower”), imān and ma‘rifā (like Ibn Karrām); admitted the created character of the lafẓ (our pronunciation of Qurʾānic verses); held that the elect, in Paradise, would be summoned to enjoy directly familiarity with the divine being; chosen his references from authors not by following the formal correctness of their isnāds, but on account of their intrinsic significance, from their moral weight (‘ibra), for the reader.

The Ri‘āya is his main work; it forms in 61 chapters, in the shape of advices given to a pupil, a complete manual of the inner life. Ghazālī used it before writing his Iḥyā’; and in spite of periodical attacks, its reputation among Arabic-speaking Muslim mystics lasted for a long time and may be compared with that of the Imitatio Jesu Christi among Christian mystics using Latin; the Shādhiliya brotherhood, with Mursī, Ibn ‘Abbād Rūndī and Zarrūk Burnūsī, have always recommended its use; and one of them, ‘Izz al-Dīn Maḳḳisī, has made a summary of it.

The Ash‘arī theologians also esteem Muḥāsibī as a precursor.

MUḤIBB AL-DĪN. [See AL-ṬABARĪ.]

AL-MUḤIBBĪ, a family of scholars in Damascus of the xth—xith (xvth—xviith) centuries of which three members distinguished themselves in literature:

1. Muḥibb al-Dīn Abu 'l-Faḍl Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr b. Dāwūd b. 'Abd al-Rahmān b. 'Abd al-Khalīk b. Muḥibb al-Dīn 'Abd al-Rahmān b. Taḳī al-Dīn al-'Ulwānī al-Ḥamawī al-Dimashqī al-Ḥanafī, born in the middle of Ramaḍān 949 (Dec. 23, 1542) in Ḥamāt, studied there, in Ḥalab and Ḥimṣ and after a journey to Constantinople obtained a post as teacher in the Madrasa al-Kuḍā'iya in Damascus. In 978 (1571) he accompanied the Shaiḫh al-Islām and Chief Kāḍī Čiwī Zāde to Cairo, was for a period a kāḍī there and after a second journey to Constantinople was appointed kāḍī in Ḥimṣ, Ma'arrat al-Nu'mān and several other towns of northern Syria. In 993 (1585) the post of a chief na'ib (al-niyāba al-kubrā) was given to him; at the same time he was military judge, judge of the Syrian caravan, taught in several madrasas and gave fatwās at the Sultān's request. He died on the 23rd Shawwāl 1016 (Feb. 18, 1608). Of his numerous writings only three have survived: his commentary written in 969 (1561) (according to al-Muḥibbī, iii. 322, on the other hand, prepared at the age of 16) on Muḥammad b. al-Shihna's (d. 815 = 1412) Urḍūza al-Bayāniya (Manẓūma fi 'l-Ma'āni wa 'l-Bayān) in the Berlin, Alshwardt, Verz., No. 7256—7257 and Gotha, Pertsch, No. 2789 MSS., his Travels, al-Rihla or Hādī 'l-Aḡān al-Nadjiyya ila 'l-Diyār al-Miṣriyya, in the Paris, Cat. de Slane, No. 2293; Cairo, Fihrist, vii. 646; Istanbul, 'Ātif Efendi, No. 2030 (s. Rescher, in M.F.O.B., v. 496) MSS., which he wrote when kāḍī in Ma'arrat al-Nu'mān, and his commentary written in 1011 (1602) on the authoritative verses in Zamakhsharī's Kashshūf entitled Tanzil al-Āyāt, pr. Būlak 1281, Cairo 1307—1308, and on the margin of Kashshūf, ibid., 1318.

2. His grandson Faḍl Allāh b. Muḥibb Allāh b. Muḥibb al-Dīn was born on the 17th Muḥarram 1031 (Dec. 2, 1621) in Damascus, at an early age showed great linguistic ability, received in 1048 (1638) from Nadjma al-Dīn al-Ghazzī (d. 1061 = 1651), (see Brockelmann, G.A.L., ii. 292) the idjāza for Ḥadīth, and after failing to secure something in Ḥalab through the Shaiḫh al-Islām Muḥammad b. Zakariyā, was given by his father the latter's post at the Derwishīya. In 1051 (1641) he accompanied Muḥammad 'Iṣmatī to Constantinople, was appointed to the Madrasa Arba'in there, but dismissed a year later, when he returned home. In 1059 (1649) he accompanied the kāḍī Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Ḥalīm al-Bursawī to Egypt and became his deputy. After a quarrel with him, he resumed his studies in al-Azhar and came home next year. In 1073 (1662) he again went to Constantinople and four years later was appointed kāḍī of Bairūt but returned to Damascus in 1079 where he died on 23rd Djumādā II, 1082 (Oct. 27, 1671). While his own Diwān and his description of his journeys to Constantinople have not been preserved, his edition of the poems of his friend Mandjaḳ Pasha (d. 1080 = 1669 in Damascus) are still in existence. He first of all arranged them chronologically, beginning with a poem on Sultān Ibrāhīm I of the year 1055 (1645) (in addition to the MSS. mentioned in Brockelmann, G.A.L., ii. 277 there are now Köprülü, ii. 1245 and Möşul, Dāwūd, Makḥḥūfāt, No. 153, 20), then alphabetically, including poems of a later period down to 1071 (1660); this edition was printed at Damascus in 1301. In 1078 (1667) he edited the biographical work of al-Ḥasan al-Būrīnī (d. 1024 = 1615), Tarāḡīm al-A'yān min Abnā' al-Zamān and published it with a supplement; we may add to the MSS. mentioned by Brockelmann, G.A.L., ii. 290: Muḥammad Kurd 'Alī, in R.A.A.D., iii., 1923, p. 193—202.

Bibliography: Muḥibbī, op. cit., iii. 277—286; Wüstenfeld, op. cit., p. 15—19.

3. His son Muḥammad al-Amin b. Faḍl Allāh b. Muḥibb Allāh b. Muḥammad Muḥibb al-Dīn al-Dimashqī, born in 1061 (1651) in Damascus, went with his father in 1077 (1666) to Bairūt but returned home several times from there. A friend of his father's, Muḥammad b. Luṭf Allāh b. Bairām al-'Izzatī, who had been kāḍī in Damascus in 1065 (1655) and was military judge in Anatolia in 1078 (1668), provided him with funds to study in Brusa. He returned home after a brief stay there on 8th Ṣafar 1086 (May 4, 1675) in company with the mufti Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Ḥalīm. Al-'Izzatī had in the meanwhile been appointed military judge in Adrianople and was able to procure him a post there. But his patron fell ill soon afterwards and had to resign. Muḥammad accompanied him to Stambul and looked after him till his death on 10th Shawwāl 1092 (Oct. 24, 1681). He then returned to Damascus and began to write. When in 1101 (1690) he had made the pilgrimage to Mecca, he was appointed deputy kāḍī and then a teacher in the Aminiya in Damascus. He died there on the 18th Djumādā I 1111 (Nov. 11, 1699).

His principal work is a collection of 1,289 biographies of scholars, poets etc. of his time and the period immediately preceding it arranged in alphabetical order, entitled Khulāṣat al-Aḥṣar fi A'yān al-Karn al-ḥādī 'aṣḥar, the first fair copy of which he finished in 1096 (1685) (printed Cairo 1284, 4 vols.). The draft of a number of biographies from the Hidjāz and Yemen, which is preserved in the Brill-Houtsma MS., No. 112 appears to be part of the preliminary work on this collection; the draft of a synopsis is in Berlin (Ahlwardt, No. 9895). A synopsis was prepared by 'Alī b. 'Abd al-Ḥadīdj al-Ghazzī al-'Āmirī (d. 1191 = 1777; Murāḍī, iii. 215); MS. in Tübingen (Seybold, No. 9). A second great biographical work on celebrities of all ages entitled al-I'tām was to give under each letter al-a'tām wa 'l-nisab wa 'l-kunā wa 'l-abnā' wa 'l-nisā' wa 'l-ummahāt separately. In the draft in Leipzig (Vollers, No. 683) giving the letter mīm the sources, which from the articles are taken usually word for word, are generally quoted. He also wrote a continuation of al-Khafādjī's Raiḥānat al-Alibbā' entitled Nafḥat al-Raiḥāna wa-Rashḥat Ṭilā' al-Ḥāna, which survives, in addition to the MSS. quoted by Brockelmann, G.A.L., ii. 294, in Stambul, Nūr-i 'Oṭhmāniya, No. 4352 (M.S.O.S., xv. 22) and Möşul, Dāwūd, Makḥḥūfāt,

N^o. 264, 7; an anonymous selection from it called Mukhtārāt is in Cairo, *Fihrist*², iii. 342. A supplement (dhail) to it was written by Muḥammad b. Muḥammad al-Su'ālātī in 1111 (1699); MSS. in Berlin, Ahlwardt, N^o. 7422; Copenhagen, Mehren, N^o. 170; St. Petersburg, As. Mus., N^o. 251; Brit. Mus., Or. 6516 (Descript. List, N^o. 57); Yale-Landberg, N^o. 179; Damascus, Zaiyāt, N^o. 78, 64. A companion work of the middle of the xith century is 'Abd al-Rahmān b. Shāshū's Tarāḍīm ba'd al-'A'yān min Ahl Dimashq min 'Ulamā'ihā wa-Udabā'ihā, pr. Bairūt 1886. His Diwān, mainly ḥaṣidas on friends and patrons, which are as a rule also included in his Khulāṣa, is preserved in the autograph copy in the library of A. Taimūr in Cairo; s. R.A.A.D., iii. 342, and the Berlin MS., Ahlwardt, N^o. 8007; cf. N^o. 8008; Flügel, Z.D.M.G., ix. 224. In the Urdjūza Barāhat al-Arwāḥ djalibāt al-Surūr wa 'l-Afrāḥ, Berlin, N^o. 8162 he collected sayings and proverbs. Al-Tha'alibī's Kitāb Thimār al-Kulūb fi 'l-Mudāf wa 'l-Mansūb was arranged alphabetically by him as Mā yu'awwalu 'alaihi fi 'l-Mudāf wa 'l-Mudāf ilaihi, MS. in Stambul, Top Kapu, N^o. 2455; 'Ātif Efendi, N^o. 2247 (see R.S.O., iv. 727); Aya Sofia, N^o. 4136 (M.S., vii. 132); Cairo, *Fihrist*², iii. 285. The monograph on grammar Djany al-Djan-natain fi Naw'at 'l-Muthannayain is preserved in a MS. belonging to A. Taimūr Paṣha (R.A.A.D., iii. 340; iv. 147) and printed in Damascus 1348. The lexicological work Sawā' al-Sabīl fi-mā fi 'l-Lughā al-'arabiya min al-Dakḥil is preserved in a Damascus MS.; see R.A.A.D., iii. 340.

MUḤIBBĪ. [See SULAIMĀN I.]

MUḤĪT. [See BAHR MUḤĪT.]

MUHR (P., Sanskrit मुद्रा), seal, signet or signet-ring. Pronounced in Persian mohr and möhr and in Turkish mühür with the second vowel disjunctive and unstable or popularly möhür (Hindoglu, Aucher, Ciackiak and Holdermann) or even, according to Viguier, mihir. The word has been arabicised in the form of barbarous derivatives like tamhīr "action of sealing" and mamhūr (synonym: mühürilü) "sealed, hidden".

Muslim legend, according to Mouradgā d'Ohsson (vii. 121), traces the use of seals to Lāhuk, vizier of Lātis, son and successor of the Pharaoh of Moses (cf. Carra de Vaux, L'abrégé des merveilles, p. 387; in contradiction with Genesis, xli. 42).

In the article KHĀTAM are given useful references to the use of seals among the Arabs and also among Turks and Persians and the coin of this name is dealt with under MOHR. Here we shall deal more particularly with the word muhr as a complement to that article. We have not however to forget that this word muhr was used by the Persians and Turks either alongside of khātām or in place of it, to express also ideas taken directly from the Arabs, as in the phrase müḥr-i Süleimān or müḥr-i Djem "seal of Solomon" (also the name of a plant) or müḥr-i nübüvvet "the famous mark of a prophet which appeared on Muḥammad's back".

The Shāhnāma regards the seal (muhr, with its synonym of ring or nigīn; the two words sometimes appear together: muhr-i nigīn, vi. 51, verse 557 of Mohl's edition) as an attribute of sovereignty, like the crown and throne. It is the same when sovereignty is delegated to governors (vi., p. 5, v. 1; cf. i., p. 499, v. 163; iii., p. 421, v. 111; vii., p. 459, v. 374; p. 463, v. 418). There is a reference in the same poem to seals of amber (i., p. 545, v. 692) such as actually existed (cf. Reinaud, Mon., i. 129). They were sometimes steeped in Chinese musk (vi., p. 351, v. 2288).

In Turkey the seal was again the emblem of power. The imperial seal (müḥr-i hümayūn) was handed to the grand vizier, hence also called ṣāhib-i müḥr [cf. ṢADR A'ZAM], with great solemnity (cf. M. d'Ohsson, vii. 120), and Na'imā (iv. 430) in speaking of ambition to become grand vizier uses the phrase mühür arzusu ("desire for the seal").

We may mention here that according to d'Ohsson (ibid.), the sultān had four seals with a tughra, set in rings; one was square and remained in his possession; he entrusted the others which were round, to the Grand Mistress or Lady Treasurer of the Harem (khazna-dār) and to the khāṣṣ-oda-bāshi, a white eunuch who at one time held the office of first chamberlain.

The seal was changed at each accession of a new monarch (cf. Na'imā, i. 117) as was the tughra itself. Ewliyā Çelebi's statement, which implies the contrary, is therefore rather strange (vii. 300, v. 4 from below). In Persia the seal was retained but the name was changed [cf. KHĀTAM].

The grand vizier produced the imperial seal on the dīwān days for the ṭawush bashi to seal the bag (kise) for the registers of the rūsnāma and the archives of the Finance Department or māḥye defterkhānesi, the Treasury (khazāne) and the general Archives (defterkhāne) (M.T.M., 499). The grand vizier also had, like all the viziers or governors of provinces, two other seals, one, a large one, impressed at the top of buyurultu or "ordinances", and the other, a small and modest one, placed at the foot of letters from the vizier, including official ones (cf. Aḥmad Rāsim, Othm. Tārīkhī, iii. 1514).

The use of seals in Turkey (we know very little of those of the Saldjūks; cf. Reinaud, Mon., i. 121 note) was exceedingly widespread. They were used for impressions in wax (mühür mumu) and for stamping in a particular kind of ink to which saliva was added, as in Persia (cf. Le Père Raphaël du Mans, p. 129). In more modern times the seal was carried in the purse (cf. a verse by Mehmed 'Ākif in his poem Seifi Baba). It is only recently that under the influence of the west the mühür has been displaced by the signature. It must have received its coup de grâce with the recent adoption of the Roman alphabet and of rubber seals.

The industry of seal-engraving has thus been gradually disappearing. It had at one time reached a high degree of perfection and the artists used to sign their work. These signatures were usually very brief, Mithli, Sā'ī, Aḥmad etc. They were written in characters so minute that they could only be distinguished with a lens and only when very clearly engraved. Quite a study could be written on these artists.

Ewliyā Çelebi gives the following information about the seal engravers of Istanbul (i. 575). He distinguishes:

1. Engravers on stone, ḥakikī'ākān, 105 workmen in 30 shops. They engraved on stones such as agate, garnet, turquoise and jasper. Their patron saint or pir was 'Abd Allāh Yamānī, a disciple of Uwais al-Karānī who is buried in Ta'izz.

2. The engravers of mühür: mühürkēnān who worked especially for the viziers, 80 workmen in 50 shops. Their pir was the Caliph 'Othmān. In the reign of Murād IV the most noted were Maḥmūd Čelebi, Rizā Čelebi and Ferid Čelebi, who charged from 100 to 500 piastres for their work.

3. The engravers of silver seals and talismans: mühürkēnān-i sim ü-heyākil, 40 workmen in 15 shops. Pir: 'Ukkāsha who is buried near Mar'ash, who, having seen on the Prophet's back the mühür-i nübüwwet (cf. above), began to engrave talismanic formulae (two of these are quoted). These workmen "cannot engrave Yemen agate". They were established in the area called Seyişkēnānlar.

We may still mention the custom of making partisans, whose loyalty one wished to be sure of, stamp their seals on a Qur'an (Kur'an mühürletmek); cf. in the Turkish papers of June 8, 1925, statements by a rebel Kurd.

The word memhür in the old language of the Janissaries meant vouchers for their pay (M. d'Ohsson, vii. 337).

In figurative language Persian and Turkish uses the expression "to break the seal": muhr berdashen, mühür almak (or bozmağ, açmağ, götürmek) for "to deflower a virgin" [cf. further thh art. TAMGHA].

The MUHRDĀR (mohrdār), Turk. mühürdār [cf. the article KHĀTAM], keeper of the seals or better "private secretary" (cf. below), was therefore a very important personage. Mir 'Alī Shīr Newā'i was the mohrdār of Husain Baikara before becoming dāvān begi and first minister (cf. Belin, Notice sur Mir ..., 1861, p. 13; cf. de Sacy, N. E., iv. 282, 261). He was succeeded in these offices by another poet, Merwārīd (ibid.). — On the mohrdār in Persia, cf. Le Père Raphaël du Mans, p. 21. In Central Asia the title of muhrdār seems to have replaced that of tamghachi which occurs as early as the Orkhon inscriptions.

In Turkey, each vizier had his mühürdār (Ahmad Rāsim, 'Othm. Tārīkhī, i. 455). Cf. the account of the career of a mühürdār in the Sidjill-i 'othmānī, ii. 31 below (Behdjet Pasha [the same as is mentioned in the Memoirs of Sa'īd Pasha, i. 4]).

The rūznāmedji had also their own mühürdārs (J. Deny, Sommaire des archives turques du Caire, p. 136). At Kādi Kīōy there exists a quarter called Mühürdār. For the work bearing the title Mühürdār Tārīkhī, cf. Babinger, G. O. W., p. 216 sq.

With the viceroys of Egypt the mühürdār was a "private secretary" of the Khedive. The title of mühürdār was abolished in 1884 but the office has remained. His salary was the same as that of the chief of the cabinet (cf. ibid., p. 92 and 476).

AL-MUHTADĪ, ABŪ 'ABD ALLĀH MUḤAMMAD, an 'Abbāsīd caliph. After al-Wāthiq's death, a number of officials wished to pay homage to the young Muḥammad, son of the deceased caliph and a Greek slave; instead however, al-Wāthiq's brother was proclaimed his successor and only after the deposition and murder of the unfortunate al-Mu'tazz (end of Rādjab 255 = July 869) Muḥammad ascended the throne with the name al-Muhtadī. His ideal was the Umayyad 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz. Like the latter, he was distinguished for the strictness with which he conducted his life; with piety and simplicity however, he combined strength and ability and during his brief reign he did his best to raise the caliphate from its degradation and to restore the power of the Commander of the Faithful. In several provinces there were risings by 'Alids, real or alleged; but the most dangerous enemy of the caliph was the Turkish general Mūsā b. Bogha. When the latter, who was fighting against the 'Alids in Persia, heard of the accession of al-Muhtadī, he returned home. Reaching Sāmarrā in Muḥarram 256 (Dec. 869) he forced the caliph to take an oath to bring to justice the Turkish chief Šālīh b. Waṣīf, who had robbed the mother of the caliph al-Mu'tazz of all her priceless treasures. When Šālīh concealed himself, the Turkish mercenaries mutinied and were intending to depose al-Muhtadī but were appeased by the resolute action of the latter. Al-Muhtadī then promised Šālīh's followers that he would pardon him; but as the latter did not appear, they went to Sāmarrā and began to pillage it until they were scattered by Mūsā. Šālīh was soon afterwards discovered and killed by one of Mūsā's men. When Mūsā had taken the field against the Khāridjīs, al-Muhtadī began to incite the people against him and his brother Muḥammad b. Bogha and accused them of embezzlement. Muḥammad was brought to trial and put to death although al-Muhtadī had expressly guaranteed his pardon. The only course left for the caliph was to dispose of Mūsā if he wished to keep his throne. But his plan was betrayed; Mūsā advanced with superior forces and the caliph suffered a disastrous defeat. As he declined to abdicate, he was murdered in Rādjab 256 (June 870) in horrible fashion.

MUHTASIB (A.), "censor", an officer appointed by the caliph or his wazīr to see that the religious precepts of Islām are obeyed, to detect offences and punish offenders. His office was the ḥisba, and to it only men of good standing could, in theory, be appointed. Like all holders of public office, he had to be a Muslim and free. Generally he was a faqih, and in addition to his police functions he performed those of a magistrate. In some respects his duties were parallel with those of the kādi, but the muhtasib's jurisdiction was limited to matters connected with commercial transactions, defective weights and measures, fraudulent sales and non-payment of debts. Even in these matters he could hear only those cases in which the truth was not in doubt. As soon as evidence had to be sifted and oaths administered the muhtasib's jurisdiction ceased. As a censor he had power to enforce the law without first requiring complaint from an injured party. He had to see that in a place where Muslims lived they did not neglect to hold a Friday service in the mosque and that if they numbered forty or more they formed themselves into an organised community. But if the number was large and there were differences of opinion on the question of worshipping together, his authority might be disputed, and it was not within his power to compel the attendance of the individual Muslim at the mosque unless he was a persistent defaulter. Even then the officer could do no more than admonish the delinquent. So far as the mosque was concerned the muhtasib could insist on the adhān and he could examine the mu'adhdhin in the subject of the times lawful for the adhān. If a public mosque fell into disrepair, the muhtasib was charged with the duty of calling the attention of the authorities to the matter.

An important part of the muhtasib's duties was to see that the laws of the shari' were maintained. Persons breaking the fast of Ramaḍān, widows and divorced women who did not observe the 'idda [q. v.] before remarriage, and other transgressors, were liable to have to make explanations before him. Public morals, further, came under his jurisdiction. He had to prevent men from consorting with women in public and from indulging openly in wine; also the playing of forbidden musical instruments came under his ban and he had to see that games and toys did not lead to offences against the shari'. However, he could not act on suspicion alone nor had he the right to go behind closed doors to pursue his investigations. His powers would appear to have been wider where the spiritual welfare of Muslims was concerned. Thus if a faqih propounded views contrary to idmāc' [q. v.] it was the muhtasib's duty to admonish him and to report him to the sovereign if he persisted in preaching heretical doctrines. Also, if a person not a faqih suddenly turned to the study of the fiqh, the muhtasib had to make investigation in order to discover his motive and to prevent his misleading persons who might apply to him. Schools also had to be visited by the muhtasib, though not so much for the purpose of inspecting the character of the teaching as to ensure that teachers did not beat their pupils too severely (Maḳrīzī, Khiṭaṭ, i. 464). Other matters which came within his jurisdiction were concerned with public amenities rather than with morals or religious institutions. Thus, in towns where the source of drinking-water was fouled or no provision was made for poor wayfarers he could order the townsmen to rectify matters. He had to ensure that no house overlooked the women's quarters of another belonging to a Muslim and that no house had projecting rainspouts or drains leading on to the street to the inconvenience of wayfarers, and finally that the sūḳ was kept clean and clear of obstacles to traffic.

AL-MUHYI. [See ALLĀH, b. 2.]

MUHYI 'L-DİN. [See IBN (AL-)'ARABĪ.]

MUHYI 'L-DİN MUHAMMAD (MEHMED) B. 'ALĀ' AL-DİN 'ALĪ AL-DJAMĀLĪ, a Turkish theologian and historian of the time of Selim I (1512-1520) and Sulaimān I (1520-1566). His father was the famous mufti Zānbilī 'Alī al-Djamālī, a grandson of Djāmāl al-Dīn Meḥmed of Aḳ Serai (hence the epithet Djāmālī). He received his theological training first from his maternal grandfather, Ḥusām-Zāde Efendi, then from his father 'Alā' al-Dīn and later from Mu'ayyad-Zāde Efendi. He worked as müderris in several medreses, in Constantinople at the Murād medrese and at the eight schools of the Fātiḥ mosque and in Adrianople where he was also a mollā for a period. He died in retirement and was buried at Adrianople in 957 (1550); according to some, however, in 956 (1549).

His main importance lies in the fact that he edited the anonymous Ottoman chronicles, the Tewāriḳ-i Āl-i 'Othmān, under the title Ta'riḳ-i Āl-i 'Othmān. These chronicles which run from the beginning of the Ottoman empire were continued by him down to 956 (1549) i. e. till shortly before his death.

Two versions of his Chronicle exist, both of which go back to him: 1. a shorter one to which corresponds the translation of the Beck manuscript by Gaudier-Spiegel: Chronica oder Acta von der Türkischen Tyrannen herkommen vnd geführte Kriegen, aus Türkischer Sprachen verdeutschet. Vorhin nie in Druck ausgegangen, Frankfurt a/O. 1567; it was also published in Latin and German by Leunclavius: Annales Sultanorum Othmanidarum a Turcis sua lingua scripti, Frankfurt 1588; 2nd edition with index and German transl.: Neue Chronika Türkischer Nation von Türcken selbs beschrieben, Frankfurt a/Main 1590;

2. a longer version: the so-called Verantian Chronicle (Codex Verantianus), edited in Latin and German by Leunclavius: Historiae Musulmanae Turcorum de monumentis ipsorum exscriptae libri XVIII, Frankfurt 1591. There were 18 books instead of the 30 planned. As early as 1590 the first three books were published in German at Frankfurt: Neuer Muselmanischer Histori, Türkischer Nation, von ihrem Herkommen, Geschichte vnd Taten; drey Bücher, die ersten vnter dreyszig; followed by the complete German translation of the Annales: Neuer Muselmanischer Histori Türkischer Nation, Frankfurt a/M. 1595.

In addition to his chronicle, which exists only in manuscript (MSS. in Vienna, Munich, Berlin, Gotha, London, Constantinople etc.), Muhyi al-Dīn is also credited with poems in Turkish, Arabic and Persian (also extant in a manuscript) and a theological work.

MUHYI LĀRĪ (d. 933 = 1526—1527), a Persian writer, author of the famous Futūh al-Haramain, a poetical description of the two holy cities, Mecca and Medina, which also contains a full account of all the rites of the obligatory pilgrimage (ḥajj).

This book, written in 911 (1506) and dedicated to Muza'ffar b. Mahmūd Shāh of Gujjarāt (917—932 = 1511—1526), was for a long time wrongly attributed to the celebrated poet 'Abd al-Rahmān Djāmī. Muhyi Lārī was a pupil of the great philosopher Muḥammad al-Dawānī (d. 907 = 1501) and made use of his extensive philosophical knowledge in a commentary on the great Qaṣida of Ibn al-Fāriḍ, which is known as al-Tā'iya al-kubrā. In this work he endeavoured, following in the footsteps of his teacher, to reconcile the principles of orthodox Muḥammadan mysticism with the teachings of Aristotle in the form in which they were disseminated in the east.

AL-MU'ID. [See ALLĀH, b. 2.]

MU'IN AL-DĪN SULAIMĀN PARWĀNA, vice-regent of the Saldjūq empire in Asia Minor after the Mongol invasion of that territory. His father Muḥaddhib al-Dīn 'Alī al-Dailamī (in some sources, such as the Ta'rikh-i Guzida, Mu'īn al-Dīn is called "al-Kāshī", which implies origin from Kāshān) had been a minister during the reign of Kaikhusraw II and had been able, after the battle of Köse Dagḥ (1243), to secure for a time the continuation of the Saldjūq dynasty in Asia Minor, by his intercession with the Mongol general Baidjū (Ibn Bibi, p. 243). His son Mu'īn al-Dīn Sulaimān soon rose to hold important offices and had been commander of Toḡat, and later of Toḡat and Erzindjān, when, in 1256, he was promoted, by the favour of Baidjū, to the rank of parwāna. The title parwāna denoted a high administrative office (high chancellor) in the Saldjūq empire and is erroneously explained by the Persian dictionaries as a synonym of farmān (the word is fully discussed in the foot-note on p. 46 of Khalil Edhem's article in T.O.E.M., vol. viii.; cf. also Huart, Les Saints, etc., i. 80). At the time indicated the three sons of Kaikhusraw were nominally reigning, but Mu'īn al-Dīn was already the real director of affairs. After Hülāgū had appeared on the scene in 1260, the empire was divided into two parts, of which Rukn al-Dīn Kīlīdj Arslan got the eastern part with Parwāna as vizier at his side. The latter had also a family connection with the dynasty, for he was married to a daughter of Kaikhusraw II, while one of his own daughters became the wife of the Saldjūq Ghiyāth al-Dīn Mas'ūd II. As vizier of Rukn al-Dīn he conquered Sinope (Sinūb) from the Greek emperor of Trebizond; the town was given to himself, and after his death some of his descendants continued to reign there (cf. Sīnūb and Tewḥid, Sinūbda Parwāne-Zādelar, in T.O.E.M., 1st year, p. 203). In February 1265 Parwāna, warned that his sultān wanted to get rid of him, had him imprisoned and afterwards strangled at Aḡ-Serāy. The two and a half years' old son of Rukn al-Dīn, Ghiyāth al-Dīn Kaikhusraw, was set up as a puppet-king. During the following years, when Parwāna was, under the supervision of the Mongols, the real master in Eastern Anatolia, the wretched situation of the country induced many notable Turks to emigrate to Egypt, where they incited Sultān Baibars to a military expedition against the Mongol domination in their country. It is highly probable that Mu'īn al-Dīn Parwāna himself was secretly at the head of these negotiations. Baibars invaded Asia Minor, defeated a Mongol army at Albistān and occupied the town of Kai-sariye in April 1277. Here he waited for Parwāna to join him, but the latter had lost his confidence in the enterprise and fled to Toḡat with the young sultān. Baibars returned again to Syria and soon a Mongol army appeared under the Ilkhān Abaḡa to inflict drastic punishment on the Muslim population; he is said to have killed over 200,000 people. At the same time suspicion fell on Parwāna. He was accused of having fled with his army at the battle of Albistān, of having not appeared before the Ilkhān after the defeat, and of having neglected to inform the Mongols of Baibars' approach. At first Abaḡa was willing to spare him, but on the insistence of the relatives of those killed in the battle of Albistān, he ordered him to be executed at Ala Dagḥ, together with his retainers, probably on the 1st Rabi' I 676 (August 2, 1277). Ala Dagḥ is, according to Khalil Edhem, probably the same as Köse Dagḥ, to the east of Siwās. His burial place is not known. A foundation inscription on a mosque built by Mu'īn al-Dīn Parwāna in 663 (1264—1265) is still extant in Marzifūn. His death inspired several poets to make elegies on him (Munaddjim Bashī). From the tradition of the Mawlawī order it appears that Parwāna was on intimate terms with Djalāl al-Dīn Rūmī; the latter's work Fīhi mā fīhi was dedicated to him (cf. Kröpülü-Zade M. Fu'ād, Ilk Müteşarraf, p. 258).

MU'IN AL-MISKĪN whose full name was MU'IN AL-DĪN MUḤAMMAD AMĪN b. ḤĀJJDJ MUḤAMMAD AL-FARĀHĪ AL-HARAWĪ and whose takhal-luṣ was Mu'ini (d. 907 = 1501—1502), a celebrated traditionist. He studied Ḥadīth for 31 years and throughout this period preached every Friday in the great mosque of Herāt. He was for year kaḏi of Herāt but gave up the post by his own request. In 866 (1461—1462) at the request of a friend, he began to write a little book on the life of the Prophet Muḥammad. Out of this little book there grew in time the great biographical work, exceedingly popular in the East, called Ma'āridi al-Nubuwwa fī Ma'āridi al-Futuwwa, which was not finished till 891 (1486) and contains a very full account of the life of the Prophet consisting of a Muḥaddima, four books and a Khātima. Besides this gigantic work Mu'ini also wrote a commentary on the Kur'ān entitled Bahr al-Durar and a collection of forty ḥadīths, Rawḍat al-Wā'izīn. His study of the history of the prophets produced a large history of Moses entitled Mu'djizat-i Mūsawī (also called Ta'rikhi-i Mūsawī or Kiṣṣa-yi Mūsawī), which was completed in 904 (1498—1499), and the story of Yūsuf and Zulaikha, Aḥsan al-Kiṣaṣ.

AL-MU'IZZ. [See ALLĀH, II.]

AL-MU'IZZ b. BĀDĪS. [See ZĪRIDS.]

MU'IZZ AL-DAWLA, ARU 'L-HUSAIN AḤMAD b. ABĪ SHUDJĀ', a Būyid, was born in 303 (915/916). After the taking of Shirāz by the Būyids he brought Kirmān under his rule in 324 (935—936). When the rebel governor of al-Ahwāz, al-Baridī [q. v.], after several unsuccessful encounters with Bedjken [q. v.], the general of the 'Abbāsīd caliph, sought the help of the Būyid 'Imād al-Dawla, the latter sent his brother Aḥmad against al-Ahwāz with an army; Bedjken was defeated first at Arradjān and then at 'Askar Mukram (326 = 938), whereupon Aḥmad took this town; but when he demanded as a reward for the help he had given that al-Baridī should help the Būyid Rukn al-Dawla against Washmgir, the brother of Mardāwīj [q. v.], al-Baridī refused and went to Baṣra. After Aḥmad had received reinforcements from 'Imād al-Dawla, he was able to take al-Ahwāz. In 332 (943—944) he undertook a campaign against Wāsiṭ while the Amir al-Umarā', the Turkish chief Tuzun, was involved in a war with the Ḥamdānīd of al-Mawṣil.

Tuzun hurriedly made peace and set out against Aḥmad, and the two armies met in Dhu 'l-Ḳa'da of this year (July 944). The details are variously given; it is certain at least that Aḥmad soon afterwards returned to al-Ahwāz. At the end of Rādjab of the following year (middle of March 945), he made a further attempt to take the town but had to withdraw the next month on the approach of Tuzun. In 334 (945) he attacked Wāsiṭ for a third time; its governor had gone over to his side and the town surrendered without a blow being struck; he then marched against Baghdād and in Djumādā I 334 (December 945) entered the capital where he at once seized the power. The caliph al-Mustakfi appointed him Amir al-Umarā' and gave him the title Mu'izz al-Dawla but was deposed and blinded a few weeks later because he was alleged to be dealing with the enemies of the Būyids. Mu'izz al-Dawla was soon afterwards attacked by the Ḥamdānīd Nāṣir al-Dawla of al-Mawṣil, who advanced on Baghdād along with Abū 'Dja'far b. Shīrẓād and very quickly occupied the eastern part of the capital. Nāṣir al-Dawla was not driven back till Muḥarram of the following year (Aug. 946) when he made peace with the Būyids but without consulting his Turkish allies. The latter were angered at this and turned against him. Nāṣir al-Dawla had to flee and only succeeded in bringing the Turks to terms with the help of the Būyids; he then returned to al-Mawṣil as a vassal of the Būyids. Abū 'l-Ḳāsim, son and successor of al-Baridī, was the next to be dealt with. Mu'izz al-Dawla sent an army against him which put his forces to flight and in 336 (947) he took the field in person. Abū 'l-Ḳāsim fled to the Ḳarmaṭians of al-Bāḥrain and Mu'izz al-Dawla occupied Baṣra. Abū 'l-Ḳāsim's governor 'Imrān b. Shāhin however held out in al-Djāmīda, the capital of the Euphrates territory between Wāsiṭ and Baṣra, and after several years fighting Mu'izz al-Dawla had to confirm him in his governorship. In 337 (948—949) Mu'izz al-Dawla undertook a campaign against al-Mawṣil because Nāṣir al-Dawla did not send the tribute imposed on him. The latter fled to Naṣībīn, but when Rukn al-Dawla, brother of Mu'izz al-Dawla, was attacked by the Sāmānīds, Mu'izz al-Dawla had to send him help and concluded peace with the Ḥamdānīds. In 347 (958—959) Nāṣir al-Dawla rebelled again but on the approach of Mu'izz al-Dawla he left al-Mawṣil and went first of all to Naṣībīn and then to Ḥalab to his brother Saif al-Dawla, while Mu'izz al-Dawla advanced on al-Mawṣil and took this town and also Naṣībīn. Through the intervention of Saif al-Dawla however peace was made (Muḥarram 348 = March—April 959). In the last year of his life Mu'izz al-Dawla had to fight the Ḳarmaṭians and 'Imrān b. Shāhin. The former acknowledged his suzerainty; the war against the latter was interrupted by the death of Mu'izz al-Dawla on 13th or 17th Rabi' II 356 (March 28 or April 1, 967).

AL-MU'IZZ LI-DĪN ALLĀH, ABŪ TAMĪM MA'ADD B. ISMĀ'IL AL-MANŠŪR, fourth Fāṭimid caliph, was born at Mahdiyya on 11th Ramaḍān 319 (28th Sept. 931), proclaimed heir-apparent in 341 (952—953), and succeeded to the throne in Shawwāl of the same year (March 953). His first object was to restore the Fāṭimid power, which had been reestablished in Ifrīkiya by his father, over the remaining provinces of the Maghrib. In 342 he led in person an army of Kitāma into the Awrās mountains and not only reduced the turbulent tribes of that region for the first time, but also received the formal submission of the chiefs of Zenāta and of the ruling princes of the west. The hostility and intrigues, however, of the Umayyad ruler of Spain, 'Abd al-Rahmān III [q. v.], maintained a situation of unrest in the Maghrib, and after ineffectual naval raids on both sides, al-Mu'izz despatched thither in 347 (958) a strong force under the command of his freedman and kātib Djawhar al-Rūmī [q. v.]. Tāhart and Sidjilmāsa were captured with little difficulty, Fās surrendered after an obstinate siege of eleven months in Ramaḍān 348, and the other strongholds in the Maghrib were occupied, with the exception of Salā and Sabta, which were held for 'Abd al-Rahmān. Although the results of this campaign in the western Maghrib were ephemeral, the establishment of the Ṣanhādji chief Ziri b. Manād at Tāhart placed an effective check upon the Zenāta of the Central Maghrib. There can be no doubt that al-Mu'izz was already contemplating the conquest not only of Egypt and Syria, but also of Baghdad, using for this purpose the Kitāma, as the 'Abbāsids had used the army of Khurāsān, while the Ṣanhādja should hold North-west Africa for him, and with this end in view he actively pursued a policy of conciliation of these tribes by lavish gifts and the abolition of financial exactions.

Though this ambition was no secret, it is represented in the official correspondence of al-Mu'izz as subsidiary to his desire (which was probably sincere) to assume the leadership in the djihād against the encroaching Greeks. Already in 350 (961) the Cretans, besieged by Nikephoros Phokas, and despairing of assistance from Kāfur, had solicited his aid. In spite of the victory claimed for al-Mu'izz by Ibn al-Athīr (viii. 404), it appears that he was unable to send assistance in time, but he seized the opportunity to denounce the treaty made with the Emperor Constantine VII in 956, and opened a fresh attack in Sicily. Taormīna was captured in 351 (962), and an expeditionary force sent from Constantinople was severely defeated both on land and sea, the general Manuel Phokas being killed, and the commander Niketas taken prisoner.

In the same year (355 = 966) al-Mu'izz began his preparations for the advance on Egypt, by ordering wells to be dug along the route. His relations with Kāfur at this time are obscure. Fāṭimid emissaries had long been engaged in active propaganda in Egypt, and had evidently made some headway, aided by the resentment of the population against the Sūdāni troops, who were fanatical Sunnis. Their propaganda was indulgently regarded by Kāfur, and it is not impossible that, as the Fāṭi-mid writers claim, he privily declared his adhesion to al-Mu'izz. His death on 21st Djumādā II, 357 (24th May 968) gave the signal for the advance of the Fāṭimid army, said to have been over 100,000 strong, which set off under the command of Djawhar on 14th Rabi' I, 358 (6th Feb. 969), with the support of a naval squadron. The disorganization which prevailed in Egypt and the terror inspired by the Greek armies (who in 968 had swept over the whole of northern Syria without meeting opposition and had taken immense numbers of prisoners), contributed greatly to the prospects of its success; moreover, many of the Egyptian notables and even of the troops had sent letters to al-Mu'izz inviting his intervention. On Djawhar's approach the population made their submission by an embassy of notables, but the Ikhshīdī and Ṭulūnī regiments rejected the conditions laid down in the agreement, and had to be forcibly dislodged from their positions at Djiza and on the islands. The retreating Mamlūks split up into bands, some of which continued to give Djawhar much trouble as local centres of disaffection, ending only with the arrest and deportation to Africa of their commanders, and the disarmament or imprisonment of the remainder.

Djawhar, having entered Fustāt on 17th Sha'bān 358 (7th July 969) and laid the foundations of the new city of al-Kāhira, immediately took in hand the reform of the administration. Complete religious toleration was promised, and confirmed by the reinstatement of the existing officials, weekly sessions for the hearing of maqālim were instituted, several vexatious taxes were abolished and property which had been illegally sequestered to the Treasury was restored to its owners, and regular salaries were assigned to the officers of the mosques. Another of his reforms, however, caused great resentment; this was the striking of a new coinage to replace the existing debased coinage, and the order to levy all taxes in the new currency. His difficulties were increased by a prolonged famine and by the turbulence of the Berber soldiery, and it was not until the arrival in Egypt of al-Mu'izz himself in Ramaḍān 362 (June 973) that the task of reorganization was completed by centralizing the financial administration under Ya'qūb b. Kilis [q. v.] and 'Aslūdji b. al-Ḥasan, and by the removal of the Berber troops to a new camp near Heliopolis.

The course of events in Syria after the occupation of Egypt is differently related and obscure in detail. Djawhar's lieutenant Dja'far b. Falāḥ defeated the joint forces of the *Ikhshīdī*s and *Ḳarmāṭī*ans under al-Ḥasan (in some sources al-Ḥusain) b. 'Ubaid Allāh b. Tughdji at Ramla in the early months of 359 (970), but the general disorganization and the licence of the Arab tribesmen preventing him from entering Damascus until Dhu 'l-Hijda of the same year. Shortly afterwards he detached some contingents against the Greeks, but the troops sent to recover Antioch were defeated near Iskandarūna, or, according to Yaḥyā b. Sa'īd (ed. Cheikho, p. 139), were recalled after besieging the city for five months. Meanwhile the *Ḳarmāṭī*an general al-Ḥasan b. Aḥmad al-A'sam (in some versions al-Aghsham), in revenge, it is said (but see de Goeje, Les Carmathes du Bahrain, p. 181—190), for the stoppage of the subsidy he had received from the Ikhshīdī al-Ḥasan, opened negotiations with the Buwaihīd 'Izz al-Dīn and the Ḥamdānīd amir of al-Mawṣil, and with the aid of subsidies from them and some lkhshīdī contingents, defeated and killed Dja'far and recaptured Damascus in Dhu 'l-Ḳa'da 360 (Aug.-Sept. 971). Having shut up the remaining Egyptian forces in Yāfā, he marched on Cairo, but was defeated by Dja'war in Rabi' I 361 (Dec. 971), and his fleet was destroyed at Tinnis. The Ḳarmāṭians retained their hold on Damascus, however, repulsed a strong Maghribī force despatched to Palestine by Dja'war in Ramaḍān 361, and with an army of Arab auxiliaries and lkhshīdīs (some sources also add Dailamis) made a second descent upon Egypt after the arrival of al-Mu'izz. By bribing the Arabs, the Caliph succeeded in dividing and defeating the Ḳarmāṭian army outside Cairo in Ramaḍān 363 (May-June 964), but not before Ḳarmāṭian forces had overrun both the Delta and the Ṣa'īd. On al-Ḥasan's return to al-Aḥṣā' the 'Ukailid Zālim b. Mawhūb occupied Damascus on behalf of al-Mu'izz, but came into conflict with the Maghribī troops, whose indiscipline and excesses at length led the citizens to appeal to the Turkish general al-Aftakīn, who remained in possession of the city until he was captured by al-'Azīz [q. v.]. Meanwhile in northern Syria the Fāṭimid troops gained a series of striking successes against the Greeks. Tripoli and Bairūt were captured in 364 (975), and John Zimiskēs suffered a crushing defeat both on land and sea at the hands of Raiyān, governor of Tripoli, on his attempt to recover the city.

The empire which al-Mu'izz bequeathed to his successor, though it fell short of his ambitions, was still of imposing extent. The viceroy to whom he had committed the western provinces, Bulukkin b. Zīrī [q. v.], proved both loyal and capable; when, on the departure of the Caliph, the Zenāta again rose in revolt, he scattered their forces and recaptured Tahart and Tilimsān. The holy cities of Mecca and Madina acknowledged the suzerainty of the Fāṭimids, and they had a powerful following in Sind. Only in Syria had the Ḳarmāṭians, on whose cooperation al-Mu'izz had confidently relied (though the letter reproduced by al-Maḳrīzī, Itti'āz, ed. Bunz, p. 133 sqq. is of doubtful genuineness), brought him to a halt, but by this action they had placed a fatal obstacle in his way. This disappointment preyed on his mind and, worn out by ill-health and by grief at the loss of his eldest son 'Abd Allāh (died 364), he died at Cairo on 11th Rabi' II, 365 (Dec. 19, 975), having nominated as his successor his second son Nizār al-'Azīz.

The personal character of al-Mu'izz was singularly noble; frank, accessible, simple in his habits, endowed with brilliant gifts and all the traditional qualities of ḥilm, he was at the same time a capable administrator and just towards his subjects, though the financial exactions of his last years left a bitter memory. No instance of cruelty is recorded of him, except the execution of his Ḳarmāṭian captives, and he was completely devoid of religious fanaticism.

MU'IZZĪ, AMĪR ABŪ 'ABD ALLĀH MUḤAMMAD B. 'ABD AL-MALIK, one of the most famous of Persian court poets. His place of birth is not exactly known. According to most of the sources he was born in Samarḳand about 440 (1048—1049) but Nasā and Nishāpūr are also mentioned. The son of a little known poet 'Abd al-Malik Burhānī, who was attached to the court of the Saldjūk Alp Arslān (1063—1072), he was introduced to Sultān Malik-Shāh (1072—1092) by Amīr 'Alī b. Farāmūz, ruler of Yazd (443—488 = 1051/1502—1095), made a favourable impression on the sultān and received from him the takhalluṣ of Mu'izzī, which comes from the laqab of Malik-Shāh, Mu'izz al-Dīn. He enjoyed even greater distinction under the last great Saldjūk ruler Sandjar (1118—1157) and was appointed his malik al-shu'arā' and the head of a regular establishment of poets, said to have numbered 400. He is reputed to have become fabulously wealthy from the splendid gifts of the ruler and he received a salary paid out of the revenues of Isfahān. Nevertheless he continually tried to increase his fortune and, as he himself tells us, never wrote a single panegyric without making certain in advance that his work would be well paid. According to the Oriental sources, he came to a tragic end, being accidentally killed by Sultān Sandjar, while practising archery in his tent. This is not possible however, as Mu'izzī himself mentions this incident in his Diwān and says that, although he suffered a long illness as a result of being struck by the arrow, he completely recovered in the end. This event took place in Marw, about 496 (1102—1103), but he lived for another 46 years and died there in 542 (1147—1148). There is an elegy written on the occasion of his death in the Diwān of Maḍjd al-Dīn Sanā'ī. Mu'izzī is one of the most brilliant writers of ḥazidas in the old Ghaznawid style ('Unsurī) but his art was finally displaced by Anwārī's new style and came to be forgotten.

MUḲĀBALA, Gr. ἀντίμετρος, in the Almagest ἀντίμετρος, Lat. oppositio, the term in astronomy for the opposition of a planet and the sun or of two planets with one another. In opposition the difference in longitude between the two heavenly bodies is 180° ; while the modern use is to take no note of the deviations of latitude from the ecliptic, al-Battānī expressly emphasises (Opus astronomicum, ed. Nallino, iii. 196) that we can only have the true muḳābala when both bodies are either in the ecliptic itself or are in equal ecliptical latitudes when opposed: in other words when they are diametrically opposite one another in the heavens (cf. "διάμετρος"!); Opposition with the sun can only occur for the moon and the outer planets (in ancient astronomy only for Mars, Jupiter and Saturn), not for the two inner ones, Mercury and Venus. When an outer planet is in opposition to the sun, its conditions of visibility are at their best; at midnight it passes through the meridian and is above the horizon the whole night. When the moon is in opposition to the sun we have the full moon; the usual technical expression for this in Arabic astronomy is al-istikbāl which is derived from the same root as muḳābala (Greek ἡ πανσέληνος) and is rendered by Plato Tiburtinus and other mediaeval translators by praeventio; but we not uncommonly find the general term muḳābala applied to the opposition of sun and moon, while on the other hand we never find al-istikbāl used in the general sense of opposition of the planets (cf. al-Battānī, ii. 349, s. v. k-b-l).

Al-muḳābala, opposition, forms along with al-tarbiʿ, quadrature (Gr. τετράγωνον, Lat. tetragonum, quadratum), al-tathlith, trigon (Gr. τρίγωνον, Lat. trigonum, triangulum, trigonum, aspectus trinus), and al-tasdis, hexagon (Gr. ἑξάγωνον, Lat. hexagonum, sexangulum, aspectus sextilis), the four astrological aspects (ashkāl, sg. shakl, Gr. σχήματα, σχηματισμοί, συναρμωτισμοί, also βύεις, Lat. aspectus or radiationes), which are applied to the ecliptical differences in longitude of two planets to the amount of 180° , 90° , 120° or 60° respectively. The ashkāl also play a part in the astrological arrangement of the signs of the zodiac (burūdī) (cf. the article MINṬAQA and al-Battānī, iii. 194). It should be noted that the conjunction of planets (muḳārana, Greek συνωδος; for moon with sun [new moon] always idjtimāʿ) is not included among the ashkāl, nor the position when the difference of latitude is 30° or 150° (cf. al-Battānī, op. cit.).

In horoscopes muḳābala and tarbiʿ are as a rule regarded as unfavourable in principle, tathlith and tasdis on the other hand as favourable.

MUḲADDAM (A.), "placed in front". Applied to persons the word means the chief, the one in command, e. g. of a body of troops or of a ship (captain). Dozy, Suppl., s. v., gives a number of police appointments which have this name. In the dervish orders the word is used for the head of the order or the head of a monastery.

As a neuter noun the word is a technical term in logic and arithmetic. In logic it means the protasis in a premise in the form of a conditional sentence, e. g. "If the sun rises (it becomes day)", where this whole sentence is to be regarded as premise of a syllogism. But as every sentence can be a premise, muḳaddam is really identical with the condition in the conditional sentence. In arithmetic muḳaddam means the first of two numbers in a proportion, i. e. 3 (:5) or in other words the divided in a simple division. — In logic and in arithmetic the portion following the muḳaddam (in brackets above) is called tālī.

AL-MUḲADDASĪ, SHAMS AL-DĪN ABŪ 'ABD ALLĀH MUḤAMMAD B. AḤMAD B. ABĪ BAKR AL-BANNA' AL-ŠA'MĪ AL-MUḲADDASĪ AL-MA'RŪF BI 'L-BASHSHĀRĪ as he is called on the first page of the Berlin manuscript (Cat. Ahlwardt, N^o. 6034), is the author of the most original and at the same time one of the most valuable geographical treatises in Arabic literature. The name-form al-Muḳaddasī, denoting his origin from Jerusalem, goes back to Sprenger, who brought the Berlin manuscript from India and made this author first known in Europe (A. Sprenger, Die Post- und Reiserouten des Orients, Leipzig 1864, p. xviii.), but the form al-Maḳdisī is probably more correct as Jerusalem is commonly spelt al-Bait al-Maḳdis (Yāqūt, Mu'adjam, iv. 590). Yāqūt always quotes him as al-Bashshārī.

Biographical dates on the life of this author are only to be found in the text of his treatise. In 356 (966), when he was at Mecca, he was about twenty years of age; it is probable that he lived at least as late as 1000, as the last datable information in the treatise belongs to the end of the ivth (xth) century. His grandfather Abū Bakr al-Banna' was an architect in Palestine and had made for Ibn Tūlūn the gates of the town of 'Akkā. His mother's family was originally from Biyār in Kūmis, from where his grandfather Abū 'l-Taiyib b. al-Šawā (in B.G.A., iv., p. vii., l. 12 "paternus" is to be corrected into "maternus") emigrated to Jerusalem. Muḥammad b. Aḥmad himself shows also a good knowledge of architecture, besides a good literary and general erudition.

The geographical treatise is known from two old manuscripts, which form the basis of de Goeje's edition in the B.G.A., iii, Leyden 1877 and of his revised edition of 1906. The Berlin manuscript has the title Aḥsan al-Taḳāsim fī Ma'rifaṭ al-Aḳālīm, while the Constantinople manuscript (Aya Sofia, N^o. 2971 bis; cf. Ritter, in Isl., xix. 43), written in 658 (1260), is only indicated as Kitāb al-Aḳālīm. The Leyden manuscript (Cat., v. 191) is a modern copy of the Constantinople one, while another Berlin manuscript (Cat. Ahlwardt, N^o. 6033) is a bad copy of the other Berlin manuscript. The date of composition is not certain. The text itself states that it was completed in 375 (985) (B.G.A., iii. 9), but as has been said, information of a later date has been added, while Yāqūt (i. 653) gives the year 378 (988). The manuscript C (Constantinople) is somewhat less extensive than B (Berlin) and de Goeje, hesitatingly, considers the redaction of C as the older one. It is dedicated to a certain Abū 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī b. al-Ḥasan and mentions the Sāmānids as the most important dynasty; B, on the contrary, does not contain the dedication and is more orientated towards the Fātimids.

The general scope of the work proves beyond doubt that it is based on the same geographical tradition as the treatises connected with the names al-Balkhī — al-Iṣṭakhri — Ibn Ḥawkal; the same is proved by the fact that the maps accompanying both manuscripts show the still rather primitive type of the Iṣṭakhri maps (the Maḳḍisī maps have been published by K. Miller, in Mappae Arabicae, vol. i.—v., Stuttgart 1926—1931). In this last respect al-Maḳḍisī's work does not really reflect the considerable progress of geographical knowledge that is manifested in the text. As in the texts of al-Iṣṭakhri and Ibn Ḥawkal the object is to treat only the Islāmic world (mamlakat al-Islām) of the ivth (xth) century and that after a division into regions (aḳālīm) which, on the whole, is the same as that of the two authors mentioned; the order is not always the same, but the distinction between western and eastern regions is maintained. The treatment is often more detailed than with the earlier authors, while the disposition of the geographical matter is the same, each region ending with a survey of the distances between the different towns. In how far al-Maḳḍisī is dependent on al-Iṣṭakhri and Ibn Ḥawkal remains to be examined. His introductory chapters show not a few original features and are especially valuable for information about earlier geographical authors. As de Goeje has already remarked, this information is more accurate in the redaction C than in B; if the latter redaction is really later it would seem that the rather depreciating judgment he gives therein of al-Balkhī, al-Djaihānī and others (p. 4) must be explained by the change of the author's political predilection in favour of the Fātimids and occidental Islām. Al-Maḳḍisī's style and language is sometimes difficult, owing to his expressly stated endeavour to adapt himself in the description of each region to the special idiom used in that region. Moreover, the reading of his text is several times made unpleasant by the boisterous way in which the author speaks of the merits of his work.

A English translation of part of the treatise was published by G. S. A. Ranking and R. F. Azoo in the Bibliotheca Indica, Calcutta 1897—1910, vol. i.—iv.

Bibliography: The author and the work are discussed by de Goeje in the introduction to vol. iv. of the B.G.A., p. vi.—viii.; further cf. Brockelmann, G.A.L., i.

AL-MUKADDIM. [See ALLĀH, II.]

MUKALLĀ (MAKALLA), a seaport on the south coast of Arabia, 2½ miles N. W. of the cape of the same name. The town lies between two bays at the foot of a reddish limestone cliff, which rises to a height of 300 feet behind the town; four towers for the defence of the town are built upon it. On the west side a wall runs from the cliff to the shore with only one gate in it. The only buildings of any size are the great mosque on the coast with a minaret which can be seen from a great distance, and the sultān's palace; the other buildings are mainly huts with a few houses of stone. The palace is a great six-storey building with decorated windows which stands on a kind of peninsula. In the centre of the town is a large cemetery with the tomb of Walī Ya'qūb; in the modern western part of the town is the bazaar which is provided with all kinds of goods and has some modest industries which provide the native population with baskets, pipes of a kind of limestone, silver powder-horns and muskets without stocks. There is a yard in the harbour where the native sailing-boats are built. The country around is not fertile; a mile to the west however is an oasis belonging to the ruler, which is watered by a stream which also provides the town's water supply. The climate of Mukallā is very dry, the coast hot; only from October to April and in June and July do fresh breezes and showers temper the heat. The population varies between 6,000 and 12,000.

Mukallā is the only place between 'Aden and Maṣṣaṭ that deserves the name of harbour. It cannot however be used as an anchorage during the southwest monsoon; in this period its place is taken by Burūm, 16 miles southwest. The trade with India, Ṣomaliland, the Red Sea and Maṣṣaṭ is considerable. The exports are mainly gum arabic, skins, honey from the Yeshbom valley, senna and some coffee; the imports are cotton goods, metals, pottery from Bombay, dates and dried fruits from Maṣṣaṭ, coffee from 'Aden, sheep, aloes and frankincense from the African coast. The fisheries also give a considerable yield while amber is obtained in considerable quantities. Parsis and banians from Bombay play a leading part in the trade and Hindustānī is spoken almost as much as Arabic. Since 1881 Mukallā has been under the al-Ḳa'itī dynasty with which England concluded a treaty granting a protectorate on May 1, 1888. According to Ibn al-Mudjāwir, the old name of the town was al-Mukannā, and the natives also call al-Mukallā, like al-Shīhr, Bender al-Aḥḳāf or Sūḳ al-Aḥḳāf. The port has steamship communication with 'Aden; most of the traffic is borne by native sailing-boats of 100—300 tons, which are busiest at the time of the date harvest.

(ADOLF GROHMANN)

AL-MUKALLAD B. AL-MUSAIYIB, ḤUSĀM AL-DAWLĀ ABŪ ḤASSĀN, an 'Uḳailid. After the death in 386 (996) or 387 (997) of the 'Uḳailid emir Abū 'l-Dhawwād Muḥammad b. al-Musaiyib [cf. BAḤĀ' AL-DAWLĀ], a quarrel arose between his brothers, 'Alī and al-Mukallad, each of whom claimed power. 'Alī was the elder; but al-Mukallad wrote to Baḥā' al-Dawla and promised him an annual tribute and then told his brother that Baḥā' al-Dawla had appointed him governor of al-Mawṣil and asked 'Alī's help to take the town. Baḥā' al-Dawla's general in al-Mawṣil, Abū Dja'far al-Ḥadjīdjādī, took to flight and the two brothers agreed to share the government. Disputes between al-Mukallad's representative in Baghdād and Bahā' al-Dawla's officials gradually led to open hostilities. A reconciliation was soon brought about and al-Mukallad promised to pay 10,000 dinārs and in return received the title Ḥusām al-Dawla with al-Mawṣil, al-Kūfa al-Ḳaṣr and al-Djāmi'ain as a fief. In 387 (997) he took 'Alī prisoner. As a result the third brother advanced with a strong army against al-Mukallad; before they came to blows however, their sister Rahila succeeded in making peace among the brothers. 'Alī was released and received his confiscated property back and al-Mukallad turned his attention to the lord of Wāsiṭ, 'Alī b. Mazyad, who was on the side of 'Alī and Ḥasan. But when al-Mukallad learned that 'Alī had designs on al-Mawṣil, he turned back but through the intermediary of Ḥasan, the two brothers were again reconciled. Soon afterwards 'Alī and Ḥasan left al-Mawṣil. After long negotiations, it was agreed that 'Alī should be al-Mukallad's representative in al-Mawṣil whenever the latter had to leave the town. On 'Alī's death in 390 (999—1000), Ḥasan succeeded to his privileges but was driven out by al-Mukallad and had to take refuge in the 'Irāq. In Ṣafar 391 (Dec. 1000—Jan. 1001) al-Mukallad was murdered in al-Anbār by a Turkish Mamlik.

(K. V. ZETTERSTÉEN)

MUKĀN (Mūghān), a steppe lying to the south of the lower course of the Araxes, one part of which (about 5,000 square kilometres) belongs to Russia (U. S. S. R.) and the other (50—70 × c. 50 kilometres) to Persia. The steppe which covers what was once the bottom of the sea has been formed by the alluvial deposits from the Kur (in Russian Koura) and its tributary the Araxes. (The latter has several times changed its course and one of its arms flows directly into the gulf of ẸẸzīl-Aghač). In the interior the only water in Mūghān is from a number of springs, but it is covered with tells and shows traces of the old system of irrigation. Mūghān has a very mild climate in winter (Ḳazwīnī calls it djūrūm Aḍhar-bāidjān) and in the spring is covered with a rich carpet of verdure but in summer the heat makes it a regular hell and it is infested with snakes (Monteith says "in June the snakes literally covered the ground"; cf. Abū Ḥāmid al-Gḥarnaṭī in Ḳazwīnī, p. 379).

The name. The old Arabic transcription (Balādhuri, Ṭabari) is Mukān (without article) but quite early in certain manuscripts of the Arab geographers we find Mūghān (probably a popular etymology mūghān "magi") which becomes general in the Mongol period. Markwart, Z.D.M.G., 1895, p. 633 connects the name of Mukān with that of the people mentioned by classical writers as inhabiting this region: Hecataeus, fragment 170: ἐκ Μυκῶν εἰς Ἀράζην; Pomponius Mela, book iii., ch. v.: "Mochi ("ad Hyrcanium fretum Albani et Moschi et Hyrcani"). This tribe is to be connected with the Caspians who lived in this region; (cf. Hübschmann, Die altarm. Ortsnamen, 1904, p. 269; cf. in Yāqūt, iv. 676 the genealogy invented by Ibn al-Kalbī, according to which Mukān and Djilān — both inhabitants of Ṭabaristān — were the sons of Kamāshah (?) b. Yāfith b. Nuḥ; cf. Genesis x.). The Chronicle of Theophanes, p. 363, has Βουκάνια (var. Βουκάνια), the Armenian geography Mukan, the Georgian chronicle Mowakan (another Mowakan lay near the confluence of the Alazan with the Iora).

History. The Byzantine general Leontius in 678 subdued Iberia, Albania, Bukania (cf. above) and Media. The district of Mukān was conquered in 21 (642) by an officer of Surāḳa Bukair who addressed a letter guaranteeing peace to "the people of Mukān of the mountains of al-Kabdj" (Caucasus; Ṭabari, i. 2666). According to Balādhuri, p. 327—329, in 25 (645) Walid b. 'Ukba undertook a campaign against the people of Mukān (ahl Mukān), of al-Babr [cf. ṬAROM] and al-Tailasān (= Talish). Another campaign of Sa'īd b. 'Aṣī against the people of Mukān and Djilān, although successful, entailed severe losses. According to Ya'qūbī, ed. Houtsma, ii. 395, 15, in 123 the future Caliph Marwān II b. Muḥammad undertook a campaign in Djilān and Mukān. Mukān figures several times as a stronghold of Babak (Tab., iii. 1174, 1178). In the third (ninth) century Ibn Khurdādhbih, p. 119, mentions one Shakla (?) as chief of Mukān. According to al-Mas'ūdī, Murūdj, ii. 5, in his time the Sharwān [cf. SHIRWĀN] had conquered the states (mamlaka) of Lāyirān (several variants) and al-Mukāniya. It appears from Ibn Miskawaihi (ed. Margoliouth, i. 399) who mentions the isphabad of Mukān b. Dalūla as ally of the Gil chief Lashkari b. Mardī, who rebelled against the Dailamis in 326 (937), that Mukān enjoyed a certain degree of autonomy. In 339 (950) the Kurd Daisam sent his vizier "into the mountains (sic!) of Mukān to entrench himself". In 349 Mukān appears as a centre of rebellion (Ibn Miskawaihi, ii. 136, 178—179). The poet Ḳaṭrān mentions the rising of the isphabad of Mukān against the Rawwādī Wahsūdān (344—378; cf. Kisrawī, Pādshāhān-i gumnām, Ṭihirān 1929, ii. 94). Later we hear of Mukān mainly as an excellent area for the winter pasturage of the conquering nomads. In Yāqūt's (iv. 676) time the majority of the people of Mukān were still Turkomans. In the history of the Khwārizmshāh Djālāl al-Dīn, Mukān is constantly mentioned. The sultān sends his booty there, keeps his baggage and mobilises his troops there (Nasawī, Sira, p. 210, 280, 366 etc.). But in 617 (1220—1221) the Mongol generals Djebe and Subutay spent the winter in Mukān (Djuwainī, i. 116), and Ḳazwīnī, p. 379 says that Mongols took Mūghān for their winter pastures and drove out the Turkomans. In the time of Timūr, Mukān must have been included in the region of Ḳarabāgh where this conqueror liked so much to pass the winter. During the winter of 804 (1401) Timūr restored an old canal which was given the name of his tribe Barlas. The canal left the Araxes at Kūshk-i Čangshī and at a distance of 10 farsakhs ended at Sardja-pil (bel?). Since, in order to give the necessary instructions, Timūr (who was to the north of the Araxes) had to cross the river (Zafarnāma, ii. 395), we may suppose that the canal lay to the south of the Araxes, i.e. in the steppe of Mūghān. It must correspond to the Yegin G'aur arkhi of which traces can still be seen for a length of about 35 miles. Sardja-pil may correspond to Čarčeli on the Russian map (according to the involved description by Monteith, the Barlas canal issued in the neighbourhood of Qara-su (?). The canal is in any case quite distinct from another canal which Timūr traced in 806 to the north of the Araxes towards the town of Bailakān (Zafar-nūma, ii. 543).

In the Šafawid period (and perhaps already under the Karakoyunlu) Mūghān became the possession of the Shīrī Turkoman tribes who formed the principal support of the dynasty and became known as Shāhsewān [q. v.]. By article ii. of the treaty of Gülistān of 1813 the steppe of Mūghān was divided between Russia and Persia. The boundary line was more precisely defined in article iv. of the treaty of Türkmenčai [q. v.]. In 1884 Russia forbade Persian nomads to cross into Russian territory. Towards the end of the sixth century the project of irrigating the land of Mūghān was conceived and realised between 1902 and 1907. The four systems of canals were to make 200,000 hectares cultivable, particularly for cotton. From 1884 the steppe was occupied solely by nomads who were Russian subjects. But in 1917 there were already 46 Russian villages with 17,000 inhabitants while the Turkish nomads who had become settled on the banks of the Kur and of the Araxes numbered 30,000 souls. As a result of the tragic events of 1918, the whole Russian population had to leave Mūghān and the canals became silted up. Between 1920 and 1924 the work of restoration was carried out and the fugitives began to return. The total area of irrigated land in Mūghān is estimated at 253,000 hectares, while immediately to the north of Mūghān the steppe of Mil (from Mil-i Bailakān, "the tower of Bailakan"; cf. Khanikow, Mém. sur les inscriptions musulm. au Caucase, in J. A., Aug. 1862, p. 72) has another 165,000 irrigated hectares.

Historical geography. The Arab geographers are fairly well acquainted with Mūghān (cf. the Bibliography). In the Mongol period, Mūghān must have comprised all the lands to the north of the Šalāwāt range (which is a western outlier of Russian Tālīsh and forms the watershed between the middle course of the Qara-su and the Bolgaru), to the east of the lower course of the Qara-su (where it follows the northern direction) and to the south of the Araxes. Towards the east Mūghān stretched to the Caspian Sea and included the coastal region of Russian Tālīsh. The mountainous part of the latter, held as in a vice, must also have belonged to Mūghān. The same condition must have existed in the Arab period for the curious expression of Ibn Miskawaihi, ii. 136 referring to the Djibāl Mukān can only refer to the mountainous part of Russian Tālīsh.

We may note Muḳaddasī's remark (p. 380) who among other wonders mentions, one marḥala (7—8 farsakhs = 20—25 miles) distant from Mukān, an imposing fortress called al-Ḥsra (?) below which are houses and palaces in which there are large quantities of gold (dhahab 'aḡīm) in the form of birds and wild beasts and "many kings made plans to seize it but never succeeded in reaching it". Muḳaddasī does not definitely say that the fortress belongs to Mūkān and evidently speaks of it by hearsay. Is this a reference to Shindān-ḳal'a (which is about 50 miles = 2 marḥala to the south of the presumed site of the shahristān of Mūghān)? On this imposing mountain (6,000 feet high) can still be seen ruins of important fortifications (Radde, p. 135: "ruins of a strong castle... many ruins of brick buildings"). Finally in a Persian translation of Iṣṭakhri, p. 186, 17, we read: "The Gils and the Mūkān are tribes on foot who rarely go on horseback" which can only refer to a few remnants of the old population settled in upper Tālīsh (where the highlanders are very distinct from the lowlanders).

AL-MUKĀṬARĀT. [See ASTURLĀB.]

MUKĀTIL B. SULAIMĀN B. BAŠĪR AL-AZDĪ AL-KHURĀSĀNĪ AL-BALKHĪ, ABU 'L-ḤASAN, traditionist and commentator on the Kur'ān, was born in Balkh and lived in Marw, Baghdād and Bašra, where he died in 150 (767); there is also a reference to a stay in Bairūt. Of his life we know almost nothing apart from a few details for his judgment as a traditionist. The name of his wife Umm Abi 'Isma Nūḥ b. Abi Maryam has been preserved. According to Ibn Duraid, he was one of the mawālī of the Banū Asad. He is sometimes quoted as Muḳātil b. Djāwāl dūz or Dawāl dūz. Ibn Ḥadjar, Lisān al-Miṣnān, expressly states in contradiction of wrong ideas that this is our Muḳātil and that Dawāl dūz is not a laḳab of Muḳātil himself but of his father.

Muḳātil's prestige as a traditionist is not very great; he is reproached with not being accurate with the isnād. His exegesis enjoys even less confidence. The biographers vie with one another in telling stories which illustrate his mendacity and particularly his professing to know everything. Contempt is poured on his memory by stories of ludicrous questions which were put to him about the most impossible things and to which he either gave fantastic answers or could make no reply. It is in keeping with this profession of universal knowledge that the sources are unanimous in talking of his extreme anthropomorphism (tashbīḥ).

It did little to help his fame also that he is said to have told pious stories [cf. ḲIṢṢA] in the mosque, at a time when this was strictly forbidden. In politics he is said to have belonged to the Zaidiya, in theology to the Murdji'a [q. v.].

Muḥātīl's literary activity was somewhat comprehensive, yet until quite recently nothing was known of his works. Only since 1912 has a Ḳur'ān commentary by him been known in the MS. Or. 6333 of the British Museum, the genuineness of which however Goldziher did not think beyond doubt. The Fihrist gives a list of his works; Ḥādjdī Khālifa also gives some of them. They deal mainly with the language and exegesis of the Ḳur'ān; but a pamphlet against the Ḳadariya is also mentioned. This is however hardly in keeping with another story, according to which he wrote a pamphlet against Ḍjahm [q. v.] and the latter wrote against him.

(M. PLESSNER)

AL-MUḤAṬṬAM, the part of the range of hills west of the Nile, which lies immediately to the east of Cairo and from which the mountains take a north-easterly direction, bordering the Nile delta to the south-east. It reaches a height of about 600 feet and consists, as does the greater part of the north African mountains, of limestone (cf. Description de l'Égypte, Etat moderne, Paris 1822, II/ii. 751).

The name Muḥaṭṭam (the Tādī al-ʿArūs records also the popular form al-Muḥaṭṭab) does not go back to a pre-Muḥammadan nomenclature, nor is it considered, in spite of its correct Arabic formation, as a true Arabic word, for the geographers (cf. Yāqūt, iv. 607 sqq.) give, hesitatingly, different explanations of its meaning. The name occurs for the first time in the historical tradition of the Egyptian Arabs, as found in the Futūḥ Miṣr of Ibn ʿAbd al-Ḥakam (cf. Torrey's edition, New Haven 1899, p. 156 sqq.), in half legendary tales in which also al-Muḥawḥis [q. v.] plays a part. Some of these traditions give it an eponymous hero, Muḥaṭṭam b. Miṣr b. Baiṣar b. Ḥam, or lay stress on the special sanctity of the mountain, declaring that, in some way, it is connected with the mountain of Jerusalem. As in the last mentioned traditions Ka'b al-Aḥbār [q. v.] is named as final authority, it seems probable that the origin of the name must be sought in Jewish legendary traditions (for Jewish traditions about mountains, cf. the Midrash Thillim on Psalm lxviii. 17) and that the name has been fixed only in course of time on the ill-defined mountainous region to which it is attached since the flourishing times of al-Fuṣṭāṭ and al-Ḳāhira. The vagueness of the geographical definition has survived in the Arabic geographical sources, which either call Muḥaṭṭam the entire eastern mountain range as far as Uṣwān (Yāqūt), or even represent under the name Muḥaṭṭam the whole of the mountain system that runs over the inhabited world from China to the Atlantic Ocean (Ibn Hawḳal and others). Moreover several geographers give the legendary statement that in the Muḥaṭṭam are mines of emerald and other precious stones, while in reality it contains only stone quarries, but these were used already in very ancient times. Makrīzī, Khīṭaṭ, ed. Bülāḳ, i. 123 gives a fairly complete survey of the different traditions and opinions.

It may be thus assumed that the Muḥaṭṭam acquired a real geographical identity only after the foundation of al-Fuṣṭāṭ. Its geographical situation, viz. its proximity to the bank of the Nile, has deeply influenced the territorial expansion of this town and later of Cairo [q. v.]. Parts of the town and famous sites are situated on the western spurs of al-Muḥaṭṭam, such as the mosque of Ibn Ṭūlūn and the citadel of Saladin. The elevation of Ibn Ṭūlūn's mosque bears, however, the special name of Ḍjabal Yaṣḥkur. The cemetery of al-Ḳarāfa belongs likewise to the Muḥaṭṭam and it is with this cemetery that are connected the ancient traditions already mentioned, in which al-Muḥawḥis plays a part; al-Muḥawḥis informs ʿAmr b. al-ʿĀs that the mountain, instead of earthly vegetation, is destined to bear the plants of Paradise and the caliph ʿUmar, informed by ʿAmr, decides that by these plants of Paradise can only be meant Muslims who have died. Accordingly, tradition records a number of ṣaḥābīs who are buried in al-Ḳarāfa. On the summit of al-Muḥaṭṭam was built in the Fāṭimid period the mosque of al-Djuyūshī, by Badr al-Djamālī in 478 (1085); for this reason the mountain is also called Ḍjabal al-Djuyūshī. On the southern slopes, towards Hulwān, lay the Christian monastery Dair al-Ḳuṣair (description by al-Shabūshī towards 1000; cf. Sachau, in Abh. Pr. Ak. Wiss., 1909). A historical, or perhaps legendary feature, connected with al-Muḥaṭṭam is that the Fāṭimid caliph al-Ḥākim is said to have disappeared mysteriously, in the night of 27th Shawwāl 411 (Feb. 23, 1021), when he had gone for a ride in the Muḥaṭṭam. — Finally it may be mentioned that the Muḥaṭṭam has given its name to one of the large modern Arabic newspapers published at Cairo.

(J. H. KRAMERS)

AL-MUḤAWḤAS, AL-MUḤAWḤIS, the individual who in Arab tradition plays the leading part on the side of the Copts and Greeks at the conquest of Egypt. The Prophet is said to have sent a letter to him in the year 6 A. H. In the address on this letter, the text of which is given in Ibn ʿAbd al-Ḥakam (ed. Torrey, p. 46), al-Makrīzī (Khīṭaṭ, i. 29), al-Suyūṭī (Ḥusn al-Muḥāḍara, i. 58) and al-Manūfi (p. 29), as well as in an entirely different version in Pseudo-Wāḳidī (p. 10), and also in the accounts of the incident in the Arab historians, the position of Muḥawḥis is described in the following phrases:

1. Ṣāḥib al-Iskandariya (Nawawī, p. 577; Ibn ʿAbd al-Ḥakam, p. 45, 52; Abū Ṣāliḥ, p. 38 [100]; Ibn Kathīr, iii., fol. 159, along with N^o 7 in Ibn Sa'd in Wellhausen, Skizzen und Vorarbeiten, iv. 3 [99]);
2. Malik al-Iskandariya (Ibn ʿAbd al-Ḥakam, p. 49; al-Suyūṭī, i. 60; Pseudo-Wāḳidī, p. 25; Ibn Hishām, p. 971);
3. Ṣāḥib Miṣr (Abu 'l-Fida', i. 149);
4. Malik Miṣr (al-Manūfi, p. 7; cf. al-Makrīzī, Khīṭaṭ, i. 163, 22 sq.);
5. Malik Miṣr wa 'l-Iskandariya (Pseudo-Wāḳidī, p. 10);
6. Ṣāḥib Miṣr wa 'l-Iskandariya (Pseudo-Wāḳidī,

p. 10); 7. ʿAzīm al-Kubṭ (Ibn ʿAbd al-Ḥakam, p. 46, 47; al-Makrizī, Khitaṭ, i. 29, 12, 16; al-Suyūṭī, i. 58; al-Manūfī, p. 29; al-Ṭabarī, i. 1575; al-Masʿūdī, Tanbih, p. 261, 5 along with 1, q. v.).

All these epithets no doubt mean simply the actual ruling authority in Egypt, whose true title was not known to the Arabs. If we remember that in the year 6 (628) the Persians were masters of Egypt, we can hardly give much credence to the story of the Arab historians. This is evident from the statement recorded by Manūfī (p. 30) that Egypt was under the rule of Mukawḳis continuously from the lifetime of the Prophet, through the caliphate of Abū Bakr to the beginning of the caliphate of ʿOmar. Muḥammad's letter to Mukawḳis was long ago declared not to be genuine by E. Amélineau (Fragments coptes, p. 392) and Wellhausen (Skizzen und Vorarbeiten, iv. 90) although they did not doubt the fact of the embassy to him; later Butler (Conquest, p. 522) and Th. Nöldeke (Z. D. M. G., xlviii. 160) still believed in the embassy although the latter granted the possibility that tradition might have transferred the name known from the time of the conquest to the man to whom Muḥammad sent gifts, while for example S. Lane-Poole (Egypt in the Middle Ages, p. 6, note 2) supposes that the Mukawḳis of 628 and the Mukawḳis of the conquest are two different people. This suggestion however is disposed of by the fact that the Mukawḳis of the letter is called in Ibn Kathīr مينا ابن جريج (in Abu 'l-Fidaʿ

the patronymic has been corrupted through منى

to منى; Nawawī only gives Djuraidj), i. e. the same as the Mukawḳis of the conquest; for we need not heed the patronymic of Mukawḳis given by Pseudo-Wāḳidī (p. 10) (بن راعيل), while the epithet al-Farḳab al-Nūnī, which al-Masʿūdī, Tanbih, p. 261, 5 has taken in an obviously corrupt form from an old source, is the Ibn Qurḳub al-Yūnānī of the Mukawḳis of the conquest. In view of the many serious contradictions, which the transposing of Mukawḳis into the period of Persian rule in Egypt offers, there is no alternative but to regard with Caetani, Annali dell' Islām, iv. 90 the story of Muḥammad's embassy to Mukawḳis as legendary and devoid of any historical value (cf. also G. Rouillard, p. 187 and note 2). The genuineness of the parchment found in a monastery at Akhmim by the French Egyptologist E. Barthélemy in 1852, which was thought to be the original of Muḥammad's letter to Mukawḳis and was actually put among the relics of the Prophet in the old Serail, thus disappears (cf. the publication by Belin, in J.A., 1854, p. 482—518 and Djirdji Zaidān, in Hilāl, xiii./2, 1904, p. 103 sq.). Its falsity had already been recognised by J. Karabacek (Beiträge zur Geschichte der Masʿaditen, Leipzig 1874, p. 35, note 47 and Mitteilungen des K. K. Österr. Museums, xix. [1884], p. 183) (cf. also Nöldeke-Schwally, Geschichte des Qorāns, i., Leipzig 1909, p. 190). As a matter of fact palaeographical grounds are clearly against any assumption of a date in the first century for this document.

The same discrepancies, which we find in the transmission of the name and title of the Mukawḳis of Muḥammad's letter are found in the Mukawḳis of the conquest. In the historians we find the following names:

1. Djuraidj b. Minā (Abū Šāliḥ, p. 30 [81], 101 [230]); 2. Djuraidj b. Minā b. Qurḳub (Ibn ʿAbd al-Ḥakam, p. 64, note 9; Ibn Ḥadjar, Iṣāba, iii. 1090); 3. Ibn Qurḳub or Ibn Farḳab (al-Kindī, p. 8; al-Makrizī, Khitaṭ, i. 289, 27; Ibn Taghribirdī, i. 9; Yāqūt, Muʿdjam, iii. 894, 14).

Taking first of all the name of his grandfather, J. v. Karabacek's endeavour (p. 2) to dispose of apparent contradictions in the statements about the patronymic by assuming a double name Minā Farḳab proves unnecessary, when we see the name unequivocally given in N^o. 2. When Karabacek (p. 3) preferred the reading Farḳab for Qurḳub, he was at least able to quote the form فرقب in the Codex Parisinus of Ibn Taghribirdī, but I cannot agree with Amélineau in supporting Karabacek's proposal (Fragments, p. 394 sq.) to equate this name with Παρκάβιος, especially if we remember the variant فرقب of the Iṣāba, and Nöldeke must be right when he (Z. D. M. G., xlviii. 161) restores this to the Παρκάβιος rejected by Karabacek. The form فرقب (unpointed however) has however so far been found in only one papyrus, the more usual form being فرقبوس (Z. D. M. G., i. 158). Butler's conjecture (p. 523) on the name فرقب seems to me as improbable as Karabacek's identification. He calls attention to Abū Šāliḥ's observation (p. 67 [156]) that فرقب is a corruption of Gregorios and supposes that Farḳab is a corruption of Farḳar so that Ibn Farḳab would be an error for Ibn Farḳar and mean "son of Gregory". Casanova's proposal (in Butler, p. 523) must be dismissed as still more improbable, viz., that Ibn Farḳab is a corruption of Abū Qirūš. The office filled by Mukawḳis is described by the sources in the following terms:

1. Šāḥib Mišr (al-Balādhuri, p. 226); 2. Malik ʿalā Mišr (al-Makrizī, Khitaṭ, i. 163, 22 sq.; Ibn Duḳmāk, v. 118); 3. Amīr al-Kubṭ bi-Mišr (Ibn Ḥadjar, iii. 1090); 4. Amīl ʿalā Mišr (Ibn ʿAbd al-Ḥakam, p. 64, note 9; al-Makīn, p. 29); 5. Amīl ʿalā 'l-Kharādī bi-Mišr (Eutychius, ii. 302). If the three first terms only mean the ruler of Egypt in general, the two last named limit the sphere of activity of Mukawḳis to the administration of taxation and the expression given in 4 may be taken as synonymous with amīr "governor". In this connection we have the very clear evidence of Ibn ʿAbd al-Ḥakam, p. 37 and Ibn Duḳmāk, v. 119 who preserve the statement that Mukawḳis was appointed by the emperor Heraclius as governor of Egypt and entrusted with the waging of war and the levying of taxation. Abū Šāliḥ's statement (p. 30 [81 sq.]) that Mukawḳis Djuraidj b. Minā had rented the taxes of Egypt from Heraclius for 18,000,000 dinārs fits in with this. This makes intelligible the statement of Eutychius (ii. 302) who calls Mukawḳis controller of the land taxes (ʿamīl al-kharādī) and traces his attitude to the Arabs to his embezzling the taxes raised, and further explains the description of Mukawḳis (ΠΑΡΚΑΒΙΟΣ) as ΤΑΞΙΑΡΧΗΣ ΕΞΗΝΑΝ-

ΛΩΣΙΟΝ ΠΤΕΧΩΡΑ ΝΗΝΛΕ in the Vita of Apa Samuel published by Amélineau (p. 367), to which we may add the statement of the Ethiopic Synaxar that Mukawḳis had been Patriarch and financial controller of Egypt.

M. J. de Goeje and J. v. Karabacek have laid special stress on this side of the activity of Muḳawḳis and identified the prefect George mentioned in John of Nikiu (p. 559), whom de Goeje regards as prefect of Lower Egypt and Karabacek (p. 8) as pagarch of Babylon, with Muḳawḳis who is called in the sources George son of Menas. A. J. Butler (note 4 to Abū Ṣāliḥ, p. 81), Milne and Lane-Poole have followed de Goeje while Amélineau (Fragments coptes, p. 404; Samuel de Qalamon, p. 24 and Résumé de l'histoire de l'Égypte, p. 243) wished to identify Muḳawḳis with the Patriarch George who was appointed by the emperor Heraclius as successor or deputy to Cyrus during the period of the latter's stay in Constantinople (cf. John of Nikiu, p. 574).

In contrast to these attempts at identification, which are in more than one respect in contradiction to the sources, the most probable solution of the Muḳawḳis problem is the identification of Muḳawḳis with the Patriarch and governor Cyrus of Phasis, who was sent in the year 631 A. D. by Heraclius to Alexandria where he died on March 21, 642. While Zotenberg (in his edition of John of Nikiu, p. 576, note 2) had already pointed out that the main features of the activity of Cyrus are found in the Arabic stories of Muḳawḳis, although no doubt the legend mixes up the activities of several individuals under this name, F. M. Esteves Pereira, (Vida do Abba Samuel, p. 41—53) completely proved the identity of the two. Independently J. Krall in an unpublished article for the Mitteilungen aus der Sammlung des Papyrus Erzherzog Rainer, on the authority of three new fragments of the Vita of Apa Samuel, had come to the same conclusion. The full study of the whole problem by A. J. Butler, the main result of which, the identity of Muḳawḳis with the Patriarch Cyrus, has been adopted by B. Evetts (Patrologia Orientalis, i. 491, note 1), by M. Guidi in his doctoral thesis, C. H. Becker and O. Braun in his article Cyrus in the Kirchliches Handlexicon, ii., col. 530 and others, has been critically examined by L. Caetani (Annali dell' Islām, iv. 86 sqq.). The decisive evidence for the identity of the two individuals is found in the History of the Patriarchs of Severus of Ashmūnain (ed. Evetts, p. 490 sq.; ed. Seybold, p. 106 sq.) in which there are references to the Patriarch and governor of Heraclius in connection with the flight of the Patriarch Benjamin once as Cyrus (قبيرس), then a few lines later as al-Maḳawḳaz or al-Maḳawḳas; the synaxars in this connection also give the name al-Maḳawḳas (cf. E. Amélineau, Fragments coptes, S. 397, note 1; p. 398, note 1; p. 406, note 1 and the edition by R. Basset, Patrologia Orientalis, xi. 562) and the Arabic Vita of Benjamin (Amélineau, p. 400, note 1); of peculiar importance is the text edited in R. O. C., xx. 393, where the combined names Cyrus al-Muḳawḳiz appear. There is the additional fact that the period of ten years which, according to the history of the Patriarchs, lay between the flight and return of the Patriarch Benjamin coincides within a year with the period of office of Cyrus (631—642) in Egypt, whom the Christian sources describe as an "unbeliever" (пасевне, Amélineau, Fragments coptes, p. 364, 366; kāfir in Severus of Ashmūnain, p. 495 [108]), godless and sinful Kauchios (παταρχιος παсевνε μαραβανης, Vienna Coptic fragments of the Vita of Apa Samuel in Krall, Kauchios frequently in Amélineau), deceitful Antichrist (παντιχριστος μιλανος in Amélineau, p. 366 sq.) and Pseudoarchiepiskopos (ibid., p. 365). The double position of Cyrus or Muḳawḳas as supreme head of the administration and archbishop, of which we have ample evidence (cf. G. Rouillard, p. 230, note 2), and which is quite certain from the testimony of Severus (p. 490, 495 [106—108]) and the Arabic and Ethiopic synaxar (Amélineau, p. 406, note 1: وزير وبطريرك, p. 399) and also by the Vita of Samuel (Amélineau, p. 367), was quite unknown to the Muslim Arabic sources. Nöldeke has already called attention to this remarkable fact (p. 160) and it remains a crux for the identification of the two figures. There was however no necessity for the Arabs to refer to his position in the church. He was only of importance to them as head of the administration. If one wants to, one can see an indication of his ecclesiastical dignity in the wish expressed by Muḳawḳis during the negotiations with 'Amr regarding the capitulation of Alexandria (in Ibn 'Abd al-Hakam, ed. Torrey, p. 72) that he might be buried in the Church of St. John (cf. thereon Amélineau, p. 400 sq.). How much the Christian sources differ in their ideas of the personality and position of Muḳawḳis may be gathered from the description of the death of Muḳawḳis. According to Severus of Ashmūnain (ed. Evetts, p. 495; Seybold p. 108), the governor and Patriarch of Alexandria poisoned himself after the occupation of Alexandria lest he should be put to death by 'Amr, while John of Nikiu (p. 335, 578) says that Cyrus weakened by vexation at the faithlessness of 'Amr caught dysentery and died. According to Caetani, the contradictions and obscurities on the part of the Arab historians show that they did not consider who Muḳawḳis exactly was, but simply used the name as the family name of the chief personage in Egypt at the time of the Muslim conquest. Evidently all who negotiated with 'Amr in the name of the Copts are included in one individual. The unanimity with which Muḳawḳis is described as a Copt and the different names given him suggests that Muḳawḳis conceals not only Cyrus but also other Egyptian negotiators — e. g. perhaps the commander of Babylon, George, and the bishop of the same town, Menas. The Arabs must have made one out of these two negotiators and given him like Cyrus the name Muḳawḳis. Of the attempts to explain this name, Karabacek's (p. 8) μεγαύκης is as little probable as Amélineau's explanation (p. 407—409) which makes Kauchios "the man from Kauchion". We would rather think with Butler and Guidi of a connection with καυδίσκος, which indicates the home of Cyrus. But even this explanation is by no means certain and the connection of Muḳawḳis with Cyrus has again (in Canterelli) given rise to serious doubts. Nau, p. 11 has compared Muḳawḳis with μακός. His name survived in the Kōm el-Muḳawḳis in the area of old Cairo (Ibn Duḳmāḳ, iv. 53).

MUKḤADRAM (A.), the term applied to an individual whose life fell within the periods of both paganism and Islām. Various explanations are given of the origin of the name. Some derive it from uḡḡn mukḥadrama "cropped ear" and say the meaning is that these people were cut off from the Djāhiliya by Islām (cf. nāḡa mukḥadrama "a she-camel with cropped ears"). It is said that the tribes who adopted Islām cropped the ears of their camels differently from what they had done in the pagan period. A man who had therefore seen both the pagan and Muslim styles was called mukḥadram. Others derive the word from mā' khidrim "(a well) which contains much water" and explain that a man who has lived in both Djāhiliya and Islām was called mukḥadram, since he was fully acquainted with both periods. The term mukḥadram is occasionally found with the same application and the explanation given is that the individuals had mixed paganism and Islām. Some commentators describe as mukḥadramūn only those who adopted Islām after the death of Muḥammad.

The word mukḥadram is particularly used to describe one of the four classes into which the Arab philologists divide the poets. It means those whose work was begun in the period of the Djāhiliya but who lived to see Muḥammad and his mission and some even adopted Islām. Among these for example were Labid, al-A'shā and Ka'b b. Zuhair. These poets are still completely immersed in the poetic tradition of the Djāhiliya. The new outlook was late in finding its way into poetry so that the change is not yet reflected in the poets who were Muḥammad's contemporaries. The scheme of the ḡaṣida of the pagan poetry with its fixed themes and stereotyped images also holds for the mukḥadramūn and in their poems one can hardly find the slightest hint that they were contemporary with the great religious change in Arabia. The only exception is the ḡaṣidas composed in honour of Muḥammad, like the ḡaṣida of Ka'b b. Zuhair called after its opening words Bānat Su'ād and the panegyric on the Prophet by al-A'shā. While these still follow the scheme of the ḡaṣida as regards form they reflect Muḥammadan points of view and legal ordinances and also use Ḳur'ānic phrases.

MUKHLIS AL-DAWLA. [See AL-MUKALLAD.] AL-MUKHTĀR B. ABĪ 'UBAID AL-THAḲAFĪ, a Shī'a agitator who seized possession of Kūfa in 66 (685—686). The clan of Thaḡif to which he belonged was the same as that of the poet Umayya b. Abi 'l-Ṣalt [q. v.] and another poet, Abū

Mihdjan, was his second cousin (al-Mukhtār's grandfather Mas'ūd being the son of 'Amr b. 'Umayr b. 'Awf; cf. Wüstenfeld, Gen. Tab., G. 19). He is said to have been born in 622 (Ṭabarī, i. 1264) a statement which has perhaps no real foundation (cf. Ṭabarī, ii. 2: in 40, he was a "young man", ghulām shābb) and based on the fact that his adversary 'Abd Allāh b. al-Zubair was born in the same year. His father having died the death of a hero at the battle of the Bridge in 13 against the Persians, the orphan was brought up by his uncle Sa'd b. Mas'ūd who became governor of al-Mada'in under the caliph 'Alī. Al-Mukhtār was his deputy when Sa'd left al-Mada'in to go after the Khāridjīs who had left 'Alī's camp in 37 (Ṭabarī i. 3366; al-Dinawarī, p. 218). His early life and his family traditions therefore made him a partisan of 'Alī: al-Ṭabarī (ii. 2) however says that when 'Alī's son al-Hasan took refuge with al-Mukhtār's uncle when fleeing from Mu'āwiyā in 40, the nephew proposed to surrender him to his rival and he was reproached with this disloyal act 25 years afterwards by the Shī'īs. This is all we know of the early days of one who was destined to become the champion of the extreme Shī'īs: his refusal to bear witness before Ziyād b. Abihi against Ḥudjir b. 'Adī, who was accused of having attempted an anti-Umayyad rising at Kūfa in 51 (Ṭabarī, ii. 134), shows however that his feelings were already pro-'Alid. It is only when, after the death of Mu'āwiyā, the hopes of the partisans of 'Alī's family began to rise again, that al-Mukhtār emerges from obscurity; he took part in the rising of Muslim b. 'Aqil in 61 and, imprisoned by the governor 'Ubaid Allāh b. Ziyād, he was only released after the failure of al-Ḥusain's attempt and returned to Mecca, where 'Abd Allāh b. al-Zubair was secretly engaged in preparing the movement which was to take him to the head of the anti-Umayyad rising. It is alleged that al-Mukhtār, after vainly trying to compromise Ibn al-Zubair prematurely, disappeared from Mecca for a whole year which he spent in his native town of al-Ṭā'if. It was no doubt in this period that the ideas ripened in him which made him the initiator and leader in a new political and religious phase of the Shī'a movement; but of the way in which his ideas came to him, their immediate origin and the influences which went to form them, history unfortunately knows nothing.

In any case, al-Mukhtār returned to al-Zubair, who had in the meanwhile been publicly recognised as caliph, and fought bravely at the first siege of Mecca in 64. But his adhesion to the cause of Ibn al-Zubair had no other object than to enable him to return to Kūfa which was then under the anti-Umayyad caliph. According to one source which is in contradiction to Ṭabarī, al-Mukhtār was sent by al-Zubair himself to the capital of the 'Irāk to take charge of its administration, having promised him the support of the 'Alid party (al-Mas'ūdī, Murūdj, v. 70); it seems more probable that, as Ṭabarī says, he went there of his own accord to carry out his plans for a Shī'a revival.

The Shī'īs of Kūfa were at this time (Ramaḍān 64) under the influence of Sulaimān b. Ṣurad [q. v.]. Al-Mukhtār did not wish to join his party and began propaganda of his own, saying he was the emissary of Muḥammad, son of 'Alī called Ibn al-Ḥanafīya from the name of his mother's tribe

[cf. MUḤAMMAD B. AL-ḤANAFIYA]. The motives which gave al-Mukhtār the idea that he could pass off as the legitimate successor to the rights of 'Alī, this son, who was not born of Faṭima, the daughter of the Prophet, have not been fully explained; but as the other children of 'Alī who had escaped the massacre of Kerbelā' were quite incapable, al-Mukhtār's choice was limited. In any case, his fiery and peculiar eloquence (he pronounced his discourses in sadīq with obscure phrases and expressions which recalled the Qur'ān, without being a slavish imitation of it; he also said or allowed it to be said of him that he was inspired by the angel Gabriel) was able to gain partisans for the idea of the Mahdī whose imminent coming would restore the rule of the true religion. Without being yet openly hostile to the rule of Ibn al-Zubair, al-Mukhtār's attitude was suspected. He was therefore imprisoned by the Zubairid governor 'Abd Allāh b. Yazid al-Anṣārī but his captivity was not rigorous and enabled him to remain in contact with the people of Kūfa. After the defeat and death of Sulaimān b. Ṣurad, which he had predicted, he was set at liberty on guaranteeing he would not fight against the Zubairid government. Al-Mukhtār took advantage of the liberty restored to him to secure the cooperation of Ibrāhīm b. al-Aṣhtar, son of 'Alī's famous general, who kept up his father's traditions. The latter hesitated long before accepting al-Mukhtār's proposals and only agreed on receiving a letter, undoubtedly a forgery, in which Ibn al-Ḥanafīya introduced al-Mukhtār to him as his plenipotentiary (amīn) and minister (waṣīr).

The rising then began (14 Rabī' I 66): the resistance of the chiefs of the tribes (the Ashrāf), who while opposed to the Umayyads and former fighters by the side of 'Alī, had long lost their enthusiasm for the cause of his family, was overcome by the onslaught of the troops, composed for the most part of adventurers and mawālī led by Ibn al-Aṣhtar, a most capable warrior. The Zubairid governor fled (he was at this time 'Abd Allāh b. Muṭī' al-Kurashī); the Ashrāf capitulated and al-Mukhtār, undisputed lord of Kūfa, rapidly extended his power over Mesopotamia and the eastern provinces, to which he at once appointed governors: the south alone, with Baṣra, remained to Ibn al-Zubair.

Al-Mukhtār had naturally to give the Ashrāf positions of authority in his organisation but he could not completely gain their confidence. Although old partisans of 'Alī, or sons of partisans, they were moderates who distrusted al-Mukhtār as an extremist and demagogue: indeed, the favour which the latter showed to the mawālī, who formed his real support, threatened to overthrow the system on which the political and economic supremacy of the Arabs over the native population was based, for not even the conversion of the latter to Islām had made them equal to their conquerors. Al-Mukhtār therefore was faced with the necessity of deciding for one or other. He preferred the mawālī party, probably more from genuine conviction than for political reasons: he must have believed that the triumph of the Mahdī whom he foretold would make all believers equal without distinction of race. During the absence of the army which had gone under Ibn al-Aṣhtar to fight 'Abd al-Malik's troops, the Ashrāf made an attempt to overthrow al-Mukhtār who was forced to temporize with them; but succeeding in informing Ibn al-

Ashtar of his difficulty, the latter returned to Kūfa and completely routed the enemies of al-Mukhtār. This was the signal for putting into execution the latter's full Shī'a programme; all those who had taken part in the murder of al-Ḥusain, or had neglected to defend him, were put to death. This bloody deed seemed to have divine approval, for two days later the Syrian army which had set out for the 'Irāq was completely routed on the banks of the Khazir by Ibn al-Ashtar, and its leader 'Ubad Allāh b. Ziyād, who had defeated and killed al-Ḥusain, was killed in the battle (Muḥarram 67). In the fanatical enthusiasm of these days in which the Shī'a cause seemed to have won a definite success there took place episodes of great religious interest although unfortunately not yet clearly explained, notably the worship of the empty chair (Tabari, ii. 702—706; cf. al-Mubarrad, al-Kāmil, ed. Wright, p. 597—600).

But in spite of his successes at home and abroad, al-Mukhtār was threatened by the presence in Baṣra of the brother of 'Abd Allāh b. al-Zubair, Muṣ'ab, whose army, organised by al-Muhallab b. Abi Ṣufra, hardened in the war with the Khāridjīs and strengthened by the accession of the Kūfan Ashrāf who had left the town, was one to be feared. Indeed, the Shī'i troops were defeated by it at al-Maḍhār on the Tigris; a little later at Ḥarūrā, they suffered a complete rout, mainly because of the absence of Ibn al-Ashtar who was in the north at al-Mawṣil and whom al-Mukhtār either through distrust of him or through excess of confidence in himself had neglected to recall. Al-Mukhtār who had taken refuge in the citadel of Kūfa held out there valiantly for four months. Finally abandoned by most of his men, he was slain in a desperate sortie (Ramādān 14, 67). His body was mutilated, his hand suspended at the gate of the great mosque (and it was only taken down many years later by al-Ḥadīdījādī); one of his wives, who would not disown him, was executed in brutal fashion, although she was the daughter of al-Nu'mān b. Baṣhīr al-Anṣārī, who had been governor of Kūfa under Mu'āwiya. A great many of al-Mukhtār's followers were also massacred.

The nature of the movement led by al-Mukhtār has been variously judged by modern historians. The historical tradition which grew up in Kūfa, especially in the milieu of the Ashrāf, is naturally hostile and regards him as an adventurer and false prophet. His conduct was undoubtedly somewhat crooked occasionally; the way in which he exploited the name of Ibn al-Ḥanafīya (who never wished to be completely compromised in the business of the Mahdī) was not quite fair. But neither these doings nor his double dealing with regard to the Ashrāf (they paid him back however only too well) are sufficient to convict him of bad faith. They were tactical expedients which every one who wants to stir the masses is justified in employing for the triumph of his cause. It seems certain that al-Mukhtār sincerely believed in his mission, and his equalitarian ideas about the mawālī, although premature, were, as the future was to show, the only ones which could secure to Islām its later expansion and transform it from the exclusively Arab movement it was at first into a world wide civilization. What is still and will remain mysterious in the personality of al-Mukhtār (Wellhausen rightly observes that "demoniac" natures like his are always problematic), is the manner in which he arrived (no doubt through a crisis within himself) at the religious and eschatological conception of the Shī'a of which he was the creator and which is infinitely greater than the expiatory sacrifice of the tawwābūn of Sulaimān b. Ṣurad. It is owing to this conception that the importance of the movement started by al-Mukhtār is far greater than the ephemeral political success which he enjoyed; in the popular enthusiasm which welcomed his propaganda we see the germs of the ideas which transformed the Shī'a from a political movement to a religious doctrine. In what measure these ideas were in existence before al-Mukhtār, in what relation they stood to that enigmatical personage 'Abd Allāh b. Saba' and his disciples are points that are still obscure. But if he was not the inventor of the doctrine of the Mahdī, it was undoubtedly he who in locating in a real person, Muḥammad b. al-Ḥanafīya, the mystical figure of the Messiah, the restorer of the true religion, gave it the stamp which was henceforth typical of Imāmī doctrines.

The name Mukhtārīya is borne by one of the many Shī'a subdivisions given in the lists of the writers on heresies; but it is doubtful if it ever had a real existence as an organised sect, especially as the sources which mention it do not clearly distinguish it from the Kaisāniya [q.v.] and the Khashabiya [q.v.], which seem very likely to be the legitimate successors of the teachings of al-Mukhtār.

Bibliography: The principal and almost the only source for the history of al-Mukhtār is al-Tabarī (ed. de Goeje), ii. 530—752 and passim, which is based for the most part on the statements of eye-witnesses of the events. The secondary sources add practically nothing new; they are quoted in Caetani, Chronographia islamica, a. 64 § 13, 65 § 6, 66 §§ 5—7, 9—12, 67 §§ 2, 4, 42 (a few details also in the biography of Muḥammad b. al-Ḥanafīya in Ibn Sa'd, v. 71—77); H. MUKHTĀR PASHA, GHĀZĪ AḤMAD, a Turkish general and statesman, was born in Sept. 1832, the son of a high official in Brussa, and received a military training there and in Constantinople (officer in 1854). He took part in the Crimean War, from 1860 taught in the Mekteb-i Ḥarbiye as professor of the art of war and in 1865 was tutor to the prince Yūsuf 'Izz al-Din. After holding a command in Albania (1867—1870) he distinguished himself under Redif Pasha in the Yaman campaign, the conduct of which he took over in 1871 as General of Division and Pasha. On his return he was given the title of müşir. In the Herzegovina he was defeated in 1876 at the Duga Pass. After the declaration of war by Russia (April 24, 1877) he was given the supreme command on the Caucasus front, where after at first having to retire to Köprüköy, he counter-attacked at Daḥar (June 21) and Ziwin (June 25) and forced the Russians under the Armenian generals Loris-Melikoff and Ter-Hugassoff, to evacuate Ottoman territory and occupied Sukhum.

Successes in August on the Yaghni Dagħ and at Kīzīl-Tepe (near Bash Gedikler) earned him the title of honour of Ḡhāzī [q. v.] but did not prevent the collapse of the army in Oct.—Nov. [cf. DEWE BOYŪN, KARS AND ERZERUM]. Appointed Commander-in-Chief of the Artillery, he restored peace in Crete in 1878; in 1879—1885 he served as commissioner on the Greek frontier. As a result of the Anglo-Turkish agreement of Oct. 24, 1885, he became the first High Commissioner of the Porte in Egypt, holding the post till 1906 and playing a part in the Taba affair. In this period he busied himself with the question of reforming the calendar; he advocated a uniform Hidjra solar year for all Muslims (see Bibl.).

From Dec. 1908 Vice-President of the Ottoman Senate, he proposed in the National Assembly of April 27, 1909 to give prince Reshād the name Mehmed V in memory of the first conqueror (Fātiḥ) of Constantinople [see MUḤAMMAD II] (communication of 'Abd al-Rahmān Sheref to Martin Hartmann); he himself led the deputation which announced his accession as Sultān-Caliph and brought him to the War Ministry to receive the oath of allegiance [cf. BAĪĀ']. On Oct. 14, 1911 he succeeded Sa'īd Pasha [q. v.] as President of the Senate and on July 22, 1912 as grand-vizier in the cabinet of the "Great Ones" (Büyükkler). Under pressure from the association of old-Turkish officers (Khalāṣkārān) he persuaded the Senate on Aug. 4 by a bold interpretation of the constitution to declare the session of Parliament closed. He endeavoured to free the army and civil service from politics, obtained an amnesty for Albania, recalled Aḥmad 'Izzet Pasha from the Yaman, instituted the Naval Medal and Medal of the Red Crescent, obtained favourable terms in the treaty of peace with Italy (Oct. 18, 1912) but could not avert the catastrophe in the Balkan War. On Oct. 29, 1912 he retired in favour of Kīāmīl Pasha, but remained a member of the Senate till 1918, in which on Feb. 12, 1917 he advocated the adoption of the Gregorian calendar and rejection of the Christian reckoning for the financial year. He died on Jan. 21, 1919. Maḥmūd Mukhtār Pasha is his son.

MUKHTĀRĪ, SIRĀDĪ AL-DĪN 'UTHMĀN B. MUḤAMMAD AL-MUKHTĀRĪ AL-ḠHAZNAWĪ, court poet of the later Ḡhaznawids Ibrāhīm b. Maṣ'ūd II (1059—1099) and Maṣ'ūd III b. Ibrāhīm (1099—1114). He lived for a considerable period in Kirmān, where he wrote panegyrics on the Saldjūk Arslān-Shāh b. Kirmānshāh (1101—1141). The great poet Madjd al-Dīn Sanā'ī showed him the greatest reverence and celebrated him in a long kaṣida as the best poet of his time. He could not have been Sanā'ī's teacher, as the Bankipore Catalogue (i. 32) says, since he must have been only a year or two older than Sanā'ī. His influence however is quite marked in many of Sanā'ī's works. One of Mukhtārī's philosophical kaṣidas may be regarded as the one of the finest examples of the old Persian school of poetry since naṣīras on it were written by the best poets such as Khākānī, Amīr Khusrāw, Athīr-i Akhsikātī, 'Abd al-Rahmān Djamī and Nawā'ī. His chief work is a large Diwān of lyrics, the majority of which are panegyrics in the style of the old Ḡhaznawid poets like 'Unṣurī and Farrūkhī, and dedicated to Arslān-Shāh, Bahrām-Shāh, Aqūd al-Dawla Dailamī, Ṭamghash-Khān and a number of viziers. Besides these kaṣidas there were in the Diwān a few short mathnawī's, one of which of an astronomical nature seems to have had a great influence on later poetry. We should probably also ascribe to our poet the authorship of the Shāhriyār-nāma, an imitation of the Shāh-nāma, the hero of which is Shāhriyār son of Barzū son of Suhrāb, i. e. a great-grandson of Rustam, and the action of which is laid in India. The poem is dedicated to Maṣ'ūd III; in the preface the poet says that he has worked at it for three years and hoped for a present worthy of this labour. If he does not receive this gift however, he will not write a satire this; seems to be a direct reference to Firdawsī. The year of Mukhtārī's death is not exactly known, 530 (1135), 534 (1139), 544 (1149) and 554 (1159) are mentioned. The last date seems to be the right one.

AL-MUKĪT. [See ALLĀH, II.]
MUKRĀ, a district and village in the Yaman, a day's journey south of Ṣanā'. The Arab geographers mention a cornelian mine here. The name is also given to a mountain in the Yaman Sarāt. According to Sprenger, we cannot connect the Hīmyar tribe of this name with the Monpīras of Ptolemy.

MUKṬADAB, name of the thirteenth metre in Arabic prosody, very little used; in theory it consists of three feet, with two successive mustaf'ilun, in each hemistich; but in practice it has only two.

There is one 'arūd and one ḍarb:
maṣ'ūlātu mustaf'ilun: maṣ'ūlātu mustaf'ilun. However, maṣ'ūlātu should lose its f (ma'ūlātu = fa'ūlātu) or change its ū to u, which is very frequent (maṣ'ūlātu = fa'ūlātu).

Mustaf'ilun can never retain its f (mustaf'ilun = muṣṭaf'ilun). (MOH. BENCHENEB)

AL-MUKṬADĪ BI-AMRĪ 'LLĀH, ABU 'L-KĀSIM 'ABD ALLĀH B. MUḤAMMAD, 'Abbāsīd caliph. His father was a son of the caliph al-Qā'im and his mother an Armenian slave girl named Urdjuwān. After the death of his grandfather al-Qā'im in Ṣaḥbān 467 (April 1075), al-Mukṭadī succeeded him as caliph. The real ruler was the Saldjūk sultān Malikshāh [q. v.] to whose daughter al-Mukṭadī was married in 480 (1087). By 482 (1089) however, she had returned to her father because she was neglected by the caliph. Malikshāh, who wished to prevent the caliph interfering in affairs of state, endeavoured to induce him to leave Baghdād and take up his residence in another town; this plan however came to nothing through the death of the sultān in Shawwāl 485 (Nov. 1092) and al-Mukṭadī was left in peace in the capital. About this time the power of the Saldjūks reached its greatest height and in all the lands conquered by them the spiritual supremacy of the caliph was recognised. Al-Mukṭadī died suddenly on 15th or 19th Muḥarram 487 (4th or 8th Feb. 1094) at the age of 38. He was perhaps poisoned by Malikshāh's son and successor, Barkiyārūq [q. v.] whom he had offended by confirming the selection of his minor brother Maḥmūd as sultān.

AL-MUKṬADIR. [See ALLĀH, II.]

AL-MUKṬADIR BI 'LLĀH, ABU 'L-FADL DJA' FAR B. AḤMAD, 'Abbāsīd caliph, son of al-Muṭtaḍid and a slave named Shaghāb. After the death of his brother al-Mukṭafī in Dhū 'l-Ka'da 295 (Aug. 908), al-Mukṭadir who was only 13 at the time was proclaimed caliph. Many however preferred 'Abd Allāh, son of the caliph al-Mu'tazz, and after the murder of the vizier al-'Abbās b. al-Ḥasan b. Aḥmad [q. v.], al-Mukṭadir was declared to be deposed and Ibn al-Mu'tazz elected caliph. The eunuch Mu'nīs [q. v.] came forward to save al-Mukṭadir; Ibn al-Mu'tazz was slain and al-Mukṭadir retained the caliphate. He showed very little independence however and allowed himself to be guided, sometimes by the personnel of the ḥarem and sometimes by the viziers among whom special mention may be made of the intriguing Ibn al-Furāt [q. v.] and the brave Ibn al-Djarrāh [q. v.]. Al-Mukṭadir's caliphate was therefore marked by a gradual decline. In his reign the dynasties of the Fātimids [q. v.] and Ḥamdānids [q. v.] became independent. The Karmāṭians also rebelled once more. In the years 307 (919—920) and 311 (923) Baṣra was plundered by the Karmāṭian chief Abū Ṭāhir Sulaimān [cf. AL-DJANNABĪ] and at the end of the year 311 (924) he fell upon the pilgrim caravan returning from Mecca. In Dhū 'l-Ka'da of the following year (925) he attacked the caravan which was going on the pilgrimage to Mecca from Baghdād and put it to flight. He next plundered al-Kūfa and then returned to Bahraīn. An army sent against the Karmāṭians under the command of Mu'nīs arrived only after they had retired. In 314 (926—927) Yūsuf b. Abi 'l-Sādī was summoned from Aḥḥarabāidjān to help, but Sulaimān defeated him in Shawwāl of the following year (Dec. 927) and took him prisoner. The caliph's troops did not dare to give battle and in Muḥarram 316 (March 928) Sulaimān seized the town of al-Raḥaba. After an unsuccessful attack on al-Raḥka he retired; in 317 (929—930), or, according to others, in 316, he plundered Mecca and carried off the Black Stone.

On the Byzantine frontier both sides continued their raids with varying fortunes. In 305 (917) the Byzantines made an offer of peace and after two years peace was definitely concluded, but hostilities very soon broke out again. In 314 (926—927) the Byzantines ravaged the district of Malatya and in the following year they crossed a considerable part of Armenia. After taking several Armenian cities which belonged to the Arabs (316 = 928—929) and occupying northern Mesopotamia (317 = 929—930) they lost all their gains in 319—320 (= 931—932). In Muḥarram 317 (Feb. 929) a rebellion broke out in the capital. Al-Mukṭadir was forced to abdicate but was brought to a place of safety by Mu'nīs, while the soldiery plundered the palace. His brother Muḥammad was summoned to be Commander of the Faithful in his stead with the style al-Kāhīr; but since the chief leader of the rebels, the head of police Nāzik, could not satisfy the demands of the troops for higher pay, al-Kāhīr was deposed after a few days and al-Mukṭadir placed on the throne once more. In Baghdād the confusion increased and in 320 (932) the catastrophe came. The enemies of Mu'nīs took advantage of his absence to persuade the caliph that Mu'nīs intended to dethrone him and when Mu'nīs approached at the head of his army, al-Mukṭadir was persuaded with great reluctance to take the field against him; he fell at the beginning of the encounter (27th Shawwāl 320 = Oct. 31, 932). AL-MUKṬAFĪ LI-AMRĪ 'LLĀH, ABU 'ABD ALLĀH MUḤAMMAD, 'Abbāsīd caliph, born on 12th Rabi' II 489 (April 9, 1096), son of al-Mustazhir and a slave girl. After the deposition of his nephew al-Rashīd, al-Mukṭafī was acknowledged as caliph on the 8th Dhū 'l-Hidjja 530 (Sept. 17, 1136). While the Saldjūks were fighting among themselves, he did his best not only to maintain his independence but also to extend his, rule and one district after the other in the 'Irāq fell into his hands. In 543 (1148) a number of emīrs announced their allegiance to Sultān Mas'ūd and marched on Baghdād but dispersed after several encounters with the caliph's troops. According to some sources, the same thing took place again next year. In Radjab 547 (Oct. 1152) Mas'ūd died, and was succeeded by his nephew Malikshāh who was deposed in a few months and succeeded by his brother Muḥammad. In the meanwhile the caliph seized the two towns of al-Hilla and Wāsiṭ. In the following year Sultān Sandjar who lived in Khurāsān was attacked and taken prisoner by the rebel Ghuzz [q. v.] whereupon his emīrs proclaimed Mas'ūd's brother Sulaimānshāh sultān. In Muḥarram 551 (Feb.—March 1156) the latter was recognised by the caliph on condition that he did not interfere in the affairs of the Irāk. Although al-Mukṭafī supported him he was defeated in Djumādā I (June—July) of the same year by his nephew Muḥammad and the latter's auxiliary. In Dhu 'l-Hijidja (Jan.—Feb. 1157) Sultān Muḥammad advanced on Baghdād to take vengeance on the caliph. The latter had to retire to the eastern part of the town and was besieged there for several months. In Rabi' I 552 (May 1151) however, the sultān suddenly raised the siege because Malikshāh was advancing on Hamadhān. As the latter therefore retired, hostilities automatically ceased and Muḥammad is said to have later made his peace with al-Mukṭafī. The latter twice besieged Takrit in vain; on the other hand, he succeeded in taking Liḥf. The Crusaders continued their hostilities in al-Mukṭafī's caliphate. The most powerful pillar of Islām was the Atābeg of al-Mawṣil, Imād al-Dīn Zangī, and his son Nūr al-Dīn Maḥmūd in Syria. Al-Mukṭafī died on 2nd Rabi' I 555 (March 12, 1160).

AL-MUKṬAFĪ BI 'LLĀH, ABŪ MUḤAMMAD 'ALĪ B. AḤMAD, 'Abbāsīd caliph, son of al-Mu'taḍid and a Turkish slave girl named Čiček (Arabic Djidjak). In 281 (894—895) he was appointed by his father governor of al-Raiy and several towns in the neighbourhood, and five years later he was made governor of Mesopotamia and took up his quarters in al-Raḡḡa. After the death of al-Mu'taḍid on 22nd Rabi' II, 289 (April 5, 902), he ascended the throne and at once won the good-will of the people by his liberality and by destroying the subterranean dungeons in the capital. He proved a brave and fearless leader who fought with success against the many enemies of the caliphate. The Ḳarmāṭians were ravaging Syria; one town after another fell into their hands and Damascus itself was plundered. On the 6th Muḥarram 291 (Nov. 29, 903) the general Muḥammad b. Sulaimān finally succeeded in inflicting a crushing defeat on them and they scattered in all directions. Muḥammad then turned his attention to Egypt where he put an end to the rule of the Ṭūlūnids. Many of their followers joined him and after the Ṭūlūnid Ḥārūn b. Khumārawaih had been slain, the capital had to surrender (Safar 292 = Jan. 905) and 'Isā al-Nūshari was appointed governor of Egypt. An attempt to restore the Ṭūlūnids was easily crushed (293 = 905—906). About this time the Ḳarmāṭians again began to be troublesome and at the beginning of the year 294 (Oct.—Nov. 906) they attacked the great pilgrim caravan returning from Mecca, massacred the men and carried off the women and children. In Rabi' I of the same year (Dec. 906—Jan. 907) they were defeated near al-Qādisiyya by the caliph's troops under Waṣīf b. Šawārtegin. The war with the Byzantines was also vigorously pursued. In 291 (903—904) a Greek named Leo who had adopted Islām undertook a number of raids on the Greek coasts with his fleet of 54 ships. The Byzantines however had the advantage by land. In 292 (904—905) Mar'ash, al-Maṣṣiṣa and Ṭarsūs were taken by the Greek general Andronicus and in the following year the Byzantines advanced as far as Halab. Then the Muslims gained the upper hand and Andronicus went over to them. Al-Mukṭafī died in Dhu 'l-Kā'da 295 (Aug. 908) at the age of 31; cf. also the article AL-'ABBĀS B. AL-ḤASAN B. AḤMAD.

AL-MUKṬANĀ, BAHĀ' AL-DĪN, a Druse missionary and author, with his teacher Ḥamza (b. 'Alī; q. v.) founder of the theological system of the Druses [q. v.], the fifth minister of the Druse theogony, with several titles of honour, in addition to the above two: al-Djanāh, al-Aisar, al-Tālī, al-Khayāl, al-Mukāsīr etc. His "secular" name was Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī b. AḤmad al-Samūki. Of his life practically nothing is known. As Arab historians are silent about him (Silvestre de Sacy, Exposé de la religion des Druzes, ii. 320), his own writings are almost the only source. According to Druse tradition, he was ḳāḍī in Alexandria in al-Ḥākim's time [q. v.] (M. v. Oppenheim, Vom Mittelmeer zum Persischen Golf, i., Berlin 1899, p. 135). As his works reveal quite a good knowledge (not without misunderstandings) of Christian religion and literature, he may have been born a Christian, probably in Syria. Only for the period of his teaching do we have chronological exactness. His taḥlīd of investiture is dated on the 13th Shābān of the third year of Ḥamza's mission i. e. 411 (1020) (S. de Sacy, op. cit., i. 474—475; ii. 309, 313; transl. ibid., ii. 297—309). The earliest of his known writings is of the tenth year of Ḥamza, 418 A. H. (ibid., ii. 326). In consequence one must assume that he came to the front after the disappearance of al-Ḥākim and Ḥamza. His activity was not a continuous one and he had even to live for a time in concealment (about the year 17—18 of Ḥamza; see S. de Sacy, op. cit., ii. 364), whether in Egypt or Syria is not certain (H. Guys, La nation druze, p. 114). The latest date known in his writings is the 26th year of Ḥamza, i. e. 433—434 (1042) (S. de Sacy, op. cit., i. 496; ii. 379). His farewell epistle dates from this year; according to it he had retired into concealment (ibid., i. 514—515; ii. 358); nothing more is known of him. The "Druse theogony" does not agree with these dates; it gives 17 years as the period of his activity (H. Guys, op. cit., p. 107). Ph. Hitti's assertion (The Origins of the Druse People, p. 11) that he died in 1031 is due to a misunderstanding.

Druse tradition not unjustly ranks him with Ḥamza and regards him as the greatest theological writer, to whom four of the sacred books are ascribed (M. v. Oppenheim, op. cit., i. 135—137). These are not books in the proper sense but collections of separate tracts, usually in the form of epistles, directed to followers of the Druse teaching or of other creeds in various lands (Byzantium, Syria, Egypt, Arabia, India). They are to this day frequently read by the Druses in their khalawāt; commentaries were written on some of them by the last independent Druse theologian 'Abd Allāh al-Tanūkhī (d. 1480; on him see Ph. Hitti, op. cit., p. 53, 71; M. v. Oppenheim, op. cit., i. 137). Of the some 110 Druse treatises so far known in Europe, 70 are ascribed by S. de Sacy to al-Mukṭanā (op. cit., i. 484 and 496). Except for a few short texts published by S. de Sacy along with other writings of Ḥamza (see Bibl.) very few have been printed, namely the Kitāb al-Bad' by Chr. Seybold (s. Bibl.) and al-Risālat al-Ḳuṣṭanīniya, sent in 1028 to the Byzantine Emperor Constantine VIII., by J. Khalil and L. Ronzevalle (s. Bibl. and extracts in Hitti, op. cit., p. 64—67). Others are accessible only in translations and extracts (espec. in Silvestre de Sacy; al-Risālat al-Masīhiyya, a synopsis in Hitti, op. cit., p. 68—70). As with other Druse writers, the style is very obscure and artificial, frequently embellished with rhymed prose.

Silvestre de Sacy, whose book still is the most important collection of material, regards al-Mukṭanā as "un enthousiaste de bonne foi" (op. cit., i. 508). It is highly desirable that some one should devote a special study to his life and work, paying particular attention to the authenticity of his works and to a critical edition of them.

MULAI [See MAWLĀ.]

MULK (A.), royal power, is used in the Qur'ān with reference to God and to certain pre-Islāmic personages, who all appear in the Old Testament, and in the former case is synonymous with malakūt; the latter word however occurs only four times in the Qur'ān and always with a dependent genitive (kull shai' or al-samawāt wa 'l-arḍ) while mulk is often used absolutely. To God alone belongs mulk. He has no associate therein; to Him belongs mulk over heaven and earth as well as over the judgment. He gives mulk to whom He will; the unbelievers have no share in it. Shaitān promised Ādam imperishable mulk and tempted him with this promise to eat of the shajarāt al-khuld (Sūra xx. 118). Nimrūd endeavours to claim for himself God's mulk against Ibrāhīm (ii. 260) but God gives mulk to the family of Ibrāhīm (iv. 57). Yūsuf thanks God in prayer for the mulk which He has given him (xxi. 102). Fir'awn boasts of his right to the mulk Miṣr (xliii. 50); God wills to give Tālūt mulk over the recalcitrant Israelites and to send the tābūt as a sign (ii. 248 sqq.) Dāwūd's mulk is mentioned ii. 252 and xxxviii. 19 and Sulaimān's ii. 96; the latter prays for it (xxxviii. 34).

That the conception of mulk was not carried over into Muslim law generally has been explained in the article MALIK; an exception is Egypt during the Aiyūbid period and in quite modern times. MULTĀN is an ancient town of the Panḍjāb situated in 30° 12' N. and 71° 31' E., and has been known at various times as Kashtpūr, Hanspūr, Bāgpūr, Sanb or Sanābpūr, and finally Mulasthān, of which Multān is a corruption. This name is derived from that of the idol and temple of the sun, a shrine of vast wealth, which the Arabs, who plundered it, named dār al-ḍahab, or the house of gold. It remained the Arab capital, and the outpost of Islām in India, for three centuries but by A. D. 900 its ruler had become independent of Baghdād. At this time it was seized by 'Abd Allāh the Ḳarāṭī, and became a stronghold of the Ḳarāṭian heretics, who were crushed and expelled by the orthodox Maḥmūd of Ghaznī. The town and province remained nominally subject to his descendants until Khusrāw Malik, the last of them, was carried into captivity by Mu'izz al-Din Muḥammad b. Sām, when it became a province of his Indian empire. On his death the governor, Nāṣir al-Din Ḳabāḥā, attempted to establish his independence of Dihli, but Ḳuṭb al-Din Aibak reduced him to obedience, and the province remained nominally subject to Dihli from 1206 to 1438 when Shaikh Yūsuf Ḳuraishī became independent ruler of Multān and was followed by the kings of the Langāh tribe, who reigned until 1527. The town was occupied both by Timūr in 1397 and by Bābūr in 1528.

The province was one of the ṣubas of Akbar's empire, and remained nominally subject to his successors until 1752, when its allegiance was transferred to Kābul. It was threatened by the Sikhs as early as 1771, but was not annexed by them until 1818, when Randjit Singh took the city by storm. It was not affected by the first Sikh war, but the murder of two British officers by Mūlraḍī led to the second Sikh war, and the city was captured on January 3, 1849. Its fortifications were dismantled in 1854 and its garrison was disbanded in the mutiny of 1857.

MUMTĀZ, BARKHWARDĀR B. MAḤMŪD TURK-MĀN FARĀHĪ, a Persian writer, a contemporary of the Ṣafawid Sulṭān Ḥusain (1694—1722). At an early age he left his native town of Farāh and went to Marw where he entered the service of the governor Aṣlān-Khān. After two years however, he left this post and became munshī with Ḥasan Kūlī Khān Shāmlū Kūrcī-bāshī in Iṣfahān. At a banquet there at his master's house he heard a story which attracted him exceedingly. He wrote it down and it became the foundation of a great collection, Maḥfilārā, which contained about 400 stories and consisted of a muḥaddama, eight bāb and a khātima. Soon afterwards he returned to Farāh, spent some time in Herāt and Meshhed and then entered the service of the emīr Minūcihr Khān b. Kārṭighāy whose duty it was to defend Darūn and Khabūshān against raids by the wild nomad tribes. His stay there was disastrous for Mumtāz, since he lost all his goods and chattels and the valuable manuscript of his Maḥfilārā during a nomad raid; he did not have another copy of it. He resolved however to restore the book and wrote all the stories that he could remember a second time. Thus arose the second version of the Maḥfilārā, which consists of a muḥaddama, five bābs and a khātima and has come down to us under the title Maḥbūb al-Kulūb. The book is written in an extravagantly artificial style. The khātima is the best part; it contains the celebrated story of Zibā and Ra'nā, which is very common in Persia in a simplified form in many editions from the popular presses.

MUMTĀZ MAḤALL, wife of Shāh Djahān, and the lady for whom the Tādj Maḥall [q. v.] was built. She was the daughter of Abu'l-Ḥasan Aṣaf Khān, who was Nūr Djahān's brother. Her name was Ardjumand Bānū, the title Mumtāz Maḥall being conferred on her after Shāh Djahān's accession. She was his favourite wife and bore him fourteen children, seven of whom grew up. She was born in 1593, married in 1612, and died, at Burhānpūr in the Deccan, very shortly after the birth of a daughter in 1631. She was beautiful and amiable, and Shāh Djahān loved her tenderly.

MUNADJDJIM. [See ASTROLOGY.]

MUNADJDJIM BASHĪ is the name by which the author of the most important general historical work written in Turkey is known. His real name was Aḥmad Efendī, son of Luṭf Allāh, a native of Eregli near Konya. He was born in Selānik, in the first half of the xvth century, received a scholarly education and served in his youth for fifteen years in the Mewlewī-khāne of Kāsim Pasha under Shaikh Khalil Dede (Sidjill-i 'othmānī, ii. 287). Afterwards he studied astronomy and astrology and became court astrologer (munadjdjim bashī) in 1078 (1667—1668). In 1086 (1675—1676) he was admitted to the intimate circle of Sulṭān Muḥammad IV as muṣāhib-i pādīshāhi. He was dismissed in Muḥarram 1099 (November 1687) and banished to Egypt. From here he went some years later to Mecca, where he became shaikh of the Mewlewī-khāne. In 1105 (1693—1694) he was obliged to move to Medina, where he lived for seven years. Soon after his return to Mecca he died there on the 29th of Ramaḍān 1113 (February 27th 1702) and was buried near the tomb of Khadija.

Besides writing his historical work, Munadjdjim Bashī displayed a considerable literary activity. Of his works are mentioned a ḥaṣhiya on the Qur'an commentary of Baidāwī, a commentary on the 'Aḳā'id al-Aḳudiya of al-Idjī, a Laṭā'if-nāme, a translation of the anecdotes of 'Ubaid-i Zakānī, and a number of treatises on geometry, mysticism and music. His Turkish diwān also gives him a place in the ranks of Turkish mystical poets; his takhalluṣ was 'Ashīk.

The general history was written in Arabic under the title Djāmi' al-Duwal, but although manuscripts of the Arabic original exist (the Semā-Khāne-i Edeb of 'Alī Enwer mentions two MSS. not mentioned by Babinger, viz. one in the library of the mosque of Selim II in Adrianople and the other in the imperial palace, in the library of Aḥmad III), it is much better known in the Turkish translation made by the poet Nedīm [q. v.] in the xviiith century under the title Ṣaḥā'if al-Akḥbār (printed in three volumes in Constantinople in 1285). It is a world history, arranged, after the fashion of similar Arabic works, according to dynasties, with a main division into three parts: the first treating of the history of Muḥammad, the second the non-Muḥammadan dynasties and the third the Muḥammadan dynasties. In the introductory chapters the author cites his numerous sources, not a few of which are lost in the original. Therefore the work has a special value for the knowledge of many smaller dynasties and for this reason it has been especially used by E. Sachau for Ein Verzeichnis muhammedanischer Dynastien, in SB. Pr. Ak. W., Berlin 1923 (cf. the introduction). The last dynasty treated is that of the Ottoman Sulṭāns; it is proportionately longer and more detailed than the history of the other Muḥammadan dynasties and based on several imperfectly known sources; the last part, which ends in 1089 (1678), gives contemporary history. The Turkish translation of Nedīm is very readable and not composed in the high-flown literary style that prevailed in his period. For this reason it is especially praised and represented in Ebuzziyā Tewfik's *Nümūne-i Edebiyāt-i 'othmāniye*⁶, Constantinople 1330.

(J. H. KRAMERS)

AL-MUNĀFIKŪN (A.), the term applied in the Qur'an to those Medīnese upon whose fidelity and zeal Muḥammad could not absolutely rely. The Arabs (e.g. Mubarrad, Kāmil, ed. Wright, p. 153) derive the word from nāfiḳā ("one of the entrances to the hole of a fieldmouse"), but it is certainly the borrowed Ethiopic manāfēk "heretic" from nafaḳa to "split", nāfaḳa "to be divided, irresolute". The meaning "waverer", "doubter" quite fits the usual use of the word in the Qur'an, while the usual translation "hypocrite" only suits a few passages. Another description of the same people in the Qur'an is: "those in whose hearts there is sickness (weakness, doubt)", again in contrast to the unshakably firm believers. Sometimes (ix. 68 sq.; xxxiii. 73; xlviii. 6; lvii. 13) there are references to women of this type (munāfiḳāt) in addition to the male munāfiḳūn. A closer consideration of the passages in question shows we have not to think of a regular, rigidly defined party; sometimes the reference is to such Medinese as had only joined the Prophet under compulsion or reluctantly, and sometimes to those who had quite honestly joined him but had not been able to retain their belief and enthusiasm (ix. 67; lxiii. 3). Muḥammad also on one occasion speaks of munāfiḳūn among the Beduins. The first group found their leader in 'Abd Allāh b. Ubayy [q. v.] who would have been the chosen head of the Ka'ila tribe, if a new and superior force, which he could not meet, had not opposed him in Muḥammad. Nevertheless these grumblers, joined by other unreliable elements, were strong enough to cause the greatest embarrassment to the Prophet in critical moments e.g. before the battle of Uḥud (iii. 160 sq.), in the War of the Ditch (xxxiii. 1, 12—24, 60, 73) and before the march on Tabūk (ix. 65—69, 74, 78), as he had always to be careful not to drive them over into the enemy's camp. It is no wonder then that his utterances about them are always made in a tone of great irritation. He describes them as hypocrites, who say something different from what they mean in their hearts (iii. 161; xiii. 1); in their irresolution they join, according to their view of the future, sometimes the Muslims and sometimes the enemy (iv. 137—142; v. 57); if it goes badly with the believers, they think that their religion has deceived them (viii. 51). When they are together among themselves they revenge themselves for the restraint which they must put upon themselves by malicious remarks about the Prophet and his revelations, but are in great anxiety, lest Allāh may communicate their secret conversations (ix. 65 sqq.; x. 79, 125 sqq.). They are indolent at prayer (iv. 141), refuse to take part in the fighting or to contribute from their means (xlvii. 22, 31; lvii. 1 sq.; lxiii. 71; cf. iv. 40 sqq.); they hope for a weakening of his power so that the more worthy may expel the meaner (lxiii. 8). As representatives of the true Meccan aristocracy, their attitude and eloquence made a certain impression on the Prophet but on closer examination they are nothing but "propped timbers" (lxiii. 4). In a word, they are no better than the unbelievers. God makes them err (iv. 50 sqq.) and their abode shall be hellfire (ix. 74; lvii. 13 sq.). We cannot help feeling in some ways a certain sympathy for these men who were deprived of their rights; but in the end they deserved their fate for their complete lack of ideas and courage at decisive moments and their conduct with regard to the Jews in Medina, whom they incited to resist Muḥammad and then left in the lurch (cf. lv. 11), makes a very unfavourable impression. With the death of 'Abd Allāh they lost their leader and their opposition was forced to be silent before the great successes of Muḥammad's last years.

The word munāfiḳ remained however and like other Qur'anic terms was used in the fighting between the various parties as a term of abuse; cf. e.g. its application to Ibn Zubair (Ṭabarī, ii. 467, 3) and his party (Ahlwardt, Anonyme Arab. Chronik, p. 73, 4).

In the Qur'an Sūra lxiii. is called after the Munāfiḳūn; it is connected by most commentators with the campaign against the Banū Muṣṭalik.

AL-MUNDHIR B. MUḤAMMAD. [See UMAIYADS II.]

AL-MUNDJIYA, title of sūra lxvii., which is also called al-mulk and al-wāḳiya.

MUNGIR (MONGHYR), the head-quarters of the Mungir District in Bihār and Orissa in India, situated in 25° 23' N. and 86° 28' E. on the south bank of the Ganges. The population of the district in 1911 was 2,132,893, of whom 200,339 were Muḥammadans. Muḥammadan historians state that Bakhtiyār Khaldjī was the first Muḥammadan who conquered Mungir during his subjugation of Bihār about 595 (1198). Henceforth it became a place of military importance. In 1177 (1763) Nawwāb Mir Kāsim, the Nawwāb Šubadār of Bengal, when he proposed to fight against the British made Mungir his military head-quarters. He founded here an arsenal under Gurgin (Gregory) Khān, his Armenian general. The gun-making industry for which the town is famous is said to date from the establishment of this arsenal.

MUNIS AL-MUẒAFFAR, ABU 'L-HASAN, principal 'Abbāsid general from 296 to 321 (908—933), and latterly virtual dictator (usual attribution to him of nisba al-Kuṣhūrī seems to rest on passage — p. 347 — in Hilāl al-Šābi's Kitāb al-Wuṣarā' [ed. Amedroz], where Naṣr should be read for Mu'nis), a eunuch (passage of Ibn Miskawaih [ed. Amedroz and Margoliouth, i. 160] shows that khādīm in this case does not mean merely freedman, as suggested by Massignon, al-Hallaj, p. 205, N^o. 2), said by al-Dhahabī, Ta'rikh al-Islām (followed by Ibn Taghribirdī, ed. Juynboll, ii. 255) to have been 90 years old at death (though this age would seem incredibly great for a recently active commander), i.e., to have been born in 231 (845—846), and to have held the rank of amīr for 60 years.

Mu'nis first appears (if passage of al-Ṭabarī, iii. 1953, refers to him) as a ghulam of al-Mu'taḍid (not yet caliph) in Zandj [q. v.] campaign of 267 (880—881); and is mentioned as Chief of Police in caliph's camp in 287 (900). Al-Dhahabī (also Ibn Taghribirdī, loc. cit.) states, again, that he was banished to Mecca by al-Mu'taḍid, to be recalled on accession of al-Mu'taḍir [q. v.]; and as Mu'nis is nowhere referred to during intervening reign of al-Muktafi, the statement may be true. (If so, in al-Mas'ūdi's description, Murūdj al-Dhahab, ed. B. de Meynard, viii. 212, of al-Mu'taḍid's death, for khādim read khāsin, as in 'Arib, ed. de Goeje, p. 29).

Mu'nis owed his later eminence mainly to his leading the defence, in 296 (908), of the Ḥasanī palace at Baghdād for al-Muḥtadīr against the partisans of the latter's cousin, the pretender Ibn al-Mu'tazz [q. v.]. During the caliph's youth his gratitude and that of his powerful mother for this service assured Mu'nis's position; and though later al-Muḥtadīr's favour turned to enmity, by that time Mu'nis's authority was hardly in need of support, owing chiefly to his almost invariably successful generalship. For though he undertook no very important campaigns, except perhaps the repulse of the Fātimid al-Mahdī [q. v.] in 307 (919–920) (for which he received the laḡab al-Muẓaffar), and the defence of Baghdād from the Ḳarmāṭians [q. v.] in 315 (927–928), he was only once defeated — in 306 (918).

Mu'nis early fell out with the wazīr Ibn al-Furāt [q. v.], repeatedly opposing him, till in 312 (924), on Ibn al-Furāt's third term of office, Mu'nis played a prominent part in securing his dismissal and execution. He now became all-powerful, being invariably consulted on the appointment of viziers and so controlling the government. Hence the change of al-Muḥtadīr's affection to dislike, first signalized (315 = 927) in an abortive plot of the caliph's to murder him. In 316 Mu'nis lent himself to al-Muḥtadīr's deposition in favour of his half-brother al-Ḳāhir [q. v.]. He almost immediately restored him, however, thereby becoming more absolutely his master than ever. Al-Muḥtadīr eventually defied Mu'nis (319 = 931), who thereupon left Baghdād. Next year, however, having meanwhile collected a strong force, he marched on the capital intending to reimpose his authority. He duly defeated the caliph's army outside the walls, but al-Muḥtadīr himself was killed on the field.

Mu'nis now restored al-Ḳāhir. But by resuming his dictatorial ways he soon so alienated him also that he was obliged in self-defence to keep the new caliph a prisoner in the palace. He even contemplated deposing him. Al-Ḳāhir, however, succeeded in luring Mu'nis, together with his chief supporters, into the palace, where he shortly had them executed in Shābān 321 (August 933).

Mu'nis' influence was on the whole exerted for good; but he was neither strong nor intelligent enough to prevent the decline of the caliphate. His example of depriving the caliph of real power was pernicious. It was to be followed all too soon by the series of adventurers who, with the style of amīr al-umara' [q. v.], were to dominate al-Ḳāhir's successors.

MUNKAR WA-NAKĪR (the forms with the article are also found), the names of the two angels who examine and if necessary punish the dead in their tombs. To the examination in the tomb the infidels and the faithful — the righteous as well as the sinners — are liable. They are set upright in their tombs and must state their opinion regarding Muḥammad. The righteous faithful will answer, that he is the Apostle of Allāh; thereupon they will be left alone till the Day of Resurrection. The sinners and the infidels, on the other hand, will have no satisfactory answer at hand. In consequence of this the angels will beat them severely, as long as it will please Allāh, according to some authorities till the Day of Resurrection, except on Fridays.

In some sources a distinction is made between the punishment and the pressure (daḡḡa) in the tomb, the righteous faithful being exempt from the former, not from the latter, whereas the infidels and the sinners suffer punishment as well as pressure (Abu 'l-Mu'in Maimūn b. Muḥammad al-Nasafī, as cited in the commentary on the Waṣīyat Abi Ḥanīfa, Ḥaidarābād 1321, p. 22).

The punishment in the tomb is not plainly mentioned in the Ḳur'ān. Allusions to the idea may be found in several passages, e.g. sūra xlvii. 29: "But how when the angels, causing them to die, shall smite them on their faces and backs"; sūra vi. 93: "But couldst thou see, when the ungodly are in the floods of death, and the angels reach forth their hands, saying, Yield up your souls: this day shall ye be recompensed with a humiliating punishment"; sūra viii. 52: "And if thou wert to see when the angels take the life of the unbelievers; they smite their faces and their backs, and taste ye the torture of burning" (cf. further sūra ix. 102; xxiii. 21; lii. 47).

The punishment of the tomb is very frequently mentioned in Tradition (see Bibliography), often, however, without the mention of angels. In the latter group of traditions it is simply said, that the dead are punished in their tombs, or why, e.g. on account of special sins they have committed, or on account of the wailing of the living.

The names of Munkar and Nakīr do not appear in the Ḳur'ān, and so far as I can see, once only in canonical Tradition (Tirmidhī, Ḍiḡā'iz, bāb 70). Apparently these names do not belong to the old stock of traditions. Moreover, in some traditions one anonymous angel only is mentioned as the angel who interrogates and punishes the dead (Muslim, Imān, trad. 163; Abū Dāwūd, Sunna, bāb 39^b; Aḥmad b. Ḥanbal, iii. 233, 346; iv. 150; Ṭayālīsī, N^o. 753).

So there seem to be four stages in the traditions regarding this subject: the first without any angel being mentioned, the second mentioning "the" angel, the third two angels, the fourth being acquainted with the names Munkar and Nakīr.

This state of things as reflected in ḥadīth finds a similar reflex in the early forms of the creed. In the Fīkh Akbar i., which may date from the middle of the viiith century A.D., the punishment of the tomb appears as the only eschatological representation (art. 10). In the Waṣīyat Abi Ḥanīfa, which may represent the orthodox views of the middle of the viiith century, we find, apart from an elaborate eschatology, the two following articles (arts. 18, 19): "We confess, that the punishment in the tomb shall without fail take place. We confess, that in view of the traditions on the subject, the interrogation by Munkar and Nakīr is a reality". The term "reality" is apparently intended to oppose the allegorical interpretation of eschatological representations as taught by the Mu'tazilis.

The Fikḥ Akbar ii., which may represent the new orthodoxy of the middle of the ixth century A. D., is still more elaborate on this point (art. 23): "The interrogation of the dead in the tomb by Munkar and Nakir is a reality and the reunion of the body with the spirit in the tomb is a reality. The pressure and the punishment in the tomb are a reality that will take place in the case of all the infidels, and a reality that may take place in the case of some sinners belonging to the faithful". In the later creeds and works on dogmatics the punishment and the interrogation in the tomb by Munkar and Nakir are expressed in similar ways.

The Karrāmiya [q. v.] taught the identity of Munkar and Nakir with the two guardian angels who accompany man ('Abd al-Kāhir al-Baghdādī, Uṣūl al-Dīn, Stambul 1928, p. 246). Ghazālī admits the idea that eschatological representations are a reality that takes place in the malakūt.

The origin of the names is uncertain; the meaning "disliked" seems doubtful. The idea of the examination and the punishment of the dead in their tombs is found among other peoples also. The details to be found in Jewish sources (ḥibbūṣ haḳ-keber) are strikingly parallel to the Muslim ones.

MUNSARIḤ, the name of the tenth metre in Arabic prosody; it has three feet to the hemistich. It has three 'arūd and four ḍarb:

1st 'arūd	{	mustaf'ilun maf'ulātu mustaf'ilun
		mustaf'ilun maf'ulātu mustaf'ilun
		mustaf'ilun maf'ulātu mustaf'ilun
2nd 'arūd		mustaf'ilun maf'ulātun
3rd 'arūd		mustaf'ilun maf'ulun.

We rarely find mustaf'ilun in the ḍarb of the first 'arūd. The second ḍarb of the first 'arūd is not indicated by al-Khalil b. Aḥmad but Ibn Barri notes it was much used by the muwallad poets, among them Ibn al-Rūmī. It may be noted that the second and third 'arūd are regarded as belonging to the raḍiāz metre.

Mustaf'ilun may lose: 1. its s except when used as the first ḍarb in the first 'arūd; 2. its f and the foot becomes (musta'ilun =) muṣṭa'ilun; 3. its s and f at the same time (which is very bad) and the foot becomes (muta'ilun =) fa'ilatun. This last change could not be undergone by the first 'arūd.

Maf'ulātu loses 1. its f, which is very bad and the foot becomes (ma'ulātu =) maf'āilu; 2. its w and the foot becomes (maf'ulātu =) fā'ilātu;

3. its f and w at the same time which is very bad and we have (ma'ulātu =) fa'ilātu.

Maf'ulān and maf'ulun may lose their f and become (ma'ulān =) fa'ulān and (ma'ulun =) fa'ulun. (MOH. BEN CHENEH)

AL-MUNTAQĪK, a section of the Arab tribe of the Banū 'Uḳail, which in turn is a subdivision of the great group of the 'Āmir b. Ṣaṣ'a'a [q. v.]. Genealogy: al-Muntaqīk b. 'Āmir b. 'Uḳail (Wüstenfeld, Gen. Tab., D. 19). The very scanty information in Wüstenfeld can be supplemented by the notice which Ibn al-Kalbī gives of the Banu 'l-Muntaqīk (Djāmharat al-Ansāb, MS. Brit. Mus., fol. 130v—131r); but this little clan nowhere appears to play a great part in early history. The territory inhabited by the Banu 'l-Muntaqīk is the same as that of the other divisions of the Banu 'Uḳail, in the southwest of Yamāma; some places belonging to them are quoted by al-Bakrī (Mu'djam, ed. Wüstenfeld, p. 567), Yāqūt (Mu'djam, ed. Wüstenfeld, i. 793—794; iv. 712, l. 78: we may note that in these two passages al-Muntaqīk is said to be the surname of Mu'āwiya b. 'Uḳail while the usual genealogy makes this Mu'āwiya a son of al-Muntaqīk), al-Hamdānī (Djāsira, ed. D. H. Müller, p. 177, l. 12—15: note the mention of gold mines in their territory). The Banu 'l-Muntaqīk numbered among their clients the Banū Ṭaṭhr (Wüstenfeld, Gen. Tab., C. 13) whose eponym was said to have been made a prisoner by them (Kitāb al-Aghānī, vii. 110); one of the few episodes of the pre-Islāmic period in which this clan is mentioned is the battle of Shi'b Djabala where ʿKais b. al-Muntaqīk distinguished himself (Aghānī, x. 44; Naḳā'id, ed. Bevan, p. 671 l. 12—672, l. 14, where Ibn Ṭufail should be deleted). In the history of the origins of Islām, several of them appear as ambassadors of the Banū 'Uḳail to the Prophet: such were Anas b. ʿKais b. al-Muntaqīk and Laḳīṭ b. 'Āmir b. al-Muntaqīk (Ibn Sa'd, i/ii. 45 etc.; on the latter the biographical collections have long discussions as to whether he is to be identified with this or that muhaddith: cf. among others Ibn Ḥadjar, Tahdhīb al-Tahdhīb, viii. 456). In the period of the conquests, the Banu 'l-Muntaqīk settled in the marshy region between Kūfa and Baṣra (al-Kāḳashandī, Nihāyat al-'Arab, p. 65—66). All that we know of them after this period is the names of a few individuals who held public offices: a certain 'Āmir b. Mu'āwiya b. al-Muntaqīk, mentioned by Ṭabarī, i. 3284 at end, as fighting at Siffin, is said by Ibn al-Kalbī to have been governor of Armenia and Ādharbāidjān under Mu'āwiya; according to Ibn al-Kalbī, 'Abd Allāh b. Mu'āwiya b. Rabī'a b. 'Āmir b. al-Muntaqīk was governor of Marw and Ahwāz, also under Mu'āwiya, and 'Abida b. ʿKais b. al-Muntaqīk of Armenia, under Yazīd I. These men are not mentioned elsewhere: the same is true of the poet Djahm b. 'Awf b. al-Ḥusain b. al-Muntaqīk (Ibn Ḥadjar, Iṣāba [ed. Sharafiya, Cairo 1325], v. 124 follows Ibn al-Kalbī).

AL-MUNTAQĪM. [See ALLĀH II.]

AL-MUNTAṢIR (also called Mustanṣir) b. 'LLĀH, ABŪ DJĀ'FAR MUḤAMMAD B. DJĀ'FAR, 'Abbāsīd caliph, son of al-Mutawakkil by a Greek slave. After his father had been murdered in Shawwāl 247 (Dec. 861) by conspirators, among whom was al-Muntaṣir, the latter ascended the throne, aged 25 according to the usual statement. As a ruler he was only a tool in the hands of the vizier Aḥmad b. al-Khaṣīb and the Turkish generals. His brothers al-Mu'tazz and al-Mu'ayyad were forced to renounce their claims to the throne and Waṣīf, the commander of the bodyguard, was sent to the Byzantine frontier. Unlike his father, he treated the 'Alids with great consideration; nothing else remarkable is recorded of him. Al-Muntaṣir died in Rabi' II 248 (June 862) or, according to a less trustworthy report end of Rabi' I, in Sāmarrā after a reign of six months.

MURĀBĪṬ. [See ALMORAVIDS.]

MURĀD, the name of an Arab tribe, belonging to the great southern group of the Madhhidj [q. v.]; genealogical tradition (Ibn al-Kalbī, Djāmharaṭ al-Ansāb, Escorial MS., fol. 114b—117b, which is followed by Ibn Duraid, Kitāb al-Ishṭikāk, ed. Wüstenfeld, p. 238, 4; cf. also Lisān al-'Arab, iv. 409) regards Murād as a nickname, for this tribe was said to have been the first to rebel (tamarrada) in the Yaman: an etymology which is not convincing. Murād's own name is said to have been Yuhābir b. Madhhidj and he was therefore a brother of the 'Ans and the Sa'd al-'Ashira (Wüstenfeld, Geneal. Tabellen, p. 7, 11). Although they were neighbours of the South Arabian civilization, the Murād have always retained a typically Beduin character; their country (usually called al-Djāw and placed to the east of Naḍjrān and Ma'rib) is bare and sterile (cf. the picturesque description given of it by the Kitāb al-Aghānī, xviii. 135 and "the mountains of the Murād" mentioned by Yāqūt, Mu'djam, ii. 78) and its inhabitants are notorious as brigands (fakḥ Murād; cf. Kitāb al-Aghānī, x. 147). The land inhabited by the Murād and by their neighbours, the Hamdān [q. v.], had once belonged to the Ṭayī' (Yāqūt, Mu'djam, i. 129), who had left it to settle in the north of the Arabian peninsula; it is probable that it was from the old masters of the country that the Murād and the Hamdān inherited the cult of the god Yaghūth (cf. below).

The Murād appear for the first time in history in connection with an episode, not however at all clear, of the last days of the dynasty of the Lakhmids of al-Ḥīra; as the king 'Amr b. al-Mundhir (III) b. Mā' al-Samā' had excluded his half-brother 'Amr, a son of Usāma, sister of Hind mother of the first-named 'Amr, from a share in the kingdom, the latter sought refuge with the Murād, who recognised him as their chief but when he began to rule tyrannically, they killed him, which gave 'Amr b. Hind a pretext for invading the land of the Murād and putting to death the murderer of 'Amr b. Usāma (al-Mufaḍḍal al-Dabbī, Amthāl al-'Arab, Constantinople 1300, p. 68—69, who gives a more satisfactory account than that contained in the passages quoted by G. Rothstein, Die Dyn. der Lakhmiden, p. 99, in which Yāqūt, iv. 130 should be read for i. 130). 'Amr is said to have been killed by a certain Ibn al-Dju'aid (the same story is given by Ibn al-Kalbī, Djāmhara); according to Yāqūt on the other hand by Hubaira b. 'Abd Yaghūth surnamed al-Makshūh; the latter's son Kais seems to have been one of the most powerful chiefs of the Murād at the time of the rise of Islām.

The Murād had just then suffered a disastrous defeat, which had considerably weakened them, at the hands of the Hamdān, as the result of a quarrel which had arisen in connection with the control of the worship of the god Yaghūth (cf. Wellhausen, *Reste arab. Heidentums*², p. 19—22 and the sources mentioned by him). It is probably this defeat (Yawm al-Razm), which tradition places in the same year as the battle of Badr, which made a section of the Murād think it advisable to seek an alliance with Muḥammad; but Kais b. al-Makshūh refused to join in this. It was therefore another Murādī chief, Farwa b. Musaik, who went to al-Madina in the year 10 A. H., and concluded a treaty there with the Prophet (cf. Caetani, Annali dell' Islām, ii. 332). To what extent tradition is right in saying that Farwa was given authority to levy zakāt on all the tribes of the Yaman, is very difficult to ascertain. In any case, the policy of the Murād was not oriented towards Muḥammad under the leadership of Kais b. al-Makshūh. In the great rising led by al-Aswad al-Ansī against Persian hegemony in the Yaman, the Murād were against him. But if, as tradition has it, Muḥammad used his connections with some chiefs of the Yaman to prevent al-Aswad's success, after the death of the Prophet these same chiefs refused obedience to Abū Bakr and resolutely threw themselves into the struggle against Islām. It is again Kais b. al-Makshūh who plays the chief part in these events. Taken prisoner, Abū Bakr granted him his life and henceforth the chief of the Murād and his tribe played their part bravely in the conquests. We find them sometimes in Syria, sometimes in the 'Irāk, and Kais everywhere distinguishing himself by his exploits. He lost an eye at the battle of Yarmūk (cf. Caetani, Annali dell' Islām, i.—v., index s. v. Qays b. Hubayrah). But the account of his death in the civil war between 'Alī and Mu'āwiya at the battle of Ṣiffin is based on confusion with another man of the same name of the tribe of Badjila (this fact, which is clearly indicated by Ibn al-Kalbī, Djāmhara and Ṭabarī, i. 3301—3302, has already been noted by Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣāba, ed. Sharafīya, v. 281; Annali dell' Islām, ix. 638 should be corrected). We also find the Murād in the conquest of Egypt (Annali, iv. 573, 21 A. H., § 191 b [29]). But it was at Kūfa that they settled in the largest numbers. It was there that one of them, 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Mulḍjam, assassinated the caliph 'Alī; it was there also that in 60 (679) Hānī' b. 'Urwa al-Murādī was executed by orders of the governor 'Ubaid Allāh b. Ziyād after being found guilty of conspiring with Muslim b. 'Aqil in favour of al-Ḥusain (Ṭabarī, ii. 227 sq.). He was a descendant of the poet 'Amr b. Kī'ās (R. S. O., xiii. 58, 3271), one of the very few poets of this tribe, which does not seem to have produced many individuals of note either during the Djāhiliya or under Islām. We may however mention Uwais al-Ḳaranī (of the Banū Ḳaran b. Radmān b. Nādjīya b. Murād; Wüstenfeld, Geneal. Tab., p. 7, 25), one of the prototypes of Muslim asceticism.

(G. LEVI DELLA VIDA)

MURĀD I, according to the common tradition the third ruler of the Ottoman state, was a son of Orkhān and the Byzantine lady Nilüfer. Although some Ottoman sources profess to know the year of his birth (Sidjill-i 'othmānī, i. 74 gives the year 726 = 1326), this date, like all dates given by Turkish sources relating to this period, is far from certain. The name Murād (Greek sources such as Phrantzes have Ἀμουράτης, from which later Latin sources make Amurath, while contemporary Latin sources from Italy have Moratibei) must have originated in mystical circles and hardly occurs in earlier times. An 'Abdal Murād lived in Orkhān's time (cf. Sidjill-i 'othmānī, iv. 354; 'Ashīk Pasha Zāde, ed. Giese, p. 200; photographs of his tomb in R. Hartmann, Im neuen Anatolien, Leipzig 1928, plates 9 and 10). The ancient Turkish chronicles often call Murād Ghāzī Khunkhār, later Turkish historians Khudāwendikār [q. v.].

During his father's lifetime Murād had already been entrusted with the governorship of In Ōñü and later of Brusa. His brother Sulaimān Pasha had held the more important sandjaks and was destined to become Orkhān's successor. Sulaimān's untimely death, shortly before that of Orkhān himself, placed Murād unexpectedly at the head of the Ottoman principality. This happened about 1360; the date of Orkhān's death is uncertain.

Murād I became the first great Ottoman conqueror on European soil. In this he followed the footsteps of his brother Sulaimān Pasha and of other Turkish emirs before him.

It is not yet possible to gain a clear idea of the succession of the military achievements by which the Ottomans succeeded in establishing themselves firmly on the Balkan Peninsula. Even the outstanding victories are confounded with each other in the Ottoman and Western sources, and the exact dating of even important events is subject to great difficulties. The Byzantine sources, the most reliable of all, are mainly concerned with the tortuous policy of the Byzantine rulers. On the other hand, many tales of a legendary character have entered the historical accounts of later times. The impression on the whole is, that the Ottoman successes were mainly due to the mutual rivalry between the then existing Balkan states, Byzantium, and the Bulgarian and Serbian kingdoms, complicated by the struggle of Venice and Genoa for an advantageous position in the Levant, and the zeal of the popes for bringing the Greek church back to Rome. This secured the Ottomans at all times allies in the Christian camp itself. Nor is it possible to ascertain which Ottoman expeditions were really planned by Murād and his councillors and which were merely successful raids by Turkish bands. All this makes it extremely difficult to form an adequate judgment of Murād's personality as a warrior and as a statesman.

Provisionally three periods can be distinguished. The first begins shortly after Murād's accession with the conquest of Western Thrace, in which were taken Çorlu, Demotika (if this town had not already been taken under Orkhān), Gümüldjina, Adrianople (about 1362; cf. EDIRNE) and Philippopolis, mainly through the activity of the beglerbeg Lala Shāhin and Ewrenos Beg. These conquests provoked a coalition of Servians, Bosnians and Hungarians, who were beaten on the river Maritza by Hādjdī Ilbeki. The western part of Bulgaria was raided up to the Balkan Mountains and the Byzantine Emperor John Palaeologos made his first submission as vassal to Murād. Murād himself had been on a campaign in Anatolia, which brought him as far as Toḡat [q. v.] during which he consolidated the Ottoman hold on Angora (already taken by Sulaimān Pasha in 1354; cf. Witteke, Festschrift Jacob, 1932, p. 347, 351 sqq.). He then came to Rüm-ili and took up his residence in Demotika, to change this town in 1366 for Adrianople, from this time on the European capital of the Ottomans. The story about a treaty between Ragusa and Murād concluded in 1365 has a legendary character (cf. Giese, Festschrift Jacob, 1932, p. 42, after Jireček). In the meantime the hostility between Byzantines and Bulgarians gave Murād the opportunity of taking Ishtebol (Sozopolis) near Burgas, and the same hostility led to the failure, about 1366, of a crusade undertaken at the instigation of Pope Urban V by count Amadeo of Savoy to come to the rescue of the Byzantine Emperor; the expedition only drove the Turks from Gallipoli for a short time.

A second period of Murād's reign may be said to begin with the crushing of a Serbian advance on the Maritza, near Cirmen, probably in 1371. This Serbian defeat is known to the Turkish sources as sırf şindighi and gave the Turks during the following years the important Macedonian towns of Seres, Drama and Ḳawalla, and at the same time the possibility of advancing west of the Vardar. These conquests were made by Ewrenos and Djandarlı Khalil Pasha, while Lala Shāhin obtained about the same time successes in eastern Bulgaria (battle of Samakow). Then followed again some years of comparative tranquillity, in which the newly won regions were partly colonized with Ottomans; the still unsubdued northern parts of Serbia and Bulgaria were governed by the local rulers as vassals of Murād. The latter had more than once to interfere with the dynastic affairs of the Palaeologoi. After John Palaeologos had sold in 1375 the island of Tenedos to Venice, this led to an action of Genoa in combination with the Turks, in course of which John lost his throne and was imprisoned, until, by the favour of Murād, he became Emperor again in 1379; his dependency went so far as to help the Turks, together with his son Manuel, in the conquest of Philadelphia (Ala Shehir), the only remaining Greek fortress in Asia Minor. The end of this second period is marked by an increased activity in Anatolia. A part of the territory of the Germiyan-Oghlu [q. v.] was acquired as a wedding gift to prince Bāyazid when he married the daughter of that ruler (probably in 1381); this territorial accession was followed by the sale of the greater part of the lands of the Hamid-Oghlu to Murād and by the conquest of a part of the principality of Teke.

About 1385 there followed new conquests in Europe. Turkish troops intervened in Epirus and Albania (under Khalil Pasha), but decisive for the establishment of Ottoman power in the Balkans was the taking of Sofia (1385 ?) and Nish (1386 ?). About the same time, the Italian republics, Genoa and Venice, obtained by treaties with Murād, concluded respectively in 1385 and 1388, commercial privileges in Turkish territory. Immediately after the successes in Serbia, probably also in 1386, Murād went to war with the Karamān-Oghlu 'Alā' al-Dīn, his son-in-law; this conflict had long been threatening [cf. KARAMĀN-OGHLU]; now the Ottoman power had grown so far as to destroy the political equilibrium in Anatolia. Murād was victorious in the battle of Konya, but left 'Alā' al-Dīn in his possessions and set the example, henceforward traditional, of leniency in dealing with the Anatolian population. This caused a lively discontent amongst the Serbian troops who had taken part in the battle of Konya. These Serbians are said to have contributed to the anti-Turkish feeling among the Serbians in general, who, under the leadership of Lazar Gresljanowitch, and with the Bosnian king Tvrtko as a powerful ally, were preparing a last effort to free themselves from Turkish vassalage. They succeeded in defeating an Ottoman army at Plochnik (1388). The results were meagre, however, for at the same time the Turks made new conquests in Bulgaria (Shumla and Tirnovo) and even raided Morea. In 1389 Murād himself marched against the Serbians and their allies and fought the famous battle of Kosovo Polje (Turkish: KOSOVA), where he himself lost his life, although the Serbians, partly owing to treachery in their own ranks, were defeated. The most probable date is June 20, 1389 (Gibbons, cf. also Giese, in Ephemerides Orientales, No. 34, April 1928, p. 2 sq.). The way in which Murād was killed, during or after the battle, is not clear from the early sources; the later Serbian epic tradition has the well-known tale that Murād was murdered by Milosh Obranowitch, Lazar's son-in-law, who, claiming to be a deserter, had obtained an audience with Murād after the battle, was admitted to his presence and killed him with a dagger. Murād's body was transported to Brusa and buried in a türbe near the mosque which he had built at Çekirge in Brusa (cf. Ahmed Tewhid, in T. O. E. M., vol. iii.).

Murād I was the first ruler under whom the state founded by 'Othmān rose to be more than one of the then existing Turkoman principalities in Asia Minor. This development is symbolised in the successive change of titles given to him in different building inscriptions dated in his reign (cf. Taeschner, in Isl., xx. 131 sqq.). While the oldest inscription calls him simply Bey, like his father Orkhān, and gives him a laḡab (Shihāb al-Dunyā wa 'l-Dīn) after the Saldjūk fashion, he is already called Sultān [q. v.] in 785 (1383), while in the inscription from 790 (1388) on the 'imāret built by him in Iznik, we find the style which afterwards became a tradition with the Ottoman sultāns (al-malik al-mu'azzam al-khākān al-mukarram al-sultān ibn al-sultān). It was a time when the old Saldjūk traditional institutions no longer held and new forms of government and administration came into being, to which the example of Byzantine institutions, and also those of Mamlūk Egypt may have contributed. Even if it is not true that Djandarlı Khair al-Dīn Khalil Pasha — who was appointed Murād's vizier at the beginning of his reign and died about 789 (1387) — was the first Ottoman grand vizier, it cannot be denied that the activity of this man — who by his origin belonged to a higher culture than the Ottoman — as Murād's councillor as well as his military deputy and administrator in Macedonia, makes him a true prototype of the grand viziers of a later age (cf. Taeschner and Wittek, in Isl., xviii. 66 sqq.). His son 'Alī Pasha began also to play an important military part during the later years of Murād's reign. It is also with Khalil Pasha that the old Turkish sources connect the institution of the Janissaries as troops formed from converted Christian prisoners of war. In the administration of the timārs [q. v.] a Kānūn of Murād I is said to have brought improvements. Some of these measures were closely connected with the problem of acquiring a quiet and loyal population in the newly conquered Christian territories; this was not possible by Turkish colonisation only but succeeded mainly through a humane treatment of the original inhabitants, after the region had once been conquered.

The more important buildings of Murād I are all in Asia Minor. The best known are the Khudāwendikiār Djāmi'i in Çekirge, near Brusa, where Murād himself is buried, and the Ulu Djāmi' in Brusa; further a mosque in Biledjik, the Nilüfer 'Imāreti in Iznik (recently described by Taeschner, in Isl., xx. 127 sqq.). There is also a mosque of Murād in Serres. The old Ottoman chronicles enumerate his foundations. — On Murād I's coins cf. 'Alī, in T. T. E. M., xiv. 224.

Bibliography: The information given by the old Turkish chronicles ('Ashīk Pasha Zāde, Anonymus, ed. Giese, Urūdī, the translations of Leunclavius, also Düstūr-nāme-i Enweri, ed. The Byzantine historians (Phrantzes, Ducas, Chalcondyles), however, give a far clearer survey of this period so far as it came under their attention, while documents from Venice, Genoa and Rome throw light on the diplomatic activities provoked by the advance of the Turks in Europe. Ibn Hādjar al-'Askalānī, Inbā' al-Ghumr fī Anbā' al-'Umr, contains also a biography of Murād I. Further the historical works of von Hammer, Zinkeisen and Jorga, and H. A. MURĀD II, sixth ruler of the Ottoman Empire, was born in 806 (1403—1404) and ascended the throne in May 1421, when he arrived in Adrianople some days after his father Muḥammed I's death; his decease had been kept secret on the advice of the vizier 'Iwaḍ Pasha until the new sultān's arrival. As crown prince he had resided at Maghnisa, and he had taken part in the suppression of the revolt of Simawna Oghlu Badr al-Dīn. Immediately after his accession he had to face the pretender known in Turkish history as Dözme Muṣṭafā [q. v.] and his ally Djunaid [q. v.]. Both were supported by the Byzantine emperor Manuel and at first were successful in the European part of the empire. Bāyazid Pasha, sent from Brusa, was defeated and killed in the battle of Sāzlı Dere (between Seres and Adrianople) and the allied Greek forces took Gallipoli. Then Murād himself had to face them in Asia; he succeeded in sowing discord between Muṣṭafā and Djunaïd and defeated the first in the battle of the bridge of Ulubad. Then Murād went over, with the help of ships from the Genoese colony of New Phocæa (Yeñi Foça), recovered Gallipoli, after which he entered Adrianople and killed the pretender. In 1422 he began a siege of Constantinople; this siege was raised, either by the effect of Byzantine gold (through the intermediary of the græcophil vizier İbrāhīm Paşa) or as a result of the rise of a new pretender in İznik in the person of Murād's younger brother Muṣṭafā. The latter was at last betrayed by his former supporter İlyās Paşa and killed. Then followed a struggle with Djunaïd, who had established himself again at Aidin, but surrendered at last in 1425, after which he was killed. Murād was now at peace with all his European neighbours and vassals; the Emperor Manuel had died in 1424 and was followed by John Palæologos, with whom peace was concluded. Several towns had been taken in the meantime in Morea, and Wallachia paid tribute. In Anatolia there had been a conflict in 1423 with İsfendiyār of Sīnūb, ending with the acquisition of a part of his territory by Murād; after 1425 the Ottoman power was confirmed in Teke and Monteshe and the Karamān Oghlu İbrāhīm, who tried to take the already Ottoman Adalia, had to retire and made peace. In eastern Anatolia Yürkeğ Paşa subdued the Turkomans round Tokat and Amasia and of the region of Djaniğ. In 1428 there began difficulties on the Hungarian frontier. The most noteworthy exploit of this period was however the capture of Saloniki (Selanik; q. v.) in March 1430; after the Greeks had sold this town to Venice in 1427; Murād had never given up the plan of avenging that transaction. Peace with Venice soon followed.

Occasionally the Turks had taken several fortresses in Epirus and Albania, but their interest began more and more to concentrate on the north-western regions, where George Brankovitch ruled as vassal over Serbia. With the latter peace was renewed in 1432 and his daughter Mara was given to Murād, but the Turkish raids continued in Serbia as well as far into Hungarian territory. In 1438 the Turks made, together with Serbians and Wallachians, incursions in Hungary (capture of Semendra); in 1440 they beleaguered Belgrad in vain and in 1442 Turkish troops under Mezîd Bey laid siege to Hermannstadt. Here they suffered a heavy defeat by John Hunyadi, who in the coming years was to act as champion of Hungary and Christian Europe. He was the leader, in 1443, of a big crusading army including Serbians, Poles and Germans; the Turks were thrown back at Nish, after which Sofia was taken. The campaign ended with a heavy defeat of the Turks at Jalowaz, between Sofia and Philippopolis. In the same year Murād had to oppose again the Karamān Oghlu, who supported the Christian allies. But the peace with Hungary, concluded in July 1444 at Szeged, though advantageous to Hungary, maintained the former frontiers of the Ottoman political influence; only Wallachia became tributary to Hungary.

After this peace, which was to last ten years and seemed to Murād a guarantee for the future, he abdicated in favour of his son Muḥammad, leaving with him Khalil Paşa, son of İbrāhīm Paşa (who had died of the plague in 1429) and Khusrav Molla [q. v.] as councillors. He retired himself to Maghnisa, but had to come back when, in September of the same year, the Hungarians, flouting the peace treaty, were preparing a new crusade. They marched south of the Danube to Varna; here the army of Murād inflicted on them a crushing defeat, in which King Ladislas of Hungary was killed. Again Murād II went back to Maghnisa, but in the following year a Janissary revolt broke out in Adrianople and it was the vizier Khalil who invited Murād to return a second time, as the young Muḥammad did not seem to be able to face the situation.

During the last six years of his reign Murād led again several campaigns in the Balkan peninsula. In 1446 an action was undertaken against the Palæologoi in the Morea (destruction of the Hexamilion, capture of Corinth and Patras); in 1447 against Albania, where the activity of Skander Beg [q. v.] had begun in 1443; in 1448 he faced again a Hungarian invading army, which was beaten on the plain of Kossowa; and in 1450 he was again in Albania (siege of Croja). In that year Constantine Palæologos became, by the grace of Murād II, the last Byzantine Emperor, after the death of John. Shortly afterwards, in the first days of February 1451, Murād died at Adrianople. He was buried in Brusa at the side of his mosque (cf. Aḥmad Tewhîd, in T.O.E.M., iii. 1856).

His reign was of extraordinary importance for the future political and cultural development of the Ottoman Empire. After the first critical years he continued his father's work of consolidation. His aim was mainly to live on peaceful terms with the vassal princes, of whom the ruler of Sīnūb and the despot of Serbia gave their daughters to Murād. This peaceful policy was in concordance with his character; the Byzantine historians and other Christian sources describe him as a truthful, mild and humane ruler. His most influential viziers were not yet the renegades of later times; they belonged to the old families that had supported the cause of Murād's forefathers and were becoming a kind of hereditary nobility: İbrāhīm Paşa and Khalil Paşa of the Djandarlı Oghulları (F. Taeschner and P. Wittek, in Isl., xviii. 92 sqq.), Hâdjîdî 'Iwâḍ Paşa (Taeschner, in Isl., xx. 154 sqq.), the sons of Timurtash, of Ewrenos and others. The mystical tradition was strong in his surroundings, as is proved by the great influence of a man like the Shaikh Amîr Bukhārî; other shaikhs came to his court from Persia and Mesopotamia. This determined also the direction which the classical Ottoman literature was to take in following centuries. Murād II was the first Ottoman prince whose court became a brilliant centre of poets, literary men and Muḥammadan scholars [see TURKS, B, iii.]. But also to non-Islāmic envoys and visitors Murād's court seemed a centre of culture (cf. Jorga, i. 464 sqq., which description applies principally to Murād II). Amongst the sultān's buildings a mosque in Brusa (cf. H. Wilde, Brusa, p. 51) and one in Adrianople (the Üç Şerfeli Djami'), are notable and some large bridges. His army organisation is well known from a full description by Chalcondylas.

Bibliography: The older Turkish sources: Neshrî (Haniwaldanus), 'Ashîk Paşa Zāde, Urudj, Rûhî, Anonymus Giese, are completed by the Byzantine historians Phrantzes (who himself played a part in the diplomatic history of the time), Ducas and Chalcondylas, and also by the later Ottoman authors Sa'd al-Dīn, 'Āli and Münedjdjim Bāshī. A curious contemporary description is that of an unknown captive from Mühlenbach in Transylvania (captured 1438) in his Tractatus de moribus conditionibus et nequitia Turcorum (cf. K. Foy, in M.S.O.S., iv., v.).

MURĀD III, twelfth ruler of the Ottoman Empire, was born on the 5th Djumādā I 953 (4th July 1546; Sidjill-i 'othmāni, i. 76) as son of the later sultān Selīm II and the khāṣṣekī Nūr Bānū. He arrived at Constantinople on Dec. 21st, 1574, after Selīm II's death and reigned until his death on January 16, 1595 or a few days later. His reign is not characterized by great conquests in Europe. The peaceful relations with Austria were officially maintained; peace was several times confirmed (in 1575 and 1584) by a new treaty and by extraordinary Austrian embassies. Nevertheless there were continual Turkish raids into Austrian territory, especially in Croatia in 1578 — where even a new sandjak was formed — followed by triumphal processions in the capital, which the Austrian envoys were forced to witness. It was only in 1593 that a formal war broke out, in which the then grand vizier Sinān Pasha took the town of Raab (1594). The relations with Venice were of the same kind as with Austria; notwithstanding several serious naval collisions peace was maintained, mainly through the influence of Murād's khāṣṣekī Şāfiye (of the family of Baffa) and the Kapudan Pashas, who were Italian renegades. In the Danube principalities the never ending dynastic disputes went on; this was also the case in Transylvania. Even Poland was considered more or less as an Ottoman tributary vassal state; the Polish king, Stephan Bathory, owed his crown to the sultān's protection and after his death (1587) the new king Sigismund began to reign by the grace of Murād. The Porte had to intervene several times in the disturbances caused by Polish cossacks in Moldavia and the Tatar Khānate and by Tatar incursions in Poland. In the Crimea the Ottoman intervention was even stronger, because the Persian war necessitated in 1581 and 1583 expeditions by the way of Kaffa and the Crimea against Dāghistān and Transcaucasia.

The most outstanding military exploit of the Ottoman Empire during Murād III's reign was the war with Persia, which lasted from 1577 to 1590. Persia passed, after Shāh Tahmāsp's death in 1576, through serious inner troubles. This gave the Turks a favourable opportunity of enlarging their territory. Between 1577 and 1584 the chief theatre of the war was Georgia; Lala Muştafā Pasha won the battle of Lake Čaldir (August 9, 1578), after which the princes of the small Georgian kingdoms became nominally Ottoman vassals, while several towns, like Tifis and Shākī, came under direct military occupation. In 1579 the town of Karş was fortified. That same year Sinān Pasha became ser-asker on the Georgian front. The completion of the conquests confronted the Ottoman armies with serious difficulties, especially after Simon, the former king of Kartli, had come back from exile in Persia. This made necessary the already mentioned expedition by the way of the Crimea in 1581 under Özdemiş 'Othmān Pasha who was joined in 1583, by the same way, by Dja'fer Pasha; they came back to Constantinople again via the Crimea and 'Othmān Pasha was received with great honour by the sultān after his return, although it would seem that the real aim of the expedition — a junction with the Turkish forces of the south — was not reached, owing to the combined efforts of the people of Georgia and Shirwān (cf. W. E. D. Allen, A History of the Georgian People, London 1932, p. 157). The second phase of the Persian war began with the taking of Tabriz in 1585 by 'Othmān Pasha, followed by other successes on Persian territory (Gandja in Transcaucasia and Nihāwend). In 1587 Shāh 'Abbās I ascended the throne; soon afterwards there began peace negotiations, ending in a peace treaty (March 21, 1590) which left Georgia, Shirwān, Karabāgh, Tabriz and Luristān to the Ottoman Empire. One of the peace conditions was that the Persians should give up most of their anti-Sunnite religious practices.

During Murād III's first years Muḥammad Pasha Soḳolli [q. v.] had continued to administer the huge Empire as grand vizier, but his once unquestioned authority began to wane under the influence of the sultān's courtiers like Shemsī Pasha and the defterdār Uweis; an influential personality also was the Khwādja Sa'd al-Dīn — the historian — and the eunuch Ghazanfer Agha. Home and foreign politics were influenced also by Murād's mother Nūr Bānū and the already mentioned khāṣṣekī Şāfiye (Baffa), who used as a powerful agent outside the palace the Jewess Kira (Chierazza in the Italian sources). Soḳolli's confidants were relegated from the capital (as the nishānđji Feridūn) or executed (like Michael Cantacuzenos). But he was still grand vizier, when he was murdered on October 11, 1579. After him the grand vizierate was changed no less than ten times under Murād III. Sinān Pasha, already mentioned, held the office three times; 'Othmān Pasha, appointed in 1585, after his return from Dāghistān, died eight months afterwards. As the sultān, though well-intentioned, was too weak himself to direct a consistent policy, — as he acknowledged himself according to 'Āli (cf. Hammer, G. O. R., ii. 567) — all kinds of abuses gradually began in this epoch, especially in the administration of the fiefs [cf. TIMĀR] and the enrolling of the Janissaries; they are summed up in Koči Bey's Risāla. This sultān's reign witnessed for the first time revolts of the Janissaries directed against the imperial diwān itself. The first mutiny, in April 1589, was caused by depreciation of the coinage and could be appeased only — as so often afterwards — by the sacrifice of the lives of high officials. In 1592 there was a similar Sipāhī revolt. More than one provincial rebellion had to be subdued by force; the most celebrated expedition was that of Ibrāhīm Pasha, the later dāmād and favourite of Muḥammad III, to Egypt and Syria in 1585; in Syria he persecuted severely the Banū Ma'an, the leaders of the Druses, but very soon afterwards the successful career of Fakhr al-Dīn [q. v.] began.

Murād's reign can be characterized as the beginning of the internal weakening of the Ottoman power. The sultān did not possess the strong personality of his grand father; his amorous tendencies were much encouraged by his mother and his wife Şāfiye, and he had far more than a hundred children. Besides he was inclined to mysticism; he protected mystic poets and himself wrote poems under the takhalluṣ Murādī, besides a mystical treatise called Futūḥāt al-Ṣiyām (Hādjdī Khalifa, N^o. 1003). It is possible that he was in sympathy with the repeated outbursts of Muḥammadan fanaticism that occurred during his reign and led to the conversion of several churches in the capital into mosques, amongst them the church of the Greek Patriarchate. These actions caused violent but vain remonstrations from the representatives of France and other Catholic powers. The outward splendour of the court was extravagant; the festival of the circumcision of his son Muḥammad, in June 1582, seems to have surpassed all similar ceremonies in the Ottoman history (description by Leonclavius).

MURĀD IV, fifth son of sulṭān Aḥmad I, and seventeenth ruler of the Ottoman Empire, was born 28th Djumādā I 1021 (July 27, 1612) and called to the throne as a result of the mutiny of the Janissaries and Sipāhis, which had forced Muṣṭafā I to abdicate, on September 11, 1623. When the lives of Murād and his brothers were in danger, they had been hidden by Khalil Pasha. But even after his enthronement Murād IV’s position was far from strong. The turbulent and continuously mutinying Janissaries and Sipāhis were the real masters of the situation and the seven grand viziers that succeeded each other between the accession and 1632 were more or less dependent on the momentary wishes of those militias. The young sulṭān and his mother Kösem [q. v.] were at first unable to restore the authority of the government, and more than once they were constrained to sacrifice a high official to the mutinous soldateska, amongst them the grand vizier Hāfiz Pasha [q. v.] in February 1632. Gradually the old experienced statesmen of ‘Othmān II’s time regained their influence, and sometimes the sulṭān was able to suppress unreliable officials, as already in April 1624 by the execution of the grand vizier Kemānkesh ‘Ali Pasha [q. v.], but it was only in 1632 that he became real master of the situation; in that year he had the grand vizier Redjeb Pasha — until that time one of the most influential men at court — executed, after which began Murād IV’s personal reign of terror.

During this period from 1623—1632 the Asiatic affairs of the Empire required all the available energy of the Porte. In 1623 Baghdād had fallen after many atrocities into the hands of the Persians as a result of the intrigues of the Turkish su bashī Bekir; Mōsul also became Persian, and the Anatolian army under Hāfiz Pasha was powerless. Abāza Pasha [q. v.] was still in revolt at Erzerüm; in 1624 an agreement was reached with him, but only in 1628 the grand vizier Khosrew Pasha forced him to surrender, after which Abāza played a part as governor of Bosnia and of Silistria. In the meantime several vain efforts were made to recover Baghdād, by Hāfiz Aḥmad Pasha in 1626, and by Khosrew Pasha [q. v.] in 1630.

From 1632 Murād IV prepared with incredible energy the mobilisation of all the country’s resources for the war against Persia, where Shāh ‘Abbās I had died in 1627. He suppressed with great cruelty the rebellious movements among the Janissaries and reduced their number by not applying the dewshirme for twelve years. New and more reliable troops were formed from the āḳebedjis, bostandjis and especially the segbāns (seymens). The necessary funds were procured by drastic financial measures, amongst them the confiscation of large fortunes. Every attempt at opposition was cruelly suppressed; in 1633 even the Shāikh al-Islām Akhī-Zāde Ḥusain was executed. In October 1633 an army under the new grand vizier Tabanī Yaṣī Muḥammad Pasha left Constantinople, but that year and the following no important military operations took place. The Kapudan Pasha Dja‘far, however, was successful in suppressing the power of the Druse Amir Fakhr al-Dīn [q. v.] and bringing him alive to Constantinople. In 1635 Murād himself left the capital, joined the grand-vizier’s army in Erzerüm and conquered Eriwan (August 1635). Then the undefended Tabriz was taken and destroyed, after which the sulṭān returned. In the following year the Persians recaptured Eriwan. Finally, in 1638, Murād took the field for the second time with the grand vizier Ṭaiyār Muḥammad Pasha; Baghdād was taken by them in December 1638, and thousands of Shī‘is were massacred. This was the end of the Persian war; in 1639 a peace was concluded, which left Baghdād to Turkey and Eriwan to Persia.

In comparison with the events in Asia, European affairs were of secondary importance. The peace with Austria was several times renewed (1625 at Gyarmath and 1627 at Szön) although predatory raids from both sides never ceased. Serious trouble was caused in 1624 by the appearance of Cossack ships in the Bosphorus; they were defeated only in 1626. Another hotbed of unrest was the Crimea, where from 1624 till 1628 the Porte had to suffer against its will the Khān Muḥammad Girāy and his brother Shāhin Girāy, who even took Kaffa for a time. After 1628 the Tatar Mirzā Kāntemir (or Kāntimur), chief of the Noghays, became the most powerful man in the khānate; his continual incursions caused serious conflicts with Poland (peace restored in 1634) and in Moldavia. At last Kāntemir was executed at Constantinople in 1637.

The peaceful relations with Venice and the western sea powers continued; in 1624 the capitulations had been renewed, but as the Porte was without authority over the Barbary states of Algiers and Tunis, England, Holland and France concluded separate treaties with their rulers in order to avert as much as possible the damage done to their trade by the ships of the corsairs. In 1638 a more serious battle took place in the Adriatic between the Venetian fleet and Barbary corsairs; at first Murād ordered the massacre of all Venetians in his Empire, but in 1639 peace was restored. In Constantinople the ministers of Holland (Haga) and England (Roe) intervened successfully in the troubles between the Porte and the Greek Patriarchate.

Murād IV died on February 9, 1640 and was buried in the türbe of the mosque of his father Aḥmad; he was the last warlike sultān of the Empire; by his energy he restored for some time its military authority, but his reforms did not last after him. Still a separate ḵanūn-nāme bears Murād IV's name. He was a man of considerable physical strength and of high personal erudition and he liked the company of poets. His attachment to the poet Tiflī [q. v.] is famous in literary tradition. The poet Nef'ī [q. v.] on the other hand was executed by his order. On verses written by Murād cf. Gibb, H.O.P., iii. 248 sqq. He had four sons, all of whom died young; at his death there was only his brother Ibrāhīm to take the succession. His brothers Bāyazīd and Sulaimān were killed by his order during the Eriwan campaign, and later also his brother Kāsim. In course of time Murād had become ever more ferocious, and he is said to have sworn in 1639 that he would subdue all his Christian neighbours (Jorga, iv. 1).

MURĀD V, Ottoman Sultān from May 31 till Sept. 7, 1876. He was born on Sept. 21, 1840 as son of Sultān 'Abd al-Maǧǧid and was deprived of all influence on public affairs during the reign of his elder brother 'Abd al-'Azīz, who had the plan of altering the succession in favour of his own descendants, so as to deprive Murād of his rights. Murād was called to the throne by the coup d'état of the recently established cabinet, of which Midḥat Pasha [q. v.], Muḥammad Rušḥī and Ḥusain 'Awnī were the leading members. By deposing Sultān 'Abd al-'Azīz they hoped to eliminate the influence of reactionary elements who were opposed to their schemes of reform and they expected to find an ally in Murād. In the night from 30th to 31st May 1876 Murād was induced with some difficulty to proceed to the Seraskerate in Constantinople, where he received the homage of the troops and the high dignitaries. He confirmed the cabinet in office. Very soon afterwards took place the suicide of the deposed sultān (June 5) and the murder of the ministers Ḥusain 'Awnī and Rušḥīd Pasha during a cabinet meeting in Midḥat's house (June 15). These events seem to have been fatal to the mental equilibrium of the new sultān, who, already in the night of his accession, had shown signs of abnormal nervous excitement. He was unable to appear before his people at the selāmīk, nor could the sword-girding ceremony (ḵil'āḍ alayī) be applied to him. Midḥat Pasha and his friends, although fearing that a new change of ruler might endanger their plans, had to arrange another deposition; they had the sultān's health examined by a number of physicians and, on their report, obtained a fatwā from the Shāikh al-Islām Ḥasan Ḵhair Allāh Efendi, authorizing Murād's deposition (September 1). His younger brother 'Abd al-Ḥamīd II became sultān and Murād went to live in the Čiraghan Palace, where he died on August 29, 1904. His confinement during 'Abd al-Ḥamīd's reign continued to excite speculation as a yet unsolved mystery and was occasionally represented as one of the crimes of the Ḥamīdian regime.

MURĀD PASHA, Turkish grand vizier under Aḥmad I, was a Croatian by birth and was born about 1520. He served the empire as military commander and later as wālī in different provinces (Egypt, Yaman, Anatolia) and was made prisoner by the Persians in the battle of Tabriz (Sept. 1585), where Čiḡhāle's army was defeated. In 1601 he was pasha of Budin and in 1603 commander-in-chief on the Hungarian front. In these posts he repeatedly conducted for the Porte peace negotiations with Austria. He was the chief negotiator of the peace of Zsitvatorok (Nov. 11, 1606). A month afterwards (Dec. 11, 1606), after the execution of Derwish Pasha in Constantinople, he was appointed grand vizier, being then already about 80 years of age.

As grand vizier Murād Pasha became particularly famous by his relentless persecution and repression of the many rebellions in the Asiatic provinces. In 1607 he defeated the Kurd Džānbulād [q. v.] in North Syria (battle of Urudj Owāsī in Oct. 1607). After having passed the winter in Aleppo, he succeeded in crushing the forces of the arch-rebel Kālander Oghlu at the pass of Göksum in Cappadocia (July 1608), where he decided the battle by his personal courage. Then he pursued from Siwās the rebel Maimūn and defeated him near Baiburt. His habit of throwing the captured rebels into pits dug for that purpose brought him the name of Koyudju Murād Pasha. Notwithstanding the sultān's order — provoked by his enemies in the capital — that he should proceed immediately against Persia, he returned in December to Constantinople, where he was received with great honours. Poets celebrated his achievements against the rebels. In 1609 Murād Pasha went to Scutari for the Persian campaign, but he went no further that year, because he wished first to deal with two remaining dangerous rebels: Muselli-Čaush in İč İli and Yūsuf Pasha in Aidin. By false propositions of reconciliation these two were at last induced to surrender and afterwards killed. Murād Pasha had to make use more than once of his personal influence with the sultān to restrain the latter's impatience before his plans had succeeded.

On the other hand, the sultān had to protect several dignitaries against the personal hatred of the terrible old man. In 1610 the grand vizier at last marched to Persia and destroyed Tabriz; then he went to Erzerūm, from where he began long and extended negotiations with Shāh 'Abbās. Before the following year's campaign had begun, he died (August 5, 1611). He was buried in a türbe near the medrese he had founded in the quarter Weznedjiler in Constantinople.

By his successes in restoring the internal order of the empire Murād Pasha is considered as one of the most able grand viziers; the historians give ample proofs of his sound judgment of persons and situations. To his initiative is due a compilation of the kānūns regulating the timār administration (G. O. W., p. 141).

MURĀDĪ, takhalluṣ of Murād III [q. v.] and Murād IV [q. v.].

MURCIA (Ar. Mursiya), a town in the S. E. of Spain, 140 feet above sea level in the centre of the famous huerta de Murcia ("gardens of Murcia") watered by the river Segura (Ar. Wādī Shakūra [q. v.] or Wādī 'l-abyaḍ, "the white river"). The area of Murcia has a large population: over 150,000, although the town in the strict sense has barely 30,000. Murcia is the capital of the province of the same name and the see of a bishop; it has also a university. Its port, 40 miles to the south on the Mediterranean coast, is Cartagena, the Ḳarṭājīanna or Ḳarṭājīannat al-Khulafā' of the Arabs.

The situation of Murcia in the centre of very fertile gardens, forming an island of vegetation in a bare country poorly endowed by nature, had been noticed already by the Arab geographers who give more or less long accounts of it. Abū 'l-Fidā', for example, says that it was like Seville for the number of its groves and parks (muntasahāt), among which he mentions the famous al-Rushāḳa.

Murcia in the Umayyad period was the capital of a province or kūra which bore the name of Todmīr [q. v., iv. 805]. This name which is connected with the name of Theodemir, a Visigothic chief of the region at the time of the Muslim conquest, was also applied to the town of Murcia itself, from the time when it supplanted Orihuela [q. v.] as the chief town of the region. Indeed almost all the Arab authors who speak of Murcia agree in saying that it was a comparatively recent foundation; it was built by order of the Umayyad emīr 'Abd al-Raḥmān II al-Ḥakam about the year 210 (825), according to the al-Rawḍ al-miṣṭār in 216 by the governor Djābir b. Malik b. Labid.

The land of Todmīr and with it of course Murcia was much involved in the civil wars provoked by the rivalry of the Yamanīs and the Muḍarīs of Spain in the period of the independent emirs of Cordova. In the reign of 'Abd Allāh (275-300 = 888-912), a rebel, the renegade Daīsām b. Ishāk, rose there with the connivance of the famous agitator Ibn Ḥafṣūn [cf. Umayyads II]. He ruled independently all the province of Todmīr until the emīr of Cordova sent to suppress him in 283 (896) an army led by his uncle Hishām b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. al-Ḥakam and the general Aḥmad b. Muḥammad Ibn Abī 'Abda. Daīsām was defeated between Aledo and Lorca and the latter town besieged. The country was only definitely pacified and restored to the central power in Cordova in the reign of the caliph 'Abd al-Raḥmān III and his successor al-Ḥakam II.

During the events which ended in the break up of Umayyad Spain, Murcia became, like the majority of the great towns of the Peninsula, the capital of a little independent state. At first in the hands of the "Slavs" [cf. ṢAḲĀLIBA] Khairān and Zuhair, along with Almeria and Jaen, the principality of Murcia was then for some time attached to the kingdom of Valencia, in the reigns of 'Abd al-'Azīz al-Manṣūr Ibn Abī 'Amir and his son 'Abd al-Malik al-Muzaḥfar. The governor who then ruled Murcia was Abū Bakr Aḥmad b. Ishāk Ibn Tāhir; when he died in 455 (1063) after amassing a considerable fortune, he was succeeded by his son Abū 'Abd al-Raḥmān Muḥammad who soon proclaimed himself independent and repudiated the authority of the Valencian dynasty.

The principality of Ibn Tāhir soon aroused the covetousness of the minister of al-Mu'tamid [q. v.] Ibn 'Abbād, king of Seville, and an expedition was sent against Murcia with the help of an independent lord of the district, Ibn Rashīk. Ibn Tāhir was taken prisoner and shut up in Montegudo, but escaping, he reached Valencia where after acting as adviser to al-Ḳādir Ibn Dhī 'l-Nūn [q. v.] and having almost succeeded him, he finally died in 508 (1119). The conquest of the kingdom of Murcia by Ibn 'Ammār in the name of the 'Abbāsids took place in 471 (1078), but it was only nominal and it was Ibn Rashīk who exercised the real power instead of Ibn Tāhir.

The kingdom of Murcia was one of the first districts of the Peninsula to be conquered by the Almoravids. Murcia was taken for Yūsuf b. Tāshfīn [q. v.] in Shawwāl 484 (Nov.-Dec. 1091) by the Lamtūnian general Ibn 'Ā'isha who next took Denia and Játiva. Ibn 'Ā'isha remained governor of Murcia; he was replaced later by Abū Bakr b. Ibrāhīm Ibn Tiflīwī, then by a brother of the sultān 'Alī b. Yūsuf, Abū Ishāk Ibrāhīm.

A general rising against the Almoravids took place in Spain in the beginning of the xth century and gave rise to the formation of a new series of kingdoms of "taifas". Murcia therefore between 1145 and 1147 was in the hands of two rival leaders, 'Abd Allāh b. Iyād and 'Abd Allāh b. Faraj, until the Valencian ruler Muḥammad b. Aḥmad b. Sa'īd Ibn Mardaniṣh seized it and took up his residence there. This individual, who was of Spanish origin (cf. above, ii., p. 403), soon became the powerful ruler of all S. E. Spain, between Valencia and Almeria, and instituted a series of fruitful alliances with the Christian rulers of Catalonia, Aragon and Castille. He was for long able to resist the attacks of the first Almohads 'Abd al-Mu'min [q. v.] and Yūsuf [q. v.], and it was only after his death in 567 (1172) during the siege of his capital Murcia that his kingdom passed finally to the Mu'minid sovereigns.

From the fall of the Almohad empire in Spain until its conquest by the Christians Murcia had a very troubled existence. It was in turn the residence (from the beginning of the xiiith century) of princes of the family of the Banū Hūd of Saragossa: Muḥammad b. Yūsuf al-Mutawakkil, the latter's uncle, Muḥammad, Abū Bakr Muḥammad al-Wāṭṭik, then it passed to the Naṣrids of Granada to 'Abd Allāh b. 'Alī Ibn Ashkīlūla. For details of the obscure history of this period see the monograph by Gaspar Remiro quoted below. According to Ibn al-Abbār (cf. M. Bencheneb, Notes chronologiques sur la conquête de l'Espagne, in Mélanges René Basset, Paris 1923, ii. 73), Murcia was surrendered to the Christians by Aḥmad b. Muḥammad b. Hūd, son of the governor, on Thursday 10th Shawwāl 640 (April 2, 1243). But if we may believe the Christian chronicles it was in February 1266 that Don Jaime of Aragon took definite possession of Murcia.

MURDĀDH (P.), the fifth month of the Persian solar year running from July 19 to Aug. 18 (Murdādh māh). Murdādh is also the name of the seventh day of each month (Murdādh rūz); it is the last of the series of the days which are called after the Amesha Spentas. Murdādh (Pehlevi amurdāth "immortality") forms with Khurdādh [q.v.] (Pehlevi khurdāth perfection) an indivisible pair and the days which bear these names come together. They denote a pair of archangels, of whom Murdādh has charge of the gifts of the earth on which the life of man depends. The seventh day of the month Murdādh on which the names of the day and of the month are the same is called Murdādhgān.

Bibliography: al-Birūnī, Āthār, ed. Sachau, p. 42, 43, 70, 221; Geiger-Kuhn, Gr. I. Ph., ii. 638, 675 sqq. (M. PLESSNER)

AL-MURDĪJĀ, name of one of the early sects of Islām, the extreme opponents of the Khāridjites [q.v.]. The latter thought that a Muslim by committing a mortal sin becomes a kāfir. The Murdjī'a, on the other hand, were of opinion that a Muslim does not lose his faith through sin. This doctrine led them to a far-reaching quietism in politics; according to their doctrine, the imām who was guilty of mortal sins did not cease to be a Muslim and must be obeyed. The ṣalāt performed behind him was valid.

Occidental and Oriental explanations of the name show considerable divergencies (cf. e.g. Sale, Preliminary Discourse, p. 229 sq.; Goldziher, Richtungen der islam. Koranauslegung, p. 179; v. Kremer, Gesch. d. herrschenden Ideen, p. 20; Houtsma, Strijd over het dogma, p. 34). It seems to me that the origin of the name must be sought in the term irdjā', in this way that Murdjī'a meant adherents of the doctrine of irdjā' ('Abd al-Kāhīr al-Baghḍādī uses the term for their doctrine) and that this term goes back to verse 107 of sūra ix. The context of this verse not only explains the term irdjā', but may also give an insight into the evolution of the ideas of the Murdjī'ites. In the preceding verses Muḥammad makes a distinction between two groups among the Madinese who had forsaken him in the expedition to Tabūk [q.v.]: some had shown niṣāḥ without penitence; they were to receive punishment in this and in the other world (verse 102). Others had shown penitence (tawba); they were left to Allāh's mercy (verse 103). The third group, who had not made penitence, were left in suspense (murdjā'ūna, or, according to a different reading, murdjawnā).

The situation in Madina after the expedition to Tabūk was generalised by later sects. As a matter of fact, the third group mentioned in the passage discussed — viz. sinners who did not show penitence — was relegated to Hell by the Khāridjites. In opposition to this, the Murdjī'ites taught the doctrine of irdjā' mentioned in sūra ix. 107 and therefore they were called Murdjī'a, i.e. the adherents of the doctrine of respite or hope; for this the term irdjā' means; the variants murdjā'ūna and murdjawnā are irrelevant in this respect.

In the course of time the doctrine of the Murdjī'a assumed a double aspect. Their chief thesis was the indelible character of faith, in opposition to the Khāridjites. Their second thesis was of an eschatological nature: where there is faith, sins will do no harm. On account of the latter doctrine they were called the adherents of promise (ahl al-wa'd), in contra-distinction to the Mu'tazila [q.v.] who were called the adherents of threats (ahl al-wa'id). So the doctrine of irdjā' had acquired a triple aspect — which accounts for the divergent explanations of the name —, viz. the doctrine of faith bearing an indelible character, an indulgent attitude towards sinners in the Muslim community, and a hopeful prospect for them in the Last Judgment.

These are the chief tenets of the Murdjī'a as they appear to us as well as to later Muslim writers such as al-Shahrastānī. Earlier authors enumerate a number of divergencies among the different groups of Murdjī'ites. Al-Ash'arī mentions their variety of opinion regarding faith, unbelief, sins, tawhīd, interpretation of the Qur'an, eschatology, mortal and venial sins, forgiveness of mortal sins, the impeccability of the Prophets, punishment of sins, the question whether there were infidels among the early generations of Islām, redress of wrongs, the beatific vision, the nature of the Qur'an, the quidditas of Allāh, His names and ṣifāt, predestination.

'Abd al-Kāhīr al-Baghḍādī mentions three groups of Murdjī'a: a. those who taught irdjā' regarding faith and free-will; to this group belonged Ḥaillān Abū N-rwān al-Dimashqī, Abū Shāmīr, Muḥammad b. Abī Shāhib al-Baṣrī; b. those who taught irdjā' regarding faith and compulsion (djabr); c. those who gave faith the pre-eminence before works and belonged neither to the adherents of the doctrine of free will nor to those of predetermination; to the latter group belonged the followers of Yūnus b. 'Awn, Ghassān, Abū Thawbān, Abū Mu'adh al-Tawmānī, Bishr b. Ghaiyāth al-Marīsī [q. v.]. The followers of Ghassān reckoned Abū Ḥanīfa as one of their friends, not, however, quite rightly, according to al-Baghḍādī. That Abū Ḥanīfa shared the general views of the Murdjī'a, appears from his (unedited) letter to al-Battī, which is preserved in a MS. in the library of Cairo.

Although al-Baghḍādī mentions a ḥadīth in which the Murdjī'a are cursed, the high esteem in which Abū Ḥanīfa stood as a dogmatist and as a doctor of the law would be in itself sufficient proof of the fact that the "sect" was not too eccentric. As a matter of fact, their political quietism was largely practised by orthodoxy itself. As regards eschatological punishment, the Fikḥ Akbar, ii. (art. 14) rejects the Murdjī'i doctrine of our good deeds being accepted and of our sins being forgiven, Allāh being free to punish the sinner or to grant him forgiveness. — The same 'aḳida, however, shares the Murdjī'i doctrine of the constancy of faith (art. 18).

MURGHĀB. [See MERW AL-SHĀHIDJĀN.]

MURĪD, novice, the term applied during his period of preparation to one who wishes to enter a derwish order [ṬARIQA; q. v.; cf. also DERWISH] or a guild [ṢINF; q. v.]. The task of the murid and his obligations to his master (shaikh, pir) and to his ideal and their mystic and erotic foundations have been often and fully discussed, so that it is here sufficient to give a reference to the most important literature of modern times, which will guide one to the sources themselves. In the wider application of the word murid has become a term for mystic in general.

AL-MŪRIYĀNĪ, ABŪ AIYŪB SULAIMĀN AL-KHŪZĪ, vizier of the caliph al-Manṣūr. When the governor of Fārs Sulaimān b. Ḥabīb al-Muhallabī in the Umayyad period had the future caliph al-Manṣūr, who was accused of embezzling state funds, flogged and intended to treat him with still greater indignity, the latter was saved by Abū Aiyūb al-Mūriyānī who was Sulaimān's secretary. According to another story, al-Manṣūr purchased him as a young boy and sent him in some capacity to his brother, the caliph al-Saffāh, who was so pleased with him that he at once took him into his service and retained him there after his manumission. Al-Mūriyānī was in any case appointed vizier by al-Manṣūr in succession to Khālīd b. Barmak. He had a great influence over the caliph; in 153 (770) however, he was arrested with his brother and the latter's sons and deprived of all his property. According to some, his crime was that he had embezzled a large sum received from al-Manṣūr to make a district in Khūzistān arable and deceived the caliph when he came to inspect it by making the place look as if it were cultivated. According to others, he had a son of al-Manṣūr murdered. He died in prison in 154 (770/1). — The nisba al-Mūriyānī comes from Mūriyān, a town in Khūzistān.

MURSAL (A.), part. pass. IV from arsala "to send". As a technical term it denotes a. an apostle of Allāh; b. traditions of which the isnad is defective in a certain sense; cf. ḤADĪTH, iii. c.

AL-MURSALĀT, title of sūra lxxvii., after the first verse: "By those which are sent by Allāh, following one another in a continual series". According to some interpreters a certain group of angels is meant here; according to others, however, the mursalāt are the verses of the Qur'ān. See the commentaries on the Qur'ān on sūra lxxvii. i.

MURSHIDĀBĀD, district in the Presidency Division of Bengal; area 2,143 sq. m.; pop. 1,372,274, of whom 713,152 are Muslims. The public offices are at Barhāmpūr, but the old capital is at Murshidābād, which before Murshid Kuli's appointment was known as Makhsūsābād or Makhsūdābād. The district is mainly agricultural, and produces much rice, jute, etc., and is famous for its mangoes. The silk industry was formerly of great importance, but has now much declined. The district played a very prominent part in the history of Bengal, and is full of historical sites though Plassey is now outside its borders. The history of Calcutta and of the English in Bengal is intimately connected with Murshidābād. But the Nawābs are no longer of political importance.

While the authorship of the Nahḍ al-Balāgha must remain open the anthology Taif al-Khayāl is to be ascribed to our author and not with Derenbourg, Cat. Escur., N^o. 348 to his brother, as in the preface he quotes his own work mentioned under N^o. 7. He and not his brother as in the article SHARĪF PASHA is to be credited with the Madjāsāt al-Kur'an, which Ḥādjdji Khalifa N^o. 11377 ascribes as al-Madjāsāt to al-Raḍī and he is probably also the author of the Kitāb al-Madjāsāt al-nabawiya, also ascribed to al-Raḍī and extant in a manuscript in the British Museum (s. Oriental Studies presented to E. G. Browne, p. 137, N^o. 2) and was printed at Baghdād in 1328. This also holds of the Kitāb Ma'ānī al-Kur'an, there quoted but now lost. The Turkish commentary on the Diwān ascribed to 'Alī also credits him with the authorship.

MURTADD (A.), "one who turns back", especially from Islām, an apostate. Apostacy is called irtidād or ridda; it may be committed verbally by denying a principle of belief or by an action, for example treating a copy of the Qur'an with disrespect.

1. In the Qur'an the apostate is threatened with punishment in the next world only; the "wrath of God" will fall upon him according to a Sūra of the latest Meccan period (xvi. 108 sq.) and severe punishment (adhāb) "except he did it under compulsion and his heart is steadfast in belief". Similarly it is written in the Medina Sūra iii. 80 sqq.: "... This is the punishment for them, that the curse of Allāh, the Angels and of men is upon them for all time (82); the punishment shall not be lightened for them and they shall not be granted alleviation, (83) except for those who later repent and make good their fault, for Allāh is forgiving and merciful. (84) Those who disbelieve after believing and increase in unbelief, shall not have their repentance accepted; they are the erring ones. (85) Those who are unbelievers and die as unbelievers, from none of them shall be accepted the earth-full of gold even if he should wish to ransom himself with it; this is a painful punishment for them and there will be no helpers for them" (cf. also iv. 136; v. 59; ix. 67). Sūra ii. 214 is to be interpreted in the same way although it is adduced by Šhāfi' as the main evidence for the death penalty: "... He among you who falls away from his belief and dies an unbeliever — these, their works are fruitless in this world and the next, and they are the companions of the fire for ever".

2. There is little echo of these punishments in the next world in the Traditions (cf. Ibn Mādja, Hudūd, bāb 2; Ibn Ḥanbal, i. 409, 430, 464 sq.; v. 4, 5). Instead we have in many traditions a new element, the death penalty. Thus Ibn 'Abbās transmits an utterance of the Prophet: "Slay him, who changes his religion" or "behead him" (Ibn Mādja, Hudūd, bāb 2; Nasā'i, Tahrim al-Dam, bāb 14; Tayālīsī, N^o. 2689; Mālik, Aḳḏiya, tr. 15; cf. also Bukhārī, Istīṭābat al-Murtaddīn, bāb 2; Tirmidhī, Ḥudūd, bāb 25; Abū Dāwūd, Ḥudūd, bāb 1; Ibn Ḥanbal, i. 217, 282, 322). According to another tradition of Ibn 'Abbās and 'Ā'isha, the Prophet is said to have permitted the blood to be shed of him "who abandons his religion and separates himself from the community (Ḍjamā'a)" (Bukhārī, Ḍiyāt, bāb 6; Muslim, Ḳasāma, tr. 25, 26; Nasā'ī, Tahrim al-Dam, bāb 5, 14; Ḳasāma, bāb 6; Ibn Māḏja, Ḥudūd, bāb 1; Abū Dāwūd, Ḥudūd, bāb 1; Tirmidhī, Ḍiyāt, bāb 10; Fitan, bāb 1; Ibn Ḥanbal, i. 382, 444). But there was no agreement from the first on the nature of the death penalty; thus 'Ikrima (d. 106 = 724) and Anas b. Mālik (d. 91 = 710) criticise 'Alī for having burned apostates (Bukhārī, Istīṭābat al-Murtaddīn, bāb 2; Tirmidhī, Ḥudūd, bāb 25; Abū Dāwūd, Ḥudūd, bāb 1; Ibn Ḥanbal, i. 217; according to a variant the reference is to Zindīks or Zuṭī, who served idols; Nasā'ī, Tahrim al-Dam, bāb 14; Ibn Ḥanbal, i. 282, 322). According to a tradition of 'Ā'isha's, apostates are to be slain, crucified or banished (Nasā'ī, Tahrim al-Dam, bāb 11; Ḳasāma, bāb 13; Abū Dāwūd, Ḥudūd, bāb 1).

On the question whether the apostate should be given an opportunity to repent, traditions differ. According to one tradition of Abū Burda (d. 104 = 722), Mu'adh b. Ḍjābal refused to sit down until an apostate brought before him had been slain "in accordance with the decision of God and of his apostle" (Bukhārī, Maḡhāzī, bāb 60; Istīṭābat al-Murtaddīn, bāb 2; Aḳḏam, bāb 12; Muslim, Imāra, tr. 15; Abū Dāwūd, Ḥudūd, bāb 1; Ibn Ḥanbal, v. 231). In the same tradition in Abū Dāwūd however, it is added that they had tried in vain for 20 nights to convert the apostate. The caliph 'Omar is also represented as disapproving of this proceeding with the words: "Did you then not shut him up for three days and give him a round loaf (raghīf) daily and try to induce him to repent. Perhaps he would have repented and returned to obedience to God. O God! I was not there, I did not order it and I do not approve; see, it was thus reported to me" (Mālik, Aḳḏiya, tr. 15). There are also traditions according to which God does not accept the repentance of an apostate (Ibn Ḥanbal, v. 2 sqq.) and others according to which even the Prophet forgave apostates (Nasā'ī, Tahrim al-Dam, bāb 14, 15; Abū Dāwūd, Ḥudūd, bāb 1; Ibn Ḥanbal, i. 247; Ṭabari, Tafsīr, iii. 223).

3. a. In the Fīḡh there is unanimity that the male apostate must be put to death, but only if he is grown up (bāligh) and compos mentis ('āqīl) and has not acted under compulsion (mukhtār). A woman on the other hand is imprisoned, according to Ḥanafī and Shī'ī teaching, until she again adopts Islām, while according to al-Awzā'ī, Ibn Ḥanbal (Tirmidhī, Ḥudūd, bāb 25), the Mālikīs and Shāfi'īs (cf. Umm, i. 131, where Shāfi'ī vigorously attacks Abū Yūsuf who is not mentioned by name) she also is put to death. Although this punishment is not properly ḥadd (cf. thereon Shāfi'ī, Umm, vii. 330, 20-22) it is regarded as such by some jurists, as it is a question of a ḥaḳḳ Allāh (cf. e.g. Sarakhshī, Siyar, iv. 162); therefore the execution of the punishment lies with the imām; in the case of a slave however, the mawlā can carry it out, as with any other ḥadd punishment. Execution should be by the sword. According to the above traditions, apostates must sometimes have been tortured to death. The caliph 'Omar II had them tied to a post and a lance thrust into their hearts (Abū Yūsuf, Ḳharāḏī, p. 112). Bāḏjūrī expressly forbids any form of torture, like burning, drowning, strangling, impaling, flaying; according to him, Sulṭān Baibars (708-709 = 1308-1309) was the first to introduce torture (Snouck Hurgronje, Verspr. Geschriften, ii. 198). Lane (Manners and Customs, ch. iii., near the end) records the case of a woman who had apostatised and was led through the streets of Cairo on an ass, then strangled in a boat in the middle of the Nile and thrown into the river. [The throwing of the corpse into the Nile was already usual in Cairo in the Fāṭimid period; cf. Mez, Renaissance d. Isl., p. 29]. In quite recent times followers of the Ḳāḏyānī or Aḡmadiya sect in Afghānistān were stoned to death (O.M., v. [1925], 138). In former Turkish territory and Egypt as well as in Muslim lands under European rule since the middle of the sixteenth century, under European influence the execution of an apostate on a ḳāḏī's sentence has been abolished, but we still have imprisonment and deportation (cf. Isabel Burton, The inner Life of Syria, London 1875, i. 180 sqq.); but nevertheless renegades are not sure of their lives as their Muslim relatives endeavour secretly to dispose of them by poison or otherwise. Occasionally modern Islāmic writers (Aḡmadiya movement) endeavour to prove that Islām knows of no death penalty for apostasy; the Indian apologist Muḡammad 'Alī lays great stress on the fact there is not once an indication of the death penalty in the Ḳur'ān (Zwemer, The Law of Apostasy, in Islām, p. 17, 37 sq., London 1924; O.M., v. [1925], 262).

I should like here to call attention to an agreement which is probably not accidental. As in Islām, in addition to apostasy, unchastity and unnatural vice (even by stoning are punished by death) according to both Shāfi'īs and Mālikīs, as well as blaspheming God or a prophet and magic, we find in Islām all crimes punished by death which in the Mishna (Sanhedrin, vii. 4) are threatened with stoning.

b. Whether attempts at conversion must be made is a question of ikhtilāf. A number of jurists of the first and second (viith and viiith) centuries deny this (as do the Zāhiris) or like 'Aṭā' (d. 115 = 733) make a distinction between the apostate born in Islām and one converted to Islām; the former is to be put to death at once (so also the Shī'īs). Others insist on three attempts at conversion (relying on Sūra iv. 136; cf. Ṭabari, Tafsīr, v. 193 sq.) or have him in the first place imprisoned for three days (cf. above 2). According to others again one should await the round of the five times of prayer and ask him to perform the ṣalāt at each; only when he has refused at each is the death punishment to be enforced. If however he repents and professes Islām once more, he is released (cf. thereon Shāfi'ī, Umm, i. 228; Abū Yūsuf, Ḳharāḏī, p. 109). In later times istitāba was always applied.

c. Apart from the fact that apostasy deprives the murtadd of burial with Muslim rites it has certain civil consequences. The property of the murtadd is fai' according to Shāfi'ī and the Mālikīs; if the fugitive murtadd returns penitent, he is given back what remains (cf. Umm, i. 231 sqq., where Shāfi'ī opposes the contrary Ḥanafī view). Others, especially later Shāfi'īs, regard the rights of ownership of the apostate as suspended (maw-kūf) and regard him as one who is under guardianship (maḥdīr); only if the fugitive apostate dies in the dār al-ḥarb, does his property become faī (Shirāzī, Muḥaddḥab, Cairo 1343, ii. 240; cf. Shāfiʿī, Umm, vii. 355). Among the Ḥanafis and Shāfiʿis the estate is allotted by the qāḍī to the legal heirs (cf. also the traditions in Dārimī, Farāʿid, bāb 40), the mudabbār and umm walad are set free, even when the apostate escapes into the dār al-ḥarb, for this is equivalent to his death. If he comes back penitent, however, he receives of his property what still exists; the heirs however are not liable for compensation. — The marriage of the murtadd is void (bāṭil). Of his legal undertakings the istilād is effective (nāfiḍ), i. e. the umm walad becomes free; the kitāba also continues. Other legal activities, like manumission, endowment, testament, sale are suspended (maw-kūf) according to Abū Ḥanifa; according to Abū Yūsuf they are effective as in the case of a penitent in good health, according to Muḥammad al-Shaibānī however only as in the case of an invalid, i. e. they cannot deal with more than one third of the estate. In the case of the female apostate however, they are always effective. If the apostate makes such legal arrangements after his flight into the dār al-ḥarb, they are invalid (Sarakhṣī, Siyar, iv. 152; cf. also Abū Yūsuf, Kharāj, p. 111). But since according to Shāfiʿī and Mālik his whole estate becomes faī, such legal arrangements are invalid; only the manumission of a slave remains suspended until his possible return penitent; in the case of his death also this slave becomes faī (cf. however above the view of later Shāfiʿis).

He is punished for crimes committed before apostasy, if he returns penitent; for crimes committed during ridḍa, no notice is taken of the ḥukūkh Allāh (i. e. no ḥadd) but only of the ḥukūkh al-ʿibād, and he must for example pay the diyya (Sarakhṣī, Siyar, iv. 163, 208 sq.; cf. Shāfiʿī, Umm, i. 231).

MŪSĀ, the prophet Moses of the Bible.

1. In the Qurʾān. Muḥammad regards Mūsā as his predecessor, his model, and believes he had already been foretold by Mūsā (vii. 156); his religion is also Mūsā's religion (xlii. 11). Mūsā is also conceived in Muḥammad's image. Charges are brought against him similar to those made against Muḥammad he is said to want to pervert people from the faith of their fathers, (x. 79); he practises magic (xxviii. 18). Mūsā and Hārūn seem rather to be sent to the stubborn Pharaoh than to the believing Israelites. Revelation is granted him: tawrāt, kitāb, furqān, ṣuḥuf (ii. 50; xxi. 49; liii. 37; lxxxvii. 19), illumination, instruction and guidance. The picture of him is made up of Biblical, Haggadic and new elements. Mūsā is exposed, watched by his sister, refuses the milk of other nurses and is suckled by his own mother. Coming to the assistance of a hard pressed Israelite he kills an Egyptian but repents of this crime to which Satan had tempted him. He is pursued and escapes to Madyan. At a well there he waters the flocks of the two daughters of a shaikh. One of them invites him home modestly. He receives her as his wife at the price of 8—10 years service. This preliminary history is told in Sūra xxviii. 1—28; the mission itself is often mentioned.

Mūsā receives from the burning bush in the holy valley of Ṭuwan (xx. 12; lxxix. 16) orders to take off his shoes, the message to Pharaoh, the signs of his mission, the rod, the snake, the hand that becomes white. His speech is difficult to understand (xliii. 52); Hārūn accompanies him as wazīr (xx. 30; xxv. 37). Pharaoh reproaches Mūsā with ingratitude, saying he had been brought up by them (xxvi. 17). Pharaoh assembles his magicians but their rods are devoured by Mūsā's. The magicians profess their belief in God and are mutilated in punishment (vii. 106—123; xx. 59—78; xxvi. 36—51). Pharaoh wishes prayers to be offered to him as God, orders Hāmān to build him a tower so that he can reach the God of Mūsā (xxviii. 38; xl. 38). Mūsā performs nine miracles (xvii. 103; xx. 59—78; xxvii. 12). These are: 1. the rod and snake; 2. white hand; 3. deluge; 4. locusts; 5. lice; 6. frogs; 7. blood; 8. darkness; 9. dividing the sea (cf. e. g. Ṭabari, ed. de Goeje, i. 485).

Mūsā spends 30 and 10 nights with God (vii. 138). He brings instruction and admonition on the tablets. In his absence Sāmīrī makes the lowing golden calf (vii. 146; xx. 79—98). Mūsā breaks the tablets. He desires to see God. God crumbles the hill to dust (vii. 139). Israel fears war and has to wander 40 years in the wilderness (v. 24—29). Mūsā's enemies, Qārūn (Korah), Pharaoh and Hāmān, perish (xxix. 38).

Some details differ from the Biblical story. Instead of Pharaoh's daughter, it is his wife who rescues the infant; instead of seven shepherdesses Mūsā assists two. Instead of ten plagues, Muḥammad speaks of nine miracles. Mūsā strikes twelve springs out of the rock, one for each tribe (ii. 57, a memory of the twelve springs of Elīm, Exodus xv. 27). The divergence is greater when Hāmān is made minister to Pharaoh. Then there are new features: Mūsā repents of having slain the Egyptian. Mūsā sees the burning bush at night and desires to take a brand from its fire for his house (xx. 10; xxviii. 29). Pharaoh's magicians die for their belief in God.

The following seems to originate in Haggada: God forbids the infant to be suckled by an Egyptian mother (xxviii. 11). In the Haggada Moses is offered to all Egyptian suckling mothers; but the mouth that is to speak with God cannot imbibe anything impure (Sōṭa, 12^b). That God tilts the mountain over Israel (ii. 60, 87; vii. 170) is explained from the Haggada: Israel hesitated to accept the Tora and God tilted Sinai over them: Tora or death (Sabbath, 80^a; ʿAboda Zara, 2^b). The turning of the sabbath breakers into apes (ii. 61; iv. 50; v. 65; vii. 166) recalls the Haggada in which the builders of the tower of Babel become apes (Sanhedrin, 109^a). Qārūn is represented as an exceedingly rich man the keys of whose treasure can hardly be carried by many strong men (xviii. 76, 79); the Haggada says that Korah found a hidden Egyptian treasure; 300 mules carried the keys of his treasury (Pesachim, 119^a; Sanhedrin, 110^a; Pal. Sanh., x. 27^d; Ginzberg, Legends, vi. 99, 560). — The Qur'anic story of a believer at the court of Pharaoh who wants to save Mūsā is not quite clear (xl. 29). Ought we to compare Jethro in the Haggada who advises clemency at Pharaoh's court? (Sōṭa, 11^a; Sanhedrin, 106^a; Ginzberg, v. 392, 21; v. 412, 101).

The story of Mūsā accompanying a wise man on a journey seems without parallel (xviii. 59—81). The attempt is often made to distinguish this Mūsā of Khadir as Mūsā b. Manasse from Mūsā b. 'Imrān [cf. the article KHADIR].

2. Mūsā in post-Qur'anic legend. The histories of the prophet (especially Tha'labi's) supplement the Qur'anic story with much from the Bible, Haggada and folklore.

Much is added from Haggada. Pharaoh's sick daughters are cured as soon as they touch Moses's cradle. Exodus Rabba, i. 23 makes Pharaoh's daughter be cured of leprosy. — The infant Mūsā scratches Pharaoh's chin. Pharaoh wants to slay him. On the intercession of Āsiya he tests him by putting gold and jewels on one side and burning coals on the other. Mūsā reaches for the gold but Gabriel directs his hand to the burning coal. Mūsā puts his burned hand on his tongue and therefore becomes a stammerer (Ginzberg, v. 402, 65; Hamilton, Zeitschr. f. germanische Philologie, xxxvi. 125—159).

Elements of other legends are woven into the legend of Mūsā. The Ibrāhīm-Namrūd legend supplies the following features: Pharaoh frightened by dreams persecutes the infants; Mūsā is hidden from the assassins in the burning oven but the fire becomes cool and does him no harm. Pharaoh orders prayers to be offered to himself as to a god, has a tower built, shoots an arrow against heaven; the arrow comes back blood-stained and Pharaoh boasts he has slain God (Tabari, i. 469). — From the story of Jacob and Laban come the following: Mūsā serves 8—10 years for his wife (xxviii. 27). His father-in-law offers him the spotted lambs born in his flock and the ewes for the watering troughs bear spotted lambs (Tha'labi, p. 112). There are frequent references to a pious Egyptian woman who is martyred by Pharaoh with her seven children, the youngest of whom is still at its mother's breast (in Tha'labi, p. 118, 139); this is of course modelled on the martyr mother of the Maccabees.

There are many fanciful embellishments, e.g. the miracle of the snakes, the plagues, the scenes on the Red Sea; Moses's rod in particular plays a great part. It came from Paradise; Ādam, Hābil, Shīth, Idris, Nūh, Hūd, Šālih, Ibrāhīm, Ism'īl, Ishāk and Ya'qūb had previously used it (Kisā'i, p. 208). In Tabari (p. 460 sq.) an angel brought the rod. Mūsā obtained it from his wife; his father-in-law quarrels with him about its ownership and an angel decides in favour of Mūsā. It is a miraculous rod and Tha'labi (p. 111—116) in particular relates the wonders it performs. It shines in the darkness; it gives water in a drought, and placed in the ground it becomes a tree bearing fruit; it produces milk and honey and fragrant scent; against an enemy it becomes a double dragon. It pierces mountains and rocks; it leads over rivers and sea; it is also a shepherd's staff and keeps beasts of prey from the herds of Moses. When Mūsā was asleep on one occasion the rod slew a dragon, on another occasion seven of Pharaoh's assassins.

The varied Biblical, Haggadic, legendary and fairy tale features in the Islāmic legend of Mūsā are thus blended into a very full picture and in Tha'labi form a regular romance.

MÜSÄ B. NUŞAIR B. 'ABD AL-RAḤMĀN B. ZAID AL-LAKHMĪ (or AL-BAKRĪ) ABU 'ABD AL-RAḤMĀN, Arab governor, conqueror of the western Maghrib and of Spain. He was born in 19 (640); his father had been in the immediate entourage of Mu'āwiyā [q. v.]. Mūsā was at first appointed by the caliph 'Abd al-Malik to collect the kharāj at al-Baṣra, but having been suspected of embezzlement, he fled and took refuge with the caliph's brother, the governor of Egypt 'Abd al-'Azīz b. Marwān; the latter took Mūsā to Syria to the caliph who fined him 100,000 dinārs. 'Abd al-'Azīz provided half of this sum for Mūsā and brought him to Egypt where he gave him the governorship of Ifrīkiya which had been previously held by Ḥassān b. al-Nu'mān. The various chroniclers are not agreed as to the date of his appointment to the office but it possibly took place in 79 (698) or the following year.

Mūsā and his troops thereupon entered on a career of successful conquest which ended in the consolidation of Arab power in Ifrīkiya and in the conquest of the rest of north Africa and of Spain. Here we give only the most essential details. Assisted by his son 'Abd Allāh al-Marwān he sent successful expeditions against Zaghwān and Saḍjūma and reduced the Hawwāra, the Zanāta and the Kutāma. The Berbers taking refuge in the west of the Maghrib, Mūsā decided to bring them to subjection; confirmed in his office by 'Abd al-Malik's successor al-Walid, he continued his advance to Tangier and Sūs [q. v.] and returned to Ifrīkiya leaving as his deputy in the Maghrib his freedman Ṭāriḳ [q. v.]. The latter in 92 (710—711) invaded Spain and Mūsā anxious about and at the same time jealous of the progress made by his lieutenant crossed himself in the following year leaving his son 'Abd Allāh as governor of Ifrīkiya. Landing at Algeciras in Ramaḍān 93 (June—July 712) with his other son 'Abd al-'Azīz, he refused to take the same route as Ṭāriḳ and taking the towns of Sidona (Shadhūna; q. v.), Carmona, Seville and Merida, he was on his way to Toledo when Ṭāriḳ came to meet him and was bitterly reproached by his master. Mūsā b. Nuṣair then continued his march and completely subjugated the north of Spain from Saragossa to Navarre. In 95, he left Spain with immense booty, leaving his son 'Abd al-'Azīz as governor; he reached Kairawān at the end of the year and continued by land to Syria in a triumphal procession of Arab chiefs and Berber and Spanish prisoners. The caliph al-Walid then near his end urged him to hurry while his brother and heir presumptive Sulaimān, eager to appropriate the vast wealth brought by Musā, tried to delay him. He arrived in Damascus shortly before the death of al-Walid and when Sulaimān assumed power he at once displayed his hatred of the conqueror. Regarding Musā b. Nušair's stay in Syria before his death in 98 (716—717), the Arab historians give a number of details which are obviously of quite a legendary character.

Bibliography: All the Muslim chroniclers who deal with the conquest of Africa and Spain deal more or less fully with Musā b. Nušair. We may mention among the more important: Ibn 'Abd al-Ḥakam, Futūḥ Miṣr, ed. Torrey, Yale Univ. Press, 1922; Ibn al-Ḳūṭiyya, Iftitāḥ al-Andalus, ed. Ribera; Akhbār maǧmū'a, ed. Lafuente y Alcántara; Ibn 'Idhārī, al-Bayān al-mughrib, ed. Dozy, i. and ii.; Ibn al-Aṭṭir, Kāmil, etc. — Biographical notes on Musā b. Nušair are given by Ibn Khallikān, Wafayāt al-A'yān, iii. 475; Ibn al-Farāǧī, Ta'riḫ 'Ulamā' al-Andalus, in B. A. H., viii., No. 1454; al-Dabbī, Bughyat al-Multamis, in *B. A. MUSĀ ĆELEBI, one of the younger sons of the Ottoman sultān Bāyazīd I. According to some sources he was younger than his brother Muḥammad I [q. v.], who is generally considered as the youngest. Musā had been taken prisoner in the battle of Angora (1402) and was left by Timūr in custody with the Germiyan Oghlū Ya'kūb Beg. The latter sent him afterwards to his brother Muḥammad in Amasia, and for some time he became Muḥammad's helper in the re-establishment of Ottoman power in Anatolia; he is even said to have driven their brother 'Isā from Brusa, though the current opinion is that Muḥammad went there himself. When, in 1404, their eldest brother Sulaimān Ćelebi appeared in his turn in Brusa, Musā first opposed him in the name of Muḥammad and went afterwards, with the latter's consent, to Europe, where he hoped to make an end of Sulaimān's reign with the aid of Mirče of Walachia and Stephan of Serbia. At first this enterprise failed through a defeat inflicted on Musā near the walls of Constantinople. Sulaimān resided in Adrianople. Here Musā appeared suddenly in 1411 (or 1410); Sulaimān had to flee and was killed on his way to Constantinople, after which Musā took his place as ruler of the Ottoman territory in Europe, surrounded by the military and political councillors of Sulaimān, as Ewrenos Beg and the Djandarlı Oghlu Ibrāhīm Paṣa. Musā began his short reign with great energy, recovering nearly all the Ottoman possessions in Serbia and Thessaly, and sending raiding expeditions as far as Carinthia. At the same time he adopted a despotic attitude which displeased his entourage and prepared the final victory of his brother Muḥammad. Ibrāhīm Paṣa, sent to Constantinople to exact tribute, went from there to Muḥammad's court (cf. Taeschner and Wittek, in Isl., xviii. 94) and, when Musā soon afterwards began a siege of Constantinople, Muḥammad came to the rescue of the emperor. In this he failed for the moment and he was obliged to return to Anatolia. But in 1413 Muḥammad appeared again in Europe, having found allies in the Serbians. Meanwhile, the Turkish commanders in Serbia and Thessaly were drawn to Muḥammad's side and even the old Ewrenos prepared to leave Musā's cause; his son and other military chiefs went over openly to Muḥammad. The latter approached Adrianople from the north and followed from here Musā's army beyond Philip; polis; then he joined his allies in Serbia and met Musā's army on the plain of Čamurlu, east of Sofia. Here Musā's army was defeated (July 1413) and Musā himself perished in the flight. His corpse was found and buried in the türbe of Murād I in Brusa.

MUSĀ, ABŪ MUḤAMMAD AL-HADĪ, an 'Ab-bāsīd caliph. After the death of his father on Muḥarram 22, 169 (Aug. 4, 785) al-Hādī ascended the throne and at once put an end to the influence of his mother al-Khaizurān, by forbidding her to interfere in the slightest in matters of state. When he proposed to exclude his brother Ḥārūn from the succession in favour of his son Dja'far, he met with vigorous opposition from the Barmakid Yahyā b. Khālīd [q. v.]. When the latter boldly persisted in his opposition, he was arrested; but the caliph's plan came to nothing for he died suddenly in Rabi' I 170 (Sept. 786) in 'Isābādh near Baghdad. According to the usual but not at all certain story, he was poisoned or stabbed by his mother's orders. Al-Hādī who was only 26 when he died is described as brave, just, liberal and full of joie-de-vivre. The most important event of his brief reign was an 'Alid rising in Mecca and Medīna. 'Omar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz, the governor of Medīna, had punished an 'Alid along with some other citizens of the town for drinking wine. As a result the 'Alids rebelled and renounced their allegiance to the caliph. After several days fighting the ringleader of the movement, a descendant of 'Alī called al-Husain b. 'Alī, marched on Mecca where he obtained a number of additional followers. Soon afterwards the pilgrims arrived; at Fakḥkh near Mecca, a battle took place and al-Husain was killed (Dhu 'l-Ḥiǧǧa 169 = June 786). As regards the fighting with the Byzantines, the Muslims under Ma'yūf b. Yahyā invaded Asia Minor where they took much booty.

MÜSĀ AL-KĀZIM the seventh Imām of the Twelfer Shī'a, son of Dja'far b. Muḥammad al-Ṣādīq [q.v.], was born about 128 (745) at al-Abwā' [q.v.], the traditional burial-place of Āmina, mother of the Prophet. He grew to manhood in his father's house in Medina and remained there as Imām after the latter's death in 148 (765) without playing any part in politics. In particular he took no share in the great rising of the Hasanid 'Alids which collapsed at Fakhkh in 169 (786). Nevertheless the caliph was suspicious of him. He was perhaps already imprisoned by al-Mahdī. In 179 (795) Hārūn had him brought first to Baṣra and then to Baghdad; he is said to have been released for a time but he died in prison in Raḍjab 183 (Aug.—Sept. 799).

Little attention was paid to Mūsā outside the Shī'a, but we find him occasionally, as the Shī'is point out, quoted as an authority, for example for a strongly pro-'Alid tradition in Aḥmad b. Ḥanbal, Musnad, i. 77 infra (cf. al-Dhahabī, Mizān al-Fīdāl, No. 1835). The Shī'a records are more voluminous. He is said to have had the honorific al-Kāzīm "he who restrains his anger" because he returned kindness for injury to an opponent so that the latter came over to him. As evidence of his fitness for the imāmate he is reputed to have had a great knowledge of fiqh and is thus brought into connection with Abū Ḥanīfa. The chapters on miracles, usual in all biographies of the imāms, credit him with being born with a knowledge of languages, e.g. Ethiopic and the language of birds, in later stories also of "Frankish" to fit a story, modelled on a later Kerbelā' motif, that Hārūn could not find a Muslim to assassinate him and therefore brought Franks, who were so impressed by his nobility that they refused to kill him. Prayers by Mūsā have been handed down; a letter of warning to al-Husain b. 'Alī b. al-Ḥasan, the leader of the Fakhkh rising; letters from prison; a statement of his claims to the imāmate against Hārūn through relationship with the Prophet, not through 'Alī like the 'Abbāsids through 'Abbās but through Fāṭima, whom he compares with the mother of Jesus. Considerable portions of the biography are the result of the disputes within the Shī'a, even the account of his conception and birth. That his mother was bought from a slave dealer is not disputed; but great pains are devoted to proving she was a virgin. When at the death of his father a group of the Nāwusiya "remained" steadfast to him, the Ismā'īliya [q.v.] and the Fathīya branched off, the claims of Mūsā had to be based on a will of Dja'far, the authenticity of which is as doubtful as that of Mūsā in favour of his son 'Alī al-Riḍā; this was used against the followers of another son Aḥmad, as well as against the Mamfūra who "remained" by Mūsā himself and a similar party in the Mūsawiya (Mūsā'iya; for details see the writers on heresy, especially al-Ash'ari, Maḳālāt, ed. Ritter, Constantinople 1930, p. 25 sqq.). The dispute with the latter groups also explains the very detailed stories of witnesses who had seen Mūsā's corpse. Bitter differences of opinion within the family are revealed by the fact that even Mūsā's son Ibrāhīm for a long time denied his father's death, and also by the fact that Mūsā's brother Ibrāhīm or a nephew 'Alī b. Ismā'īl played the traitor with Hārūn, inciting him by pointing out the great sums which were given to Mūsā as the true caliph by his followers; on the other hand, the incautious acknowledgment of Mūsā's imāmate by the theologian Hishām b. al-Ḥakam is made responsible for his capture. — The kunya of Mūsā is Abū Ibrāhīm or Abū 'l-Ḥasan, also Abū 'Alī; the statements regarding the number of his children vary between 30 and 60; 37 is the usual figure. Besides his successor 'Alī al-Riḍā some prominence was attained by the partial imām Aḥmad, but more by Zaid, who at the time of the great rising of Abū 'l-Sarāyā in Baṣra, by burning the houses and followers of the 'Abbāsids acquired the name Zaid al-Nār, "Zaid of the fire" (Tabarī, iii. 986), and Ibrāhīm, who on account of similar activities in Ṣan'ā' was called al-Djazzār, "the butcher" (Tabarī, iii. 987); a daughter Fāṭima, who died in Ḳumm, has given to this city in her tomb its most important sanctuary. Mūsā himself was buried in the cemetery of the Kuraish in Baghdad, where his grandson, the ninth imām Muḥammad al-Djawād [q.v.], was in time interred beside him; thus arose the twin sanctuaries al-Kāzīmāin [q.v.]

BANŪ MÜSĀ, more precisely BANŪ MÜSĀ B. SHĀKIR, the usual name for the three brothers Abū Dja'far Muḥammad, Abū 'l-Ḳāsim Aḥmad and al-Ḥasan b. Mūsā b. ShĀkīr, who made a reputation under the 'Abbāsids from al-Ma'mūn to al-Mutawakkil as mathematicians, astronomers and technicians and also at times played a part in politics. The father is said to have begun life as a bandit in Khurāsān, then to have become an astronomer and geometer. We have no means of testing such stories or learning how a bandit could become an astronomer. If we assume however that Mūsā b. Shākīr like Muḥammad b. Mūsā al-Khwarizmi joined al-Ma'mūn's train in Khurāsān as astronomer and astrologist and then came with him to Baghdād, we can understand that al-Ma'mūn took his three sons, still young, into his service on Mūsā's death and had them educated in mathematical sciences by the astronomer Yahyā b. Abī Manṣūr. The Banū Mūsā thus at a comparatively early age were admitted to that circle of scholars who, by their thorough and expert translations, introduced Greek science to Islām and by their own researches laid the foundation for the glorious development of the sciences in the *iii*th (*ix*th) and *iv*th (*x*th) centuries. Attaining fame and fortune, they used their wealth to purchase Greek manuscripts and sent agents into the Byzantine provinces to seek for and purchase books. Of Muḥammad b. Mūsā it is related that he met Thābit b. Qurra in Ḥarrān while on a journey and induced him to settle at the caliph's court. It may be assumed they these scientific expeditions to seek books and scholars did not take place without the caliph's support.

History also records political and literary feuds. A particular enmity is said to have existed between al-Kindī and the three brothers, because the caliph al-Mu'taṣim did not entrust them but al-Kindī with the education of his son Aḥmad. The feud went so far that the Banū Mūsā are later said to have intrigued against the choice of Aḥmad as caliph. This story can only be understood in connection with court intrigues, in which the ambitions of the brothers and the jealousy of the courtiers played the same parts as elsewhere. If all is true that is recorded of the malevolent attitude of the brothers to recognised scholars, little praise can be bestowed on their character. The stories of the huge incomes, especially that of Muḥammad b. Mūsā — he is said to have had for a time an annual income of £300,000 — exceed all that even the most liberal caliph could heap upon a scholar.

The works of the Banū Mūsā include translations and original works on geometry, astronomy and mechanics. Many of their works are written jointly by two or three brothers, others only by one. Muḥammad b. Mūsā is regarded as the most versatile, al-Ḥasan the best mathematician, Aḥmad as specially interested in mechanical and technical problems. The astronomical and metrological observations of the brothers were probably made mainly in Sāmarrā; their tables of observations of the sun are mentioned by Ibn Yūnus. M. Curtze, H. Suter, E. Wiedemann and F. Hauser have devoted special attention to the editing and elucidation of these works that have survived in Arabic or Latin.

MUṢ'AB B. 'UMAIR, a follower of Muḥammad of the Kuraish family of 'Abd al-Dār. The son of rich parents, this handsome young man had attracted attention by his elegant appearance when Muḥammad's preaching made so deep an impression upon him that he abandoned the advantages of his social position to join the despised adherents of the Prophet. Tradition dilates on the contrast between his former luxurious life and later poverty but these, like such stories in general, are somewhat suspicious, although not impossible, since the people in Muṣ'ab's time had not yet acquired wealth and could not have been accustomed to luxury.

When his parents endeavoured to prevent him taking part in the worship of the believers, he went with several of the faithful to Abyssinia from which he returned however before the Hijra. The Prophet thought highly of him and sent him after the first meeting at 'Aḳaba as a missionary to Medina where he won a number of followers for Islām. According to some traditions, he on this occasion, following the practice of the Jews [see MUḤAMMAD], introduced the common Friday salāt, which however, as was noted as early as by Mūsā b. 'Uḳba, others ascribe to the Medinese As'ad b. Zurāra, while others in an effort at harmonising say that As'ad conducted the common salāt during the absence of Muṣ'ab.

At Badr and at Uḥud he carried the Prophet's banner in memory of the old privilege of the 'Abd al-Dār; he met his death in the latter battle. With what ardour he adopted the new teaching is seen from his attitude to his mother who is depicted as a most lovable character and particularly from his words at the capture of his brother in the battle of Badr. His wife was Ḥanna bint Djaḥsh of the Asad.

MUṢ'AB B. AL-ZUBAIR, son of the famous ḥuwārī of the Prophet, al-Zubair, and brother of the anti-Caliph 'Abd Allāh b. al-Zubair. Handsome, chivalrous, generous to the most foolish prodigality, he resembled his elder brother 'Abd Allāh and the family of the *Zubair*s only in his bravery and in fits of severity in exacting punishment which bordered on barbarity. He began his military career at the beginning of the caliphate of Marwān I by a badly planned invasion of Palestine. Later sent as governor to Baṣra by his brother 'Abd Allāh, he soon found himself called to the help of the people of Kūfa, tired of the yoke of Mukhtār b. Abī 'Ubad [q. v.]. He began by putting to flight the army brought against him by the redoubtable Ṭhaḳafī agitator and then besieged him for four months in the citadel of Kūfa. On the death of Mukhtār, Muṣ'ab ordered several thousands of his followers to be executed and by this savage act made as many enemies as the victims had relatives. He was less successful against 'Ubad Allāh b. al-Ḥurr [q. v.] who had been sent into the 'Irāk to stir up a counter-revolution in favour of the Marwānids. A similar attempt at Baṣra by the Umayyad Khālīd b. Asid failed. But by proceeding with great severity against Khālīd's followers Muṣ'ab alienated the most influential personages in the city.

Soon he found he had to defend the 'Irāk which was directly threatened by the Caliph 'Abd al-Malik; troops were massed at Bādjumaira. Muṣ'ab awaited the Syrian army here and then retired to Dair al-Djathālīk [q. v.]. His position soon became critical for the Baṣran troops refused to follow him. The best troops of the province were far away with Muḥallab, engaged in an interminable campaign against the Khārīdjīs. The Zubairid's troops displayed only moderate enthusiasm. His officers tired of his iron hand were prepared to betray him and entered into negotiations with 'Abd al-Malik. The Marwānid was not stingy in his promises. He also tried to negotiate with Muṣ'ab, who learning of the perfidy of his followers rejected all offers and decided to die like a brave man. Among his followers Ibrāhīm b. al-Aṣhtar alone fought vigorously in the battle; the others folded their arms during the fighting or went over to the Syrian ranks. 'Abd al-Malik offered Muṣ'ab his life for the last time with the government of the 'Irāk, but in vain. Thrown from his horse, the Zubairid received the coup-de-grâce from an avenging Bakrī, 'Ubad Allāh b. Zabyān. This took place about the middle of Djumādā I (October) of 72 (691). 'Abd al-Malik wept for him and ordered his poets to commemorate his heroic end. Muṣ'ab's great generosity earned him numerous eulogies from poets. He is also famous for the fact that he had in his harem the two most independent and haughtiest women of the time, belonging to the most undoubted aristocracy of Islām, 'Ā'isha bint Ṭaḥa [q. v.], the second ḥuwārī of the Prophet, and Sukaina, granddaughter of 'Alī; feminine types, remarkable in spite of their frivolity for having bravely tried to fight against the degradation of their sex in Muslim society.

AL-MUSABBIḤĀT, name of sūra's lvii., lix., lxi., lxii., lxiv. as a group, after the first word of each of them, sabbaḥa or yusabbiḥu. The name is old, cf. Muslim, Zakāt, trad. 119.

MUSĀFIRIDS (Kangari or Sallāri), a dynasty of Dailamī origin which came from Tārom [q. v.] and reigned in the fourth and fifth centuries of the Hidjra in Ādharbāidjān, Arrān and Armenia.

Its coming to power was one of the manifestations of the great movement of Irānian liberation which formed a kind of interlude between the end of Arab domination and the first Turkish invasions. While in Khurāsān and Transoxania this movement culminated in the rule of the Sāmānids [q. v.], in western Persia and Mesopotamia its standard-bearers were the Dailamīs and to a smaller extent the Kurds (cf. V. Minorsky, La domination des Dailamites, Paris 1932).

The Musāfirids and the Djūstānids. According to a genuine document quoted in Yāqūt (iii. 148—50), the Kangari family only comes into history after seizing the famous stronghold of Shamīrān in the district of Tārom [q. v.] which was under Kāzwin. The Kangaris have therefore to be distinguished from the ruling family of Dailam, i. e. the Djūstānids of Rūdbār, of whom seven are known from between 189 and 316 (805—928), while members of the family can be traced till 434 (1042). We know that Muḥammad, son of Musāfir, the eponym of the dynasty (whose real Irānian name must have been Aswār; cf. Mas'ūdī, Murūdj, ix. 16), had married Kharāsūya, daughter of the Djūstānid Djūstān III (from 250 until after 300). From such alliances the names peculiar to the ruling family of Dailam (Djūstān, Wahsūdān, Marzubān) became popular among the Musāfirids. In 307 (919) Muḥammad killed his wife's uncle 'Alī b. Wahsūdān to avenge the death of his father-in-law Djūstān b. Wahsūdān. Henceforth there was a breach between the two families. The last Djūstānid took refuge with the Dailamī chief Asfār (lord of Raiy and Kāzwin) who sent the Ziyānid Mardāwīdj against Muḥammad but instead of fighting they joined forces and Mardāwīdj slew Asfār. Muḥammad was an important ruler and Mus'ir b. Muḥalhil speaks with praise of his buildings at Shamīrān (1,850 houses) on which 5,000 workmen were employed (the ruins of Shamīrān have been described in Brugsch, Reise d. preuss. Gesandtschaft, 1862, ii. 471—472) but he was a difficult character and did not agree even with the members of his own family.

The two branches of Musāfirids. In 330 (941) his sons Marzubān and Wahsūdān by arrangement with Kharāsūya, seized Shamīrān and shut their father up in a fortress, after which the dynasty broke up into two branches: Wahsūdān remained in the hereditary fief of Tārom, while Marzubān extended his power over Ādharbāidjān, eastern Transcaucasia and some districts of Armenia.

The fourth generation of the Musāfirids consisted of the sons of Marzubān: Djūstān, Ibrāhīm, Naṣir and Kay Khusrāw, and of the sons of Wahsūdān (330—355): Ismā'il, Nūḥ and Ḥaydar (?)

Marzubān. This ruler (330—346 = 941—957) is the most important figure in the dynasty. After the death in 314 (926) of the Sādjīd [q. v.] Yūsuf, Ādharbāidjān became the scene of the struggle between the Khārīdjī Kurd Daisam b. Ibrāhīm and Lashkarī b. Mardi, a native of Gilān, whom the Ziyārid Wushmagīr supported alternately

Lashkarī died in Armenia and Daisam was betrayed by his vizier Abu 'l-Kāsim 'Alī b. Dja'far who had come to an arrangement with Marzubān for both were bāṭinī (Ibn Miskawaih, ii. 32). Marzubān occupied Ardabil and Tabriz and finally Daisam surrendered to Marzubān and received from him a castle in Tārom. Marzubān extended his territory northward as far as Darband. In 332 (943—944) the Russians (Rūs) came by the Caspian and the river Kur and took the capital of Arrān [q.v.], Barda'a [q.v.], in spite of the resistance of the subjects of Marzubān. At the same time, the Hamdānids of Mawṣil had conceived designs on Ādharbāidjān and Marzubān had to deal with a force under Abū 'Abd Allāh Ḥusain b. Sa'id b. Ḥamdān and the Hadhbānī Kurd Dja'far b. Shakūya, which had reached Salmās [q.v.] but was soon recalled to Mawṣil by Nāṣir al-Dawla. On the other hand, the Russians, decimated by disease and harassed by the Muslims, beat a retreat (cf. the sources on the Russian invasion including the Armenian historian of the tenth century, Moses Katankatvatzi, in Dorn, Caspia, St. Petersburg 1876; the text of Ibn Miskawaih, ii. 62—67, was translated with commentary by Yakubowski in the Vizant. Vremennik, Leningrad 1926, xxiv., p. 63—92).

A new danger arose in the south-east of the lands of Marzubān when in 335 (946) the Būyid Rukn al-Dawla occupied Raiy (disputed by the Sāmānids and Ziyārids). Marzubān filled with wrath at the Būyids decided to attack them in 336. But Rukn had time to get reinforcements from his brothers. In 338 (949) Marzubān, defeated near Ka-zwīn, was besieged in the castle of Sumairam (in Fārs).

The fugitives from his army gathered round his father Muḥammad and occupied Ardabil while Wahsūdān remained in Tārom. Muḥammad soon gave dissatisfaction to his captains and was shut up by Wahsūdān in his castle at Shisagān (?). Rukn al-Dawla sent to Ādharbāidjān Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Razzāk, the former governor of Tūs [q.v.], who had deserted the Sāmānids. Wahsūdān released Daisam in the hope that he would be able to organise resistance. Daisam who had time to take Ardabil, was defeated by Ibn 'Abd al-Razzāk but the latter deserted by the intrigues around him returned to Raiy in 338 (949). Daisam reoccupied Ardabil but the advance of 'Alī b. Mīshkī, a supporter of Marzubān, forced him to seek shelter with the Artsrunids of Waspurakan [cf. wān].

In the meanwhile by an ingeniously planned coup, Marzubān escaped from Sumairam and recovered all his strongholds and treasures (in 342). After a long series of adventures which brought him to Mawṣil, Baghdad and Aleppo, Daisam in 344 (955) collected a force and read the khutba at Salmās in the name of the Hamdānid of Aleppo Saif al-Dawla. Marzubān quickly put down a rising in Darband and later drove Daisam back, who once again sought refuge with the Artsrunids who handed him over to Marzubān under threats from the latter.

In an important passage, Ibn Ḥawqāl, p. 251—255, gives the list of the tributaries of Marzubān compiled by his minister Abu 'l-Kāsim (in 344). The names include those of the lords of Shīrwān, Abkhāz (? uncertain name of a district north of Shīrwān; cf. Marquart, Streifzüge, p. 174: *Abkhān), of Shakki [q.v.], of 𐌎𐌌𐌎, of Djurzān wa-Saghiyān (Gurziwān and Saghiyān to the west of Shīrwān), of Vayots-dzor (district of Siunie), of Ahar and Warzaḡan (N. E. of Tabriz), of Khizān (N. of Bākū?), as well as the Artsrunids, Bagratids and the princes of Khačen (west of Barda'a).

Wahsūdān and his nephews. Marzubān died in Ramaḡān 346 (Dec. 957) and while bequeathing the power to his brother Wahsūdān forgot to cancel his first will by which his sons Djūstān, Ibrāhīm and Nāṣir were to succeed him in succession.

The commanders of the fortresses would not surrender them to Wahsūdān who returned to Tārom in disgust. Djūstān b. Marzubān was recognised by his brothers but was only interested in his harem. Marzubān's old general Djūstān b. Sharmazan set up in Urmiya [q.v.] and won to his side Ibrāhīm, with whom he occupied Marāgha.

In 349 (960) the grandson of the caliph Muktafi Ishāk b. 'Isā rebelled in Gilān and took the name of Mustadjir bi 'llāh. Djūstān and Ibrāhīm became reconciled and defeated the rebels at Muḡān [q.v.].

Wahsūdān began intriguing among his nephews and detached Nāṣir from Djūstān but the quarrel was of short duration. Under assurances from Wahsūdān, Djūstān with his mother and Nāṣir came to Tārom but were thrown into prison. Wahsūdān sent his son Ismā'īl to Ādharbāidjān. Ibrāhīm who was ruling Armenia (Dwin) made a move in 349 or 350 which gave Wahsūdān an excuse to massacre his prisoners. Ismā'īl soon afterwards died at Ardabil after which Ibrāhīm reoccupied Ādharbāidjān and laid Tārom waste while Wahsūdān sought refuge in Dailam. Meanwhile Wahsūdān's general Sharmazan b. Mīshkī, however, succeeded in defeating Ibrāhīm and the latter, abandoned by all his soldiers, sought refuge with his brother-in-law Rukn al-Dawla, who had married a daughter of Marzubān (355 = 966).

Rukn al-Dawla with his usual chivalry heaped favours on Ibrāhīm and sent to Ādharbāidjān his famous minister Ibn al-'Amīd (Ustādh Ra'īs) who reinstated Ibrāhīm and subjected the Kurds and Djūstān b. Sharmazan to him. Ibn al-'Amīd who was much impressed by the wealth of Ādharbāidjān proposed to Rukn al-Dawla to annex this province but his master recalled him to Raiy, saying that he did not wish to be accused of coveting the inheritance of one who had sought his protection. After the return of Ibn al-'Amīd matters went badly and from the allusions in Ibn Miskawaih we know only that Ibrāhīm was deposed and imprisoned (probably about 369 = 979, the year in which the Tadjārib al-Umam stops).

The end of the Musāfirids. In the Muslim sources the situation in Ādharbāidjān till 420 is obscure but the statements of the Armenian historian Stephen Asotik, Hist. Universelle, part ii., book iii., transl. by Macler, Paris 1917, ch. 11, 12, 18, 19, 29, 38 and 41, enable us to fill the gaps. According to Kasrawī, in 369 (979) Ibrāhīm b. Marzubān was dispossessed of his lands in Ādharbāidjān by the Rawwādi family (on which see the articles MARĀGHA, MARAND, TABRİZ and Kasrawī, op. cit., ii.). The son of Ibrāhīm Abu 'l-Haidjā (the "Abihadj Delmastani" of Asotik) retained Dwin [q.v.] and on the invitation of king Mushel of Kars in 982—983 made an expedition into Armenia where he desecrated the churches. This Abihadj later lost all his lands to his neighbour Abutluḡ of Goṭṭh (i. e. Abū Dulaf Shaibānī, lord of Ordūbād). He later wandered in Georgia and Armenia and even visited the Byzantine emperor Basil II; he was killed by his servants at Ukhtikh (Olti). Finally another Abhadj, son of Rovd, amir of Atrapatakan (Abu 'l-Haidjā b. Rawwād of Ādharbāidjān), took from Abū Dulaf "the towns of Salar and after sacking Gōthn marched on Dwin, seized this town and demanded from the Armenians the arrears of tribute" (Asotik, ch. xviii.). King Smbat II hastened to accede to the demand. The Rawwādids thus gained possession of the remainder of the possessions of the Musāfirids of whom they claimed to be the successors. There is no reason to connect the Arab-Kurd Rawwādids with the Musāfirids, who were of Dailamī origin, although there may have been intermarriage between the two families.

The Tārom branch. After the disappearance of the descendants of Marzubān, Tārom, the original fief of the dynasty, alone remained in their hands. Wahsūdān had extended his power over the adjacent districts of Zandjān, Abhar and Suhraward (the latter name is usually mutilated in the sources). A ḡaṣīda of Mutanabbī (Kasrawī, op. cit., i. 45) dated probably in 354 suggests that Rukn al-Dawla drove Wahsūdān from Tārom for a time, but his family had remained there, for from Yāqūt, iii. 148—150 we learn that in 379 (989) the Būyid Fakhr al-Dawla took Shamirān from the young son of Nūh b. Wahsūdān, whose mother he married (the child's name was probably Djustān; cf. Yāqūt, Irshād al-Arib, ii. 308).

In 387 (997) after the death of Fakhr al-Dawla, Ibrāhīm b. Marzubān b. Ismā'īl b. Wahsūdān seized the fortress of Sardjīhān and Tārom. In 411 (1020) even Kāzwin was in his hands (cf. Nuzhat al-Kulūb, in G. M. S., p. 58). When Maḥmūd of Ghazna had taken Raiy, he sent against him the Dailamī Kharamīl. After the return of Maḥmūd to Khurāsān (420), his son Mas'ūd attacked Ibrāhīm but only captured him by a stratagem. Sardjīhān, however, remained in the hands of Ibrāhīm's son. In 427 (1037) we find the "sālār of Tārom" in his fief again.

Nāsir-i Khusrāw who was in this region in 437 (1045), speaks in high terms of the lord of Shamirān Djustān (b.) Ibrāhīm whose title was "Marzubān al-Dailam Djl-i Djlān Abū Šālih, Mawlā Amīr al-Mu'minin".

Under 454 (1062) Ibn al-Athīr records the visit of Tuḡhril to Tārom, where he imposed a tribute of 100,000 dīnārs on Musāfir, who is the last Musāfirid known. From Yāqūt's words we may conclude that the Ismā'īlis of Alamūt put an end to the rule of the family when they dismantled Shamirān.

MUSAILIMA (a contemptuous diminutive from Maslama, which is the form of his name given in Mubarrad, Kāmil, ed. Wright, p. 443, 5; Balādhuri, ed. de Goeje, p. 422 ult.; cf. Ṭalāḡa [q. v.] for Ṭalḡa), a prophet of the Banū Ḥanīfa in Yamāma contemporary with Muḥammad. His genealogy is variously given but always contains the name Ḥabīb; his kunya was Abū Ṭhumāma. According to the usual account, he appeared as a prophet soon after the death of Muḥammad, after having visited the latter in Medina with a deputation. There is however another tradition according to which he began his prophetic career before Muḥammad did, and D. S. Margoliouth has given very cogent reasons for accepting this. According to Ibn Ishāq (Ibn Hishām, ed. Wüstenfeld, p. 200), Muḥammad's enemies reproached him with having obtained his wisdom from a man of Yamāma named Raḥmān. Now we have ample evidence (Wakīdī, transl. Wellhausen, p. 28; Ṭabarī, i. 1935, 14; Balādhuri, p. 105; Baghawī on Sūra xxv. 61) that Musailima, who preached in the name of Raḥmān, was himself called Raḥmān. Further the story recurring in all traditions that Musailima proposed to the Medinese prophet a division of authority or a transfer of his power to him on his death (a similar story is told of the Ḥanīfa chief Hawdhā) becomes more intelligible if this prophet already occupied in Yamāma a position similar to that of Muḥammad in Medina. It is also worthy of note that the prophetic utterances attributed to Musailima recall the earliest Meccan sūras with their short rhyming sentences and curious oaths and have no resemblance at all to the later Medinese sūras. In particular the fact that all the Banū Ḥanīfa followed him into battle against the Medinese shortly after the death of Muḥammad shows that he must have been active for a considerable time and was no upstart imitator of Muḥammad. That the latter was the usual method of explaining the "liar" Musailima, is readily intelligible, nor is it to be wondered at that orthodox tradition could not deny itself the pleasure of depicting his relations with the Tamīm prophetess Sadjāḡ [q. v.] in the most scurrilous fashion. Fortunately however, the otherwise little reliable Saif gives quite a different story, which although influenced by later ideas (Musailima in order to gain followers reduces the five daily ṣalāts to three; he has a mu'adhdhin and a muḡīm; he tries in vain to imitate Muḥammad's miracles etc.), gives a picture of him which is in the main correct and we can agree with Wellhausen that his utterances have a distinctly Yamāma colouring. According to Saif's account, he must have been considerably influenced by Christianity for he speaks of the kingdom of heaven and of him who will come from heaven. Like several other men of the time in Arabia of deep religious feelings he favoured asceticism. He forbade wine and marital intercourse after the birth of a son. It is interesting that Palgrave on his journey into Najd found a number of sayings still current under Musailima's name; unfortunately he did not trouble to record them so that we cannot compare them with what is recorded of his utterances in literature. This rival community in the heart of Arabia meant a serious danger to the young faith of Islām. Therefore when the first attempts to repress it had failed, Abū Bakr sent his ablest leader Khālīd b. al-Walīd against Musailima and the Banū Hanīfa. A battle was fought at 'Akrabā' [q. v.] in 12 A. H. which at first went against the Muslims, but Khālīd's superior strategy finally prevailed and Musailima and many of his followers fell martyrs for their faith. The battle was unusually fierce and the Muslims also suffered heavily, among the fallen being a number of the best authorities on the revelations of Muḥammad.

MUSALLĀ (A.), part. pass. II of ṣ-l-w, place where the ṣalāt is performed on certain occasions. When Muḥammad had fixed his abode in Madīna, he performed the ordinary ṣalāt's in his dār, which was also his masjid (not in the sense of temple). The extraordinary ṣalāt's, however, were performed on a place situated southwest of the city in the territory of the Banū Salima, outside the wall, northeast of the bridge on the wādī, where at present the street from the suburb al-'Anbariya reaches the market-place Barr al-Munākha (cf. Burton, Personal Narrative, plan opp. i. 256; picture of the muṣallā as well as of the mosque of 'Umar situated on the place, opp. i. 329; al-Batānūnī, al-Riḥla al-Ḥidjāziya, 2nd ed., plan of Madīna opp. p. 252; part of the Barr al-Munākha, ibid., opp. p. 264; Caetani, Annali, vol. II/i., opp. p. 72).

On this spot the ṣalāt was performed on the 1st Shawwāl and on the 10th Dhu 'l-Ḥijjja (Ṭabari, i. 1281, 1362). On the latter day the ṣalāt was combined with the slaughtering of two spotted rams (Bukhārī, Aḍāḥi, bāb 6). On the two days of festival Muḥammad and his followers on their way to the muṣallā were preceded by Bilāl who bore the spear ('anaza; q. v.).

It is also said that the ṣalāt for rain was held on the muṣallā (copious data in Tradition, cf. Wensinck, Handbook, s. v. Rain; and do., Moham- med en de Joden, p. 141). Further it is related that the service for the dead was performed on this spot (Bukhārī, Djanā'iz, bāb 4, 61; Wensinck, Mohammed en de Joden, p. 140). Finally the muṣallā is mentioned as the place where executions took place (Bukhārī, Ṭalāk, bāb 11; Ṭabari, i. 1903). The sacred character of the place appears in the fact that menstruating women were taught to avoid it (Bukhārī, Ḥaid, bāb 23). According to Caetani (A. H. I, § 55, note 3; cf. A. H. 2, § 24, note 1), the muṣallā was used more frequently.

It was not only in Madīna but in a large number of other places that the rites mentioned, or some of them, were performed on a muṣallā. According to al-Nawawī (commentary on Muslim's Ṣaḥīḥ, Cairo 1283, ii. 296), this was the practice of most of the capitals. The custom prevails up to the present day. According to Doutté, the North-African muṣallā is used for the rites of the 10th Dhu 'l-Ḥijjja. It is a large threshing-floor, with a wall provided with a miḥrāb; there is also an elevated place for the khaṭīb. This is the form of the muṣallā in many towns of Morocco.

To the doctors of the law it was questionable whether the festival ceremonies should be performed on the muṣallā or in the mosque. There was divergency of opinion on this point, even within the madhhab's (Abū Ishāq al-Shirāzī, Tanbih, ed. Juynboll, p. 41, where "the field" (al-ṣaḥrā') is mentioned side by side with the mosque; Zirkānī, comm. on the Muwatta', i. 328; Khalīl b. Ishāq, Mukhtaṣar, Paris 1318, p. 33 sq.; al-Nawawī, op. cit., ii. 296).

Wensinck has conjectured that even in pre-Islāmic times rites of several kinds were performed on an open area, threshing-floor, muṣallā or the like. The connection between all those rites and the special place is sought by him therein, that they had a special connection with the fertile earth, of which the threshing-floor and the like were symbols.

MUSAWĪ. [See MECCA, ii. 4.]

AL-MUSAWWIR. [See ALLĀH II.]

MÜSH, town in Western Armenia near the southern bank of the Murād Şu (Arsanias), some 70 km. as the crow flies to the west of Khilāt. In pre-Muḥammadan times it was the principal town of the district of Tauran (Hübschmann, Idg. Forsch., xvi. 326; J. Saint-Martin, Mémoires Historiques et Géographiques sur l'Arménie, i., Paris 1818, p. 102). In Islāmic times the name Ṭarūn

(as spelled by Yāqūt, iv. 534) is sometimes used for the town itself as in Ṭabarī, iii. 1408 (cf. J. Markwart, Süd-Armenien und die Tigrisquellen, Vienna 1930, p. 354). The tradition of the Armenian historians connects the foundation of Mūsh with Muṣḥet Mamikonean, the ancestor of the powerful, originally non-Armenian family of the Mamikoneans, who lived in the ivth century A. D. To him is ascribed the construction of a castle, the ruins of which are still visible on one of the hills that dominate Mūsh. This town itself is situated at the mouth of a mountain gorge and before it extends, as far as the river, a large fertile plain, the "plain of Mūsh". During the first centuries after the Muḥammadan conquest, Mūsh remained a centre of Armenian national life; from 825—851 it was the residence of the Bagratid Bagrat. After the abduction of this prince to Baghdād in 851, the inhabitants revolted and killed the Muḥammadan governor Yūsuf b. Abī Sa'īd al-Marwānī (Ṭabarī, iii. 1408 sq.). Later on it was part of the vassal kingdom of the Bagratids. Occasionally it was occupied by Muḥammadan adventurers, as in the days of Saif al-Dawla (Ibn al-Athīr, viii. 408) in 353 (964). About this time the name Mūsh appears for the first time in Islāmic geographical literature (al-Maḳḍisī, p. 150). In Saldjūḳ times the influence of Islām became stronger; the atabegs of the Armanshāh dynasty disputed the territory of Khilāt and Mūsh with the Urtukids and even the Aiyūbid Nadīm al-Dīn laid siege to Mūsh in 604 (1207) (Ibn al-Athīr, xii. 169, 180), and in 625 (1228) Djalāl al-Dīn Khwārizmshāh was master of the country; in that year a battle was fought by him and lost on the plain of Mūsh against the Saldjūḳ ruler of Erzerūm (Ibn al-Athīr, xii. 314; Djuwainī, Tārīkh-i Dīhān-gushā, ii. 181). This accounts for the ruined state of the town in the middle of the xvth century (Ḥamd Allāh Mustawfī). After the Mongol period Mūsh was raided by Timūr in 1386, when he invaded the possessions of the Kara Ḳoyunlu (Sharaf al-Dīn, lix. 419). In 1473 the power of the Aḳ Ḳoyunlu ruler Uzun Ḥasan was definitely broken in Armenia and from that time on Mūsh belonged to the Ottoman Empire. At that time the population of its surroundings was already strongly mixed with Kurds and Turcomans. The direct authority was exercised by Kurdish local chieftains, who, in the ruling system of the Empire, were subordinated, as sandjaḳ begs, either to the pasha of Bitlis or to that of Wan. At the beginning of the xixth century ruled the Kurdish mīrmīrān Emin Pasha, who was deposed in 1828—1829 (Ritter, x. 676 and Sidjill-i ʿothmānī, i. 426). In the middle of that century, Mūsh became the chief town in the merkez ḥazā Mūsh, in the sandjaḳ Mūsh in the wilāyet of Bitlis, and in the Turkish republic it is a ḥazā in the wilāyet of Bitlis. The population of the town (some 5,000 inhabitants) was, until the Great War, half Armenian and half Muḥammadan; one of the Armenian churches had been converted in 979 (1571) into a mosque, according to an inscription (Ritter). The environs of Mūsh had also a mixed population, where, however, ancient Christian sanctuaries had long continued to exist, such as the monastery of Surb Karapet, called by the Turks Çaḳılı Kilise and described by Ewliya Çelebi.

During the Armenian troubles in the last years of 'Abd al-Ḥamid II's reign, in 1905, there began in Mūsh a revolutionary movement of Armenian tashnakists, which brought about an intervention of the Kurds and a suppression by government troops, in which the population suffered much. In the Great War the Russian advance in Armenia had gone as far as Mūsh, when, in accordance with the treaty of Brest-Litowsk (1917), the Russian troops retired in 1918, leaving this part of Armenia again in Turkish possession.

AL-MUSHABBIHA. [see TASHRIH.]

MUŞHAF (A.), Ethiopic loanword (cf. Nöldeke, Neue Beiträge, p. 49 sq.; the forms mişhaf and maşhaf occur also; according to some grammarians they are less correct, especially the latter), c o d e x, or, according to the definition of Arabic lexicographers, leaves (ṣuḥuf, plural of ṣahifa), when they are bound together between two covers. In the tradition on the redaction of the Ḳur'ān [q. v.] by Hudhaifa b. al-Yamān during 'Uthmān's caliphate, it is said indeed, that the collection of leaves that had been made by Zaid b. Thābit at 'Umar's instigation, was copied and arranged into maşāḥif. These were sent to all regions (as standard copies); the ṣuḥuf were restored to 'Umar's daughter Ḥafsa, in whose possession they had been ever since her father's death. Other ṣuḥuf were annihilated as often as occasion offered itself (Bukhārī, Faḍā'il al-Ḳur'ān, bāb 3; 'Ilm, bāb 7; Dīhād, bāb 12; Tafsīr, sūra 9, bāb 20; Aḥkām, bāb 37; Tirmidhī, Tafsīr, sūra 9, trad. 19).

From the time of the redaction of the Ḳur'ān under 'Uthmān maşāḥif are frequently mentioned in Arabic literature. In a tradition on 'Amr b. al-ʿĀs's well known stratagem during the battle of Siffin it is said that a huge muşhaf from Damascus was tied to the points of three lances (al-Dīnawarī, Kitāb al-Aḥbār al-tiwāl, ed. Girgass, p. 201 sq.; Naṣr b. Muzāḥim, Waḳāt Siffin, Bairūt 1921, p. 350; cf. p. 353); in other traditions "copies of the Ḳur'ān" in several numbers are mentioned (e.g. Ṭabarī, i. 3329).

In a tradition on the ṣalāt it is assumed that in the mosque of Madīna the muşhaf had a fixed place (Bukhārī, Ṣalāt, bāb 95; Muslim, Ṣalāt, trad. 263, 264); nowadays this place is by the dikka (cf. Lane, Manners and Customs of the Modern Egyptians, chap. Religion and Laws; and supra, art. MASJID, I, D, f.).

It is said that 'Ā'isha had a muşhaf copied for her private use by her mawlā Abū Yūnus (Tirmidhī, Tafsīr, sūra 2, trad. 29; cf. Bukhārī, Faḍā'il al-Ḳur'ān, bāb 6).

Maşāḥif were taken into the field by Muslim soldiers (cf. Tirmidhī, Hudūd, bāb 28; Abū Dāwūd, Dīhād, bāb 135); this practice met, however, with objections (cf. Bukhārī, Dīhād, bāb 129; Muslim, Imāra, trad. 92, 93), founded on the fear that they might fall into impure hands. For a similar reason persons impure in a ritual sense were prohibited from touching maşāḥif, save in a special cover (ʿallāka; Bukhārī, Ḥaid, bāb 3).

(A. J. WENSINCK)

MUSHİR (A.), councillor, Turkish pronunciation müşhîr and müşhûr (modern orthography müşür) with meaning "Marshal". Mushîr literally means "one who points out, advises". Cf. also the article MUSTASHĀR.

According to some authorities, mushîr was at first (before the 'Abbāsids) the title of the ministers (later wazīr; q. v.) or secretaries of state (kātib). So at least we are told by Ibn al-Ṭīṭakā' (ed. Derenbourg, p. 206; transl. Amar, p. 244). Khālil al-Zāhirī (ed. Ravaisse, p. 106 and 114) says that "formerly" an official to whom he gives fourth rank in the hierarchy, which shows he clearly distinguishes him from the wazīr, bore the title of mushîr. We seem however to have very little other information about this dignitary. On the other hand, the word mushîr in a non-technical sense is often found along with wazīr of which it sometimes seems to be a doublet or synonym (cf. Makrizi, ed. Wiet, iv., fasc. i., p. 20 and 74; Nöldeke, Die Erzählungen vom Mäusekönig und seinen Ministern, Göttingen 1879, p. 53: mushîr nāsiḥ, wazīr nāsiḥ).

We may note however that this older and broader conception did not survive. According to Ibn Khaldūn, the wazīr is, it is true, an "assistant" to the sovereign, but to his predecessor Māwardī (Les statuts gouvernementaux, transl. Fagnan, p. 43 sqq.) the wazīr is not the adviser of the imām but his delegate.

If Ibn al-Ṭīṭakā's statement is correct we must see a survival of this older state of affairs in the usage of the Mamlūk chancellery where we find among the honorific laqābs of the wazīr that of mushîr al-dawla (or al-saltāna or al-mulūk wa 'l-salāṭīn). Cf. Kalkaşhandī, vi. 70.

The, same usage, which perhaps came from the Saldjūks, is still more clearly established in the Ottoman chancellery. We actually find the word mushîr among the alqāb of the Turkish wazīr (vezîr) and almost at the head of the formula, which shows its importance: düstūr-i mükerrem, müşhîr-i mufakkkham, nizām ül-'alem etc. Whence in the epistolary style the epithets müşhîrî and müşhîrâne used along with düstūrî and düstūrâne or khidivî and khidivâne to designate all that belongs to an official of the rank of vezîr.

Mahmūd II in creating the principal ministries naturally thought of again giving a real value to this title of mushîr, which he gave to the principal ministers, and in the reign of his successor 'Abd al-Madjīd "the privy council (medjilis-i khāṣṣ, a regular council of ministers) consisted of the grand vizier, the sheikh al-islām, eleven mushîr and three officials of the first rank" (Bianchi, Le premier annuaire impérial de l'Empire Ottoman, Paris 1848, p. 7; Bianchi translates mushîr by "councillor or under-secretary of state" and has been followed by Barbier de Meynard in his Supplément, the references in which should be taken with this reservation). In 1250 (1834—1835) the title of mushîr was given to the new nāzir of the Interior (mülkiye nāzirî = the former ket-khūdā) and of Foreign Affairs (khāridiye nāzirî = the former re'is ül-küttāb; cf. Luṭfi, v. 29). The zabtiye müşhîrliyi was created in 1262 (1846) (Luṭfi, viii. 87).

Mahmūd II also created the post of beylerbeyi vezîr or chief of the imperial guard, who bore the title mushîr-i 'asākîr-i khāṣṣe (paṣha), an officer who took rank after the ser'asker or War Minister (Hammer, Hist. de l'Emp. Ott., xvii. 188 and 189). This title was soon to be contrasted with that of mushîr-i 'asākîr-i shāhāne by the other troops (Luṭfi, v. 28).

The ministers did not long bear the title of mushîr which gave place to nāzir, but the former of these titles, perhaps under the influence of the word "marshal", which it more or less resembles, became a special military title. It became the highest rank in the army, corresponding to vizier in the civil service and of kaşasker in the religious hierarchy. At first the title redîf-i manşûre müşhîrî (cf. Luṭfi, v. 68, 74) was given to the wālîs of certain provinces, or simply mushîr of such and such a province (ibid., p. 165 sqq.; vi. 102, 103; vii. 70). This corresponded to the demarcation of the army corps.

The number of mushîr or "marshals" soon increased and in the reign of 'Abd al-Hamīd II, there were 39 in 1890 and in 1895, 31 (see the Salnâme-i 'askerî of the years 1306 and 1311). Those who had the right to this title were the ser'asker, the topkhāne-i 'amire müşhîrî or "grand master of artillery", the sarây müşhîrî or "grand master of the Palace" (replacing the old çavuş-bashi, according to Aḥmad Rāsim, Ta'riḥ, i. 156 and 186), the khāṣṣe müşhîrî (as under Mahmūd II), the commanders of the seven army corps (kol ordu), the heads of the army services, the aides de camp to the sultān (yāwer-i ekrem). The only duty of five of the mushîr was to superintend the ceremony of the Selāmlık (selāmlık resm-i 'ālisine me'mûr). The officer in charge of the police station (merkez) of Beshiktash, near the Yıldız Kiosk, was also a mushîr (M.S.O.S., vii., 1908, part 2, p. 40). Instead of sarây müşhîrî the more usual phrase was mā-beyn mushîr (Luṭfi, vii. 62).

The honorific form of address for a mushîr was dewletli (dewletlî) efendim hazretleri. In the plural the Persian form müşhîrān or with epithet müşhîrān-i 'izām. The name of the office is müşhîrîyet or müşhîrlik, more rarely müşhîrî (Luṭfi, v. 91).

The title of mushîr, which has been borne by Muṣṭafā Kemāl Paṣhā himself, has survived in the Turkish republic but there is at present only one mushîr in office, the Chief of the General Staff, Fewzî Paṣha.

In Khedivial Egypt they stopped at a stage where the influence of the reforms of Mahmūd II was still felt. The rutbet mushîr there was down to the present reign exclusively the highest grade of officers but without distinction between military and civil offices. It was also in theory a civil rank (rutba mulkiya) to which all the princes of the khedivial house had a claim.

In Persian the title mushîr has been rarely used. Cf. however the case of the mushîr ed-dowle (cf. the similar title above) borne by an aide-de-camp of Naṣr al-Dīn Shāh (Feuvrier, Trois ans à la Cour de Perse, p. 135—136).

MUSHRIK. [See SHIRK.]

AL-MUSHTARĪ, the planet Jupiter, Pers. Hurmīd < Aurmazd (Ahura-mazdāh). The name of the planet is in Sumerian Shulpa'e, later also Mulu-babbar "the white star" (= Μολοβαβάρ in Hesychos; cf. Meissner, Babylonien und Assyrien, Heidelberg 1925, ii. 404); in the later Accadian period it is always identified with the numen supremum Marduk (Biblical Merodach). In Hebrew it is called Šedek, in Greek — just as among the Babylonians, as the symbol of the highest deity — δ τοῦ Διὸς ἄστρον. As a synonym of al-Mushtarī we find (e.g. in Ḥadīth) the name Barḍīs (cf. Lisān al-ʿArab, vii. 323).

The Arab astronomers, like Pythagoras and Ptolemy, put Jupiter in the sixth sphere (falak) from within i.e. the third from without. On the interior it adjoins the outer surface of the sphere of Mars and on the exterior the inner surface of the sphere of Saturn. The following table gives the least, mean and greatest distance of Jupiter from the centre of the earth, expressed in radii of the earth, as given by al-Battānī (Opus astronomicum, ed. Nallino, ch. 50), al-Farghānī (Complatio, ch. 21), Ibn Rusta (Kitāb al-Aʿlāk, ed. de Goeje, p. 18–20) and Abrahām bar Hiya (Sphaera mundi, ch. 9), as well as the Hindu values given by al-Bīrūnī from the compilation by Yaʿqūb b. Ṭarīk of the year 161 A.H., and the modern figures for these distances:

al-Battānī	8,022 rad. of the earth	10,473	rad. of the earth	12,924	rad. of the earth
al-Farghānī	8,876 "	11,640 ^{1/2}	"	14,405	"
Ibn Rusta	8,820 "	11,503 ^{1/2}	"	14,187	"
Bar Hiya	8,000 "	10,200	"	12,400	"
Hindu
(al-Bīrūnī)	8,019 ^{1/21} "	10,866 ^{2/3}	"	13,714 ^{2/7}	"
Modern	92,500 "	122,250	"	152,000	"

The radius of the earth is here estimated at 3,250 (al-Battānī, al-Farghānī and Bar Hiya) and 3,818 Arab miles respectively (Ibn Rusta) while, according to al-Bīrūnī, the Hindus give it as 1,050 farsakh = 3,150 Arab miles (1 Ar. m. = 1,973 metres; cf. Nallino, Il valore metrico del grado di meridiano). The true geocentric distances of the planet Jupiter are actually about 11^{1/2} times greater than given by al-Battānī for example. It should however be pointed out that the relation of 37:23 or 11^{1/8} for the greatest and least observed apparent diameter taken by this scholar, with the help of which the distance of the apogee was calculated from the estimated distance of the perigee at 8,022 radii of the earth agrees remarkably well with the modern estimate. The apparent diameter of Jupiter at the mean distance is given by al-Battānī as 1^{1/12} of the diameter of the sun. From this and the mean distance he calculates the true diameter of Jupiter at 4^{1/3} diameters of the earth (= 82^{2/3} radii), and its volume at 81 times that of the earth (i.e. [4^{1/3}]³). The true values are 2.56 (i.e. 170 times larger): diameter of Jupiter = 11.14 diameters of the earth, volume = 1,380 times the volume of the earth.

Following Ptolemy (Almagest) al-Battānī gives the greatest observed northern (geocentric) latitude as 2° 4', the greatest southern as 2° 8'. On the other hand, he points out (ch. 31 and 45) that he found the length of the apogee of the eccentric circle from his observations to be about 8° smaller (in 879 A.D., 164° 28') than was to be expected from the Almagest, taking into account the precession.

The movement of Jupiter is as in the Almagest represented to be through four circles ("spheres", aftāk) (cf. al-Battānī, Op. astr., ch. 31). The astronomical tables take for its mean daily sidereal motion the value of 5'. Its period of sidereal revolution is given by al-Qazwīnī (Āthār, ed. Wüstenfeld, i. 26) at 11 years, 10 months, 15 days.

Al-Mushtarī in astrology. Al-Mushtarī is the ruler (rabb) of the Buyūt al-Rāmi (Sagittarius, night-house) and al-Ḥūt (Pisces, day-house), also night-ruler of the 1. Muthallatha (Triguetrum), which consist of al-Ḥamal (Aries), al-Asad (Leo) and al-Rāmi (Sagittarius), whose ruler by day is the sun, and finally companion (rafiq) of the 3 Muthallatha. It has its Sharaf (exaltation) in the 15° of al-Saraḥān (Cancer), its Hubūṭ in the 15° of al-Djady (Capricornus). According to al-Qazwīnī (i. 22), "the astrologers call al-Mushtarī the larger star of fortune", al-Sa'd al-akbar, because its good influence surpasses that of Venus; they attribute to it numerous happy states and the greatest good fortune. The idea that the planet Jupiter is a star of good fortune is general among other peoples also; we also find it in Babylonia, India and China. For further details of the part played by Jupiter in Arab astrology see the works of Abū Ma'shar.

MUSĪQĪ or موسيقا or موسيقى as it was written in the West (al-Fārābī, Ihsā' al-ʿUlūm; Schiaparelli, Vocabulista in Arabico = Latin musica), is the name given to the science of music. It is a post-classical word derived from the Greek μουσική, and was already current at the time of Ishāk al-Mawṣilī (d. 236 = 850) [q.v.]. In the Mafātiḥ al-ʿUlūm (11th = xth century) mūsikī is one of the four mathematical sciences. Its author says: "As for mūsikī, its meaning is the [science of the] composing of melodies (alḥān). It is a Greek word, and it is named the nutrib. And the composer of the melodies is the mūsikūr or mūsikār (p. 236)". The contemporary Ikhwān al-Safā' say (i. 87): "Mūsikī is ghinā', and the mūsikār is the mughannī, and the mūsikāt (mūsikāriyya in Dieterici) is the instrument of music (ghinā'". 'Ilm al-mūsikī was the name given by the Arabs to the Greek or mathematical theory of music as distinct from 'ilm al-ghinā' which was the Arabian practical theory, as we know from the Kitāb al-Aghānī and Yaḥyā b. 'Alī b. Yaḥyā b. Abī Maṣṣūr (d. 300 = 912). The latter tells us (Brit. Mus. MS., Or. 2361, fol. 236v) of the "disagreement between the masters of Arabian ghinā' and the masters of [Greek] mūsikī". Of course, the Arabs and Persians possessed a theory of music long before they became influenced by the translations made from the Greek at the end of the iith (viiith) and beginning of the iiith (ixth) century.

The Pre-Islāmic System. The source of both Persian and Arabian theory of music was an older Semitic one which had influenced, if it had not been the actual foundation of Greek theory (cf. Farmer, Hist. Facts . . ., p. 123). No Persian or Arabic technical nomenclature of a theory of mūsīkī (i.e. speculative theory) has come down to us from pre-Islāmic times, although it must have existed. Al-Fārābī (d. 339 = 950) describes a musical instrument, still used in his day, called the ṭunbūr al-baghdādī or al-mizānī, the frets (dasātīn, a Persian word) of which gave a "pre-Islāmic scale" (Kosegarten, Lib. cant., p. 89; Mafātīḥ al-ʿUlūm). It was a quarter-tone scale which was arrived at by dividing a string into forty equal parts. The idea could be traced to Eratosthenes (Ptolemy, Harm., ed. Wallis, ii. 14) but probably was of far greater antiquity (Farmer, Influence of Music, in Proceedings, Musical Association, 1926, p. 121). Although al-Fārābī's instrument did not actually give the following scale, yet the theoretical division mentioned above would produce a scale which, expressed in cyclic cents, would register:

Fret	Nut	2nd	4th	6th	8th	10th
Cents	0	89	182	281	386	498

J. P. N. Land was of opinion that the later Pythagorean lute scale of the Old Arabian School was derived from the system of the ṭunbūr al-baghdādī. It is more likely however, that there was an earlier lute scale than that of the Old Arabian School, as has been hinted elsewhere (Farmer, Hist. of Arabian Music, p. 70). This was a one-octave scale fixed by the accordatura (taswiya) C-D-G-a, the frets of which gave the following scale:

-------	---	-----	-----	-----	-----	-----	------	------

For a discussion of this scale see Farmer, An Old Moorish Lute Tutor, p. 27; do., Hist. Facts . . ., p. 310.

The Old Arabian System. In the ith (viith) century we get definite glimpses of a theory in the music of the Arabs and Persians. We read of a certain Ibn Misḍjaḥ [q.v.] (d. ca. 97 = 715) who had learned Persian music (ghināʾ) and accomplishments in playing (ḍarb), and had received instruction from Byzantine (rūmī) barbiton players (barbaṭīya) and theorists (usṭūkhūsiya = σχοιχειραταί). These borrowings from abroad he incorporated into a system which came to be recognized throughout the peninsula (Kitāb al-Aghānī, iii. 84). We are told however, that Ibn Misḍjaḥ rejected from Persian and Byzantine methods what he found to be "alien to Arabian music" (ghināʾ). This would appear to show, as Land once pointed out (Remarks, p. 156), that these foreign importations "did not supersede the national music, but were grafted upon an Arabic root with a character of its own". We know that about the same time, or perhaps slightly later (Kitāb al-Aghānī, i. 98), that the Arabs adopted the Persian lute in the place of their own instrument. This latter, as we have seen, gave a one-octave scale based on the accordatura C-D-G-a, whilst the Persian lute was tuned in fourths thus: A-D-G-c, which enabled the performer to attain (with a shift) the double octave. Yet only the highest and the lowest strings of their old lute needed to be altered, and these were given the Persian names of sīr and bamm, whilst the second and third strings retained their old Arabic names of mathnā and mathlath. The new accordatura of the lute brought about a change in the scale (ṭabaqa) as the following distribution of the frets shows (Brit. Mus. MS., Or. 2361, fol. 237). The lute with the Arabs was the basis of all "theory", just as the lyre was with the Greeks.

STRINGS

	Bamm	Mathlath	Mathnā	Zīr
Mutlaḥ (Open string)	0	498	996	294
Sabbāba (1st Finger)	204	702	1200	498
Wustā (2nd Finger)	294	792	90	588
Bīnšīr (3rd Finger)	408	906	204	702
Khīnšīr (4th Finger)	498	996	294	792

Nevertheless, this scale did not satisfy everyone, and we find that the Persians introduced a new wustā fret at 303 cents, whilst later a famous musician at Hārūn's court named Zalzal [q.v.] (d. 175 = 791) adopted a fret at 355 cents, half-way between the new Persian wustā fret and the bīnšīr fret. By the time of Ishāḳ al-Mawṣilī (d. 236 = 850) these Persian and Zalzal frets seem to have created such confusion that this musician attempted to recast the lute scale in its old Pythagorean mould, which, we are told, he did without recourse to Euclid or a solitary book of the "Ancients" as the Greeks of old were called (Kitāb al-Aghānī, v. 52—53; ʿIqd al-farīd, iii. 188). His reform appears to have been successful in ʿIrāq and lasted there until the ivth (xth) century (Kitāb al-Aghānī, i. 2; Rasāʾil Ikhwān al-Ṣafāʾ, i. 98). Elsewhere however, the Persian and Zalzal notes continued in favour, as we know from al-Fārābī (Kosegarten, Lib. cant., p. 85) and the Mafātīḥ al-ʿUlūm, p. 239. A century later, whilst the Persian note of 303 cents had disappeared, that of Zalzal was still popular (Ibn Sīnā, Shifāʾ, India Office MS., fol. 173v).

There is but little preserved of the writings of the theorists of the Old Arabian School. Whether the books of Yūnus al-Kātib (d. ca. 148 = 765) [q.v.] and the more famous al-Khalīl (d. 175 = 791) [q.v.] on music (nagham and ikāʾ) dealt with these theories we know not since they have perished (Fihrist, p. 43, 143). A similar fate appears to have overtaken the music books of ʿUbad Allāh b. ʿAbd Allāh b. Ṭāhir (d. ca. 300 = 912), ʿAlī b. Hārūn b. ʿAlī b. Yaḥyā b. Abī Maṣṣūr (d. 352 = 963) and Sulaimān b. Aiyūb al-Madīnī (Kitāb al-Aghānī, v. 45; Fihrist, p. 144, 148). Beyond the sparse information given in the Kitāb al-Aghānī and the Murūdī of al-Masʿūdī (viii. 89 sq.), we have only the Risāla fi ʿl-Mūsīkī of Yaḥyā b. ʿAlī b. Yaḥyā b. Abī Maṣṣūr (d. 300 = 912) to depend on, since the Kitāb al-Lahw wa ʿl-Malāḥī of Ibn Khur-dādhbih (d. ca. 300 = 912) [q.v.] is in private hands (Hilāl, xxviii. 204).

Although we read that Ishāḳ al-Mawṣilī made his calculations by ḥisāb (Yaḥyā b. ʿAlī, fol. 237v), yet the Old Arabian School, so far as we know from Yaḥyā b. ʿAlī b. Yaḥyā, did not adjust the frets of the lute (ʿūd) or pandore (ṭunbūr) by this method. Their rule for fixing the frets was based on tuning a note with its octave or, as they termed it, its ṣiyāh or dīf, although the latter term shows that they recognized the interval ratio 1 : 2. When the Greek scholiasts came to deal with the theory of music all this was changed.

The Greek Scholiasts. By the middle of the ixth (ixth) century, the effects of the writings of the ancient Greeks on music, which had been translated into Arabic, began to be felt. Among these treatises were Aristotle's Problems and De anima, the commentaries of Themistius and Alexander Aphrodisiensis on the latter, two works by Aristoxenus — including the στοιχεῖα it would seem, the two books on music attributed to Euclid, a treatise by Nicomachus, presumably the lost book, and the Harmonics of Ptolemy, all or most of which had been translated by the first half of the ivth (xth) century at least, as we know from al-Fārābī (Fihrist, p. 266, 269, 270; Ibn al-Kifṭī, p. 65; al-Maḥḥārī, Anal., ii. 87; ʿIqd al-farāid, iii. 186; B. G. A., vii. 128; Rasāʾil Ikhwān al-Ṣafāʾ, i. 102; and Farmer, Greek Theorists of Music in Arabic Translation, in Isis, xiii., p. 325).

The ʿilm al-mūsikī now became one of the courses of the ʿulūm riyaḍiyya or quadrivium, and was studied by most savants at this period although later a few fought shy of the subject probably, as in Western Europe (Farmer, Hist. Facts . . . , p. 184), because it was too abstruse (Ibn Khallikān, iii. 471). The early scholiasts dealt with the theory of sound (ṣawt), intervals (abʿād), genres (adīnās), species (anwāʾ), systems (djumūʿ, djamāʿāt), mutation (intikāl) and composition (taʿrif), after the manner of the Greeks, and from the above order we see that Euclid influenced them in this respect. To this was added rhythm (īkāʿ). All this was of immense value to Arab theorists and their later copyists, the Persians and Turks. Instead of the old method of describing intervals according to their frets they were now given definite names and recognized by ratios. The octave became al-kull ("the whole"), whilst the fifth, fourth, and ditone were given identical names in Arabic. The tone was variously known as the ṭanīn, ʿawda or mudda. The semitone or nusf ṭanīn was recognized in its two forms, the infiṣāl or ἁπορρομή, and the baḥiya or faḍla which was the λείμμα, whilst the quarter-tone was the irḥḥāʾ. In some ways the Scholiasts were slavish and diffuse in what they borrowed, although in others they were eclectic. On the question of the physical bases of sound however, and their treatment of musical instruments, they pushed ahead of their masters.

The first to take advantage of the newly-found treasures of the "Ancients" was al-Kindī (d. 260 = 874) [q. v.]. Seven treatises on music theory appear under his name (Fihrist, p. 255—257; Ibn al-Kifṭī, p. 370; Ibn Abī Uṣaibiʿa, i. 210), and four of them would seem to have survived (Farmer, Hist. of Arabian Music, p. 127; do., Some musical MSS. identified, p. 91). Three of them are at Berlin (Ahlwardt, Verz., Nrs. 5503, 5530, 5531): Risāla fī Idjzāʾ khabarīya al-Mūsikī, Risāla fī ʿl-Luḥūn, and another without title. The fourth, the Risāla fī Khubr Taʿlif al-Aḥwān, is in the British Museum (Or. 2361), and is probably later than the others. In the latter we see the author's indebtedness to Euclid and Ptolemy. He had written a Risāla fī Kismat al-Ḳanūn, presumably Euclid's Sectio canonis. He uses a one-octave alphabetic (abjad) notation which was an improvement on Greek methods, but his pointing the way to a reform of the scale was probably of greater import to the Arabs. By introducing a fifth string on the lute, so as to reach the double octave without recourse to the shift, he obtained the Complete System (djamʿ al-ʿaṣam: Ptolemy's σύνστημα τέλειον). To accomplish this a fret called the mudjannab had to be introduced at 114 cents between the muṭlaḥ and the sabbāba fret, which in itself created another problem, and eventually led to frets being tried between the muṭlaḥ and the above mudjannab at 90 cents and between the wusṭā and binṣir frets at 384 cents. Here was the germ of the limma, limma, comma scale of the later ṭunbūr al-khurāsānī, the forerunner of the Systematist scale.

After al-Kindī, we have a gap of a century in actual documents. There are names of theorists in abundance but their works have not survived. Al-Kindī's two disciples, Aḥmad b. Muḥammad al-Sarakhsī (d. 286 = 899) and Maṣṣūr b. Ṭalḥa b. Ṭāhir, contributed works on the theory of music, the former writing six (Fihrist, p. 117, 149, 261). More important perhaps, were the three books of Ṭābit b. Qurra (d. 288 = 901) [q. v.], as well as those of Muḥammad b. Zakariyā al-Rāzī (d. 320 = 932) [q. v.] and Kustā b. Luḡā (d. ca. 320 = 932) [q. v.] (Fihrist, p. 276, 295; Ibn Abī Uṣaibiʿa, i. 309; Kitāb al-Aghām, viii. 54; Ḥādjdī Khalīfa, v. 161). The greatest of all the scholiasts however was al-Fārābī (d. 339 = 950) [q. v.] (Ibn al-Kifṭī, p. 277; Ibn Abī Uṣaibiʿa, ii. 134; Steinschneider, al-Fārābī). Although we lack two of his books on music, the Kalām fī ʿl-Mūsikī and the Kitāb fī Iḥṣāʾ al-Iḥṣāʾ, yet his greatest work, the Kitāb al-Mūsikī al-kabīr, has been preserved. This treatise, so he tells us, was written because he found an "incompleteness" in what had been handed down from the Greeks. It has been called "the most important treatise on the theory of Oriental music" (cf. vol. ii. 54), but it probably deserved to rank as one of the greatest works that had been written on music. His treatment of the physical and physiological principles of sound and music is certainly an advance on the Greeks, whilst he was the first to devote a detailed study to musical instruments, a subject on which nothing has come down to us from the Greeks. Al-Fārābī was a good mathematician and physicist, and that enabled him to do justice to what the Arabs called the ʿilm al-naẓarī or speculative theory, even to not repeating the errors of the Greeks (Farmer, Hist. Facts . . . , p. 292—293). Yet he was something more. He was a practical musician and could appreciate the art as well as the science, which was more than Themistius could do, as al-Fārābī himself mentions. As a performer with a reputation (Ibn Khallikān, iii. 309; Rasāʾil Ikhwān al-Ṣafāʾ, i. 85) he could bring the ʿilm al-ʿamalī or practical art to bear upon the discussions. So whilst he was more thorough than the Greeks in handling the physical bases of sound, he could also make valuable contributions to physiological acoustics, i. e. the sensations of tone, a question which the Greeks left practically untouched.

By the time of al-Fārābī further additions had been made to the scale. The principle by which the Persian and Zalzalīan wusṭā frets at 303 and 355 cents had been determined, was also applied to the insertion of corresponding mudjannab frets, between the muṣṭaḥ and the sabbāba, at 145 and 168 cents, with the result that there were now three muḍjannab frets known respectively as the Ancient, Persian and Zalzalīan, whilst the one at 114 cents had disappeared. Here is the fretting of the lute in al-Fārābī's day:

Al-Fārābī also noted the scale of the ṭunbūr al-khurāsānī proceeding by a limma, limma, comma, which doubtless was prompted by al-Kindī's speculations. It became the parent of the later theory of the Systematist School. In describing the scales of the rabāb or rebec he shows one that gave the just minor third (316) and just major third (386).

The next great writer after al-Fārābī was Abu 'l-Wafā' al-Buzdjānī (d. 388 = 998) [q.v.], the most eminent of the Arabic writers on mathematics. His book on rhythm (ṭiḳā) has unfortunately disappeared, although its importance has been testified to (Bibl. Ind., 1849, p. 93). The contemporary encyclopædists, the Ikhwān al-Ṣafā' in their Rasā'il, and Muhammad b. Aḥmad al-Khwarizmi in his Mafātīḥ al-'Ulūm, also deal with the theory of music. The latter does not break fresh ground although his work is helpful in controlling others. The former, however, are of considerable import because of their able and lucid treatment of acoustics. Here is an instance. According to Helmholtz (op. cit., p. 10), musical tones are distinguished by their force, pitch, and quality, and the force of a musical tone, he says, increases and diminishes with the extent or so-called amplitude of the oscillations of the particles of the sounding body. Preece and Stroh refused to accept this definition and pointed out that loudness does not depend upon amplitude of vibration only, but upon the quantity of air put in vibration (P. R. S., xxviii., p. 366). The Ikhwān al-Ṣafā' had already enunciated this opinion. "Hollow bodies" they say, "like vessels . . . will resound for a long time after they are struck, because the air within them reverberates time after time until it becomes still. Consequently, the wider the vessels are, the greater the sound, because more air is put in vibration" (i. 89). They also recognized the spherical propagation of sound (i. 88), which was an improvement on the Aristotelian De audibilibus (802, a) which said that "the direction of sound follows a straight line" (cf. Vitruvius, De arch., v. 3).

The next writers whose works have been spared us are Ibn Sīnā (d. 428 = 1037) [q.v.] and Ibn Zaila (d. 440 = 1048). Two treatises on music stand to the credit of Avicenna, as he was known in Europe, and they are contained in the Shifā' (India Office MS., 1811) and the Nadīāt (Bodleian MS. Marsh, 521) (Ibn al-Kifī, p. 413; Ibn Abī Uṣaibi'a, ii. 2; cf. Casiri, i. 271). Unlike al-Fārābī, the shāikh al-ra'is was not a practical musician, yet his biographers claim that he dealt with questions on the theory of music which were neglected by the Greeks. He is scientific and philosophic in his approach, and even critical at times, but he displays little of that originality that is so apparent in his other writings. Ibn Zaila was his disciple and echoed his opinions, although some fresh details emerge when dealing with the practical art. He quotes from al-Kindī on the question of rhythm, and is useful on that account.

Egypt also contributed its quota of music theorists, two outstanding writers being Ibn al-Haiṭham (d. 430 = 1039) [q.v.] and Abu 'l-Ṣalt Umaiya (d. 528 = 1134). Ibn al-Haiṭham appears however to have written commentaries on both the κατατομή κανόνος and the Εισαγωγή ἀρμονική of Euclid (Ibn al-Kifī, p. 168; Ibn Abī Uṣaibi'a, ii. 90). Although there were several Arabic commentaries on Euclid's Canon not one appears to have survived. Yet we have two at least in Hebrew whose authors probably depended on Arabic works. One of these was Moses N . . . Levy (Halevy) who quotes Shem Ṭob b. Isaac Shafrūt, and the other was Isaiah b. Isaac (Beth oṣar haṣṣpharōt, Year i., xxix., xxxi.). The Risāla fi 'l-Musīkī by Abu 'l-Ṣalt was probably of some importance since it is quoted by Jewish writers (Ibn Abī Uṣaibi'a, ii. 52; Ahlwardt, Verz., No. 5536 [5]; P. Duran, Grammar, Vienna 1863, p. 37). In Syria we have Ibn al-Naḳkāsh (d. 574 = 1178), Abu 'l-Hakam al-Bāhilī and his son Abu 'l-Maḍjīd Muḥammad (d. 576 = 1180), and 'Alam al-Dīn Ḳaiṣar (d. 649 = 1251), all of whom were interested in music theory (Ibn Abī Uṣaibi'a, ii. 144, 155, 162, 181; Ibn Khallikān, iii. 471), whilst further East we have such names as Ibn Man'a (d. 551 = 1156), 'Abd al-Mu'min b. Ṣaḥī al-Dīn (vith = xiith century?), Fakhr al-Dīn al-Rāzī (d. 606 = 1209) [q.v.], and Naṣir al-Dīn al-Tūsī (d. 673 = 1274) [q.v.] (Ibn Khallikān, iii. 467; Bodleian MS. Ouseley, No. 117; Brit. Mus. MS. Or. 2972; Paris Bibl. Nat. MS., Arabe, No. 2466). In the West, the two theorists of consequence are Ibn Bādjja (d. 532 = 1138) [q.v.] whose book on music enjoyed the same reputation in the West as that of al-Fārābī in the East (al-Maḳkārī, Anal., ii. 125), and Ibn Rushd (d. 594 = 1198) [q.v.] whose commentary on Aristotle's De anima reveals that lucidity of treatment in the section dealing with the phenomena of sound that made him so famous on other questions.

The Systematist School. After Ibn Sīnā and Ibn Zaila, the most thorough exposition of the theory of music, so far as existing documents show, was made by a musician in the service of the last Caliph of Baghdad, named Ṣaḥī al-Dīn 'Abd al-Mu'min b. Fākhīr (d. 692 = 1294) [q.v.], the author of two estimable works, the Risālat al-Sharafiya and the Kitāb al-Adwār, which almost every subsequent writer in music uses as his principal authorities. A later theorist, 'Abd al-Qādir b. Ḡhaibī, frankly admitted that Ṣaḥī al-Dīn was the fountain head in music theory, whilst a modern has called him "the Zarlino of the Orient" (Kiesewetter, p. 13), and many commentaries have been penned on his theories. Ṣaḥī al-Dīn was no mean physicist, and he attacks both al-Fārābī and Ibn Sīnā when he finds that their terms and definitions are inexact. Much of it may be mere quibbling over verbal niceties, but it redounds to his credit that he realized that in a science we must start off with terminological exactitudes. Like al-Fārābī, he was a practical musician, and the reform of the scale, which must be attributed to him (cf. Helmholtz, p. 280), was possibly due to this fact. The Greek scholiasts had done much to stabilize Arabian music theory, yet anomalies still existed. The most notable was the Zalzalīan wusfā note at 355 cents together with its attendant sixth at 853 cents. These did not conform to the scholiasts' scale which produced a succession of fourths (cf. Helmholtz, p. 281). It was to remedy this defect, it would seem, that Šafī al-Dīn laid down a new theory of the scale in which the octave was divided into seventeen intervals in the succession of limma, limma and comma, which enabled him to embrace the fractious Zalzalīan notes of 355 and 853 cents by close approximations which worked out at 384 and 882 cents. This scale, which has been considered "the most perfect ever devised" (Parry, Art of Music, 1st ed., p. 29), gave consonances purer than our scale of equal temperament can afford us (Riemann, Catechism of Musical History, i. 65). It is no wonder therefore that Helmholtz has considered the theory of the Systematist School so "noteworthy in the history of the development of music" (p. 283). Here is the scale of Šafī al-Dīn:

After the fall of Baghdād (654 = 1256), the hub of culture moved further East, and the writings of the Systematist School have to be sought as much in Persian as in Arabic. Most of this literature has been preserved. Kuṭb al-Dīn al-Shīrāzī (d. 710 = 1310) [q. v.], who devoted a valuable ḍjumla to the "science of music" in his Durrat al-Taḍjī (Brit. Mus., MS. Add. 7694), was the first of these writers in Persian. He was followed by Muḥammad b. Maḥmūd al-ʿAmulī (viiith = xivth century), whose Nafʿis al-Funūn also has a section on music (Brit. Mus., MS. Add. 16827). Another xvth century Persian work deserving of mention is the Kanz al-Tuḥaf (Brit. Mus. MS., Or. 2361). More important were the four works of ʿAbd al-Kādir b. Ghāibī (d. 839 = 1435) [q. v.], entitled the Djāmiʿ al-Alḥān, with its two epitomes the Maḳāṣid al-Alḥān and the Mukhtaṣar al-Alḥān (Bodleian MSS., Marsh, N^o. 282, Ouseley, N^o. 264, 385), and the Sharḥ al-Adwār. A fifth work, the Kanz al-Alḥān, the most precious of all since it contained noted music, has disappeared. Ibn Ghāibī depends on al-Fārābī, Ibn Sīnā, and Šafī al-Dīn, but is by no means servile. What he adds to our knowledge of the music of his day concerns the practical art. Both his son and his grandson were theorists, and their works still exist, the Naḳāwat al-Adwār and the Maḳāṣid al-Adwār (Nūri ʿUṭhmāniya Library, Nrs. 3646, 3649). They were in the service of the Turkish sultāns, who were now patronising this class of savants, and we find two theorists, Khidr b. ʿAbd Allāh and Aḥmad Ughlū Shukrullāh, writing in Turkish, the latter translating the Kitāb al-Adwār of Šafī al-Dīn (Lavignac, N^o. 2978). They were eclipsed, however, by two Arabic writers, the author (fl. 855—886 = 1451—1481) of the Muḥammad b. Murād Treatise (Brit. Mus., MS. Or. 2361), and Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Ḥamid al-Lādiqī (fl. 886—918 = 1481—1512), the author of the Risālat al-Fathāya (Brit. Mus., MS. Or. 6629). Al-Lādiqī is the last writer to deal in an appreciable way with the speculative theory of music which had been suscituated by the Scholiasts (cf. Kiesewetter, p. 88). As for the author of the Muḥammad b. Murād Treatise, we have in him an able mathematician who places the Arithmāṭikī of Nicomachus and Ibn Sīnā under contribution. He is replete with argument and carefully examines the statements of his predecessors on questions of accoustics. We find him saying that he had put certain theories to practical test and found them wanting. He gives divisions of the string other than those laid down by Šafī al-Dīn.

The contemporary encyclopædias also contain a section on music, the most noteworthy being the Durr al-Naṣīm (Vienna MS., NF., N^o. 4) or Irshād al-Kāṣid (Bibl. Ind., 1849) of Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm al-Akfānī (d. 749 = 1348), the Maḳālid al-ʿUlūm (Brit. Mus., MS. Or. 3143) attributed to ʿAlī b. Muḥammad al-Djurdjānī (d. 816 = 1413), and the Ummūdhādī al-ʿUlūm (Vienna MS., N. F., N^o. 7) of Muḥammad Shāh Čelebi b. Muḥammad al-Fanārī (d. 839 = 1435). To al-Djurdjānī may also be ascribed the Sharḥ Maw-lānā Mubārak Shāh, the most thorough and illuminating commentary on the theories of Šafī al-Dīn ʿAbd al-Muʿmin, and the most strikingly original treatment of the physical and physiological rudiments of sound (Brit. Mus., MS. Or. 2361). After the close of the ixth (xvth) century, treatises on the ʿilm al-musīkī are rare. Writers abound who profess to deal with it, but actually they are only concerned with the practical art. If any ʿilm is displayed in these later books it is the ʿilm al-nudjūm, and authors fill their pages with astrological tables linking up the twelve buyūt of the heavens with the twelve maḳāmāt, and so forth. Many treatises are written in verse, a form which, however much it may attract the pure adab lover, is scarcely suitable in dealing with a science. The author of one of these however, Šams al-Dīn al-Šaidāwī al-Dhahabī (or al-Dimashqī), is worthy of attention by reason of his use of a stave for the purpose of a musical notation, a device which may be traced to the year 1200 at least (Bodleian MS., Marsh, N^o. 82; Paris Bibl. Nat. MS., Arabe, N^o. 2480). In the West, treatises on the theory of music are scarcer still. Ibn Khaldūn (d. 809 = 1406) [q. v.] gives a glimpse of what was taught under this heading in his day (Prolog., ii. 410), but actual works are rare. A certain ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Fāstī wrote a treatise in 1650 entitled the Kitāb al-Djūmīʿ fī ʿilm al-Musīkī wa ʿl-Ṭubāʿ (Ahlwardt, Vers., N^o. 5521), but its author borrows his theory from older authorities (Farmer, An Old Moorish Lute Tutor, p. 14).

The Modern School. The chief feature of this school is the so-called quarter-tone system, and its most important theorist is Mikhā'il Mushāka (d. 1888) [q. v.]. The system was not invented or introduced by him as Parisot thought (Rapport, p. 21) because Mushāka himself tells us that it existed before his day (M. F. O. B., vi. 52, 105). Nor can we say that the sixteenth century was the period of its origin (cf. Lachmann, Grove's Dict. of Music, iii. 576) since we know that it was practised in the xviii century as Baron de Tott (La Borde, i. 436-439), Toderini (i. 243) and Murat (Fétis, ii. 363) have shown. Nor can it be traced in a MS. mentioned by Villoteau, as Land suggested (Recherches, p. 77-78), because this work can be identified with a MS. entitled al-Shādīyara dhāt al-Akmām (Brit. Mus., MS. Or. 1535) in which there is no mention of the quarter-tone theory. How did the system originate? Dr. Lachmann holds that it was due to the needs of transposition (Grove's Dict. of Music, iii. 567). On the other hand, Collangettes avers that in actual practice (for the lute is no longer fretted) it is simply the Systematist scale to which several smaller intervals have been added (p. 419). Some of the technical terms used in the system are of Persian origin such as those for the quarter-tone, three quarter-tone, and tone, nīm 'araba, tik 'araba, and barda. Further, as early as the xvth century, as we know from Ibn Ghāibi, Shihāb al-Dīn al-Adjamī, and the author of the Muḥammad b. Murād Treatise, intervals finer even than those of the Systematist School were being used in the newly-adopted shu'ab or modal extensions, which were not used in the time of Ṣafī al-Dīn 'Abd al-Mu'min, although they are part of the earlier (?) Persian system as reflected in the Bahdīyat al-Rūh by 'Abd al-Mu'min b. Ṣafī al-Dīn (Bodleian MS., Ouseley, No. 117). A Persian origin of the quarter-tone system is, therefore, not unlikely, although Maḥmūd Rāghib, a well known writer on Turkish music, argues in favour of a Greek origin (see the Turkish journals Milli Maḥimūc, May-Oct., 1927, and the Türkische Post, June and Aug., 1928). In the xviii century we have evidence (La Borde, i. 436) that the octave was divided into twenty-four equal parts of 50 cents each producing a scale comprising three major tones of 200 cents, each divided into four quarter-tones, and four minor tones of 150 cents, each divided into three quarter-tones:

TONES	Rast	Dūkāh	Sikāh	Djāhār-kāh	Nawā	Husnī	Arūdī	Māhūr
CENTS	200	150	150	200	200	150	150	Total	1200

Mushāka tells us that he was dissatisfied with the theorists of his day in regard to their division of the octave (cf. Murat's division of the octave into 55 commas). There was certainly a difference so far as Egypt was concerned, since one theorist divided even the minor tones into four parts as well as the major tones, thus giving twenty-eight intervals to the octave (Muḥammad b. Ismā'il Shihāb al-Dīn). At any rate, Mushāka attempted to lay down a principle that would establish the quarter-tone (rub) system on a proper basis. His method is by no means clear (Land, Recherches, p. 75; Collangettes, p. 417, 418), but Ellis (J. S. A., p. 497) and Parisot (Mus. orient., p. 15-16) believe that he was aiming at a quarter-tone scale of equal temperament, twenty-four to the octave, which was actually the scale (see La Borde, i. 436) that he found in use (cf. Collangettes, p. 419).

This is the same scale as the preceding with the exception that the base has been given a lower note in the system, i. e. yakāh instead of rast. The system of the quarter-tone scale is generally accepted to-day throughout the Islāmic Near East (Collangettes, p. 415), and even the Middle East ('Alī Naḳī Khān Wazīri).

Although in the Maghrib very little is written about the theory of music nowadays, yet in Egypt, Syria, Persia, and Turkey, there is no lack of books on the subject, as the Bibliography will show, although many of the treatises are merely manuals for practitioners. Even in Turkestan, under the auspices of the Soviet, works are being published. During the last decade a great fillip has been given to the study of the theory of music by the establishment of conservatories of music in the great Oriental capitals and chief cities, notably the Dār al-Aḥḥād at Constantinople and the Nādī 'l-Musīqī al-Sharḳī at Cairo.

MUSLIM (A.), part. IV of s-l-m, denotes the adherent of Islām [q.v.]. The term has become current in some European languages (also in the forms moslim, moslem), as a noun or as an adjective or as both, side by side with Muham-madan (in different forms). It has replaced Musulman (in different forms), except in French, where the latter term is used as a noun and as an adjective. The origin of musulman is probably muslim with the ending ān of the adjective in Persian. In some countries, e.g. Germany and the Netherlands, popular etymology has taken man for the vernacular "Mann, man", whence the plural forms Muselmänner, muselmänner etc. These forms have, however, become antiquated. — In Arabic literature the term Muslim is and has always been used to denote the adherents of Islām. See further the artt. IMĀN, AMĪR AL-MUSLIMĪN.

MUSLIM B. 'AKĪL, cousin of Ḥusain b. 'Alī. The latter, taking refuge in Mecca after the death of Mu'āwīya I, sent him to study the situation in Kūfa where the partisans of 'Alī were inviting him to come and proclaim himself caliph. Muslim there received promise of support from thousands of Shī'īs. He wrote to Ḥusain imploring him to hasten there and take command of the movement in person. In the meanwhile, the energetic 'Ubaid Allāh b. Ziyād had replaced the irresolute Nu'mān b. Bashir [q. v.]. Realising the seriousness of this change Muslim took refuge with Hānī' b. 'Urwa [q. v.]. A stratagem devised by the new governor soon revealed his hiding place. Hānī' having been captured, Muslim, abandoned by all his followers, wandered from one place of concealment to another. The descendants of Ash'ath b. Kaïs [q. v.] revealed the secret of his last hiding-place — a deed which earned the family the hatred of the Shī'a. The unfortunate 'Alid when discovered surrendered without resistance to the minions of 'Ubaid Allāh. His head was sent to the caliph Yazid I.

MUSLIM B. AL-ḤADJĪDĪ ABU 'L-ḤUSAIN AL-KUḤAIRĪ AL-NISĀBŪRĪ was born at Nisābūr in 202 (817) or in 206 (821). He died in 261 (875) and was buried at Naṣrābād, a suburb of Nisābūr. An anecdote regarding the cause of his death is related by Ibn Ḥajjār (see Bibliography). His fame is based upon his Ṣaḥīḥ, which, along with Bukhārī's book of the same name, enjoys the highest fame among the collections of traditions.

Muslim travelled widely to collect traditions, in Arabia, Egypt, Syria and 'Irāk, where he heard famous authorities such as Aḥmad b. Ḥanbal, Ḥarmala, a pupil of Shāfi'ī, and Ishāk b. Rāhūya. His Ṣaḥīḥ is said to have been composed out of 300,000 traditions collected by himself. He wrote a large number of other books, on fiqh, traditionists and biography, none of which seems to have survived.

The Ṣaḥīḥ differs from the other collections of canonical ḥadīth in that the books are not subdivided into chapters, whereas in Bukhārī's work the traditions act as examples of the tarājama's.

Still, it is not difficult to trace in the order of the traditions in Muslim's Ṣaḥīḥ a close connection with corresponding ideas of fiqh. As a matter of fact the groups of traditions have been provided with superscriptions which may be compared with Bukhārī's tarājama's; this was not, however, done by Muslim himself, as appears from the fact that the headings are not uniform in the different editions of the Ṣaḥīḥ.

A second difference between Muslim and the other collections consists in the fact that he pays peculiar attention to the isnād's, to such an extent that a tradition in his work is often followed by several different isnād's which serve as an introduction to either the same or to a slightly different matn. Such a new isnād is indicated in the text by ḥ (taḥwīl or ḥawāla "change"). Muslim is praised for his accuracy regarding this point; in other respects, however, Bukhārī is superior to him, as is even recognised by a man so devoted to him as al-Nawawī, who wrote upon the Ṣaḥīḥ a commentary, which in itself is a work of immense value for our knowledge of Muslim theology and fiqh.

Muslim has prefixed to his work an introduction to the science of tradition. The work itself consists of 52 books which deal with the common subjects of ḥadīth: the five pillars, marriage, slavery, barter, hereditary law, war, sacrifice, manners and customs, the Prophets and the Companions, predestination and other theological and eschatological subjects. The book closes with a chapter on the Kūr'ān (Tafsīr), the shortness of which is several times outweighed by the value of the Kitāb al-Imān, which opens the work, and which is a complete survey of the early theology of Islām.

MUSLIM B. KURAISH SHARAF AL-DAWLA ABU 'L-MAKĀRIM of the Arab family of the 'Ukailids [see 'OKAILIDS] was the most important ruler of the last great Arab dynasty in the Nearer East; during his reign the struggle between Fātimids and 'Abbāsids for supremacy in Syria and Mesopotamia was decided in favour of the latter. In the year 433 (1042) the 20 year old Muslim was chosen chief of the tribe after the death of his father Kuraish b. Badrān and succeeded him as ruler of Mōsul. Like most Arab rulers of the lands of the Euphrates he recognised the Fātimid caliph in Cairo as his suzerain partly because he was himself a Shī'ī. Quite early in his reign he began to cherish the ambitious plan of gradually extending the rule of his tribe over Mesopotamia. Every means of extending his power was taken by him. The first opportunity occurred when in 458 (1066) the Saldjūḳ Sultān Alp Arslān [q. v.] after conquering the Khwārizmians was proceeding to establish his supremacy in Syria. For this he had to entice the Arab chiefs from the sphere of influence of the Fāṭimid caliph and win them over to an alliance with him and to a recognition of the ʔAbbāsīd caliph. He therefore concluded an alliance with Muslim and granted him several towns in Mesopotamia. As a partner in this alliance Muslim defeated the Banū Kilāb who were vassals of the Fāṭimids. In 463 (1070) Alp Arslān died. The alliance was renewed with his son Sultān Malik Shāh [q. v.]. With his help Muslim was able a few years later to extend his power into Syria and take Aleppo. In 472 (1079) this town had no strong owner; the town was ruled by the Qāḍī al-Khutaʔī, and the citadel by one of the last Mirdāsīds [cf. the article ḤALAB]. There was a lack of provisions, as the town was continually threatened by enemies and the roads to it were cut off.

Damascus was in possession of Sultān Tutuḥ [q. v.], to whom his brother Malik Shāh had granted Syria, which was still to be conquered. It was natural for Tutuḥ to wish to bring Aleppo also into his power but the people did not care for him because of his cruelty and greed, shut their gates against him and appealed for help to Muslim. After Tutuḥ had withdrawn, Muslim approached the town with large supplies of provisions and after lengthy negotiations both town and citadel were handed over to him [see ḤALAB] and the Mirdāsīd chiefs received some smaller towns in compensation. He received a grant of confirmation from Malik Shāh, who did not want his brother to become too powerful, on paying a considerable annual tribute (£ 150,000). Muslim extended his territory by adding to it Ruhā (Edessa), Ḥarrān and a number of smaller fortresses, out of which he drove the leaders of Turkish bands so that his power stretched from Northern Syria to the Euphrates. Instead of being content with this his unbounded ambition made him overestimate his strength. Like Tutuḥ he had dreams of conquering all Syria, especially Damascus. He could not obtain the town from Malik Shāh who had granted Central Syria to Tutuḥ. He therefore again joined forces with the enemy of the Saldjūḳs, the Fāṭimid caliph, who promised to send troops to assist him to take Damascus. Muslim took advantage of the absence of Tutuḥ who was engaged in a campaign against the Byzantines in Antioch, to advance on Damascus. He occupied several towns in Central Syria, including Baalbek [q. v.]. But the Fāṭimid help did not materialise and Tutuḥ was called back by his vassals who hated Muslim. These circumstances and a rising in Ḥarrān forced him to retire. To replace Muslim who had deserted him, Malik Shāh bestowed his favour on the sons of a former vizier of the ʔAbbāsīds, Ibn Djaḥīr, and sent them against a supporter of the Fāṭimids, the Marwānīd Maṣṣūr, to deprive him of his chief possession Āmid. The latter found support from Muslim. They joined forces, were attacked at Āmid and withdrew into the fortified town leaving their other possessions undefended. Sultān Malik Shāh seized the opportunity to send ʔAmīd al-Dawla, another son of Djaḥīr, to Mōṣul, to take this city from Muslim who had in the meanwhile escaped from Āmid. When Muslim saw that he had lost his possessions he made overtures to the Sultān through the son of the vizier Nizām al-Mulk and humbly begged for mercy. The Sultān, who thought Muslim no longer dangerous, pardoned him and restored his lands to him but Muslim could not be at peace. Perhaps in secret agreement with Malik Shāh, he turned in 477 (1084) against a Saldjūḳ prince of Asia Minor, Sulaimān b. Ḳuṭulmish, who had taken Antioch from the Byzantines and demanded from him the same tribute as the Byzantines had paid. When Sulaimān refused to pay, he advanced against him with a force of Arabs and Turkomans. In the neighbourhood of Antioch in Ṣafar 478 (May 1085) the forces met, unexpectedly for Sharaf al-Dawla; his troops, who hated Muslim, went over to Sulaimān. Muslim was defeated and slain along with 400 of his Arabs (cf. Ibn al-ʔAdīm, fol. 68b). With his death the power of the ʔUḳailīds was at an end. They lost Aleppo on Muslim's death and only survived a few years longer (till 489 = 1090) as governors of Mōṣul [see ʔUḲAILIDS]. Muslim is described as an able and just man and his tolerance of Christians was remarkable. His rule is said to have been able and orderly and indeed he did bring the finances of Aleppo into order in a very short time after taking it. In any case he had wide vision and successfully endeavoured to maintain the power of the Arab tribes in Syria and Mesopotamia. It ceased with him; Turkish generals became the rulers of Syria and Mesopotamia.

MUSLIM B. ʔUḲBA of the tribe of the Banū Murra, a famous leader in the armies of the Sufyānīd caliphs. We know very little about the early stages of his career. We find him early established in Syria to which he probably came with the first conquerors. Completely devoted to the Umayyads and of great personal valour, he led a division of Syrian infantry at the battle of Siffin. But he failed in an attempt to take the oasis of Dūmat al-Djandal [q. v.] from ʔAlī. The caliph Muʔāwīya appointed him to take charge of the kharrāḍj, the finances, of Palestine, a lucrative office in which he refused to enrich himself. Muslim was prominent at the death-bed of Muʔāwīya. The caliph had charged him and Ḍaḥḥāk b. Ḳais [q. v.] with the regency until the return of Yazīd who was in Anatolia at the head of his troops. The confidence which the great Sufyānīd had in his loyalty is seen in his advice to his heir: "If you ever have trouble with the Ḥidjāz, just send the one-eyed man of the tribe of Murra there" (Muslim had only one eye). This time had now come.

Muslim had been a member of the embassy sent to Medina to bring the Anṣār back to obedience. All other efforts at conciliation having failed, Yazīd I decided to resort to force. In spite of Muslim's age and infirmities, Yazīd felt he was the man to command the expedition. He was obliged to travel in a litter so infirm was he. At Wādī ʔl-Ḳurā, Muslim met some Umayyads who had been driven out of Medina; these exiles informed him of the military situation of the town. When he reached the oasis of Medina, Muslim encamped on the ḥarra of Wāḳīm and for three days awaited the result of the negotiations begun with the rebels, Anṣār and descendants of the muhājirūn of the ʔuraish. On the fourth day, all overtures having been rejected, he made his plans for battle. It was a Wednesday, the third last day of Dhu l-Hiǧǧja 63 (Aug. 26-27, 683). After a slight initial advantage for the Anṣār, the battle ended at midday in the complete rout of the rebels. The Syrians followed them into Medina and began to plunder the city. Anti-Umayyad legend has much exaggerated the horrors and the duration of this pillaging which it extends to three days. On the day after the battle, Muslim's intervention restored order and he used the next few days in drawing up the case against and trying the principal leaders of the rebellion who had fallen into his power.

Having established order in the town, which he left in charge of Rawḥ b. Zinbā', in spite of the aggravation of his malady, he resumed his march on Mecca to deal with 'Abd Allāh b. al-Zubair [q. v.] who had rebelled against the Umayyads. Arriving at Muḥallal [q. v.] he became so ill that he had to stop. In obedience to the caliph Yazīd's instructions, he appointed to succeed him in command of the army Ḥusain b. al-Numair [q. v.], his second in command. He died at Muḥallal, where his tomb long continued to be stoned by the passers-by. Writers with Shi'a sympathies are fond of twisting the name Muslim into Musrif (criminal: an allusion to Qur'an, v. 36; vii. 79; xl. 29, 36 and passim). One statement which must be a ridiculous exaggeration puts his age at 90. Every thing, however, points to his having been born before the Hiǧra. He died a poor man. This disinterestedness is not the only feature in his character which makes us take him as one of the most representative of the types of this generation of soldiers and statesmen, whose talents contributed so much to establish the power of the Umayyads. Dozy described him as "un Bédouin mécréant". Muslim, it is true, retained all the proverbial uncouthness (djinfā') of the Banū Murra. But his whole career reveals the Murri general as a convinced Muslim of a rectitude rare in this period of unsettlement, which saw so many extraordinary vicissitudes of fortune and wavering loyalties.

MUSLIM B. AL-WALĪD AL-ANṢARĪ (called Ṣarī' al-Ḡhawānī = "he who is laid low by the fair ones", as was al-Ḳuṭāmī [q. v.] before him), an Arab poet of the early 'Abbāsīd period, born in Kūfa c. 130-140 (747-757), d. 208 (823) in Djurdjān. His father, a mawlā [q. v.] of the Anṣār [q. v.], was a weaver. Nothing is known of the poet's education. He probably got his literary training not from particular teachers or from books but in the busy life of the Mesopotamian cities, the intellectual life of which had risen to a still higher level with the advent of the 'Abbāsīds. Like most of his contemporaries he earned his living as a poet by writing panegyrics and was acquainted with many statesmen and emirs. Among the former were the general Yazīd b. Mazyad al-Ṣhaibānī (see Diwān, N^o. 1, 6, 10, 16, 49), Dāwūd b. Yazīd al-Muḥallabī (N^o. 20), Maṣṣūr b. Yazīd al-Ḥimyarī (N^o. 31) and many others. He gradually won the favour of the influential Barmakids (cf. N^o. 17, 40, 45) and of the caliph Hārūn al-Raṣhīd (N^o. 14, 41, 57); according to one story, he received his nickname from the latter on account of a verse of his (N^o. 3, 35; cf. also N^o. 23, 39). He even mentions the caliph's sister 'Abbāsa in an ode (N^o. 57, 10). The fall of the Barmakids about 187 (803) did not affect his career: he dedicated some of his odes to al-Amīn (N^o. 7, 28, 30) but his principal patron in later times was al-Ma'mūn's vizier Faḍl b. Sahl [q. v.]. Through his intervention he received from al-Ma'mūn an official post (probably ṣāhib al-barīd) in Djurdjān. He remained faithful to Faḍl b. Sahl until his death in 202 (818), and out of grief for him he wrote no more. There is a story told by his rāwī according to which he destroyed a considerable part of his poems before his death.

As regards the matter and style of his poems he was on quite traditional ground. In addition to his old-fashioned odes and elegies his satires are particularly interesting in this respect; in his polemics with the (otherwise little known) poet Ibn al-Ḳanbar on the merits of the Anṣār and Ḳuraish he revived the coarse and bitter tone of the polemics of an al-Farazdaq [q. v.] or an al-Ṭirimmaḥ [q. v.] on a similar subject. The two hundred years of development of Arabic poetry were naturally not without influence on him; in his nasibs we frequently find the style of an 'Umar b. Abī Rabī'a or al-'Abbās b. al-Aḥnaf [see IBN AL-AḤNAF], Muslim's contemporaries. His drinking songs deserve special mention. Although Nöldeke only very rarely finds in them "the natural effusion of Bacchantic joy as so frequently in Abū Nuwās [q. v.]", Arab critics are of another opinion. These two poets are to them practically the same in this respect and we must confess they are right. His drinking-songs are not only of great value for the descriptions of society and social life in the cities but from the point of view of poetry they are among the best of Muslim's work. If we must, as regards subject matter, number Muslim among the imitators of the old poets, in style he belongs to a more modern period. The historians of Arabic literature frequently mention him as the first to introduce the "new style", al-badi', with its tropes and figures. This is however not quite such a simple point; the "new style" arose only gradually in Arabic poetry, although Muslim with his contemporaries, Bashshār b. Burd [q. v.], Abū Nuwās etc., was one of the first who definitely struck out on the new path. The younger generation, especially Abū Tammām [q. v.], drove this new style to banality.

Muslim was on terms of friendship or enmity with many contemporary poets, e.g. Abū Nuwās, Abū l-'Atāhiya [q. v.], al-'Abbās b. al-Aḥnaf (who maliciously called him Ṣarī' al-Ḡhilān or Ṣarī' al-Kās; cf. Diwān, N^o. 44), Abū l-Shiṣ [q. v.], al-Ḥusain al-Ḳhalī' etc. His literary influence was not inconsiderable: Di'bil [q. v.] was his pupil (which did not prevent him exchanging satires with Muslim), Abū Tammām was particularly fond of studying his poems. His Diwān has been transmitted in very unsatisfactory fashion; it was collected in alphabetical order by al-Ṣulī [q. v.] but this edition has not come down to us (there are a few traces of it in the Kitāb al-Aḡḥānī); another story speaks of the collection made by the philologist al-Mubarrad. The only known European manuscript (Leyden) on which de Goeje's edition is based, contains only a portion of his poems (including a few spurious; see Barbier de Meynard, op. cit., p. 17 sq.); it represent an unknown edition and is of little importance for the criticism of the text.

Bibliography: Diwan Poetae Abu'l-Walid Moslim ibno'l-Walid al-Anṣārī cognomine Ḥario-l-ghawānī, ed. de Goeje, Leyden 1875 (unfortunately without an index of rhymes); the Cairo edition of 1325 (Maṭba'at Madrasat Wālidat 'Abbās al-Awwal, 8°, p. 97) although called al-Ṭab'a al-ūlā, repeats de Goeje's text in an alphabetical arrangement; the Bombay lithograph of 1303 (1886) is not accessible to me (see Rescher, op. cit.; it claims to give a better text than the Leyden edition; see Sarkis, op. cit.). Most of the sources are given by de Goeje in his edition (p. 228—310); the most important is of course the Kitāb al-Aghānī (p. 228—271). MUSNAD. [See ḤADĪTH, iv.]

AL-MUSTAḌĪF BI-AMRĪ 'LLĀH, ABŪ MUḤAMMAD AL-ḤASAN, 'Abbāsīd caliph, born on 23rd Sha'bān 536 (March 23, 1142), son of al-Mustandjīd and an Armenian slave named Ḥaḍḍa. After his father's death on 9th Rabi' II 566 (Dec. 20, 1170) al-Mustaḍīf succeeded him and at the beginning of the following year was formally recognised as caliph in Egypt also, which passed into the hands of the Aiyūbids at this time [see the article FĀṬIMIDS, ii. 96]. The assassins of al-Mustandjīd soon quarrelled among themselves. 'Aḍud al-Dīn [q. v.] whom al-Mustaḍīf had been forced to make vizier was dismissed by 567 (1171—1172) at the instigation of the emīr Ḳaimaz. In Dhu 'l-Kāda 570 (May 1175) the latter was about to attack the treasurer Zāhir al-Dīn b. al-'Aṭṭār, but the latter fled to the caliph whereupon Ḳaimaz began to besiege the palace of the latter. Al-Mustaḍīf appealed to the people to help him; the house of Ḳaimaz was pillaged and he himself fled but died soon afterwards and 'Aḍud al-Dīn again became vizier. Al-Mustandjīd already had quarrelled with Shimla, lord of Khūzistān. In 569 (1173—1174) a war broke out between the latter's nephew Ibn Shankā and al-Mustaḍīf; Ibn Shankā was soon taken prisoner and put to death. The insignificant al-Mustaḍīf died on the 2nd Dhu 'l-Kāda or, according to another statement, at the end of Shawwāl 575 (end of March 1180).

MUSTADJĀB-KHĀN BAHĀDUR (NAWĀB), thirteenth son of the celebrated Rohilla leader Ḥāfiẓ al-Mulk Ḥāfiẓ Raḥmat-Khān (1707—1774) and author of a biography of his father, which he wrote in Persian under the title Gulistān-i Raḥmat. Ḥāfiẓ Raḥmat-Khān, who was an Afghān of the tribe of Yūsuf-zāi by descent, had been since 1748 a chief in Rohilkhand (Katehr) and throughout his life waged a bitter warfare with the Mahrātās. He fell in 1774 in a fight at Mirānpūr Katra where he was fighting against the combined forces of the Nawāb of Oudh Shudjā' al-Mulk and the English. Warren Hastings' act in supporting the Nawāb with English troops became the subject of a judicial investigation. Mustadjāb Khān's book describes Ḥāfiẓ Raḥmat Khān as a fine representative of Afghān chivalry and contains much of value for studying the relations between the individual Afghān tribes.

MUṢṬAFĀ I, the fifteenth Ottoman Sulṭān, was born in the year 1000 (1591) as son of Muḥammad III. He owed his life to the relaxation of the kānūn authorising the killing of all the brothers of a new sulṭān, and was called to succeed his brother Aḥmad I at the latter's death on November 22, 1617. But his weakmindedness — which is said to have him made escape death on account of superstitious fear of Aḥmad — made him absolutely incapable of ruling. Aḥmad's son 'Oṭhmān, who felt himself entitled to the succession, had little difficulty in procuring Muṣṭafā's deposition in a meeting of the Imperial Diwān, by the kızlar ağha, the mufī and the kā'im-makām, the grand-vizier Khālil Pasha [q. v.] being absent. This happened on February 26, 1618.

Unexpectedly Muṣṭafā I was again called to the throne when, on May 19, 1622, the rebellion of the Janissaries broke out against 'Oṭhmān II. He was taken by force from his seclusion in the ḥarem and the Janissaries forced the 'ulamā' to acknowledge him as sulṭān. The next day 'Oṭhmān was killed and until June the grand-vizier Dāwūd Pasha, the man responsible for the murder, remained in power. Then he was deposed by the wālide. The real masters were the Janissaries and Sipāhī's; several grand-viziers were nominated and deposed again at their pleasure. The Sipāhī party began, after some time, to exact vengeance for 'Othmân and in January 1623, when Gurdji Muḥammad Paṣha [q. v.] was grand-vizier, Dāwūd Paṣha was killed. Soon the Janissary party came again to influence under the grand-vizier Mere Ḥusain Paṣha (Feb. 3). The latter succeeded in maintaining himself until August 20; then the general feeling amongst the 'ulamā' and the people, combined with the steadily growing opposition in the provinces against the tyranny of the militar in the capital, as manifested by the action of Saif al-Dīn Oghlu in Tripolis and still more by the revolt of Abāza Paṣha [q. v.] in Erzerüm, brought about Mere Ḥusain's deposition. The new grand-vizier, Kemānkeṣh 'Alī Paṣha, together with the mufī, deposed the sultān on Sept. 10, 1623 and called Aḥmad's son Murād to the throne.

During all his reign Muṣṭafā had continued to give signs of his complete mental aberration; he died in 1638 and was buried in the Aya Sofia. The only important international act that took place during his reign was the peace concluded with Poland in February 1623.

MUŞTAFÂ II, the twenty-second Ottoman sultān, was a son of Muḥammad IV. Born in 1664, he succeeded to his uncle Aḥmad II on February 6, 1695, at a time when the empire was at war with Austria, Poland, Russia and Venice. The new sultān in a remarkable khaṭṭ-i sherīf proclaimed a Holy War and carried out, against the decision of the Diwān, his desire to take part in the campaign against Austria. Before his departure a mutiny of the Janissaries had cost the grand vizier Defterdār 'Alī Paṣha his life (April 24, 1693) and the campaign was led by the new grand vizier Elmās Muḥammad Paṣha [q. v.]. The Turkish army operated not without success in the region of Temesvár, taking Lippha, Lugos and Sebes. The Venetians had been beaten in February near Chios and were beaten again in September. In October Azof was delivered from the Russian siege. Next year the sultān and his army were again successful in raising the siege of Temesvár, but no part of the lost territory could be recovered from the Austrians. That year, however, the Russians took Azof. The campaign of 1696 is memorable for the heavy defeat inflicted on the Turks near Zenta on the Theiss (Sept. 11), where Elmās Muḥammad lost his life, while the sultān, who had already crossed the river, had to fly to Temesvár. The imperial seal fell into the hands of the Austrians. From Temesvár Muṣṭafā nominated 'Amūdja Zāde Ḥusain [q. v.], of the Köprülü family, his grand vizier. Under this very able statesman peace was at last concluded. In 1698 the grand vizier went to the frontier, while the sultān stayed at Adrianople, but the peace negotiations were pursued more earnestly than the war. In October of that year began the peace negotiations at Karlowitz (Turk. Ḳarlofa, see CARLOWITZ) on the Danube, where on February 26, 1699 peace was concluded with Austria, Poland and Venice. With Russia only an armistice was concluded to be followed in 1700 by a definite peace. The English and Dutch ministers took part in the negotiations as intermediaries. The peace treaty meant the loss of Hungary and Transylvania, with the exception of the district of Temesvár; Poland recovered Kameniecz, while Venice had to cede Lepanto and some other towns in Morea. With Russia the Dniestr became the frontier.

The peace enabled the grand vizier to bring order into the affairs of state, which had suffered by the long and disastrous war. The Re'is Efendi Rāmi and the mufī Feizullāh, who had great influence with the sultān, were his collaborators. Some interior troubles were easily appeased; only in 1701 a campaign in 'Irāk was needed to take Baṣra from the hands of a local party that had submitted to Persia. Fortresses were put in a better state of defence and a new Kānūn-nāme was issued for the fleet. Ḥusain Paṣha resigned his offices in Sept. 1702 and died soon afterwards. His deposition was partly the work of the mufī Feizullāh, who made the sultān appoint in his place Daltāban Muḥammad Paṣha. When the latter showed himself of too warlike a disposition and caused at the same time unrest in the capital by favouring the claims of the Tatar Khān, the influence of the mufī caused his deposition and execution (Jan. 1703). Rāmi [q. v.] became grand-vizier. Rāmi's measures to enforce the authority of the central government were salutary but made him many enemies; moreover the Janissaries were not contented with a grand-vizier who was not a military man. The general unrest was increased by the permanent residence of sultān Muṣṭafā in Adrianople. All these circumstances brought about in July 1703 a Janissary revolt in Constantinople, directed at first against Rāmi Paṣha and against the mufī. The latter's deposition was obtained without much difficulty, but the rebellion continued under the leadership and organisation of a certain Ḥasan Agha. A deputation of the rebels to Adrianople was imprisoned and treated in an insolent way. Too late the sultān promised to come himself to Constantinople; the 'ulamā' were constrained to give a fatwā authorising the sultān's deposition. In August 1703 a rebel army went on its way to Adrianople, after having agreed on Muṣṭafā's brother Aḥmad as successor to the throne. When Muṣṭafā saw himself at last abandoned by his own Janissaries he resigned on August 21. He died soon afterwards on Dec. 31, 1703 and was buried in the Aya Sofia. He is rightly considered as a wise and good ruler, as is proved by his careful choice of able statesmen. He wrote poems under the takhalluṣ of Meftūnī and Iḳbālī. Under him the imperial tughra appeared for the first time on the Ottoman coins.

MUSTAFA III, the twenty-sixth ruler of the Ottoman Empire, was one of the younger sons of Ahmad III and was born on Šafar 14, 1129 = January 28, 1717 (Sigill-i 'othmānī, i. 80). When he succeeded to the throne, after 'Othmān III's death on October 30, 1757, his much more popular brother and heir to the throne, Muḥammad, had recently died, in December 1756. Turkey enjoyed at that time, since the peace of Belgrad of 1739, a period of peace with her neighbours. Since December 1756 the very able Rāghib Pasha [q. v.] was grand vizier and remained the real administrator of the empire until his death in 1763. Rāghib had removed from the capital all those who might have counteracted his influence, taking at the same time wise financial measures and endeavouring to keep the military forces in good condition. The sultān meanwhile, who was of a vivid and active temperament, busied himself, like his predecessor, with regulations concerning the clothes of his non-Muslim subjects and the appearance in public of Muḥammadan women; at this time there was also taken up again the never realized plan of linking the gulf of İzniḳ with the Black Sea [see ŠABANDJA]. The Seven Years' War in Europe (1756—1763) had not remained without influence on the policy of the Porte; after long hesitation Turkey agreed at last to conclude a treaty of friendship with Prussia (March 29, 1761). Rāghib himself was inclined to conclude even an alliance, but the sultān and the influential 'ulamā' were peacefully minded.

After Rāghib's death Muṣṭafā began to reign himself and different grand viziers succeeded one another at short intervals. From 1765 to 1768 the grand vizierate was held by Muḥsin Zāde Muḥammad Pasha, under whom the disastrous war with Russia broke out. Difficulties with Russia had already commenced in 1762, when Russia had supported the ruler of Georgia against the Turkish Pasha of Akhişkha (Čaldır); here, as well as in Montenegro, Russian emissaries worked in secret against the Turkish rule. Moreover the Khān of the Crimea repeatedly complained about Russian military measures on his northern frontier, while the party of the Confederates in Poland urgently appealed for the intervention of the Porte against the aggression of Catherine's government on Polish liberty. In these circumstances the Porte had no more interest in seeking the alliance of Prussia, where, in 1764, Ahmad Rasmī Efendi had gone as envoy, of which embassy he afterwards wrote his well-known Sefāret-nāme. The sultān himself was decidedly anti-Russian, but the diplomacy of the Russian minister Obreskoff and the pacifism of the 'ulamā' delayed the war, until, in August 1768, Muṣṭafā obtained from the then muftī Walī al-Dīn a fatwā authorizing the war with Russia. War was declared only on October 6, after the dismissal of the grand vizier Muḥsin Zāde, who had advised delay until the spring. Obreskoff was imprisoned in Vedit Kule.

The war began in January with destructive raids of the Crimean Tatars in southern Russia under their newly appointed Khān Kırım Girāy; at that time de Tott was an eye-witness with the Tatar army. In March 1769 the then grand-vizier Muḥammad Emin Pasha left Constantinople with the Holy Banner; on this occasion there was an outburst of Muḥammadan fanaticism against the Austrian internuntio and his party, who had come to witness the procession. While the grand vizier went to the Dobruča, the Russians made an attack on Chotin (Turk. Khočin), which they were able to take only in August. In the meantime the grand-vizier had been deposed and executed; his place was taken by Moldowandji 'Alī Pasha, who had encounters with the Russians on both sides of the Dniestr. Other Russian armies took Jassy and Bucarest and advanced into Transcaucasia. The year 1770 was still more disastrous for Turkey. The Russians reached, through Rumania, the Danube and in the autumn they took Kilia, Bender and Braila, in the immediate neighbourhood of the Turkish general headquarters in Baba Dağı. In the same year a Russian fleet appeared in the Mediterranean; several towns in Morea were conquered and evacuated again, but the heaviest blow was the burning of the Turkish fleet in the bay of Çeşme (July 1770). Moldowandji 'Alī — already dispossessed of his grand vizierate — was sent to strengthen, with de Tott, the defences of the Dardanelles. But the Russian fleet had ceased to be a danger and the Danube campaign of the following spring also was rather favourable for the Turks. In the beginning of 1771 the military organisation had been improved. That year, however, the Russians forced the isthmus of Perekop and conquered the entire Crimea. This was a definite loss for Turkey, and a great majority of the Tatars declared their allegiance to the Russian empress. The Turks were able, however, to remain in Otakow and Kilburnu. In Constantinople meanwhile laborious diplomatic negotiations went on with the envoys of the European powers who offered to mediate, notably Austria and Prussia. With Austria the Porte concluded in July 1771 a secret "treaty of subsidy" for diplomatic services, while the Porte disinterested herself completely in Polish affairs, going so far as to propose a partition of Poland. The result was an armistice, concluded in June 1772 at Giurgewo, followed by the peace congress of Fočani (August 1772), where Turkey's chief representative was the arrogant nishāndji 'Othmān Efendi. After the failure of the negotiations the armistice was prolonged and a new conference began at Bucarest in November. These negotiations were again broken off in March 1773, mainly from lack of agreement on the subject of the Turkish fortresses on the Black Sea; as to the Crimea, Turkey had already agreed to a formula such as was later adopted in the peace of Küçük Kainardji. In Constantinople it was chiefly the 'ulamā' who had opposed the Russian peace conditions. The war in 1773 was not very eventful; the general headquarters had been transferred to Şumna after Muḥsin Zāde had become grand vizier a second time (Dec. 1771). The Russians won a victory at Karaman in the Dobruča, but attacked Silistra and Warnă in vain. Bairūt was bombarded by Russian ships in connection with the rebellion of the Mamlūk 'Alī Bey [q. v.] in Egypt, who was supported by them. In the summer of 1773 sultān Muṣṭafā made known his desire to accompany the army against the Russians, but he was prevented from doing so by his entourage and by his illness, to which he succumbed on December 24, 1773, to be succeeded by his brother 'Abd al-Ḥamid I. Muṣṭafā was buried in his own türbe, connected with the Lāleli Djāmi'i, which he had begun to build in 1759 (Hadīqat al-Djāwāmi', i. 23).

Muştafâ III is praised in the Turkish sources as a good ruler. He had a special liking for religious disputations in his presence and was particularly interested in astrological calculations. He took an interest in the least important affairs and this prevented him from such a real statesmanlike insight as was much wanted in the later years of his reign. In his way he was an "enlightened despot". But even a more able ruler would probably have failed to save Turkey from her military inferiority against the Russian armies; measures of military organisation were taken with the aid of de Tott, but this could not prevent the desertion of the troops from assuming disastrous dimensions during certain episodes of the war. Besides the Lâleli Dîjami', Muştafâ built the Ayazma Dîjami'i at Scutari for his mother; he caused a new suburb of Stambul to be built outside the Yeñi Kapu. His reign is further marked by the extremely severe earthquake that laid large parts of the capital in ruins in 1766.

Bibliography: The Ta'rikkh of Wâsif [q.v.] is the chief historical source for Muştafâ's reign; Wâsif himself played a prominent part as secretary during the long-drawn-out peace negotiations with Russia. The well-known Aḥmad Rasmi Efendi wrote a history of the war with Russia under the title Khulâṣat al-I'tibâr (G. O. W., p. 310). The Talkhîṣât of the learned grand vizier Râghib Pasha (*G. O. MUŞTAFÂ IV, twenty-ninth sultân of the Ottoman Empire, was a son of 'Abd al-Ḥamid I and was born on Sha'bân 26, 1193 = Sept. 19, 1778 (Meḥmed Thüreyyâ, Sidjill-i'othmânî, i. 81). When the anti-reform party, headed by the kâ'im-maḳâm Mūsâ Pasha and the muftî, and supported by the Janissaries and the auxiliary troops of the Yamaḳs had dethroned Selim III [q.v.] on May 29, 1807, Muştafâ was proclaimed sultân. Immediately afterwards, the unpopular niḡâm-i dîjedid corps was dissolved and Kaḅaḳdjî Oghlu, the leader of the Yamaḳs, was made commander of the Bosphorus fortresses. Turkey was at that time at war with Russia and England, but peace negotiations had already begun and, moreover, the foreign affairs of the empire were really governed by general European politics. A secret article annexed to the peace treaty of Tilsit (July 7, 1807) had in view — already at that time — a conditional partition of Turkey. Turkey's ally, France, tried to urge a peace with Russia and obtained a Russo-Turkish armistice at Slobosia (near Gîngewo), by the terms of which the Danube principalities were to be evacuated. When in the end Russia was unwilling to put into effect the terms of the armistice, relations with France became strained (departure of Sebastiani in April 1808) and new preparations for war followed, while overtures were made to England; the English admiral Codrington had already entered into negotiations with 'Alî Pasha of Yanina.

Meanwhile the kâ'im-maḳâm and the muftî were the real rulers in Constantinople; the grand vizier Çelebi Muştafâ Pasha remained with the army in Adrianople and had no influence. The Janissaries and Yamaḳs, however, continued to be rebellious; measures had to be taken against them and the sultân himself went so far as to favour secret plans for restoring the niḡâm-i dîjedid under another name. In December 1807 Mūsâ Pasha was dismissed from the office of kâ'im-maḳâm — on account of dissen-sion with the muftî — and was succeeded by Taiyâr Pasha. The latter, dismissed in his turn, fled to Bairakdâr Muştafâ Pasha [q.v.], an acknowledged friend of the reform party, in Rusçuk. From here began the action against the régime in the capital. Bairakdâr went first to Adrianople and joined forces with the grand vizier in June 1808. They arrived in July before the gates of Constantinople at Dâwûd Pasha. Sultân Muştafâ came there on July 23 to accept their terms, which for the moment were only the destruction of the ruling party and of the Yamaḳs. On July 28 Bairakdâr, after having seized the sultân's seal from the grand vizier, began to act on his own account. He went with his troops to the palace, where the sultân — who had left shortly before for an excursion — returned in haste. He had only the time to order the execution of Selim III but was deposed immediately afterwards by the intruders, who put his younger brother Maḥmûd on the throne. After having passed some months in confinement, he was killed by order of the new sultân on November 16, in the days of the general revolt against Bairakdâr's régime, when the existence of the former sultân had become a real danger for Maḥmûd's position. Muştafâ was buried in the türbe of his father 'Abd al-Ḥamid I, near the Yeñi Dîjami'.

MUŞTAFÂ, name of several princes belonging to the Ottoman dynasty:

1. Muştafâ Çelebi, eldest son of Bâyezîd I; the date of his birth is not recorded. He disappeared in the battle of Angora (July 1402). This Muştafâ is the first Ottoman prince to bear this name, which, like such other names as Bâyezîd and Murâd, originated in mystical circles in Asia Minor in the xivth century. According to the Byzantine sources, this Muştafâ is the same as the person called by the majority of the Turkish sources:

Dözme Muştafâ, who came forward in 1419 as pretender to the Ottoman throne against Muḥammad I. He was supported by Mirçe of Wallachia and by the Izmir Oghlu Dîjunaid [q.v.]. Near Selânik they were beaten by Muḥammad and Muştafâ took refuge in the town together with Dîjunaid; the Byzantine commander refused to give them up to the sultân and sent them to Constantinople. In a treaty concluded with the emperor Manuel, the sultân promised to pay a yearly subsidy to provide for the maintenance of the prisoners, while the emperor undertook to keep them in custody. This treaty was observed until Muḥammad's death; Mustafa was relegated to a monastery on the island of Lemnos. After Muhammad's death, however, he was released and the emperor supported him against Murād II [q. v.]. In a short time he was master of the Ottoman territories in Europe; the army sent against him under Bāyazīd Pasha went over to his side at Sazlı Dere between Seres and Adrianople. He was joined likewise by great feudal lords like the sons of Ewrenos. He soon felt strong enough to break his alliance with the Greeks and expelled them from the recently taken Gallipoli. After having resided some time in Adrianople, he went together with Djunaid to Asia Minor, where they met Murād's army in a battle near the bridge of Ulubad. By the treacherous retreat of Djunaid, Mustafa was beaten and fled to Gallipoli and Adrianople; from here he tried to reach Wallachia, but was taken by Murād's troops and executed at Adrianople. All this happened in the first year of Murād II's reign (1421—1422).

Bibliography: Ducas and Chalcondylas relate the events before Muhammad's death; so does the chronicle of Neshri, but the other early Turkish chronicles know only of what happened in the beginning of Murād's reign. On coins struck by Mustafa: T. O. E. M., xv. 387; von Hammer, G. O. R., i.; Mehmed Zeki, Maktûl Shehzâdeler, Constantinople 1332, p. 45 sqq.

2. Mustafa, son of Muhammad I and younger brother of Murād II, was supported as pretender against the latter in 1423, while Murād besieged Constantinople. This Mustafa was about 13 years of age; he had fled to the Karaman Oghlu with his lâlâ Ilyās. From here they took İznik and marched against Brusa. Mustafa even went for some time to Constantinople, but Murād, raising the siege, returned to Brusa, where Mustafa was delivered to him by the treachery of Ilyās; he was executed by the sultan's orders.

3. Mustafa, son of Sulaimân the Magnificent, was born in 921 (1515) (Mehmed Thüreyyâ, Sidjill-i ʾothmânî, i. 79). He had been made, in 1533, governor of Şarukhân in Maghnisa; later he became governor of Konya, while Sulaimân's favourite son Muhammad was given Şarukhân. When Muhammad died in 1545, Şarukhân was given to Mustafa's younger half-brother Selim and he himself was placed in Amasia. This setting aside of the elder, more talented and more brilliant son was the work of Khurram Sultân (Roxelane), mother of Selim, and of her son-in-law, the grand vizier Rustam Pasha. Already some years before there had been signs of Sultân Sulaimân's lack of confidence in Mustafa's loyalty. When, in 1553, a new campaign had been planned against Persia, of which Rustam was to be the commander, Sulaimân decided at the last moment to accompany the army himself, being warned again against Mustafa through the intermediary of Selim's favourite Şamsî Agha. Selim joined him on the way and, when at Eregli near Konya, prince Mustafa came to pay homage to his father, he was killed by order of Sulaimân on October 6, 1553. His corpse was conveyed to Brusa and buried in the türbe of Murād II. This execution of an Ottoman prince is one of those events that made the deepest impression in the empire. It caused immediately the threatening of a Janissary revolt, which could only be appeased by the dismissal of the grand vizier Rustam Pasha. It is said that his brother Djihāngir died soon after him of grief; a minor son of his was killed in Brusa shortly after his execution. Mustafa had also made himself beloved as a patron of poets and scholars, amongst whom Surûri is to be mentioned in the first place. Several poets lamented his death in elegies, in which Rustam and others were openly accused of having caused the murder; best known is the merthiye of the poet Yahyâ Bey. Mustafa wrote poetry under the takhalluş Mukhlîsî. There is further strong evidence for the probability that Mustafa wrote a history of his father's reign, a Sulaimân-nâme, under the pseudonym Ferdi (cf. G. O. W., p. 83).

MUSTAFA KAMIL PASHA, leader of the second nationalist movement in Egypt (on the first, see the articles 'ARABÎ PASHA and KHEDIVE).

The son of an Egyptian engineer, he was born in Cairo on 1st Radjab 1291 (Aug. 14, 1874), studied at the Khedivial school of law there and after taking his examination went to study in Toulouse where in 1894 he took his "licence en droit". When still a student of 18 he began his political activity and entered into personal relations with the Khedive 'Abbās II [q. v.] On his return from France he founded in 1894 the second Egyptian national party (al-Hizb al-waṭanî) with the object of inducing England by appeals to justice to abandon the occupation and restore the complete independence of Egypt. Later he also aimed at getting the Sūdān handed back to Egypt and tried to prepare the Egyptians by modern education for parliamentary government. As the representative of his party he spent each year a considerable time in Europe, especially France where he consorted with politicians and journalists and conducted a vigorous propaganda for his object. All his life he was very friendly with the journalist Juliette Adam; he had dealings with Rochefort, Drumont, Col. Marchand, Pierre Loti and in 1896 had a correspondence with Gladstone. Later he visited Berlin, London, Vienna, Budapest, Geneva and Constantinople where he was highly thought of because he insisted on the Sultân's suzerainty over Egypt; Sultân 'Abd al-Hamid II [q. v.] gave him in 1904 the title of Pasha. In Cairo he founded in 1898 a school for training the youth in nationalist ideas, and in 1899 started the newspaper al-Liwā (The Banner), which appeared early in 1900, had a great success and from 1907 appeared also in English and French editions. From 1902 he published the nationalist quarterly Madjallat al-Liwā. In his speeches and articles he emphasised his aims with fiery eloquence; at the same time he expressed his approval of the building of the Turkish strategic Hîdjâz railway and his sympathy with the Japanese in their war with Russia (1904—1905). Muştafā Kāmil also regularly emphasised the privileged position of Muslims as belonging to the state religion and recognised the sultān as caliph and head of Islām and thus contributed to the pan-Islāmic movement which began early in the twentieth century.

The "Entente Cordiale" concluded on April 8, 1904 between England and France was a severe blow to him and the nationalist party; by it France, in return for a free hand in Morocco, dropped its objections to the English occupation of Egypt. The Egyptian nationalists thus lost all hope of open or secret support from the French government and were thrown upon their own resources. This situation caused Muştafā Kāmil to redouble his energy and in vigorous speeches and writings against France and England, in travelling and negotiating with statesmen of different lands, he endeavoured to make Egypt's point of view clear. As a result of the intensity of his agitation there was a breach between him and the Khedive 'Abbās II (Oct. 1904); on the other hand, his following in Egypt rapidly increased and began to be troublesome to Lord Cromer who had so far treated the new nationalism created by Muştafā Kāmil as a "quantité négligeable". The Dinshawā'i (a village near Tanṭā in the Delta) affair gave the nationalists a great stimulus; on June 13, 1906, some English officers out shooting were said to have wounded an Egyptian woman and were attacked by fellāḥin with clubs and one of the officers was killed. A special court set up by the English government sentenced four fellāḥin to death and 17 to prison or flogging and the sentence was carried out next day. The indignation in Egypt and Europe rose to great heights and even in the House of Commons the authorities were criticised. Muştafā Kāmil hurried to London and discussed the matter with the Prime Minister, Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, whom he endeavoured to convince of the necessity of recalling Lord Cromer and giving greater freedom to Egyptians. On this occasion he mentioned as suitable representatives in a parliamentary system of government all those Egyptians who in the later political movement after the war played important parts. On his return to Egypt, through the press and mass meetings in which he urged Egyptians to unite against England, he gave a great stimulus to the nationalist movement and soon had the satisfaction of seeing Lord Cromer recalled — although he was not at all the only cause of this — and replaced by Sir Eldon Gorst. The latter adopted a milder tone with the Egyptians, was on good terms with the Khedive and endeavoured to support him with a newly founded party. Muştafā Pasha attacked this representative of England vigorously also, in Oct. 1907 put his national party on a broader basis and summoned it to a "national congress", which met on Dec. 7 of the same year in Cairo; 1,017 delegates from all over Egypt appeared and after a speech by Muştafā Kāmil which carried them away the latter was elected life-President of the party. This was however his swan-song — he had been ill since the summer of 1906; he died on Feb. 10, 1908 (8th Muḥarram 1326) at the age of 34 of a slow internal trouble (intestinal tuberculosis). The rumour spread that he had been poisoned at English instigation. His funeral was an impressive expression of the national grief.

Muştafā's creations did not long survive him and his party, which produced no leader to equal him and was broken up by dissensions, gradually sank into insignificance. Although he obtained no positive results by his agitation, he prepared the way for the third and greatest nationalist movement (under Sa'd Zagh'lūl Pasha from Nov. 13, 1918). It is to his credit that he conducted his whole campaign without any appeal to force, which would have been quite useless against the British Empire, and without bloodshed.

Of his numerous writings only the more important can be mentioned; many of them were only printed after his death, some in the great (never completed) biography by his brother 'Alī Bey Fahmī Kāmil: al-Maṣ'ala 'l-sharḥiyya (1898 and 1909); Miṣr wa 'l-Ihtilāl al-indjilīzī (collection of speeches and essays, Cairo 1313); Difā' al-Miṣrī 'an Bilādihi, Cairo 1324 (1906); al-Shams al-mushrikha (Cairo 1904, on the Russo-Japanese war); Lettres françaises-égyptiennes (Cairo 1909; also in Arabic and English transl. His letters to Juliette Adam); Egyptiens et Anglais, Paris 1906 (speech of July 4, 1895 in Toulouse); Le péril anglais, Paris 1899; What the National Party wants (Cairo 1907, speech of Oct. 22, 1907).

AL-MUŞTAFĀ LI-DĪN ALLĀH. [See NĪZAR B. AL-MUSTANĪR.]

MUŞTAFĀ PASHA BAIRAKDĀR, Turkish grand vizier in 1808, was the son of a wealthy Janissary at Rusçuk, born about 1750. He distinguished himself in the war with Russia under Muştafā III, and acquired in these years the surname of bairakdār. After the war he lived on his estates near Rusçuk, and acquired the semi-official position of a'yān of Hezārgṛād and later of Rusçuk. With other a'yāns he took part in an action against the government at Adrianople, but became finally a reliable supporter of the government. Having already received the honorary offices of kapîdîlî bashî and of mîr akhor, he was, in 1806, promoted to the rank of Pasha of Silistria and at the same time was appointed ser-asker on the Danube frontier against the advancing Russian army. This made him one of the most influential men in Rûm-ili. He had become a zealous supporter of Selîm III's reform policy and, after that sultân's deposition, it was to him that the enemies of the new reactionary government turned. In June 1808 he was joined by the dismissed kâ'im-makâm of the grand vizierate in Constantinople, Taîyâr Pasha; from Rusûk they went to Adrianople, where they joined forces with the grand vizier Çelebi Muştafâ Pasha. So the entire Rumelian army marched against the capital, where they dictated their will to sultân Muştafâ IV (July 23). On July 26 Bairakdâr (or 'Alemdâr as he was called officially) was appointed commander in chief and on July 28, after having taken by force the sultân's seal from the weak grand vizier, he marched with his troops to the palace of the sultân, under the pretext of bringing back the holy standard of the prophet. At first he was allowed only to enter the first court of the serây, while sultân Muştafâ — who had been absent — returned in haste from the seaside. As Bairakdâr had made known his intention of restoring Selîm III to the throne, Muştafâ had just time to have his predecessor killed. But immediately afterwards he was himself deposed and Bairakdâr now recognized Maḥmûd II [q. v.] as sultân.

After this began the short personal regime of Bairakdâr Muştafâ Pasha as grand vizier. He had a number of the supporters of the former sultân executed, arranged a magnificent funeral for Selîm III and began to form a corps of troops called this time niẓâmîlî asker. At the same time he summoned a great imperial conference in the capital, to which all the high-placed officials of the empire were invited. Many of them answered the appeal and subscribed to the extensive programme of reforms which the grand vizier laid before them in a solemn meeting in the first days of October and which was also approved of by a fatwâ of the mufîz. But the precipitation with which the new measures were taken in hand and the tactless procedure in the abolition of long established abuses, made him ever more unpopular. The influential ulamâ were also alienated by the exaggerated reforming zeal. His only support were his Rumelian troops and a small number of friends, such as Begdî Efendi and Râmîz Pasha, together with Kâdî Pasha of Karamân who had remained in the capital after the imperial conference. Matters came to a head on November 14, 1808, in the last days of Ramaḍân 1222, by a rebellion of the Janissaries. The night following that day they surrounded the grand vizier's residence and set the quarter on fire. Bairakdâr, surprised by the fire, saw no way of escape; he hid himself in a tower of his palace, where his body was found three days afterwards, after the fire was quenched. The rumour had been spread that Bairakdâr had escaped, which had caused much uncertainty.

The grand vizier was buried in the fortress of Yedi Kule, where his bones were dug up in 1911 during railway works; they were transported to the mosque of Zeineb Sultân.

MUŞTAFÂ PASHA BUSHATLÎ, the last hereditary wazîr of Scutari (hence often called İSHKODRALÎ), the son of the celebrated Kara Maḥmûd Pasha Bushatlı [q. v.], succeeded his uncle İbrâhîm Pasha about 1810 and received the rank of wazîr in 1812. In 1820 the sandjak of Berat and in 1824 those of Ohrid and Elbasan were put under his government and he received the title of Ser'asker. Nevertheless like his father he aimed at greater independence and when Maḥmûd II's reforms threatened to deprive him of his hereditary rights and privileges, he became strongly hostile to the Sultân and maintained friendly relations with the Serbian prince Miloš, the discontented Bosniaks (cf. i., p. 757) and the Egyptian Muḥammad 'Alî (cf. J. Deny, Sommaire des archives turques du Caire, p. 264 and 553). He therefore maintained quite a passive attitude in the Russo-Turkish war (1828) and only towards the end of it, in May 1829, did he appear with his Albanians on the Danube (Vidin, Rahovo), then went on to Sofia and Philippopolis, but without taking any active part in the fighting.

On the conclusion of peace the Porte (beg. of 1831) demanded of Muştafâ Pasha that he should hand over the districts previously held by him (Dukakin, Debar, Elbasan, Ohrid and Trgovište) to the grand vizier Reshid Mehmed Pasha (on him cf. Sidjill-i 'othmânî, ii. 391) and carry through certain reforms in Scutari itself. Muştafâ Pasha resisted and with the financial and moral support of prince Miloš, led an army in the middle of March 1831 against the grand vizier. He was joined by the other Pashas of northern Albania and old Serbia who objected to reforms. The rebels had at first certain successes including the occupation of Sofia but they were completely routed at Prilep by the regular troops led by the grand-vizier (beginning of May). Muştafâ Pasha hurried back to Scutari via Skoplye and Prizren and shut himself up in the fortress. When he surrendered on Nov. 10, 1831 after six months' siege, he was pardoned on Metternich's intercession and taken to Constantinople.

Fifteen years later he again held various governorships, chiefly in Anatolia (from 1846), then in the Herzegovina (1853) and lastly in Medina where he died on May 27, 1860.

MUŞTAFÂ PASHA KÖPRÜLÜ. [See KÖPRÜLÜ.]

MUŞTAFÂ PASHA LALA, a famous military commander in the Ottoman history of the xvth century. The date of his birth is not given. He was a native of Şoḳol, the same Bosnian locality from which came the grand vizier Şokolli [q. v.], and began his service in the imperial seray. He rose in rank under the grand vizier Aḥmad (1553—1555), but was not in favour with the latter's successor Rustam Paşa, who made him in 1556 lālā to prince Selim with the object of ruining him. The outcome of this nomination was the contrary of what was expected; Muştafā became the chief originator of the intrigues by which Selim came into conflict with his brother Bāyazid and which ended with Bāyazid's execution in Persia [cf. SELİM II]. After these events Rustam Paşa managed to relegate the intriguer in administrative functions to different parts of the empire; for eight years he was wālī in Damascus. Nor was the grand vizier Şokolli favourably disposed to Muştafā, but in the beginning of 1569 Sultān Selim II called back his former lālā as ḵubbe wazīri in the capital. Very soon afterwards Şokolli appointed him ser-asker in the Yaman; Muştafā went to Cairo to take charge of his command, but here he became involved in serious disputes with the wālī Sinān Paşa on the equipment of his army. The end was that Sinān was appointed in Muştafā's stead and the latter had to return to Constantinople. Sultān Selim's protection saved him from death and in the beginning of the following year he was appointed again ser-asker of the army destined for the conquest of the island of Cyprus. Lala Muştafā Paşa led this memorable campaign with complete success; Nicosia was taken in July 1570, while Famagusta surrendered in August 1571. With the surrender of this town is connected the brutal and cruel execution of the Venetian commander Bragadino. After his return he became a serious candidate for the grand vizierate, should Şokolli disappear from the scene. His only rival was Sinān Paşa. When in 1577 the war with Persia broke out [cf. MURĀD III] both were appointed ser-asker, but, on account of Sinān's arrogant character, the latter's appointment had to be withdrawn. In April Lala Muştafā began his campaign in Georgia, fought the memorable victory of Caldır (August 1578) and took Tiflis besides a number of other towns. These military glories did not bring him to the ambition of his life. After Şokolli's assassination, Rustam's son-in-law Aḥmad Paşa had been made grand vizier and, on the latter's death in May 1580, it was Sinān [q. v.] who got the sultān's seal. Lala Muştafā died in October of the same year and was buried in the court of the mosque at Aiyūb. Apart from the unquestionably important events in which he played a prominent part, Lala Muştafā Paşa has a particular importance in Ottoman historiography because the historian 'Ālī [q. v.] had been attached to his person as scribe since the beginning of his career. Therefore his able, but intriguing and reckless character is known better than that of many other Turkish statesmen or generals. By his marriage with the grand-daughter of the last Mamlūk Sultān Ḳānşū Ḡhūrī he was a very wealthy man, who, notwithstanding his reputed avarice, founded several mosques (as in Erzerüm) and many buildings of public utility in the different places where he resided as governor.

Bibliography: The chief Turkish source is, as has been said, 'Ālī, not only in his Kunh al-Akhbār, but also in a treatise entitled Nādirat al-Maḥārib, describing the war between Selim and Bāyazid (MS. unknown; cf. Babinger, G.O.W., p. 132) and in his Nuṣrat-nāme, which gives a description of the Georgian campaign. Other sources are the works of Peçewī and Şolāḵ Zāde. Western contemporary sources are the Diary of Gerlach, the Letters of Busbeck and, especially for the conquest of Cyprus, the Italian historical descriptions.

MUŞTAFĀ PASHA RASHĪD. [See RASHĪD.] MUSTAḤABB. [See SHAR'Ā.]

MUSTA'IDD KHĀN, MUḤAMMAD SĀKĪ, born about 1061 (1650), was brought up as an adopted son by Muḥammad Bakhtāwar Khān, whom he faithfully assisted in various capacities. After the death of his patron he passed into the service of Awrangzēb. In the reign of Shāh 'Ālam Bahādur Shāh I (1118—1124 = 1707—1712), he became the secretary of 'Ināyat Allāh Khān, son of Mirzā Shukr Allāh, the minister of Bahādur Shāh, and by his desire Musta'idd Khān composed the history of the reign of Awrangzēb, entitled Ma'aṭhir-i 'Ālamgiri. Part i. is a mere abridgement of Mirzā Kāzīm's history of the first ten years of the emperor's reign; part ii. contains the history of the last forty years of 'Ālamgiri's reign (edited in the Bibliotheca Indica, Calcutta 1870—1871).

He died at the age of seventy-five at Dihli in 1136 (1723).

AL-MUSTA'IN BI 'LLĀH, ABU 'L-'ABBĀS AḤMAD B. MUḤAMMAD, an 'Abbāsīd caliph. His father was a son of the caliph al-Mu'taṣim, his mother a slave-girl named Mukhārīḳ of Slav origin. After the death in Rabi' II 248 (June 862) of al-Mu'taṣim the praetorians appointed his cousin Aḥmad caliph under the name al-Musta'in. The choice aroused discontent in Sāmarrā and unrest broke out among those who supported al-Mu'tazz [q. v.] which was only put down after much bloodshed by the Turkish soldiers. When al-Musta'in was recognised as caliph he confirmed the governor of Baghdād, Muḥammad b. 'Abd Allāh b. Ṭāhir [q. v.], in office. He bought all the property of al-Mu'tazz and his brother al-Mu'aiyad and then had them arrested. The Turks wanted to put them to death but they were protected by the vizier Aḥmad b. al-Ḳhaṣīb who soon afterwards fell into disgrace and was banished to Crete. In 249 (863) trouble broke out as a result of a defeat of the army by the Byzantines; the rebels were however scattered by the vizier Utāmiṣh and the two Turkish generals Waṣīf and Bogha Junior. Utāmiṣh was soon afterwards murdered at the instigation of the latter. As the caliph no longer felt safe in Sāmarrā he went to Baghdād in Muḥarram 251 (Feb. 865). Al-Mu'tazz was then taken by his supporters out of his prison in Sāmarrā and a war broke out which ended in Dhū 'l-Hiǧǧja 252 (Jan. 866) in the abdication of al-Musta'in [cf. BAGHDĀD]. By the arrangement made the latter was to live in Medina in future; but he was detained in Wāsiṭ and murdered in Shawwāl 252 (Oct. 866) at the age of 35. See also the article MUḤAMMAD B. AL-MUSTAKFĪ BI 'LLĀH, ABU 'L-KĀSIM 'ABD ALLĀH, 'Abbāsīd caliph, son of al-Muktafi and a slave-girl. After the Amir al-Umarā' Tuzun had deposed the caliph al-Muttaḳī, he chose al-Mustakfi as his successor on the same day in Ṣafar 333 (Sept.—Oct. 944). The new caliph was only a tool in the hands of Tuzun and his successor Abū Dja'far b. Shīrād. Baghdad began to suffer from a constant famine and neither food nor money could be raised for the troops. When the Būyid Aḥmad b. Abī Shudjā' approached [cf. MU'IZZ AL-DAWLĀ], the caliph had to declare himself ready to recognise the Būyids as the legitimate rulers in all the provinces conquered by them, and in Djumādā I 334 (Dec. 945) Aḥmad entered Baghdad and was given by the caliph the title of honour Mu'izz al-Dawla and the fullest power in all secular matters. But the new ruler suspected that the caliph was in communication with the enemies of the Būyids so he had him blinded (on 22nd Djumādā II or Sha'bān 334 = Jan. 29 or March 946) and deposed. Al-Mustakfi died in Rabi' II 338 (Sept.—Oct. 949).

AL-MUSTA'LĪ BI 'LLĀH ABU 'L-KĀSIM AḤMAD B. AL-MUSTAṢIR, ninth Fāṭimid Caliph, born 20th Muḥarram, 467 [Sept. 16, 1074] (so in all the best sources and in al-Mustanṣir's letter to Aḥmad b. 'Alī al-Ṣulāḥī, quoted in Idrīs, vii. 152), the youngest son of his father. At this time it was generally assumed in the Ismā'īlī organization that the eldest son, Nizār (born 437), would, in accordance with custom, succeed his father in the imāmate, although no formal investiture with the wilāyat al-'ahd appears to have been made. The influence of the all-powerful wazīr Badr al-Djamālī, however, and of his son al-Afdal, was thrown into the scale in favour of Abu 'l-Kāsim and al-Mustanṣir's consent obtained to the marriage of Abu 'l-Kāsim with Sitt al-Mulk, the daughter of Badr (the statement in al-Fārīqī [ap. Ibn al-Kalānisi, ed. Amedroz, p. 128] that he was the son of Badr's daughter is evidently a misunderstanding). According to the tradition of the Musta'lian Ismā'īlis [see BOHORĀS], Abu 'l-Kāsim was invested with the succession at the time of this marriage; in another version (Ibn Muyassar, p. 66 sq.) al-Mustanṣir confided his nomination of Abu 'l-Kāsim to his own sister, who divulged it after his death. On the death of al-Mustanṣir on 18th Dhu 'l-Hijja, 487 (Jan. 10, 1094), the Shī'ite 'Id al-Ghadīr, al-Afdal secured the accession of al-Musta'li without serious difficulty. The subsequent revolt of Nizār [see NIZĀR B. AL-MUSTAṢIR] at Alexandria failed owing to the opposition of the army, and al-Musta'li's succession was generally recognized, except by the Ismā'īlis of Persia [see AL-ḤASAN B. AL-ṢABBĀḤ].

Throughout his reign the actual power was entirely in the hands of al-Afdal [q. v.]. At first some successes were gained in Syria; Fāmiya (Apamea) made a voluntary submission in 489, and Tyre was recovered from a rebel governor in 490. A project of alliance with the Saldjūkid Ruḍwān of Aleppo against Damascus in the same year fell through. On the appearance of the Crusaders in Syria (490 = 1097) an Egyptian embassy was sent to open negotiations with them, and in 491 (July—Aug., 1098) Jerusalem was recaptured from the Ortuḳids Sukmān and Ḫ-Ghāzī. The advance of the Crusaders in the following year took al-Afdal by surprise; Jerusalem was again lost, and the defeat of the Egyptian army near 'Asḳalān (14th Ramaḍān, 492 = Aug. 5, 1099) definitely established them in possession. Two years later (17th Ṣafar, 495 = Dec. 12, 1101) al-Musta'li died and was succeeded by his son al-Manṣūr (al-Āmir bi-Aḥkām Allāh).

The personal character of al-Musta'li is highly praised by his Sunni contemporary Ibn al-Kalānisi; later writers speak of him as a fanatical Shī'ite, and it would seem that the Fāṭimid organization and propaganda was intensified in his reign. Idrīs refers especially to his close relations with the dā'wa in the Yaman, represented by al-Malika al-Ḥurra and her dā'i Yahyā b. Lamak b. Mālik al-Hammādi. In the capable hands of al-Afdal, order and good government were maintained, and Egypt continued to enjoy prosperity, except for a famine in 492 or 493, due to the influx of Syrian refugees.

Massé), p. 34—40, and the other sources mentioned under the article AL-AFDAL add little of importance. The Musta'lian Ismā'īlī tradition is given in 'Uyūn al-Akhbār of the dā'i Idrīs b. al-Hasan [d. 872] (MS. in possession of H. AL-MUSTANDJID BI 'LLĀH, ABU 'L-MUẒAFFAR YŪSUF, 'Abbāsīd caliph, born on 1st Rabi' II 510 (Aug. 13, 1116), son of al-Muktafi and a Greek slave-girl named Nardjis or Tā'ūs. After his father's death on 2nd Rabi' I 555 (March 12, 1160) al-Mustandjid succeeded him as caliph. While al-Muktafi was dying and hope of his recovery had been abandoned, the mother of his son Abū 'Alī endeavoured to dispose of the future caliph who had already been selected heir-apparent in 542 (1147). After winning over several emirs for her plot, she armed her slave-girls with daggers to murder the heir-apparent when he entered his father's apartment. Al-Mustandjīd however heard of the plot and had the instigator and her son arrested. A few years after his accession the Mazyadīs were expelled [q. v.]. The end of the Fātimids also fell within his reign although the 'Abbāsids were only officially recognised as caliphs of Egypt under his successor al-Mustaḍī. In 562 (1166—1167) Shimla, lord of Khūzistān, invaded the 'Irāk and demanded from the caliph the grant of a portion of the lower Euphrates territory as a fief. The caliph however sent an army against him. Shimla's nephew, Kūlīdj, was routed and Shimla returned home. Al-Mustandjīd died on 9th Rabi' II 566 (Dec. 20, 1170). When he was very ill, his physician arranged with his chamberlain Aḡd al-Dīn [q. v.] and the emīr Ḳuṭb al-Dīn Ḳaimaz to give him a bath to hasten his end. The caliph refused to agree; he was nevertheless shut up in the bath until he died.

AL-MUSTANŞIR BI 'LLĀH, ABŪ DĪ'FAR AL-MANŞŪR B. AL-ZĀHIR, 'Abbāsīd caliph; like his father whom he succeeded on the 14th Radjab 623 (July 11, 1226), he is described as a just and devout man and was generally liked although he played no great part in politics. He acquired Irbil by a legacy in 630 (1232—1233) and eight years later his lands were increased by the acquisition of the town of 'Āna which he bought from its previous owner. About this time the Mongols began to threaten the lands of Islām. Čingiz-Khān [q. v.] had died in Ramaḍān 624 (Aug. 1227) but his sons continued his campaigns of conquest. In 635 (1237—1238) the Mongols were defeated by the caliph's troops; the strongest defender of Islām however was Djalāl al-Dīn, Shāh of Khwārizm [q. v.]. Al-Mustanşir died on 20th Djumādā I or 10th Djumādā II 640 (Nov. 15 or Dec. 5, 1242). According to Ibn Khaldūn however, he did not die till the following year. The al-Mustanşiriya university founded by him in Baghdād bears his name.

AL-MUSTANŞIR BI 'LLĀH, ABŪ TAMĪM MA'ADD B. 'ALĪ AL-ZĀHIR, eighth Fātimīd Caliph, born 16th Djumādā II, 420 (July 2, 1029) (according to Idrīs, on 16th Ramaḍān = Sept. 29), succeeded his father al-Zāhir [q. v.] 15th Sha'bān 427 (June 13, 1036), and died 18th Dhu 'l-Hijja 487 (Jan. 10, 1094), after the longest recorded reign of any Muslim ruler and one which, besides being marked by the most violent fluctuations of fortune, was of critical importance in the history of the Fātimīd Ismā'īlī movement.

Internal history. During the childhood of al-Mustanşir the authority remained at first in the strong hands of his father's wazīr Abū 'l-Ḳāsim al-Djardjārā'ī. On his death (7th Ramaḍān 436 = March 28, 1045) it was seized by the evil genius of al-Mustanşir's reign, his mother, who was a Sūdānī slave, and her former master, the Jewish merchant Abū Sa'd al-Tustarī. When Abū Sa'd was assassinated in 439 (1047), after an outbreak of rioting between the Turkish and Berber troops, his place as the queen-mother's agent was taken by his brother Abū Naşr Hārūn (see however the documents published by Mann [Bibl.] and the ḳāḍī Abū Muḥammad al-Ḥasan al-Yāzūrī, who eventually accepted also the wazīrate (7th Muḥarram 442 = June 1, 1050) and held it for eight years [cf. AL-YĀZŪRĪ]. Meanwhile there was considerable unrest and perhaps also economic unsettlement in the country. If a statement in al-Maḳrīzī (i. 82 [99]; ed. Wiet, ii. 4 [67]) is to be believed, the kharaḍj of the Egyptian provinces amounted only to one million dinārs in the time of al-Yāzūrī, but this may have been exceptional, though it is plain from other sources that the government had already been forced to the familiar expedient of confiscations and indemnities. The Delta was disturbed by Arab risings, the most serious of which, that of the Banū Ḳurra, was put down only with great difficulty by Naşir al-Dawla (see below) with the Ṭaiy and other Arab troops at Kōm Sharīk in 443 (1051) (cf. Ibn al-Şairafī, p. 42 sq.; Ibn al-Aṭhīr, ix. 396 sq. and for the date Ibn al-Ḳalanīsī, p. 85). At the capital there was an increasing state of tension between the Turkish and Berber troops and the enormous bodies of Sūdānī slaves raised by the Caliph's mother (cf. Maḳrīzī, i. 94 [ed. Wiet, ii. 45] and p. 335; detailed but probably unreliable figures also in Naşir-i Khusrāw, ed. Kaviani, p. 66). In striking contrast to this is the magnificence of the court and prosperity of Mişr-Fuṣṭāṭ as described by Naşir-i Khusrāw [q. v.]. There can be little doubt that the source of much of this prosperity, apart from the manufacture and supply of luxuries to the court, is already to be sought in the commercial relations between Egypt and the Indian Ocean on the one hand (cf. Naşir-i Khusrāw's account of 'Aidhāb) and Constantinople on the other. The general insecurity deepened after the execution of al-Yāzūrī, who was the last wazīr to attempt to control the situation. He was followed by a rapid succession of puppets in office, many of whom, despite the pompous titles duly recorded by Ibn al-Şairafī, held the position for no more than a few days at a time.

The Fātimīd Caliphate was now destined to pass in a few shattering years through the same agony as the 'Abbāsīd Caliphate at Baghdād had suffered in the early part of the previous century. The breakdown of the civil administration and subsequent exhaustion of the treasury gave a free hand to the military, and the sinister policy of the Caliph's mother brought matters speedily to a head. In a pitched battle at Kōm al-Rīsh (close to Cairo) in 454 (1062) (sometimes confused with the previous battle at Kōm Sharīk) the Turkish and Berber troops led by Naşir al-Dawla Ibn Ḥamdān, a descendant of the Ḥamdānīds of Mōsul, defeated and drove the Sūdānīs into the Ṣa'īd, but the struggle continued for some years and the blacks were not finally routed and driven out until 459 (1067); thereafter they were confined to the Ṣa'īd, which suffered severely from their plundering and devastations. Nāšir al-Dawla in turn quarrelled with the Turks, and, defeated in battle by a force commanded by al-MustaŒšir in person (461 = 1068—1069), appealed to the Saldjūkid Alp-Arslān [q. v.]. Without waiting for his help, however, he regained control of Cairo and the Delta with the aid of the Arabs and Lawāta Berbers, reduced al-MustaŒšir (it is said) to the state of a pensioner on a hundred dinārs a month, assumed the title of Sultān al-Dawla, and attempted, but unsuccessfully, to restore the 'Abbāsid khutba. In Rādjab 465 (March 1073) he and all his house were killed by the rival Turkish faction, led by Ildeguz, under whom the Caliph fared little better. Meanwhile the constant anarchy and remorseless plundering of the country by the troops brought agriculture to a standstill (although the Nile floods seem to have been uniformly good). The result was a famine which lasted from 459 to 464 (1067—1072) and became progressively more severe. During these years the country was a prey to the utmost misery; the royal city and palaces were looted, and Fustāt was twice plundered and even burned by Nāšir al-Dawla. Large numbers of the population, including even the Caliph's own family, sought refuge in Syria and 'Irāk (for the depopulation and shrinkage of Fustāt cf. Maḡrizī, i. 5; ed. Wiet, i. 12; on the fate of the royal library see also Olga Pinto, Le Biblioteche degli Arabi, Rome 1928, p. 25—26). The Sunnī historians dwell on this famine with some complacency, regarding it as the retribution for the impious attack of al-Basāsiri on the 'Abbāsid Caliphate (see below), and circumstantial stories are related of the extreme destitution to which al-MustaŒšir himself was reduced. That these must be accepted with some reserve is clear from such passages as Ibn Taghribardī, II/ii. 186, 18—19.

At length in 465 (1073) al-MustaŒšir, taking courage of despair, secretly invited the governor of 'Akkā, the Armenian general Badr al-Djāmālī, to assume supreme control in Egypt. Badr accepted the commission, on condition of bringing his own troops with him, and sailing from 'Akkā in the winter, reached Cairo on 28th Djumādā I, 466 (Jan. 29, 1074). His rapid and energetic movements took the Turks by surprise, and he put to death the whole body of their leaders, together with a large number of Egyptian notables and officials. For his further military and administrative measures, by which he restored order and relative prosperity in Egypt (the total revenue of Egypt and its remaining Syrian possessions, which in 466 had amounted to 2,800,000 dinārs, rose by 483 to 3,100,000 dinārs: Maḡrizī, i. 100; ed. Wiet, ii. 68; cf. Abū Šālih, fol. 7^b—9^a) see the article BADR AL-DJĀMĀLĪ. The alliance between general and caliph was cemented by the marriage of Badr's daughter to al-MustaŒšir's youngest son Aḡmad, the future Caliph al-Musta'li [q. v.]. The Fātimid Caliphate was saved but, like its 'Abbāsid rival, at the cost of abandoning its temporal authority to a series of military commanders, entitled umarā' al-djuyūsh, from whose control it never afterwards succeeded in emancipating itself.

Al-MustaŒšir is described in contemporary sources as upright and amiable in character, and just and equitable in his dealings, but as a ruler his personality is entirely obscured by the successive wazīrs and generals who kept him virtually a prisoner. The statements of the later anti-Fātimid writers must, of course, be entirely discounted; the Fātimid sources, on the other hand, praise his sagacity and infallibility ('iṣma) as Imām.

External relations. The empire to which al-MustaŒšir succeeded was beyond any doubt the most powerful Muslim state of its time. It extended from Ifrīkiya and Sicily to Mecca and Central Syria, and maintained an active propagandist organization in 'Irāk, Persia and Ḳhurāsān (see the following section). Within a few years of his accession its territories were still further expanded by Anūshtagin's conquest of Aleppo in Šahbān 429 (May 1038) [cf. the articles FĀTIMIDS and ḤALAB] and extension of his authority even across the Euphrates, on the one hand, and on the other by the conquests of 'Alī al-Šulaiḥī in the Yaman, after establishing himself at Mašār in the same year (cf. ŠULAIḤI; also H. F. al-Hamdani, in Journal of the Royal Central-Asian Society, 1931 p. 505 sqq., and in J. R. A. S., 1932, p. 126 sqq.). After the deaths of Anūshtagin and the wazīr al-Djardjarā'i, who in spite of their rivalry zealously maintained the interests of the dynasty, the power and prestige of the Egyptian court steadily declined. The Arab tribes in Syria, though defeated in the field, remained unsubdued, and the Caliph had to be content with the little more than nominal allegiance of the Mirdāsids [q. v.] at Aleppo. At Damascus, the rivalries between the Berber and Turkish troops and the hostility of the citizens reduced the governors to impotence. The disturbed state of Syria was the more disastrous that it made it impossible for the Fātimid government to give effective support to the amir al-Basāsiri (q. v.; see the list of war material and subventions sent from Egypt: Ibn Taghribardī, p. 177) in his attempt to oppose the advancing Saldjūk power, with the result that his occupation of Baghdād and proclamation of al-MustaŒšir in 459 (1058—1059) was speedily brought to an end. The subsequent military and economic disorders in Egypt allowed a free hand to the Turkmen (Ghuzz) bands, who had appeared in Northern Syria as early as 447 (1055), though it was not until 463 (1071) that the first Saldjūkid armies entered Northern Syria and the Ghuzz bands under Atsiz [q. v.] occupied Palestine and began to harass Damascus. In many of the other towns and districts of Syria the authority was seized by local chiefs, such as the qādis Ibn 'Ammār (q. v.; also G. Wiet, in Mém. Henri Basset, p. 279 sqq.) at Tarābulus and Ibn Abī 'Aḳil at Tyre, though both of these acknowledged the spiritual authority of the Fātimid Caliph (cf. also the account of the foundation of the castle of Šarkhad by Ḥassān b. Mismār al-Kalbī in 466 [1073—1074], quoted from Sibī b. al-Djawzī in Ibn Taghribardī, p. 253). The menace of the Saldjūkids became more substantial after the arrival of Tutuṣh [q. v.] in 470 (1077—1078), but the latter never actually organized a full campaign against the Fātimids. On the contrary, the offensive was taken by Badr, who succeeded in restoring Egyptian control on the coast as far as Tyre, Sidon and Djubail in 482 (1089), but not in recovering the interior of Palestine and Damascus (lost in 468), in spite of a certain revulsion of feeling in Syria in favour of the Fātimids. It is difficult to know how much weight to lay on the story (Ibn Taghribardī, p. 272—273) that Tutuṣh at one time proposed to ally himself in marriage with Badr.

The success of the Saldjūkids also affected the position of the Fāṭimids in Arabia. In 462 (1069) the 'Abbāsid Caliph was acknowledged in the Holy Cities, and after a brief return to the Fāṭimid obedience between 467 and 473 the Hidjāz passed definitely to the 'Abbāsid cause. In the Yaman, the Ṣulāihids in the interior and the Zura'ids in the important commercial centre of 'Aden maintained the suzerainty of the Fāṭimids, the latter until the Aiyūbid conquest by Tūrānshāh in 569 (1173) [cf. the art. SALADIN].

Meanwhile the Fāṭimid empire had been similarly shorn of its possessions in the West. About 435 (1043—1044) al-Mu'izz b. Bādīs [q. v.], the Zirid lieutenant of the Fāṭimid Caliph in Kaṭirawān, began a series of repressive measures against the Shī'ites of Ifrīkiya; in 440 he seems to have made the first overt gesture of independence, and in 441 superseded the Fāṭimid coinage; but it was not until 443 (1051) that he formally renounced the Fāṭimid suzerainty and obtained an investiture from the 'Abbāsid Caliph. According to the traditional account (already fully developed in Ibn al-Ṣārafi), the wazīr al-Yazūrī in revenge launched against him the nomad bands of the Banū Hilāl (q. v.; the tribes mentioned in the Egyptian sources are Zughba, Riyāḥ, al-Aṭḥbadj, and 'Adiy), who had been a cause of much trouble to the government in the Ṣa'īd and were now given a free hand to plunder the territories of the Zirids [cf. TUNISIA, vol. iv. 851^a]. As Wüstenfeld has already indicated (p. 234 n.), the story as it stands is open to serious objections, and there can be little doubt that it has been amplified by popular legend. The westward movement of the Hilāl tribes began as early as 440, and there is no reason to reject the account of Ibn 'Idhārī that it was al-Mu'izz himself who invited the Arab tribes, then in Barqa, to enter Ifrīkiya as his djund (since he was not on good terms with the Ṣanhādja), and that they, having set out in response to his invitation, began to plunder on their own account and already before the close of 443 had inflicted a severe defeat on his troops. The two traditions are not, however, mutually exclusive and may be reconciled by supposing that the Banū Hilāl were transported in the first instance to Barqa (the governor of which had thrown in his lot with al-Mu'izz), and that their advance into Ifrīkiya was facilitated, for opposite reasons, by both al-Mu'izz and the wazīr (cf. also Ibn al-Aṭḥr, ix. 387—388). During the first years of his reign, the son and successor of al-Mu'izz, Tamīm (453—501 = 1061—1107), temporarily returned to the Fāṭimid allegiance (Lane-Poole, p. 138 n. 1), but with the conquest of Sicily by the Normans in 463 (1070) Barqa became the western limit of the Fāṭimid state.

The diplomatic relations of al-Mustaṣṣir with non-Muslim states covered a wide field. In 429 (1038) the existing treaty with the Byzantine Emperor was renewed and relatively cordial relations established. If Nāṣir-i Khuraw (ed. Kaviani, p. 67) is to be trusted, the Egyptian government was in communication in 439 (1047) also with the Georgians, the Dailamites, the Khākān of Turkistān and even the rādja of Dihli, all of whom shared with Egypt a common hostility to the Saldjūkids and the Ghaznevīds. The friendly relations with Constantinople, however, were broken off in 446

(1054), when the Empress Theodora demanded an offensive alliance against the Saldjūkids. Egyptian troops were despatched on an unsuccessful expedition against al-Lādhiḳiya, the Empress retaliated by opening negotiations with the Saldjūkids, and al-Mustaṣṣir seized the treasures of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre (al-Ḳumāma). This breach with Constantinople had important consequences for the future of Egypt, since to it may perhaps be ascribed the opening up of direct commercial relations with the Italian trading cities, though documentary evidence on the point is lacking (cf. Heyd, Histoire du Commerce du Levant, i. 105, 124).

Religious Conditions. The wide expansion of the Fāṭimid power under al-Mustaṣṣir is reflected also in the religious situation. Propaganda on behalf of the Fāṭimids is synonymous with the dissemination of the official state religion of the Fāṭimids, the Ismā'īli-Shī'ite faith. Not only in Egypt and other lands in actual subjection to the Fāṭimid authority, but in all quarters of the Islāmic world, we learn of missionaries (du'āt), who during the long reign of al-Mustaṣṣir struggled, in part with great success, to secure recognition of his claim to be the religious Imām. In the East, in Persia, and especially in Shīrāz, at the court of the Būyid prince Abū Kalidjār [q. v.], we can trace the activities at least since 429 (1037—1038) of the du'āt Abū Naṣr Hibat Allāh b. Mūsā al-Mu'ayyad fī Dīn Allāh [see AL-MU'AYYAD], doubtless the most prominent personality of his time in the Ismā'īli da'wa. He endeavoured to win over the court and the Dailamite troops to the Fāṭimid cause, but was forced to leave his post in 439 (1047—1048) as the result of pro-'Abbāsid intrigues. In the first part of his autobiography (see Bibl.) al-Mu'ayyad gives a detailed account of his activity, and in particular publishes his correspondence with an unnamed Sunnī from Khurāsān, in which he explains the religious and political principles of his mission. To what an extent the power of the Fāṭimids and the success of their emissaries in 'Irāk and Persia was feared at Baghdād is shown by the fact that several times and latterly in 444 (1052), there was published a document, to which the 'Alids also subscribed, with the object of declaring false the claim of the Fāṭimids to descent from 'Alī. At the same time the Fāṭimid cause gained also new ground in the Yaman. After the political power of the Fāṭimids had been reduced there to a minimum in the course of the fourth century, it now acquired in the Ṣulāihid 'Alī b. Muḥammad a powerful supporter. He and his successors regarded themselves not only as political but also as religious representatives of the Fāṭimid Imām in the Yaman. The voluminous correspondence between the Ṣulāihid rulers and al-Mustaṣṣir, which is still preserved, collected in a separate work (Kitāb al-Sidjillāt wa 'l-Tawḳī'āt wa 'l-Kutub li-Mawlānā al-Mustaṣṣir bi 'llāh, MS. Sch. Or. St.; many of these letters are also reproduced in Idris, vol. vii. [see Bibl.]), deals, along with political questions, in the first place with the position of the da'wa in the Yaman and in the Fāṭimid state.

In Egypt itself, soon after the accession of al-Mustaṣṣir, the doctrines of the moderate official Ismā'īliya were threatened by the appearance of extremists related to the Druzes [q. v.]. A pretender, al-Sikkīn, together with his associate al-'Anī, gave himself out as the returned Caliph al-Ḥākīm, but was promptly unmasked (Idris, vi. 296). Al-Mu'ayyad, who came to Cairo in 439 and won the goodwill of Mustanşir, was entrusted with the leadership of the religious mission as Dā'i 'l-Du'āt (it should be remarked, however, that al-Yazūrī during his wazirate also held the title of dā'i 'l-du'āt; cf. Ibn al-Sairafī, p. 40). In the reopened seminary in Cairo, where the du'āt of the various countries received instruction, he gave his lectures and gathered into his hands the strings of the whole da'wa. He appears to have exercised a special influence over the development of the da'wa in the Yaman, as the future Yamanite dā'i Lamak b. Mālik was numbered amongst his pupils. From Persia the newly-converted Ismā'īlī Nāşir-i Khusrāw [q. v.] came to Egypt, to find his master in him. At the same time al-Mu'ayyad seems also to have played an important political role. In his autobiography he quotes numerous letters which he wrote to al-Basāsiri and other generals of the Fātimids in Syria and Mesopotamia. In particular it was at his instigation that the khutba for the Fātimids was introduced into the prayer at Baghdad in 450 (cf. Ibn Muyassar, p. 8, 1; 10, 6—7). In his poems he eulogizes the Imām al-Mustanşir in a similar manner to Nāşir-i Khusrāw. Other Ismā'īlī authors of this period were the poet Hasan b. Maḥbūb, the dā'i Aḥmad b. Ibrāhīm al-Nisābūri, and the author of the Kitāb al-Madjalīs al-Mustanşiriya (lectures in which the imāmate of al-Mustanşir is demonstrated with the aid of the Ismā'īlī ta'wīl), which are ascribed by the Fātimid tradition to Badr al-Djamālī. — For the Fātimid propaganda in Transoxania see also Barthold, *Turkestan*², G. M. S., p. 304—305.

MUSTA'RIB(A) (A.), "arabised", the name of one of the groups into which the Arab genealogists divide the population of Arabia. The first is the 'arab 'ariba, the original Arabs of pure stock; they numbered nine (some say seven) tribes which are regarded as the descendants of Aram b. Sām b. Nūḥ [q. v.] and the first settlers in Arabia: 'Ad, Thamūd, Umayyim, 'Abil, Ṭasm, Djadis, 'Imlik, Djurhum and Wabār. These are extinct except for a few remnants incorporated in other tribes. The second group comprises the muta'rriba [q. v.] who are not pure blooded Arabs. They are regarded as descendants of Kaḥṭān (the Yoktān of the list of nations in Gen. x. 25 sq.) and live in southern Arabia. The third group is called musta'rriba; this name is also applied to tribes who were not originally Arabs; they trace their descent from Ma'add b. 'Adnān, a descendant of Ismā'il [q. v.]. All the north Arabian tribes are included among the musta'rriba, so that the Banū Kuraish to which Muḥammad belonged is one of them; his genealogy is in this way traced back to Abraham and he thus thought he could prove his connection with the Biblical prophets. The old term musta'rriba, for tribes not originally of Arab descent, obtained a new meaning after the conquest of Spain. It was applied to the Christian Spaniards who adopted Islam; the word musta'rriba was corrupted to Mozarab [q. v.].

AL-MUSTARSHID BI 'LLĀH, ABŪ MANŞŪR AL-FADL, 'Abbāsīd caliph, born in 486 (1093—1094), son of al-Mustaẓhir and a slave-girl. Al-Mustarshid, who was proclaimed his father's successor after the latter's death on 16th Rabi' II 512 (Aug. 6, 1118), was the first caliph since the occupation of Baghdad by the Būyids who was not content with spiritual supremacy but also endeavoured to revive the caliph's authority in temporal matters. The Saldjūk sultān had died before al-Mustaẓhir (Dhu 'l-Ḥijda 511 = April 1118) and his son Maḥmūd [q. v.] was appointed his successor. His uncle Sanjar and his brother Mas'ūd both rebelled against the new sultān and the turbulent Mazyadī Dubais b. Šadaḳa [q. v.] was raising trouble in the 'Irāk and had also quarrelled with the caliph. The latter defeated him in 517 (1123) and after al-Mustarshid had repelled a regular attack on the capital he was able to adopt a more independent attitude to the Saldjūks. But as his increasing power aroused the misgivings of the governor of Baghdad, the latter in Rabiab 520 (July—Aug. 1126) went to Sultān Maḥmūd and asked him to put a limit to the caliph's powers. Maḥmūd agreed and attacked the capital while al-Mustarshid sent an army against Wāsiṭ in order to seize this town. The attempt failed however; towards the end of the year Maḥmūd entered Baghdad and al-Mustarshid could not hold out indefinitely but had to make peace, whereupon the sultān appointed 'Imād al-Dīn Zangī governor of Baghdad and all the 'Irāk. But in Djumādā II 521 (July 1127) the latter was given the governorship of al-Mawşil and after Maḥmūd's death (525 = 1131) the succession was again disputed. In 526 Dubais and Zangī undertook a campaign against Baghdad but were defeated by the caliph at the end of Radjab (June 1132) and in the same year Mas'ūd [q. v.] had to give him complete control of Baghdād and the surrounding country. After some time he attacked the sultān but was taken prisoner in Ramaḍān 529 (Jan. 1135) and murdered in Dhu 'l-Ka'da of the same year (Aug. 1135) [cf. the art. DUBAIS B. ŠADAQA].

MUSTASHĀR (A.), councillor, Turkish pronunciation müsteshār, meaning "general secretary to a ministry" or "under-secretary of state". The word which means literally "one who is consulted" comes from the same root as mushīr [q. v.] which properly means "he who gives advice". Sāmī Bey regards the word müsteshār as a synonym of the old Turkish inal. — The office was called müsteshārī or more simply müsteshārlik.

Like the title mushīr, that of müsteshār was created by Maḥmūd II. There were at first two müsteshār in the grand-vizierate, one for foreign and the other for home affairs. The latter was later replaced by a Minister of the Interior who had in his turn a müsteshār. The number of müsteshār gradually increased but some less important departments had mu'āwin "assistant, deputy" (in 1296 for example there were mu'āwin in the finance and police departments). The office has been retained under the present republic and each ministry or wakālet has its müsteshār; that of national defence has three (for army, navy and air force).

The chief judge of Istanbul used to have a müsteshār. According to Luṭfi Efendi, the post of müsteshār of the Navy was created in 1253 (v., p. 91) and that of müsteshār of the şadreyin or of the two kağasker in 1262 (viii., p. 127). On the honorary grades of müsteshār cf. the same author, vi., p. 66; cf. also p. 103, line 8 from below.

Müsteshār is also the name given to the "councillors" of Turkish or foreign embassies or legations. The title of mustashār awwal borne by the ambassador himself, sent by the Šultān of Marocco to Stambul in 1107, is inexplicable to us (cf. Djewdet Pasha, edition 1309, ii., p. 251; cf. Recueil de Mémoires Orientaux de l'Ec. des Langues Orientales à Paris, 1905, p. 6).

As to the term mushāwir, a synonym of the preceding and from the same root, it is applied to technical advisers, whether foreigners or not; huḩukū mushāwiri "legal adviser".

AL-MUSTA'ŠIM BI' ALLĀH, ABŪ AḤMAD 'ABD ALLĀH B. AL-MUSTA'ŠIR, the last 'Abbāsīd caliph of Baghdād, born in 609 (1212/3). After the death of his father in Djumādā I or II 640 (Nov./Dec. 1242) he was raised to the caliph's throne but he had neither the talent nor the strength to avert the catastrophe threatening from the Mongols; he allowed himself to be guided by bad councillors who were not agreed among themselves but working against one another. In 683 (1255/6) the Mongol Khān Hülāgū [q. v.] demanded that the Muslim rulers should make war on the Ismā'īlis. The caliph did not trouble about this and in Rabi' I 655 (March/April 1257) a Mongol embassy came to Baghdād and demanded that al-Musta'šim should raze the defences of the city and appear in person before Hülāgū for further negotiations or send a deputy. As the caliph refused to meet these demands, Hülāgū threatened him with war. After another message in which al-Musta'šim tried to intimidate Hülāgū, the latter set out against the ancient city of the caliphs. On the way he met another embassy, offering him an annual tribute but this effort to appease the cruel foe was useless and by Muḥarram 656 (Jan. 1258) the Mongols were at the gates of Baghdād. Preparations for the siege advanced rapidly and after all attempts to resume negotiations had failed against the relentless Hülāgū, al-Musta'šim had to surrender on 4th Šafar (10th Feb.) and the city was sacked. Ten days later Hülāgū had the caliph with some of his relations put to death [cf. the art. BAGHDĀD].

MUSTAWFĪ, an official in charge of government accounts. Under the Turkish systems, e. g. under the Ghaznawids and Saldjūks, the title was borne by a functionary of high rank who was at the head of the diwān concerned with keeping the tally of public income and expenditure. Under the Nizām al-Mulk the office of the mustawfi was second only to that of the vizier (Bundārī, ed. Houtsma, p. 100) and appears to have corresponded to the diwān al-aimām or diwān al-azimma, the "Bureau of (Financial) Control" of the 'Abbāsids (Ṭabarī, iii. 522), although the Saldjūks also had a diwān of this name tenable by the mustawfi himself (Bundārī, p. 58). The qualities requisite in him were such as to fit him for the vizierate itself (ibid., p. 96), and indeed there were duties which were common to the two offices so that the same man could act as the nā'ib in both (ibid., p. 129, last line). The vizierate might be refused by a powerful mustawfi holding all the reins of government in his hands and reluctant to expose himself to the dangers inherent in the nominally more exalted office (ibid., p. 136, 141). But no officer was safe from a capricious or greedy monarch and the mustawfi Šafī al-Dīn suffered death and the confiscation of a large part of his property at the hands of Sultān Mas'ūd (ibid., p. 171). It is probable that the actual title of the State mustawfi was mustawfi 'l-mamlaka or something similar (ibid., p. 31), the ordinary mustawfi, or accountant, holding a subordinate position (ibid., p. 31, 3).

Under the Mongols the title was given to the superintendents of provincial finances (e.g. Ḥamd Allāh Mustawfī and his great-grandfather; cf. E. G. Browne, Lit. Hist. of Persia, iii. 87), and under the Timūrids, Ṣafawids and Qājārs, the mustawfī 'l-mamālīk filled the office of a secretary of state in charge of the public treasury accounts while the ordinary mustawfī was one of the lesser officers of the court (R. du Mans, Estat de la Perse en 1660, ed. Schefer, Paris 1890, p. 26, 178 sq.; A. Olearius, Voyages and Travels, London 1669, p. 274; Sir J. Malcolm, History of Persia, London 1815, ii. 437; R. G. Watson, History of Persia, London 1866, p. 16 sq.). Mustawfī 'l-mamālīk might however, under the latest Qājārs, be a title personal to a particular individual, who might be the Minister of the Interior (as in 1890) or even Prime Minister (as in 1910).

In Egypt, under the Fātimids and Mamlūks, the mustawfī might be the head of a diwān (as of the diwān al-djāish) or hold a less exalted, but still important, position as financial controller in such matters as the iktā'āt, or military fiefs (cf. Makrīzī, Khīṭaṭ, Bulāq 1270, ii. 193, middle and p. 227, under nazr al-djāish). The ordinary mustawfī was a minor official of the status of a clerk employed under a shādd, or overseer, in land-surveys or crop-estimation or else in a government office such as the depot of the government grain monopoly (op. cit., ed. Wiet, ii., ch. 32, p. 23–25).

AL-MUSTAZHIR BI 'LLĀH, ABU 'L-'ABBĀS AḤMAD B. AL-MUKṬADĪ, 'Abbāsīd caliph. After the death of his father in Muḥarram 487 (Feb. 1094) the young al-Mustazhir succeeded him; about this time the power of the Saldjūks was beginning to be weakened by internal dissensions [cf. BARKIYĀRŪK]. The Assassins, who had already appeared on the scene in al-Mukṭadī's reign, were able to take advantage of the situation and fighting this dangerous sect soon became one of the most important tasks of the sultāns and caliphs. The Crusades also began at this time. In Sha'bān 492 (July 1099) Jerusalem was taken and in the following years numerous fugitives reached Baghdād who urged Sultān Muḥammad to take part in the struggle. He therefore sent an army under the emir Mawdūd against the Crusaders in 505 (1111/12). Al-Mustazhir, who is hardly ever mentioned in the political history of this period, died on 16 Rabi' II 512 (Aug. 6, 1118) at the age of 41.

MUSULMAN [See MUSLIM.]

MUṬA, a town in the centre of a fertile plain in the land east of Jordan, east of the southern end of the Dead Sea, about two hours' journey south of Kerak, celebrated for the defeat of the Muslims there in Djumādā I of the year 8. According to the Arabic account, the reason why Muḥammad sent 3,000 men to this region was that an envoy whom he had sent to the king (presumably the imperial commandant) of Boṣrā had been murdered by a Ghassanid, but the real reason seems to have been that he wished to bring the (Christian or pagan) Arabs living there under his control. If the story is correct that he chose three leaders for the expedition, Zaid b. Hāritha [q. v.] and if he fell his cousin Dja'far b. Abī Ṭālib [q. v.] and if he also fell the poet 'Abd Allāh b. Rawāḥa [q. v.], he must have fully recognised the hazardous nature of the enterprise; but the tendency of the stories to describe the dangers of the expedition and the overwhelming nature of the opposing force as very great in order to put the unfortunate result of the battle in a better light is quite evident. In Ḥassān b. Thābit (xxi., cf. cxlviii.) we are only told that the three leaders above mentioned fell in succession. When the Muslims arrived in Ma'ān in eastern Edom, they learned that no less than 100,000 Byzantine soldiers and Beduins — a much exaggerated figure which Ibn Hishām doubles — had assembled in Ma'āb. Musil (Arabia Petrata, i. 29) locates this Ma'āb, which according to Ṭabarī, i. 2108, was not a town but a camp (fustāṭ), at Ladjdūn, a place near a spring with traces of an old Roman camp. But Abu 'l-Fidā' identifies it with al-Rabba which he describes as a village on the site of the former capital of the district, i. e. Rabbot Moab or Areopolis (P. Thomsen, Loca Sancta, p. 25; Brünnow, M. N. D. P. V., 1895, p. 70 sq. with photographs; Musil, op. cit., p. 370 sqq., 381). According to the Arab story, it was the emperor Heraclius himself who assembled this great army in Ma'āb, which is of course not true. When the Muslims heard this, we are told, they lost courage and wanted to wait until the Prophet could send them reinforcements but 'Abd Allāh b. Rawāḥa was able to fill them with such enthusiasm for a possible martyr's death that they marched on the imperial army. According to Ibn Hishām, the latter met them at a village belonging to Balḳā' called Maṣḥārīf, but this must be a misunderstanding as this term means the Syrian fortresses on the edge of the desert. At the sight of the great force of the enemy, they withdrew to the south but fighting began at the village of Muṭa and they were routed. When the three leaders named by Muḥammad had fallen in the order indicated, they wanted Thābit b. Arkān to take command but he gave it to Khālīd b. al-Walīd who succeeded in saving the rest of the force; this was the first occasion on which his military talents benefitted the Muslims; how he did it, we do not know as the stratagem related by Wākīdī, p. 312 is not to be taken seriously. Besides the Muslim account, we have a Byzantine one, the earliest in the history of the Prophet, by the historian Theophanes, whose version bears the stamp of veracity. According to him Muḥammad sent four chiefs to the land east of Jordan against the Christian Arabs there. They went to a village named Mucheon, which de Goeje, *Mémoire sur la conquête de la Syrie*², p. 6 sqq., takes to be a copyist's error for Ma'ab, while Musil, op. cit., p. 153, identifies it with Khirbet al-Mahna which lies in a broad depression, in order to fall upon the Arabs on a feastday (ἡμέρα τῆς εἰδωλοθύτου αὐτῶν, which seems to indicate a heathen rather than a Christian population) but the vicarius Theodoros there learned of their plans and rapidly collecting the garrisons of the fortresses, fell upon the Muslims at Mu'ta and defeated them. Three of the leaders and most of the force were killed and Chaledos who was called the "sword of God", alone succeeded in escaping. The tombs of the martyrs who fell there used to be pointed out at Mu'ta, where a mausoleum was built over them.

MUT'A (A.), temporary marriage (according to the Arab lexicographers "marriage of pleasure"), a marriage which is contracted for a fixed period on rewarding the woman.

I. Before Islām. According to Ammianus Marcellinus, xiv. 4, 4, temporary marriage was in use among the Arabs already in the fourth century A. D.; but this can hardly be a reference to mut'a as the woman brings a lance and tent to the man and can leave him if she likes after the period has elapsed. It is also doubtful if there is a distinct mut'a character in the marriage of Hāshim with Salma bint 'Amr, whom he married during a temporary stay in Yathrib and left with her family there after the birth of her child (Caetani, i. 111, § 92). From the passage Aghānī, xvi. 63 (matī'ūnī biha 'l-laila) as well as from Muslim traditions it may be concluded that mut'a was known in the Djāhiliya. If we remember that the same kind of temporary marriage as the mut'a was known in Erythraea (Conti Rossini, Principi di diritto consuetudinario, Rome 1916, p. 189, 249) it seems to me certain that mut'a is an old Arabian institution. (Temporary marriage is also found among other peoples: cf. Wilken, p. 21 sq.; Westermarck, History of Human Marriage, London 1925, iii. 267 sq.; cf. also the ἑγγαφεος γάμος in Egypt, to which Griffini, p. 327 calls attention; in a demotic document there is a reference to such a marriage for five months: cf. Mitteis-Wilcken, Grundzüge der Papyruskunde, II/i., p. 203 sqq.).

II. In the Kur'aan there is undoubtedly a reference to this form of marriage in the Medīna sūra iv. 28, although the orthodox explanation of this passage as early as the first century refers it to the ordinary nikāh; after giving a list of the classes of women with whom marriage is forbidden, it goes on: "And further you are permitted to seek out wives with your wealth, in modest conduct but not in fornication; but give them their reward (udjūr) for what you have enjoyed of them (istamtatūm) in keeping with your promise". After istamtatūm, Ubai' b. Ka'b and Ibn 'Abbās read the words ilā adjalin musamman "for a definite period" (Tabari, Tafsir, v. 9), a reading which naturally has not found its way into Sunni circles but is often added in Shi'a books.

III. The traditions are contradictory on the question of mut'a. According to some, it was in use in the time of the Prophet and he was even said to have practised it (matṭa'ah: Tabari, Annales, i. 1775, 1776; cf. Caetani, ii. 478, N^o. 17 and 19). In return for a robe or a handful of dates one could take an unmarried woman (uyyām) for a period of cohabitation (Muslim, Nikāh, tr. 13, 17; Ṭayālīsī, N^o. 1637). Especially when a man came to a strange town he could marry a woman there for the period of his stay so that she could look after him (Tirmidhī, Nikāh, bāb 28).

On the other hand, according to one tradition related by 'Alī, it was forbidden by the Prophet on the day (or in the year) of Khaibar (Bukhārī, Maghāzī, bāb 38; Dhabā'ih, bāb 28; Nikāh, bāb 31; Muslim, Nikāh, tr. 31—34; Nasā'ī, Nikāh, bāb 71 ["on the day of Hunain" must here be a mistake for Khaibar]; Ṣaid, bāb 31; Ibn Mādja, Nikāh, bāb 44; Tirmidhī, Nikāh, bāb 28; A'ima, bāb 6; Mālik, Nikāh, tr. 41; Aḥmad b. Ḥanbal, i. 79, 103, 142; Ṭayālīsī, N^o. 111; Zaid, Maḍmū', N^o. 718).

According to other traditions, he is said to have permitted it for a short time on particular occasions. In this connection we have a group of traditions which goes back to Sabra b. Ma'bad; the various accounts of this, some long, some short, which supplement one another, are in part given without date (Muslim, Nikāh, tr. 20, 26; Nasā'ī, Nikāh, bāb 71; Abū Dāwūd, Nikāh, bāb 13; Aḥmad b. Ḥanbal, iii. 404), in part referred to the conquest of Mecca (Muslim, Nikāh, tr. 21, 24, 25, 27, 28; Dārimī, Nikāh, bāb 16; Aḥmad b. Ḥanbal, iii. 404, 405), and in part to the farewell pilgrimage (Ibn Mādja, Nikāh, bāb 44; Dārimī, Nikāh, bāb 16; Abū Dāwūd, Nikāh, bāb 13; Aḥmad b. Ḥanbal, iii. 404 sq.). Their substance is as follows: The Prophet permitted mut'a; Sabra therefore went with a companion to a woman and each offered her his cloak. She chose the younger with the shabbier cloak and slept three nights with him; thereupon the Prophet forbade it. According to the stories associated with the farewell pilgrimage, the woman wished mut'a only for a fixed period so that ten days or nights was agreed upon, but the Prophet forbade it after the first night, saying: "Whoever of you has married a woman for a period, shall give her what he promised and ask nothing of it back and he shall separate from her; for God has forbidden this up to the day of resurrection". (For the conclusion cf. also the fragments of this in Muslim, Nikāh, tr. 23, 30).

According to a second group of traditions, which goes back to Djābir b. 'Abd Allāh and Salama b. al-Akwa', the Prophet permitted mut'a for three days on a campaign (Bukhārī, Nikāh, bāb 71; Muslim, Nikāh, tr. 14, 15; Aḥmad b. Ḥanbal, iv. 47, 51; according to Muslim, Nikāh, tr. 19 and Aḥmad b. Ḥanbal, iv. 55, this was in the year of Awtās, i. e. shortly after the capture of Mecca). In Bukhārī we have at the end: "The partnership of the two parties lasted three nights; and if they agreed to extend it, they did so, and if they wished to separate, they did so". A prohibition is given only in two versions in this group.

According to other traditions, mut'a was first forbidden by the caliph 'Omar at the end of his caliphate (Muslim, Nikāh, tr. 16—18; Aḥmad b. Ḥanbal, iii. 304, 380 and iii. 325, 356, 363, where there is a reference to the two kinds of mut'a, i. e. tamattu' on the pilgrimage and mut'at al-nisā'). 'Omar threatened the punishment of stoning so that he regarded mut'a as fornication (Ibn Māḍja, Nikāh, bāb 44; Mālik, Nikāh, tr. 42; Ṭayālīsī, N^o. 1792). Cf. the angry exclamation of Ibn 'Omar when he was asked about mut'a: "By Allāh, we were not immodest in the time of the Prophet of Allāh nor fornicators" (Aḥmad b. Ḥanbal, ii. 95, 104).

What then is at the bottom of these contradictory traditions? While Wellhausen regards mut'a as simply prostitution and not an old Arabian custom, Caetani points out that the traditions agree in connecting mut'a with an entrance of the Prophet into Mecca and sometimes even with the ḥaǧǧ and that a three days' duration is a feature of the mut'a; taking account of other considerations, he concludes that mut'a in the pagan period was religious prostitution on the occasion of the Meccan festival. However tempting this explanation may be, there is a complete lack of evidence for any religious prostitution in Mecca. With Wilken and Robertson Smith, we must rather regard mut'a as the survival into Islām of an old Arabian custom. The Prophet gives this custom sanction in the Qur'ān and also practised it himself. The traditions, if examined carefully, only mention two cases of prohibition by the Prophet: Khaibar and Mecca. As both these are later than the above Qur'ānic passage (years 3—5, according to Nöldeke-Schwally, i. 198) this prohibition would be quite possible. But since on the other hand the caliph 'Omar prohibited mut'a, which there is no reason to doubt, we might regard the tradition of prohibition as representing later views, which, as is often the case, are put back to the time of the Prophet.

IV. Attitude of the fuḳahā'. Ibn Abbās (d. 68) was an ardent champion of mut'a (Bukhārī, Nikāh, bāb 31; Muslim, Nikāh, tr. 18; Ṭayālīsī, N^o. 1792; Rāzī, Mafātiḥ al-Ghaib, Cairo 1324, iii. 195). In Mecca and the Yaman, according to Ibn Ruṣḥd (Bidāya, Cairo 1339, ii. 54), he also had followers; but before his death he is said to have been converted to the opposite view (Tirmidhī, Nikāh, bāb 28; Rāzī, loc. cit.). In later times, people still spoke derisively of a marriage by a fetwā of Ibn 'Abbās. In the second half of the first century in Mecca, fetwās were still given permitting mut'a (Muslim, Nikāh, tr. 29). The Qur'ān commentators Muǧāhid (d. 100), Sa'īd b. Djbair (d. 95), and al-Suddī (d. 127) also referred the above verse of the Qur'ān to mut'a. Suddī says that it is a marriage for a fixed period and that it should be concluded with the permission of the walī and with two witnesses; that after the expiry of this period the man has no longer any claim on the woman and that the two parties cannot inherit from one another (Ṭabarī, Tafsīr, v. 8). With the second century, the contrary view begins to predominate; although individuals like 'Amr b. Dīnār (d. 126), Ibn Ḍuraidī (d. 150) and the Zaidī sect of the Ḍjārūdīya permit mut'a (Ibn Ruṣḥd, loc. cit.; van Arendonk, Opkomst etc., Leyden 1919, p. 72, note 9), al-Ṭhawri (d. 161), Ibn al-Mubārak (d. 181) (Tirmidhī, Nikāh, bāb 28) and all the Sunnī schools of law as well as the Zaidīs (al-Nāṭiq bi'l-Ḥaḳḳ, Tahrīr, Berlin MS., Glaser 74, fol. 53b) consider mut'a forbidden. Its recognition was now limited to the Shī'a. And if the caliph Ma'mūn tried to introduce mut'a again, this was certainly due to his Shī'ī tendencies (Ibn Khallikān, Wafayāt, ii. 218).

At the same time, we still have in the second century the opinions of a period of transition. According to Zufar (d. 158), the marriage concluded under the form of mut'a was valid as a marriage but its limitation in time was invalid (Sarakhṣī, Mabsūṭ, v. 153; cf. also Bukhārī, Ḥiyāl, bāb 4). According to al-Ḥasan b. Ziyād al-Lu'lu'ī (d. 204), the mut'a was valid if the partners could not survive the time fixed, e. g. 100 years or more (Sarakhṣī, loc. cit.).

But in spite of their refusal to recognise mut'a, the Sunnīs made concessions by which mut'a gained a footing in another form. It became the practice not to insert a definite period in the contract; any agreement made outside the contract was not affected by the law. Al-Shāfi'ī (Umm, v. 71) for example, declared a marriage valid when it was concluded with the unuttered resolution (niya) to observe it only for the period of stay in a place or for a few days only, so long as this was not expressly stipulated in the contract. Similarly if agreement to this effect (murāwaqa) had been previously made and even if made on oath; but he describes such an agreement as mahrūh. There are also traces in later literature of a decision by Mālik by which he permitted mut'a (Sarakhṣī, v. 152; Badā'ūni, Muntakhab al-Tawārīkh, ed. Lees, ii. 208 sqq.) although only the contrary is recorded in the Muwaṭṭa' and Mudawwana (iv. 46).

A good exposition of the two opposite points of view is given from the Sunnī side by Kāsānī (d. 587), Badā'ī al-Ṣanā'ī, Cairo 1327, ii. 272—274 and in Rāzī, op. cit., iii. 193—198 and from the Shī'ī side by 'Alam al-Hudā al-Murtaḍā, Intiṣār, Teheran 1315, p. 60—65. The Sunnīs refer the verse above mentioned from the Qur'ān to regular marriage and declare the adǧr to be mahr, while the Shī'īs base their view on this verse and consider the traditions of prohibition not to be abrogatory and do not consider 'Omar authoritative for a prohibition. The Imāmis even go so far as to say: "The believer is only perfect when he has experienced a mut'a" (al-Ḥurr al-'Āmilī, v. 69, 2).

V. The teachings of the Imāmis.

1. Form. Mut'a is an irrevocable (lāzim) contract which, like every contract, comes into existence through ḳabūl and iqḳāb. It may be concluded with the words nikāh, taẓwīǧ or tamattu', but must always contain a precise statement of the period (adǧal) and a definite recompense (adǧr or mahr). This recompense may be the dowry usual in other marriages or a handful of corn, a dirham or such like. The period may vary from a day to months or even years. Witnesses are not necessary; nor need it be concluded before the ḳāḍī, if the partners are capable of using the formulae correctly. If the mahr is not given, the contract is invalid. If the period is not given, according to some it is a regular marriage if the word tamattu' was not used at the end of the ceremony; in the latter case the contract is again invalid.

2. The two partners must naturally fulfil the usual conditions for the conclusion of an agreement. The woman must further be unmarried and chaste ('afīfa) and if possible ought to know about mut'ā, i.e. be a Shi'ī, and can only contract a temporary marriage with a Muslim. According to Ibn Bābūye (d. 381) and al-Mufid (d. 413), mut'ā with an unbeliever is forbidden, even with a member of the possessors of a scripture (kitābiya). The nawāṣib (extreme Khāridjīs) are included among the unbelievers. According to most Imāmis (and Tūṣī also) however, mut'ā with a Christian or Jewish woman is permitted but makrūh with a madjūsiya. Mut'ā with a slave-girl is only admitted with the consent of her master. Usually the woman contracts the marriage without a walī; only a virgin (bikr), according to some, requires her father's consent (Abu 'l-Ṣalāh, d. 82; Ibn Bābūye, d. 381; Ibn al-Barrādj, d. 481; cf. Hilli, iii. 92). The man may in this way take other wives in addition to his four legal wives, especially on journeys. He must not, however, take two sisters at the same time, not even during the 'idda.

3. The mut'ā ends on the expiry of the period agreed upon. It cannot be prolonged by arrangement between the two parties; a new temporary marriage with a new mahr must rather be contracted at the end of the period. Divorce is impossible; according to some, however, li'ān and ḡihār are permitted.

4. There is no obligation on the man to provide food and home for the woman. The two partners cannot inherit from one another; but according to some, inheritance may be provided for in the contract. The 'idda after the expiry of the mut'ā is two periods or 45 days, i.e. the 'idda of a slave-girl. There is, however, disagreement whether on the man's death the period of waiting is the usual one for a wife or that for a slave. The children go with the father.

VI. Modern practice. Although these Shi'ī views have a certain amount of moral support, the mut'ā in many cases can only be described as legalised prostitution. It is true that in Persia such marriages are made for very long periods, e.g. 99 years, but the Persian, when on a journey, temporarily marries in any place where he is stopping for some time and in the towns and caravanserais mollahs and other brokers offer a wife to each new arrival. To make this business more profitable, the 'idda period is evaded by concluding a second temporary marriage with the same man after the expiry of the first, for in the case of such a marriage the 'idda is not necessary. This marriage and a woman of this kind is called in Persia ṣiḡhe (lit. "form" i.e. of the contract). Cf. Olearius [1637], Muscowit. u. pers. Reyse, Schlesswig 1656, p. 609; Chardin [1673], Voyages, Paris 1811, ii. 222—223, 225—227; Polak, Persien, Leipzig 1865, i. 207 sq.; E. G. Browne, A year amongst the Persians, Cambridge 1927, p. 505 sq.; H. Norden, Persien, Leipzig 1929, p. 148, 167; and the romance of the traveller James Morier, The adventures of Hajji Baba of Ispahan, 1824, part iii, chap. 6—8.

The constantly quoted story (first in Wilken, p. 19) of Alex. Hamilton (A new account of the East Indies, Edinburgh 1727, i. 51) that at the beginning of the xviiith century temporary marriages were publicly negotiated in Sounan (= Ṣanā') in South Arabia and concluded before the qāḍī, is a very improbable one; for Hamilton knew only the coast-towns from his own observation and wrote his account of his travels later from memory. He seems to be confusing them with conditions in Persian towns, and he makes mistakes on other matters.

In Mecca, in modern as well as ancient times (for the middle ages cf. Lisān al-'Arab: wa-mut'at al-tazwīḡ bi-Makka minhu), temporary marriages were concluded among the Sunnis but nothing is said of this in the marriage contract or this would make it invalid; everything necessary is arranged previously by word of mouth. On the conclusion of the contract, the man utters the ṭalāk formula with a time limit. Such agreements are as a rule kept (Snouck Hurgronje, Mekka, ii. 156; do., Verspr. Geschriften, vi. 150). The same artifice is used in such cases as Shāfi'ī indicated long ago (cf. above).

AL-MUTA'ĀLĪ. [See ALLĀH, II.]

MUTA'ARRIB(A) (A.) "arabised", the term applied to the descendants of Qaḥṭān (the Biblical Yaktān) who were regarded by the genealogists as "having become Arabs" in contrast to the supposed native "pure" Arab tribes like 'Ād, Thamūd, etc. They settled in South Arabia and adopted Arabic from the "pure" Arabs. The latter had learned it through Djurm, the only man who spoke Arabic in Noah's ark (all the rest spoke Syriac), and his son-in-law Aram b. Sām b. Nūh was the ancestor of the 'Ād and Thamūd etc. From South Arabia, their main centre, tribes of the Banū Qaḥṭān migrated to the north, so that there are in Northern Arabia also tribes whose genealogies make them belong to the Banū Qaḥṭān [cf. the article MUSTA'RIB(A) where the literature is given]. (ILSE LICHTENSTÄDTER)

MUTADĀRIK, name of the sixteenth metre in Arabic prosody, added to al-Khalil b. Ahmad's list by al-Akhfash al-Awsaṭ [q. v.]. It is also called mukhtara', mukhdath, khabab, shakik, muntashik, darb al-khail, rakq al-khail, ṣawt al-nākūs. It does not seem to have been used by the poets before Islām or of the first century A. H.

It has four feet to the hemistich and two 'arūd and four qarb:

Fā'ilun may change to fā'ilun (fā'lun =) fī'lun.

AL-MUTAQID BI 'LLĀH, ABU 'L-'ABBĀS AḤMAD B. TALḤA, 'Abbāsīd caliph, son of al-Muwaffaq, co-regent with the caliph al-Mutamīd [q. v.], and a Greek slave named Dīrār. Al-Mu'taqid was already the real ruler in the two last years of al-Muwaffaq's life and after the death of al-Mutamīd in Rājab 279 (Oct. 892) he ascended the throne. The new caliph who had inherited his father's gifts as a ruler and was distinguished alike for his economy and military ability is one of the greatest of the 'Abbāsīds in spite of his strictness and cruelty. On the accession of al-Mu'taqid the Ṭūlūnid Khumārāwaih [q. v.], wearied of the long war, concluded peace and gave the caliph his daughter in marriage. While the Khāridjīs in Mesopotamia were weakened by internal dissensions, al-Mu'taqid in 280 (893—894) undertook an expedition against the rebel Banū Shāibān and brought them to obedience. In the next two years the allies of the Khāridjī chief Hārūn b. 'Abd Allāh were defeated and in 283 (896) the latter fell into the hands of Ḥusain b. Hamdān, and was sent to Baghdād where the caliph had him crucified. The influence of the Hamdānīs now began to increase in Baghdād. The Dulafids [q. v.] who had given the caliphs much trouble were soon finally conquered. After al-Ḥārith b. 'Abd al-'Azīz called Abū Lailā had been defeated and slain in Dhu 'l-Ḥijja 284 (Jan. 898) near Isfahān, al-Mu'taqid had the other Dulafids imprisoned and the family now disappears from history. The Sāmānids increased their power at the expense of the Ṣaffārīds and the 'Alids. In 287 (900) the Ṣaffārīd 'Amr b. al-Laith [q. v.] was captured and brought to Baghdād. In the same year the 'Alid Muḥammad b. Zaid, lord of Ṭabaristān, occupied Djurdj marched against Khurasān but was defeated by the Sāmānid general Muḥammad b. Hārūn and died of his wounds while Ibn Hārūn took possession of Djurdjān and Ṭabaristān in the name of the Sāmānids. About the same time the governor of Armenia and Ādharbāidjān Muḥammad b. Abi 'l-Ṣādj endeavoured in combination with his freedman Waṣīf to conquer Egypt. The latter however was taken prisoner by the caliph's troops and as the most influential men in Tarsus had promised their help, al-Mu'taqid had them arrested and the fleet there burned. Muḥammad was however allowed to retain his post but died soon afterwards of the plague. The Ḳarāmatians [q. v.] now appeared on the scene and in the same year the Ḳarāmatian leader al-Djannābī [q. v.] inflicted a complete defeat on the caliph's troops. Al-Mu'taqid died in Baghdād on 22 Rabī' II, 289 (April 5, 902) at the age of 40 or 47. According to some he was poisoned. — Cf. also the art. ISMĀ'IL B. BULBUL.

(K. V. ZETTERSTĒEN)

AL-MUTAQID BI 'LLĀH, ABU 'AMR 'ABBĀD B. MUḤAMMAD B. 'ABBĀD, the most important and most powerful sovereign of the 'Abbādīd dynasty [q. v.] who reigned over the little kingdom formed by his father Abu 'l-Kāsim Muḥammad b. 'Abbād, with Seville [q. v.] as his capital, at the time of the break up of the Umayyad caliphate of Spain and the rise of the reyes de taifas (mulūk al-tawā'if); in the course of a reign of nearly 30 years (433—460 A.H. = 1042—1069 A.D.), he very considerably increased his territory by making himself the champion of the Spanish Arabs against the Berbers in Spain whose numbers, already very large in the tenth century, had been much increased since the period of the 'Amirid dictators.

When he succeeded his father, the new king of Seville, who was then 26, following the usual practice of the period, assumed the title of ḥādīj, and a little later the laḡab of al-Mu'taqid bi 'llāh by which he is best known. Gifted with real political ability, he was not long in revealing his character, that of an autocratic ruler, ambitious and cruel and little scrupulous in the means which he used to achieve his ends. As soon as he came to the throne he continued the war begun by his father against the petty Berber ruler of Carmona [q. v.], Muḥammad b. 'Abd Allāh al-Birzālī, then against the latter's son and successor Ishāk. At the same time, al-Mu'taqid was extending his kingdom in the west between Seville and the Atlantic Ocean. It was with this object that he attacked and defeated successively Ibn Ṭaifūr, lord (ṣāhib) of Mertola, and Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā al-Yaḥṣubi, lord of Niebla (Ar. Labla) [q. v.] who in spite of his Arab descent had had the audacity to ally himself with the Berber chiefs. In face of these successes of the king of Seville, the other mulūk al-tawā'if who distrusted him formed a kind of league into which entered the princes of Badajoz [q. v.], Algeciras [q. v.], Granada [q. v.] and Malaga [q. v.]. This soon became a war between the 'Abbādīd of Seville and the Aṭṣād [q. v.] of Badajoz al-Muzaḥḥar [q. v.]; it was to last for many years in spite of the efforts at mediation by the Djahwarīd ruler of Cordova which only achieved their end in 1051. Down to this year, while harassing the frontiers of the kingdom of Badajoz, al-Mu'taqid displayed other activities: in succession he defeated Muḥammad b. Aiyūb al-Bakrī, lord of Huelva [q. v.] and of Saltes [q. v.] (whose son was the famous geographer), the Banū Muzain, lords of Silves [q. v.], and Muḥammad b. Sa'īd Ibn Hārūn, lord of Santa Maria de Algarve [q. v.], and annexed their territories. To justify these annexations, al-Mu'taqid used a very crude pretext: he alleged that he had found the unfortunate Hishām II, who had really died in obscurity a few years before, and would go on till he had restored to him his former empire subdued and pacified in its integrity. In order not to be exposed to the cruelty of the king of Seville, the majority of the petty Berber chiefs settled in the mountains of the south of Andalusia acquiesced in this make-believe and paid homage to the 'Abbādid and to the Commander of the Faithful miraculously restored to aid the cause of al-Mu'taqid but at the same time carefully concealed by him. It was labour lost for them. One day the 'Abbādid invited to his palace in Seville all these petty chiefs with their suites and put them to death by asphyxiating them in baths the openings in which he walled up. In this way he took Arcos [q. v.], the capital of the principality of the Banū Khizrūn, Moron [q. v.] defended by the Banū Dammār, and Ronda [q. v.], capital of the Banū Ifran (1053).

This aroused the wrath of the most powerful Berber ruler in Spain, Bādīs b. Ḥabbūs the Zīrid [q. v.] who ruled in Granada and who alone seemed able to resist al-Mu'taqid. The latter however found that fortune favoured him in this war and a little later took Algeciras from the Ḥammūdīd al-Kāsim b. Ḥammūd. He next tried to seize Cordova and sent an expedition against it in charge of his son Ismā'īl; the latter tried to profit by the occasion to rebel and create for himself a kingdom with Algeciras as capital. This rash plan cost him his life, which his father took with his own hand, just as before him 'Abd al-Rahmān III and al-Manṣūr b. Abī 'Amir had inflicted the supreme penalty on their unworthy sons. This was the beginning of the political career of al-Mu'taqid's other son Muḥammad al-Mu'tamid [q. v.] who was to succeed him on his death; by his father's orders he went with an army to support the Arabs of Malaga, who had rebelled against the tyrannical ruler of Bādīs, the despotic Berber of Granada. But the latter routed the Sevillian army and al-Mu'tamid in sorry state reached Ronda from which he sought and received the pardon of his terrible father. The latter had long before repudiated the fiction of the pseudo-Hishām which he no longer needed. He was now by far the most redoubtable and the most feared of the Spanish rulers. He had no enemies but the Berbers, Muslims like himself but much further removed from his social ideal of a Spaniard than his Christian neighbours in the north. In another land he might have been called "Berberoktonos". But the bitterness of his hatred cast a shadow over his last days: it was not without fear that he followed events in the western Maghrib, hitherto the fief of Muslim Spain; at least in the sub-Mediterranean zone. The irresistible advance of the Almoravids [q. v.] following Yūsuf b. Tāshfīn through all Morocco would not find the straits of Gibraltar an insurmountable obstacle for long. Al-Mu'taqid realised this very well. Death at least prevented him from seeing his kingdom, entirely built up by his own energy and bold initiative, pass in a few weeks into the hands of invaders, brethren of these Berbers of Spain whom he had detested and in part destroyed.

MUTAFARRIQA (A.), name of a corps of guards, who were especially attached to the person of the Ottoman Sultān in the ancient Turkish court. The name is also applied to a member of the guard. Their occupations were similar to those of the Çawush [q. v.], not of military character, nor for court service only, but they were used for more or less important public or political missions. Like the Çawush, the Muta-farriqa were a mounted guard. In later times there were two classes, the gedikli or zi'emetli Muta-farriqa, and the fiefless. Their chief was the Mutafarriqa Aghası. In course of time their number constantly increased; at the end of the xviith century the maximum was fixed at 120 (G.O.R. 2, iii. 890, after Rāshid), but in the beginning of the xixth century von Hammer gives the number 500 for the total. The Porte needed sometimes to lay stress on the importance of the office to make them acceptable as extraordinary envoys by foreign governments (G.O.R. 2, iii. 929, after Rāshid).

Among those who have occupied this rank was the well-known first Turkish printer Ibrāhīm Muta-farriqa.

Although different explanations of the title mutafarriqa are given, the most probable interpretation is, that these functionaries were not given a special duty but formed originally a corps used for "different matters". This is still the use of the word in modern Turkish.

AL-MUTAKABBIR. [See ALLĀH, ii.]

MUTAKALLIM. [See KALĀM.]

MUTAKĀRIB, name of the fifteenth metre in Arabic prosody; it contains four feet to the hemistich. There are two 'arūd and six ḍarb:

	Fa'ūlun fa'ūlun fa'ūlun fa'ūlun
	fa'ūlun fa'ūlun fa'ūlun fa'ūlun
	Fa'ūlun fa'ūlun fa'ūlun fa'ūlun
1st 'arūd	fa'ūlun fa'ūlun fa'ūlun fa'ūl
	Fa'ūlun fa'ūlun fa'ūlun fa'ūlun
	fa'ūlun fa'ūlun fa'ūlun fa'al
	Fa'ūlun fa'ūlun fa'ūlun fa'ūlun
	fa'ūlun fa'ūlun fa'ūlun fal
	Fa'ūlun fa'ūlun fa'al
2nd 'arūd	fa'ūlun fa'ūlun fa'al
	Fa'ūlun fa'ūlun fa'al
	fa'ūlun fa'ūlun fal

Outside of the ḍarb, the foot fa'ūlun often loses its n and becomes fa'ūlu; used as the first 'arūd, it further undergoes the following changes: fa'ūl and (fa'ul =) fa'al. According to al-Khalīl, the foot which precedes the ḍarb cannot suffer any change. The first foot of the first hemistich of the first line of a piece of verse may become ('ūlun =) fī'lun and ('ūlu =) fī'lu. (MOH. BEN CHENEH)

MUTAKĀWIS, term in prosody; cf. the art. KĀFIYA.

MU'TAMAD KHĀN, MUḤAMMAD SHARĪF, was born in an obscure family in Persia, but coming to India, he attained high honours in the reigns of Djahāngir and Shāh Djahān. He received in the third year of Djahāngir a military command and the title of Mu'tamad Khān (the trustworthy Lord). Subsequently he joined prince Shāh Djahān in his campaign in the Deccan as a bakhshī (paymaster). On his return to court, in the 17th year of Djahāngir's reign, he was entrusted with the duty of writing the Emperor's memoirs. He attained a higher rank in the service of Shāh Djahān and was appointed mīr bakhshī (adjutant-general) in the 10th year of the new reign. He died in 1049 (1639). He is the author of a history called Ikbāl Nāma-i Djahāngiri, in three volumes: 1. the history of Akbar's ancestors; 2. Akbar's reign (MSS. in the India Office Library and in the Bankipore Library); 3. the reign of Djahāngir (printed in the Bibliotheca Indica, Calcutta 1865 and in Lucknow, A. H. 1286).

AL-MU'TAMID 'ALA 'LLĀH, ABU 'L-'ABBĀS AḤMAD B. DJĀ'FAR, 'Abbāsid caliph, son of al-Mutawakkil and a slave-girl named Fityān from Kūfa. He ascended the throne on the deposition of al-Muhtadī in Radjab 256 (June 870). He had no ability as a ruler, but relied on the vizier 'Ubaid Allāh b. Yahyā b. Khākān and left most of the affairs of government in the hands of his brother Abū Aḥmad al-Muwaffaḥ. In Shawwāl 261 (July 875) he designated his son Djā'far al-Mufawwiḍ as his successor and governor of the western provinces and al-Muwaffaḥ as his successor and governor of the east. The able al-Muwaffaḥ soon became the real ruler and gradually restored order in the empire again while the caliph himself exercised no influence. Already in the reign of al-Muhtadī a dangerous rising had broken out among the Zandj the negro slaves in the lower Euphrates valley, but it was not till 270 (883) that its leader 'Alī b. Muḥammad [q. v.] was conquered by al-Muwaffaḥ. Some time after the accession of al-Mu'tamid — according to the usual statement in 259 (873) —, the dynasty of the Tāhirids was overthrown by Ya'qūb b. al-Laiṭh [q. v.] and soon afterwards the Sāmānids appeared in Transoxania. On the death of Ya'qūb in 265 (879) his brother 'Amr [q. v.] submitted to the caliph and received the eastern provinces as a fief. About the same time Aḥmad b. Ṭulūn [q. v.] made himself independent in Egypt and after his death (270 = 884) his son Khumārawaih waged a desperate struggle against the 'Abbāsid caliphate. In al-Mawṣil and the surrounding country the Khāridjīs continued their destructive career, but were finally subdued. Peace was also often disturbed by 'Alid rebels and there was also the war with the Byzantines. The Paulicians who had stood by the Muslims faithfully were repeatedly defeated by the emperor Basil and in 263 (876) the latter retook the fortress of Lu'lu'a near Tarsus which al-Mu'tasim had taken. It was not till 270 (883) that the Muslims were able to inflict a complete defeat on the Byzantines. The war was however continued. After the death of al-Muwaffaḥ in 278 (891) the caliph had to proclaim the latter's son al-Mu'tadid [q. v.] as his successor instead of Djā'far al-Mufawwiḍ. In the following year al-Mu'tadid left Sāmarrā and moved the capital to Baghdād again. Here he died in Radjab 279 (Oct. 892) at the age of 48 or 50. According to some he was poisoned by al-Mu'tadid.

(K. V. ZETTERSTÉEN)

AL-MU'TAMID 'ALA 'LLĀH, the laḡab by which the third and last member of the dynasty of the 'Abbāsid [q. v.] of Seville in the 11th century is best known; his real name was MUḤAMMAD B. 'ABBĀD AL-MU'TADID [q. v.] B. MUḤAMMAD B. ISMĀ'IL IBN 'ABBĀD. While still a boy — barely 13, having been born in 431 (1040) — he was placed by his father in nominal command of an expedition against Silves (Ar. Shilb [q. v.]), then in the possession of Ibn Muzain, and this town was taken by assault as was Santa Maria d'Algarve soon after (Ar. Shantamariyat al-gharb, now Faro [q. v.]) which was held by Muḥammad b. Sa'īd Ibn Harūn [q. v.] (444 = 1052). The young 'Abbādid prince was then appointed by his father governor of these two towns. His elder brother Ismā'īl having been executed in punishment for his rebellion (455 = 1063; cf. AL-MU'TADID), Muḥammad al-Mu'tamid became heir-presumptive to the throne of Seville. A little later, the army which he was leading to the help of the Arabs of Malaga, who had rebelled against the tyranny of Bādīs b. Ḥabbūs, the Berber ruler of Granada of the Zīrid [q. v.] dynasty, was routed by the latter and al-Mu'tamid had to take refuge in Ronda [q. v.] to which his father, at first very angry at his failure, finally sent him his forgiveness. When the powerful ruler of Seville died in 461 (1069), his son succeeded to a considerably extended kingdom which included the greater part of the southwest of the Iberian peninsula.

A whole series of more or less romantic episodes is associated with the reign and life of al-Mu'tamid. If we may believe several authors of the Muslim west, an individual called Ibn 'Ammār, vizier and poet, exerted a very considerable influence during the greater part of the career of this prince from his governorship of Silves. Al-Mu'tamid's relations with a young slave girl al-Rumaikīya, gifted with considerable poetic talent, has also been the subject of much literary embellishment. It was from the surname of this young woman I'timād, that al-Mu'tamid is said to have adopted his which comes from the same root. She became his favourite wife and presented him with several sons. As to Ibn 'Ammār, exiled by al-Mu'tadid, he was recalled on the accession of his patron to Seville from which he went at his own request to be governor of Silves before being appointed grand vizier.

In the second year of his reign, al-Mu'tamid was able to annex to his kingdom the principality of Cordova [q. v.], over which the Djahwarids had been ruling, in spite of the efforts of the king of Toledo, al-Ma'mūn [q. v.]. The young prince 'Abbād was appointed governor of the old capital of the Umayyads. But at the instigation of the king of Toledo, an adventurer named Ibn 'Ukāsha was able in 468 (1075) to take Cordova by surprise and put to death the young 'Abbād prince and his general Muḥammad b. Mārtin. Al-Ma'mūn took possession of the town where he died six months later. Al-Mu'tamid whose paternal affection had been wounded and pride insulted tried for three years vainly to reconquer Cordova. He was not successful until 471 (1078); Ibn 'Ukāsha was put to death and the part of the kingdom of Toledo between the Guadalquivir and the Guadiana conquered by the armies of Seville. Nevertheless at this time it took all the skill of the vizier Ibn 'Ammār to conclude peace by paying double tribute with Alfonso VI of Castille when he sent an expedition against Seville.

This was just the time when through the energy and tenacity of the Christian princes taking advantage of the feuds which were setting the Muslim rulers of the taifas against one another, the reconquista, which had received a check and then a setback from the last Umayyads, resumed its advance on the south of the Peninsula. In spite of their successes, of which the Muslim chroniclers make a great deal, it must not be forgotten that by the middle of the vth (xth) century, many Muslim dynasties of Spain were being forced to seek on payment of heavy tribute the temporary neutrality of their Christian neighbours. Shortly before the taking of Toledo, which had far-reaching effects, by Alfonso VI in 478 (1085), al-Mu'tamid began to be involved in serious difficulties. On the imprudent advice of his vizier Ibn 'Ammār, al-Mu'tamid tried to add to his kingdom, after the principality of Cordova, that of Murcia [q. v.], which was ruled by a prince of Arab origin, Muḥammad b. Aḥmad Ibn Ṭāhir. In 471 (1078), Ibn 'Ammār went to the Count of Barcelona, Ramon Berenguer II, and asked him for assistance to conquer Murcia in return for a payment of 10,000 dinārs; until this sum was paid al-Rashīd, a son of al-Mu'tamid, was to remain as hostage. After animated negotiations which ended in the payment of a sum three times as large to the Count of Barcelona, Ibn 'Ammār resumed his plan of conquering Murcia and soon succeeded in doing so with the help of the lord of the castle of Bldj (now Vilches), Ibn Rashīk. In Murcia however, Ibn 'Ammār soon rendered himself obnoxious to his master by assuming the attitude of an independent ruler and on al-Mu'tamid's reproaching him he replied by insults to the king of Seville, his wife and his sons. Betrayed by Ibn Rashīk, he had to take refuge in Murcia and then successively in Leon, Saragossa and Lerida. Returning to Saragossa, he endeavoured to assist its ruler al-Mu'tamin Ibn Hūd [cf. SARAGOSSA] on his expedition against Segura, but he was taken prisoner and handed over to al-Mu'tamid, who in spite of the bonds of friendship which had so long linked them together, slew him with his own hand.

In the meanwhile, Alfonso VI was no longer concealing his designs on Toledo, the siege of which he began in 473 (1080). Two years later, when he sent a mission to enforce payment of the annual tribute due to him from al-Mu'tamid, its members were insulted and the Jewish treasurer Ibn Shalib who accompanied it was put to death because he had refused to accept debased money. He therefore invaded the kingdom of Seville, sacked the flourishing towns of Aljarafe (Ar. al-Sharaf; q. v.), advanced through the district of Sidona (Ar. Shadhūna; q. v.) as far as Tarifa [q. v.] where he uttered his celebrated remark expressing his pride at having reached the utmost limits of Spain.

The capture of Toledo by Alfonso VI dealt a serious blow to Islām in Spain. The king of Castille soon demanded of al-Mu'tamid that he should surrender those of his lands which had formed part of the kingdom of the Dhū 'l-Nūnids (a part of the modern provinces of Ciudad-Real and Cuenca). Throughout Muslim Spain, his demands which increased every day, made the position very serious. In spite of their reluctance, the Muslim rulers in Spain, led by al-Mu'tamid, were forced to seek the help of the Almoravid sultān Yūsuf b. Tāshfin [cf. ALMORAVIDS] who had just conquered the whole of Morocco in an irresistible advance. It was decided to send him an embassy consisting of the vizier Abū Bakr b. Zaidūn and the kādis of Badajoz, Cordova and Granada. An agreement having been reached, not without difficulty, Yūsuf b. Tāshfin crossed the Straits or Gibraltar and on the 22nd Radjab 479 (Oct. 23, 1086) inflicted on the Christian troops the disastrous defeat of Zallāka [q. v.] not far from Badajoz. We need not recall here how Yūsuf b. Tāshfin recalled to Africa, could not follow up his victory as the Muslim rulers of Spain had hoped, who through the influence exercised by the Spanish faḳīhs on the Almoravid, soon lost all prestige in his eyes. After his departure the Christians began again to harass Muslim lands, to such an extent that al-Mu'tamid had this time to go in person to Yūsuf b. Tāshfin in Morocco to ask him to cross the Straits once more with his troops. Yūsuf consented and landed at Algeciras in the following spring (482 = 1090). He laid siege to the fortress of Aledo but without taking it; then stimulated by popular feeling and the advice of the faḳīhs, he came to the conclusion that it would be more advantageous for him to wage the djihād in Spain on his own account and proceeded to dethrone and dispossess the princes who had sought his intervention. With this object he sent an army to invade the kingdom of Seville under Sir b. Abi Bakr, who at the end of 1090 took Tarifa, then Cordova where one of al-Mu'tamid's sons, Faṭḥ al-Ma'mūn, who was in command of it, was killed, Carmona, then Seville, which was captured in spite of a heroic sortie by al-Mu'tamid. The latter was taken prisoner by the Almoravid and sent with his wives and children first to Tangier, then to Meknes and a few months later to Aghmāt [q. v.], near Marrākush. There he led a miserable existence for several years until his death at the age of 55 in 487 (1095).

The sad end of al-Mu'tamid touched all his biographers, who are particularly numerous and expatiate on his natural gifts, poetical talents, generosity and chivalrous spirit. He is one of the most representative types of the enlightened Spanish Muslims of the Middle Ages, patrons of letters and scholarship, liberal and tolerant, but living in an atmosphere of luxury and ease little compatible with the care of a kingdom with frontiers open to envious neighbours on all sides. Not so great a ruler as his father al-Mu'taḍid, al-Mu'tamid is however a much more attractive figure, perhaps just on account of his misfortunes. He is entitled to a place among the great figures of Spanish Islām, alongside of 'Abd al-Rahmān III, al-Hakam II, al-Manṣūr b. Abi 'Amir and at a later date Lisān al-Dīn b. al-Khaṭīb.

MUTAMMIM B. NUWAIRA, a poet, contemporary with the Prophet. He was the brother of Mālik b. Nuwaira [q. v.], chief of the Banū Yarbū', a large clan of the Banū Tamīm. Mutammim owes his fame to the elegies in which he lamented the tragic death of his brother Mālik and these poems have made the latter's name immortal. The Arabs said there was nothing comparable to these elegies, overflowing with emotion. They regarded their author as the type of brotherly devotion.

Mutammim does not seem to have played any prominent part before the Hidjra. He was eclipsed by the striking personality of his brother, to whose qualities he never hesitated to pay homage. He is represented as having been of unprepossessing appearance, one-eyed and short in stature. The Bakrī chief al-Hawfazan eulogized the humanity with which Mutammim treated him during his captivity. Falling in his turn into the hands of the Banū Taghlib, Mutammim was delivered by a stratagem devised by his brother. He seems to have adopted Islām at the same time as his brother. Like the latter, he is numbered among the "Companions" although we never find him in direct relations with the Prophet. He escaped from the disaster in which Mālik was overwhelmed; a few fragments of other poems suggest he did not write elegies exclusively.

But after the death of Mālik he devoted himself to celebrating his memory and demanding vengeance for his death. Refused by the Caliph Abū Bakr, he thought he might have more success on the accession of 'Omar. He hurried to Madina where he was very well received by 'Omar. The latter listened with delight to his elegies, regretted that he himself had not the gift of poetry so that he might worthily celebrate his brother Zaid who had fallen in the wars of al-Yamāma, but he refused to reverse Abū Bakr's decision and limited himself to dismissing Khālid b. al-Walid, a step which probably owed something to the poetical extortations of Mutammim.

After this, tradition says that the poet became almost blind through weeping, and that he wandered over the many routes of Arabia, uttering his complaints everywhere. He found himself abandoned by his wives who became tired of his incurable sadness and wandering life. He left two sons Dāwūd and Ibrāhīm, also poets. He survived 'Omar if, as Ibn Khallikān says (ed. Wüstenfeld, N^o. 792), he is really the author of an elegy on the death of this caliph.

AL-MUTANABBĪ, "he who professes to be a prophet", the surname by which the Arab poet ABU 'L-TAIYIB AḤMAD B. AL-ḤUSAIN AL-DJU'FĪ is usually known (cf. in Ibn Khallikān, Wafayāt [Cairo 1310], i. 36, two genealogies, which do not agree, going back to his great-grandfather). Abū 'l-Taiyib was born in Kūfa in 303 (915) in the Kinda quarter whence the ethnic al-Kindī sometimes given him. His family in very humble circumstances claimed descent from the Yamanī clan of the Dju'f and he himself all his life was convinced of the superiority of the Arabs of the south over those of the north (cf. al-Wāhidī, Sharḥ Diwān al-Mutanabbī, ed. Dieterici, p. 48—49; al-Yāzidī, al-'Urf al-taiyib, p. 29 [these two works will be quoted as Wāh. and Yāz.]). The boy received his early education in his native town and soon distinguished himself by his intelligence, his prodigious memory and his precocity as a poet. He now passed under Shī'ī influences, perhaps Zaidī (cf. 'Abd al-Kādir al-Baghdādī, Khizāna, i. 382, 12) which affected the development of his philosophy, a subject to which we shall return. Circumstances were however to accelerate the speed of Abū 'l-Taiyib's religious development. Towards the end of 312 (924), undoubtedly under pressure from the Ḳarmāṭians [q. v.] who had just taken and sacked Kūfa, Abū 'l-Taiyib and his family made a first stay of two years (cf. al-Sam'ānī, Ansāb, 506 b₂₄; al-Badī'ī, al-Shubḥ al-munbī, i. 6) in Samāwa, the region lying between the Sawād of Kūfa in the east and Palmyrene in the west. The Banū Kalb who led a nomadic life in these desert steppes had been much cultivated by the Ḳarmāṭian dā'īs. It is possible that the young poet at this time came into contact with some of these heretics. It is however not very probable, in view of his youth, that this first contact had any definite effect upon him. On the other hand, this stay among the Beduins certainly gave Abu 'l-Taiyib that profound knowledge of the Arabic language of which he was later so very proud.

On returning to Kūfa, at the beginning of 315 (927), Abu 'l-Taiyib seems to have decided to devote himself entirely to poetry. At this time he most admired the great panegyrists of the preceding century, Abū Tammām and al-Buḥturī [q. v.]. Like them and like the majority of his contemporaries, he sees in poetry a sure means of attaining wealth and power. He at once attached himself to a certain Abu 'l-Faql, of Kūfa, to whom he dedicated a short piece (Wāḥ., p. 17—21; Yāz., p. 10—11). Perhaps a convert to Ḳarmāṭism, in any case a complete agnostic — the praises which he allows to be offered him show this —, this individual seems to have exercised a considerable influence on the religious and philosophical development of al-Mutanabbī (cf. also Khizāna, i. 382 below). Prepared by the Shī'a atmosphere in which he had passed his childhood and by the relations he had had with the Ḳarmāṭians in Samāwa, Abu 'l-Taiyib in contact with this patron cast off religious dogmas which he regarded as spiritual instruments of oppression. He then adopted a stoic and pessimistic philosophy, echoes of which are found throughout his work. The world is made up of seductions which death destroys (cf. Wāḥ., p. 39, l. 8—13; p. 162, l. 12—13; Yāz., p. 23 and 97); stupidity and evil alone triumph there (cf. Wāḥ., p. 161, l. 8—10; Yāz., p. 97); the Arabs — representatives of a superior race in his eyes — are overwhelmed in it by cowardly and barbarous foreigners (cf. Wāḥ., p. 148, l. 1—5; p. 160, l. 2—6; Yāz., p. 87 and 96). In contact with this world with which he was out of harmony, the consciousness of his talent, which Abu 'l-Taiyib had, developed rapidly; his vanity increased to a degree which is almost inconceivable (cf. Wāḥ., p. 60; Yāz., p. 34). His Arab particularism, as with all anti-Shu'ūbiyya [cf. SHU'UBIYYA], incited him to attack foreign oppressors (Wāḥ., p. 58, l. 30—31; Yāz., p. 33). This is why, by a contradiction from which he is hardly ever free, al-Mutanabbī coveted all his life those riches and power which he scorned in his heart, while he stands out from the mass of his contemporaries by his rigid morality and austerity (cf. al-Badī'i, op. cit., i. 78—81).

At first however, Abu 'l-Taiyib thought only of conquering the world by his poetic gifts, and to find a more favourable field for his activity he left Kūfa towards the end of 316 (928), probably as a result of the town being again sacked by the Ḳarmāṭians. He was naturally attracted to Baghdād (cf. al-Badī'i, op. cit., i. 82—83) and there became the panegyrist of a compatriot of his, Muḥammad b. 'Ubaid Allāh al-'Alawī (cf. Wāḥ., p. 6—7; Yāz., p. 3—4). From there he went to Syria. For two years he led the life of a wandering troubadour of the period (cf. Mez, Renaissance des Islams, p. 256). It is impossible to follow him in his wanderings for his Diwān, our only guide, does not present his poems in a satisfactory chronological order. Some pieces of the period are addressed to Beduin chiefs of the region of Manbij [q. v.] (cf. Wāḥ., p. 24—25, 38—39, 66—67; Yāz., p. 12—13, 22—23, 28—29); others are dedicated to men of letters of Tripolis (Wāḥ., p. 88—89; Yāz., p. 19—20), al-Lādhikiya (Latakia)

(cf. Wāḥ., p. 116—135; Yāz., p. 66—78). The poems of this period are hurriedly written and mediocre in quality, but traces of his real genius are already apparent. With the exception of a marthiya (lament) and some impromptu pieces they are all ḡasidas on neo-classical lines. The influence of Abū Tammām and al-Buḥturī preponderates.

In the course of this period of experiment, Abu 'l-Taiyib was irritated at not finding his merit recognised. Gradually he looks forward to his dreams of domination being realised by violence (cf. Wāḥ., p. 138, l. 3—7; Yāz., p. 79). Finally he abandoned the work of a paid panegyrist and returning to al-Lādhikiya he began revolutionary propaganda, the nature of which has long been misunderstood. According to Oriental writers (al-Badī'i, op. cit., i. 25—30; Ibn al-Anbārī, Nuḡat al-Alibbā', p. 369), Abu 'l-Taiyib proclaimed himself a prophet in al-Samāwa, was taken prisoner by Ikshidid [q. v.] troops and then received his epithet of al-Mutanabbī. Kratschkowsky (Mutanabbī i Abu l'Ala, St. Petersburg 1909, p. 9—11) does justice to these traditions, without however taking full account of some clear allusions in the Diwān. The latter contains pieces which prove beyond all possible doubt that a rebellion was led by al-Mutanabbī (cf. Wāḥ., p. 49—58, 86; Yāz., p. 28—33, 50). This rising, as usual at this period, must have been political as well as religious. The rising began in al-Lādhikiya and then extended to the western borders of Samāwa where the Banū Kalb constituted an element always ready to rebel. Without adhering to Ḳarmāṭism, al-Mutanabbī exploited its principles which found only too ready an echo among the marauding Beduins (cf. Wāḥ., p. 57, l. 22—23; Yāz., p. 32; allusion to the massacre of pilgrims by the Ḳarmāṭian Abū Tāhir, in 317 = 930). The ambiguity of the utterances of the rebel, the opportunism of his doctrines and his conception of the imāmate on Ḳarmāṭian lines, may have caused some misunderstanding of his preaching, since at this time any agitator was regarded as a Ḳarmāṭian. After some initial successes, al-Mutanabbī and his Beduins were defeated; he was captured and imprisoned at Ḥims (towards the end of 322 = 933). After a trial and two years' imprisonment (Diwān, Paris MS., N^o 3092, fol. 16a), Abu 'l-Taiyib was condemned to retract his errors and set free. From this adventure he gained only the epithet of al-Mutanabbī and the conviction that poetry alone would lead him to the realisation of his ambitious dreams.

The poems composed by Abu 'l-Taiyib immediately before and during his rebellion are distinguished by spontaneity of inspiration, by the liberty which the poet takes with poetic forms, by the vigour of the style, which has a much more personal character than in his first manner.

As soon as al-Mutanabbī had returned to his profession of panegyrist, he naturally resumed his wandering life (beginning of 325 = 937). For several years he led a precarious existence and had to be content to sing the praises of citizens and minor officials of Antioch, Damascus, Aleppo etc. who paid him very badly (cf. Wāḥ., p. 93—206; Yāz., p. 51—131; Yāqūt, Irshād, v. 203). Little by little however, his fame grew. At the beginning of 328 (939), we find him becoming court poet to the emir Badr al-Ḳharshānī (the Badr b. 'Ammār of the Diwān), governor of Damascus for the ex-amir al-umara' Ibn Rā'iq [q. v.], who had just taken possession of Syria. Of Arab origin, Badr was regarded by al-Mutanabbī as the Maecenas for whom he had been waiting so long. The panegyrics and occasional poems which are dedicated to this emir reveal a sincere admiration for him and possess a sustained inspiration (cf. Wāḥ., p. 206—245; Yāz., p. 132—163). These pieces and those that precede them, after Abu 'l-Ṭaiyib's return to literature, constitute what might be called the third manner of the poet. With the exception of a poem on hunting in the style of Abū Nuwās [q. v.] (cf. Wāḥ., p. 201—202; Yāz., p. 128—129) and a number of impromptu poems of no particular interest, al-Mutanabbī wrote only ḥaṣīdas during this period. He would seem then to have returned to his first manner, if the work of this period did not show considerable progress in form.

The friendship between Badr and al-Mutanabbī lasted only about a year and a half and as a result of intrigues of jealous rivals (cf. Wāḥ., p. 253, lines 13—16; Yāz., p. 169), Abu 'l-Ṭaiyib feeling no longer safe, sought refuge in the Syrian desert (cf. Wāḥ., p. 251—252; Yāz., p. 168—169). There the idea of rebelling again took possession of him (cf. Wāḥ., p. 253—254; Yāz., p. 170—171). Fortunately the departure of Badr for the 'Irāq enabled him to leave his hiding-place and resume his profession of panegyrist. He now sang the praises of several individuals of second rank (cf. Wāḥ., p. 107—108, 284—348; Yāz., p. 60—61, 194—241). Lastly he succeeded in establishing himself at the Ḥamdānīd court in Aleppo where he became the official poet of the emir Saif al-Dawla [q. v.] at the beginning of 337 (948).

From the literary point of view, the work of this period which runs roughly from the middle of 329 (940), date of the quarrel with Badr, to the beginning of 337 (948), marks his fourth manner, to which he remained faithful till his death. It is characterised by a compromise between the pure neo-classical tradition and a freer form which the poet had adopted in the poems of the period of his rebellion. Without rejecting the framework of the neo-classical ḥaṣīda, he reduces the erotic prologue to a minimum, sometimes even replacing it by a philosophical and lyrical opening which breathes his dreams, disillusionments and angers.

Al-Mutanabbī stayed nine years with Saif al-Dawla. He was genuinely attached to this patron, who was in his eyes the personification of the ideal Arab chief, brave, magnanimous and generous. Saif al-Dawla in his turn recognised the worth of his panegyrist whom he overwhelmed with gifts and never treated with arrogance. Al-Mutanabbī accompanied him on his expeditions and on returning to Aleppo sang of his exploits against the Byzantines and the Beduins of the desert. In the brief intervals of leisure between the campaigns of the Ḥamdānīd, the poet shared in the leisure of the court of Aleppo, devoting himself to improvisation and writing panegyrics as occasion arose (cf. Wāḥ., p. 522—537; Yāz., p. 376—395) or laments (marthiya) on the deaths of relatives of Saif al-Dawla (cf. Wāḥ., p. 388—389, 408—409, 577—578; Yāz., p. 271—272, 286—287, 427—428). The difficult character of al-Mutanabbī and the repute which he enjoyed did not fail to gain him implacable enemies. A few devoted friends like the poet al-Babbaghā [q. v.] tried, it is true, to defend him but their zeal could do nothing against the enmity of the hostile group led by the famous Abū Firās [q. v.]. Saif al-Dawla at first paid no attention to the attacks made upon his favourite. When he grew wearied and his protection ceased, Abu 'l-Ṭaiyib no longer felt his life safe, fled secretly from Aleppo with all his family and sought refuge in Damascus (end of 346 = 957).

Eastern critics generally are agreed that the poems composed by al-Mutanabbī during his stay with Saif al-Dawla mark the highest point in his work. Although there is a certain degree of exaggeration in this, it is certain that the poet, while continuing his fourth manner, reveals in the highest degree the mastery which he had acquired in his art during this period. Much more than Abū Firās, with whom he is often contrasted, he was able to depict the glories of Saif al-Dawla's campaigns against the Byzantines. His verse, it is true, has not the charm of that of Abū Firās but it is fuller and more epic in style.

From Damascus, Abu 'l-Ṭaiyib went to Egypt to al-Fuṣṭāṭ [q. v.] where he obtained the patronage of the Ikhshidid Kāfūr [q. v.]. Al-Mutanabbī's career now reveals the necessities to which poets in the fourth (tenth) century had to submit. Deprived of moral and material independence Abu 'l-Ṭaiyib was forced to sing the praises of a patron for whom in his heart he felt only contempt. The panegyrics which he devoted to him barely conceal his regret at losing the favour of Saif al-Dawla. They are somewhat forced and contain points against Kāfūr (cf. al-Badī'ī, op. cit., i. 125—126). The poet perhaps only agreed to celebrate this patron because the latter had promised him the governorship of Ṣaīdā (Sidon) (cf. ibid., i. 115). When he saw that these promises were not being fulfilled, he tried to gain the favour of another Ikhshidid general, Abū Ṣhudjā' Fāṭik (ibid., i. 131—132), but the latter dying in 350 (960) and relations with Kāfūr still being strained, al-Mutanabbī had once more to decide to fly. On the day of the feast of sacrifice of this year, after writing a satire on Kāfūr, he left al-Fuṣṭāṭ secretly and crossing Arabia after great trials (cf. al-Badī'ī, op. cit., i. 139—140), he reached the 'Irāq, spent some time in Kūfa, then settled in Baghdād. He perhaps thought of attaching himself to the famous Būyid vizier al-Muhallabī who had gathered a very brilliant court around him. He had however to abandon hope of this in face of the hostility to him evinced by poets and scholars established at the court of al-Muhallabī, such as Ibn al-Ḥadīdjādī [q. v.] and Abu 'l-Faraj al-Iṣfahānī, author of the Kitāb al-Aghānī. During his stay here, as he had already begun to do in Egypt (cf. Ibn al-Farajī, Ta'rikh al-Andalus, No. 453), al-Mutanabbī gave lectures in which he expounded to a group of friends the work he had done till that date (cf. Dhahabī, Ta'rikh al-Islām, Paris, No. 1581, fol. 265a). The year 353 (964) was spent in this fashion. The poet perhaps also visited Kūfa about this time (cf. F. Gabrieli, Vita di al-Mutanabbī, p. 60, note 4). At the beginning of 354 (965) in any case, he left the 'Irāq and went via al-Ahwāz to Arradjān [q. v.] in Susiana where he received the patronage of the Būyid vizier Ibn al-'Amīd [q. v.]. Al-Mutanabbī devoted some panegyrics to him (cf. Wāḥ., p. 740—741; Yāz., p. 564—565), then he left him to go to Ṣīrāz in Fārs where he rejoined the Būyid Sultān 'Aḥud al-Dawla [q. v.] who had expressed a desire to have him at his court. After addressing to the Būyid Sultān several panegyrics which are among his best work, Abu 'l-Ṭaiyib left Shīrāz for reasons not clearly known, perhaps simply out of nostalgia (cf. Wāḥ., p. 766, line 1—3; Yāz., p. 589). He was returning by short stages from Persia to Baghdād when he was attacked by marauding Beduins near Dair al-ʿĀkūl [q. v.] at the end of Ramaḍān 354 (Aug. 955). He and his son were killed in the fighting and all his baggage, including the autograph MSS. of his Diwān, was scattered (cf. al-Badīʿi, op. cit., i. 227—239).

Even in his lifetime, al-Mutanabbī had been surrounded by ardent admirers who defended his work in its entirety against the attacks of detractors no less eager to run him down. Among the latter however, the majority only criticised him as a poet because they objected to his character as a man. The criticism was therefore not distinguished by impartiality and only reflects the opinions of a coterie. It required the death of Abu 'l-Ṭaiyib to produce a third class of admirers who were more clear-sighted than the first and sufficiently impartial not to fall into the exaggerations of the second (cf. al-Djurdjānī, al-Wasāʿta, p. 11—12, 45—46). It was the opinion of this new category that prevailed and when Mutanabbī's contemporaries had all disappeared, the literary public remained decidedly favourable to Saif al-Dawla's bard (except al-ʿAskari [q. v.] and Ibn Khaldūn). From the fifth (eleventh) century the name of al-Mutanabbī became a synonym for "great poet". His literary influence became one of the most considerable ever exercised on Arabic poetry. Annotated by Ibn Djinnī [q. v.] and later by Abu 'l-ʿAlāʾ [q. v.], by al-Wāḥidī, al-Ṭabrizī, al-ʿUkbarī and Ibn Sīda [q. v.], to mention only the most eminent, the Diwān of Abu 'l-Ṭaiyib throughout the middle ages and in modern times has been made accessible to scholars and literary men from Persia to Spain by learned men, often more zealous than intelligent. Space does not permit us to estimate what later poetry owes to al-Mutanabbī. We are content to point out that in different ways all Arab panegyrists have been influenced by Abu 'l-Ṭaiyib. At the present day he is still one of the most read in North Africa; Syria and Egypt also hold him in very high esteem and many critics have devoted studies full of praise to him. It seems however that in the last named country al-Mutanabbī attracts at least as much by the boldness of his philosophy and the ardour of his pro-Arab feelings as by his purely literary qualities.

A list of commentators, but incomplete, is given in Ḥadjdji Khalifa, Lexicon, iii. 306—312. The most celebrated commentaries are those of al-Wāḥidī, Mutanabbī carmina cum commentario Wahidii (ed. MUṬARRIZĪ, ABU 'L-FATH NĀSIR B. ʿABD AL-SAYYID B. ʿALĪ B. AL-MUṬARRIZ, grammarian, adīb and jurist, was born in Khwārizm in Radjab 538 (1144). He was a pupil of al-Mawḥib b. Aḥmad known as Akḥṭab Khwārizm. As he was born in the same province and in the year in which al-Zamakḥsharī died, he was called Khalīfat al-Zamakḥsharī; al-Suyūṭī's assumption that he was a pupil of Zamakḥsharī was deduced from this epithet and is of course wrong. Al-Muṭarrizī was an adherent of the Muʿtazila. As a jurist of the Ḥanafī school he enjoyed particular prestige and his work al-Mughrib fi 'l-Lughā, a dictionary, arranged alphabetically, of terms used in tradition and of the legal terms of the jurists of the Ḥanafī school, was regarded by the scholars of this madhhab with the same respect as the Ḥarib al-Fikḥ of al-Azhari by the Shāfiʿis. For his son he compiled a lexicon of synonyms entitled al-ʿIknāʾ li-mā huwayya taht al-Kināʾ, which the latter was to study after he had learned the Qurʾān by heart. It is a kind of text-book giving a comprehensive survey of the subject. In al-Muṭarrizī's opinion the existing works on this subject were either too big or not full enough. The work deals only with "good and usual" words, omitting the "bad and unusual" ones. Modern and ancient linguistic usage are distinguished and verses often quoted in illustration. His al-Miṣbāḥ fi 'l-Naḥw, which deals with the grammar of the Arabic language, was also written for his son. It was much used by students and often commented upon. Super-commentaries were added to the commentaries; one of the latter was even translated into Turkish. Al-Muṭarrizī was also an expositor and prepared a commentary on the Maḳāmāt of Ḥariri. He also was a poet, among his efforts being a poem in which he set himself to use nothing but synonyms. In 601 (1204) he was in Baghdād where he had disputations with the scholars of that city. In Djumādā I of 610 (1213) he died in his native town.

MUTAŠARRIF. [See SANDJAK.]

AL-MUTAŠIM BIL'LĀH, ABŪ IŠHĀḲ MUḤAMMAD, an 'Abbāsīd caliph, born in 179 (795—796) or 180 (796—7), the son of Hārūn al-Rashīd and a slave-girl named Mārida. In the reign of his brother al-Ma'mūn [q.v.] he took part in the fighting against the Byzantines in Asia Minor and received the governorship of Egypt. After the death of al-Ma'mūn in Radjab 218 (Aug. 833) he ascended the throne and was soon afterwards acknowledged even by his nephew al-'Abbās b. al-Ma'mūn [q.v.] whom the troops had proclaimed caliph and the army also then paid him homage. An 'Alid pretender, Muḥammad b. al-Ḳāsim, was disposed of by the governor of Khurāsān 'Abd Allāh b. Ṭāhir [q.v.]. After concluding a truce with the Byzantine emperor Theophilus, al-Mutašim sent an army commanded by the Arab general 'Udjaif b. 'Anbasa against the Zoṭṭ [q.v.] who had migrated from India in the Sāsānian period and settled in the swamps between Baṣra and Wāsiṭ. They had been frequently used in their wars by the Muslims. After the death of al-Ma'mūn however, they began to ravage and lay waste the country round as if it were hostile territory. They submitted after seven months' fighting at the turn of the year 219—220 (834—835) and in Muḥarram 220 (Jan. 835) they were brought in ships to Baghdād and banished by al-Mutašim to 'Ain Zarba [q.v.]. In the same year he appointed Ḥaidar b. Ka'su, usually called al-Afshīn [q.v.], commander-in-chief in the war against Bābek [q.v.], but it was only after two years that he was victorious. The intolerance of the caliph against all those who would not share the opinions of the Mu'tazila made him unpopular with the people and in addition there was the dissatisfaction of the citizens of the capital with the undisciplined Berber and Turkish mercenaries whom al-Mutašim took into his service. At the end of 220 (835) he therefore resolved to move his residence to a smaller place. While his son Hārūn al-Wāḥik remained in Baghdād as governor, the caliph established himself first on the al-Ḳāṭal canal and then in Sāmarrā three days' journey up the river. Here in the course of the year 221 (836) there arose a splendid palace with numerous buildings for the troops [cf. the art. BAGHDĀD]. Very soon afterwards the war with the Byzantines blazed up again. The emperor Theophilus invaded Muslim territory on the Upper Tigris, captured Zibāṭra and wrought tremendous havoc in northern Syria and Mesopotamia. In Djumādā I 223 (April 838) al-Mutašim himself took the field, accompanied by his ablest generals. The huge force advanced in three columns: the eastern army was commanded by al-Afshīn, the two divisions of the western one by al-Mutašim and Aṣhnās. Al-Afshīn very soon put the emperor to flight and in Shawwāl (Sept.) of the same year

Amorium after 55 days' siege passed through treachery into the hands of the caliph who had the town destroyed. But the victory had no permanent results. As winter was coming on, al-Mutašim had to retire, particularly as a conspiracy in favour of his nephew al-'Abbās b. al-Ma'mūn [q.v.] demanded urgent measures. About the same time the ispahbad of Ṭabaristān Māziyār b. Ḳārin rebelled, but the rising was suppressed by 'Abd Allāh b. Ṭāhir [q.v.]. In 226 (840—841) or 227 troubles again broke out in Palestine where the Umayyads still had many supporters. The leader, Abū Harb al-Mubarka', claimed to be a descendant of the Umayyads and everywhere preached rebellion against the caliph until Radjā' b. Aiyūb al-Ḥiqārī, whom al-Mutašim sent against him, took him prisoner and brought him to Sāmarrā. Al-Mutašim died on 18th Rabi' I 227 (Jan. 5 842) in Sāmarrā. By favouring the Turks and suppressing the Arab element he hastened the decline of the 'Abbāsīd empire. Unlike al-Ma'mūn, he was comparatively uneducated. That learning was not allowed to fall into oblivion in his reign is rather due to the chief ḳāḍī Aḥmad b. Abī Du'ād [q.v.].

AL-MUTAŠIM, MUḤAMMAD B. MA'N B. MUḤAMMAD IBN ŠUMĀDIH AL-TUJĪBĪ, second ruler of the dynasty of Tuḡībīds [q.v.] of the kingdom of Almería [q.v.], reigned from 443 to 484 (1051—1091). Gifted like his contemporary al-Mu'tamid [q.v.] of Seville with a certain amount of poetic talent, he made his capital during his long reign one of the great centres of culture in the Peninsula. But like the other mulūk al-ṭawā'if of Spain, he was for the most of his time at war with one or other of his neighbours. He was without doubt implicated in the conspiracy fomented by the Jew Yūsuf against his master Bādīs, king of Granada [cf. ZIRIDS]. Later his forces took part with those of Yūsuf b. Ṭāshfin in the famous battle of Zallāḳa [q.v.]. Like the other Muslim rulers of Spain he felt in the following year the weight of the Almoravid sultān's arm. After unsuccessfully besieging the fortress of Aledo and inciting Yūsuf to act harshly against al-Mu'tamid, whom he hated personally, he realised on his death-bed that his capital would be besieged by the Almoravids as Seville had been. This is why he advised his son and successor Aḥmad Mu'izz al-Dawla to seek an asylum with the lords of Bougie [q. v.]. Almeria was taken very soon afterwards by the Almoravids.

AL-MUTAWAKKIL 'ALĀ 'LLĀH, ABU 'L-FADL DJĀ'FAR B. MUḤAMMAD, an 'Abbāsīd Caliph, born in Shawwāl 206 (Feb.—March 822), son of the caliph al-Mu'tašim and a slave-girl from Khwārizm named Shudjā'. He ascended the throne in Dhu 'l-Hijjā 232 (Aug. 847) on the death of his brother al-Wathīk. His old opponent, the vizier Ibn al-Zaiyāt, soon fell a victim to the cruelty of the new caliph and a similar fate befell the Turkish general Itākḥ, although the latter along with Waṣīf had helped him to the throne. The caliph dreaded his influence and had him thrown into prison where he died of thirst (Djumādā II 235 = Dec. 849—Jan. 850). From the religious point of view al-Mutawakkil was thoroughly orthodox. Soon after his accession he forbade any disputation about the Qur'ān. Those who had been arrested because they would not recognise the teachings of the Mu'tazila were released and in 235 (849—850) he revived and intensified the regulations for special dress for Jews and Christians which went back to the caliph 'Omar. The synagogues and churches recently built in Baghdad were taken down and the Mu'tazili chief qāḍī Aḥmad b. Abī Du'ād [q. v.] with his sons dismissed and the office of chief qāḍī given to the Sunnī Yahyā b. Akṭham. The 'Alids also fell under his ban. In 236 (850—851) he had the mausoleum of al-Ḥusain in Kerbelā' destroyed and pilgrimage to this place forbidden. The provinces were frequently ravaged by rebels and foreign foes. In Aḥḥarbaīdjān in 234 (848—849) Muḥammad b. al-Ba'ith rebelled; he had earlier been taken prisoner and brought to Sāmarrā but had escaped; he established himself in the strong town of Marand. The caliph's troops could do nothing against him until Bogha al-Sharābī [q. v.] took command. After a long siege the latter offered him a pardon; but when Ibn al-Ba'ith tried to escape he was seized and brought to Sāmarrā, where he soon died in prison. When al-Mutawakkil attempted to treat semi-independent Armenia like a conquered province, a dangerous rising broke out there in 237 (851—852), which was suppressed in the following year, but only with difficulty, by Bogha al-Kabir. About the same time (238), the Byzantines landed in Egypt and plundered Damietta and in Asia Minor the war went on in the traditional fashion against the Byzantines. When the Paulician sect was persecuted by the empress Theodora they went over to the Muslims in masses. The Byzantines, however, succeeded in taking many prisoners. Those who would not become converted were massacred; but when al-Mutawakkil who had moved his residence in Safar 244 (May—June 858) to Damascus but left it after only two months, sent Bogha with the Turkish cavalry against the Byzantines, the fortune of war turned. Bogha fought with success against the enemy and in the following year the emperor Michael himself was defeated at Samosata. In 246 (860—861) the Muslim generals took a considerable number of prisoners; but no permanent change in the situation was produced. In Syria also trouble broke out. Two governors in succession were driven out of Ḥimṣ and only with the help of the troops from Damascus and al-Ramlā was order restored (241 = 855—856). About the same time al-Mutawakkil sent an army under command of Muḥammad b. 'Abd Allāh al-Ḥummī against the rebel Beḍja. The latter were completely defeated but their leader 'Alī Bābā was pardoned. In the reign of al-Mutawakkil the dynasty of the Ṣaffārids [q. v.] was established in Sijjistān. To keep the people of Baghdad in check, he sent for the governor of Khurāsān, Muḥammad b. 'Abd Allāh b. Tāhir [q. v.], and when the turbulent praetorians made trouble he built a new residence at Djāfariya in 245 (859—860) outside of Sāmarrā, which swallowed up enormous sums. Poets and scholars were rewarded with princely munificence by this caliph. The extravagance, capriciousness and cruelty of the caliph, however, made him hated, and finally he quarrelled with the commander of the Turkish bodyguard. In Dhu 'l-Hijjā 235 (July 850) he had arranged that his eldest son Muḥammad al-Muntašir should succeed him and the two other sons Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Mu'tazz and Ibrāhīm al-Mu'ayyad were each to receive a governorship with a claim to the throne after al-Muntašir. He began to favour al-Mu'tazz however, and thus aroused al-Muntašir's discontent. The latter conspired with a few others of the same sentiments and in Shawwāl 247 (Dec. 861) al-Mutawakkil was murdered [s. AL-FATH B. KHAḲĀN].

MUTAWĀTIR (A.), part. act. vi. from w-t-r, "that which comes successively". It is used as a technical term in two senses:

a. In the theory of cognition it is applied to historical knowledge (khabar), if the latter is generally acknowledged; e. g. the knowledge that there is a city called Makka and that there has existed a king called Alexander.

Definitions of the term show slight differences. According to al-Djurdjānī knowledge is mutawātir, when it is supplied by so many persons that either their number or their trustworthiness excludes doubt of its truth (Ta'rifāt, ed. Flügel, p. 210; cf. Sprenger, Dictionary of Technical Terms, p. 1471).

According to Abū Ḥafṣ 'Umar al-Nasafi († 537 = 1142) reports are mutawātir when handed down without deviation by persons who cannot be supposed to have plotted a lie. Taftāzānī in his commentary (p. 33 sq.) mentions two objections. The first is, that Jews and Christians accept as mutawātir reports that are rejected by Muslims. To this objection Taftāzānī simply replies that the possibility that these reports should be mutawātir, is excluded. The second objection is, that the reports of every single reporter (āḥād, q. v.) represent an opinion only and that an accumulation of opinions cannot be said to afford certainty. To this Taftāzānī replies that often plurality has a power of which singleness is devoid, e.g. a cord made of hair.

For the place of this source of knowledge within the theory of cognition, cf. the Supplement, s. v. ‘ILM.

6. In prosody the term is applied to the rhyme in which one moving letter intervenes between the quiescents.

MUTAWWIF, Meccan pilgrims’ guide. The word literally means one who leads the ṭawwāf [q. v.]. The task of the mutawwif is however by no means limited to assisting pilgrims from foreign lands, who entrust themselves to their guidance, to go through the ceremonies required at the circumambulation of the Ka‘ba. On the contrary they act as guides at the sa‘y also and at all other ceremonies which are prescribed or only recommended for the ḥadjj or ‘umra [q. v.]. The mutawwifs also cater very completely for the physical welfare of the pilgrims. As soon as the pilgrims arrive in D̲jidda, their agents are ready on the arrival of the steamers to provide all the services they require from disembarkment to departure for Mecca. In Mecca the mutawwifs or members of their families and servants take charge of the pilgrims. During the whole of their stay they provide the pilgrims with lodging, service, food, purchases (necessary and unnecessary), attend them if they fall ill and in case of death take charge of what they leave behind them.

The mutawwifs of course do not do all this for nothing. They are appropriately paid for their trouble and see that, if the pilgrim is rich, their friends and relations also make something out of him. Of the money which they themselves receive, they have to hand over a considerable part in the form of fees, presents etc. to the shāikh of the gild and to the treasury, — another reason for getting as much as possible out of those entrusted to their care. It is therefore no wonder that many pilgrims have complained bitterly about the covetousness of these particularly prominent representatives of the Meccan pilgrim industry. Recently the fees for guides have been fixed by a legal enactment of the Ḥijāz government (O. M., xii. [1932], 249).

Reference has already been made to the fact that the mutawwifs are organised in gilds; they are divided up into separate groups who sometimes have the right to exploit the pilgrims from a definite area only (e.g. Lower Egypt). All these groups together form the gild with a chief shāikh officially recognised at their head. The gild is also very exclusive. “Wild” (i. e. independent) guides (djarrārs) have to be content with the scanty pickings left over for them by the organised mutawwifs.

(R. PARET)

AL-MU‘TAZILA is the name of the great theological school which created the speculative dogmatics of Islām. The meaning of the name is clear from al-Mas‘ūdī, Murūdj, vi. 22: the Mu‘tazilis are those who profess the doctrine of i‘tizāl, i. e. the doctrine of the mansila baina ‘l-mansilataini or the state intermediate between belief and scepticism, the fundamental doctrine of the school (see below). A tradition which emanates from the ahl al-ḥadīth derives the name Mu‘tazila from a schism which took place in the circle of al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī: after laying down their doctrine of the mansila baina ‘l-mansilataini, Wāṣil b. ‘Aṭā and ‘Amr b. ‘Ubaid are said to have separated (iṭazala) from al-Ḥasan’s circle to found an independent school or rather to have been expelled from it by the latter. These traditions are not entirely without historical foundation but the interpretation of the name deduced from them is certainly wrong. The Mu‘tazilis were proud of their name, which they certainly would not have been if it had been a nickname invented by their enemies. We have here, as the variety of versions also shows, a tendentious invention of the ahl al-sunna wa ‘l-djama‘a anxious to rehabilitate al-Ḥasan and brand the Mu‘tazilis as heretics.

Origins and political history. There are quite definite indications that the Mu‘tazila was of political origin and that it arose under the same constellation as the Shī‘i and Kharidjī movements. The accession of ‘Alī (D̲hu ‘l-Ḥijda 35) is the great watershed in the currents of the history of Islām. It is well known that several notable Companions of the Prophet refused to pay ‘Alī the homage which he demanded or offered it reluctantly. The most frequently mentioned were Ṭalḥa and al-Zubair but the names of many others have been preserved: Sa‘d b. Abī Waḳḳās, ‘Abd Allāh b. ‘Omar, Muḥammad b. Maslama, Usāma b. Zaid, Ṣuhaib b. Sinān and Zaid b. Ṭhābit (al-Ṭabarī, i. 3072). Of these Ṭalḥa and al-Zubair openly rebelled against ‘Alī but the majority remained neutral. The Medinese in general followed the example of the latter and in Baṣra al-Aḥnaf b. Kays with 6,000 Tamīmīs and a group of Azdis under Ṣabra b. Shaimān also stood aside from the quarrel (al-Ṭabarī, i. 3169, 3178). In speaking of the latter the text uses the verb i'tazala, which still has its proper sense of "to separate from", but which is already on the way to become a political term meaning "to take up a neutral attitude in the quarrel between 'Alī and his adversaries". Now al-Nawbakhtī mentions (Kitāb Firaḡ al-Shi'a, ed. Ritter, p. 5) a party which on the accession of 'Alī separated and followed Sa'd b. Abī Waqqās, 'Abd Allāh b. 'Omar, Muḥammad b. Maslama and Usāma b. Zaid. "These separated (i'tazalū) from 'Alī and refused either to fight against him or to take his side although they had paid homage to him and had received him favourably; they were called al-Mu'tazila and are the ancestors of all the later Mu'tazila". The Mu'tazila as a theological school must therefore have been preceded by a political Mu'tazila, which determined its structure.

This hypothesis seems to be confirmed if we analyse carefully what is recorded of the founders of the theological school. According to a unanimous tradition, this school originated with two natives of Baṣra, Wāṣil b. 'Atā' [q. v.] and 'Amr b. 'Ubad [q. v.]. The period of their activity covers practically the reign of the caliph Hishām and his Umayyad successors, i. e. the years 105–131 (723–48). We have a good deal of quite early information about them, not always free from lacunae, but sufficient to enable us to grasp the leading ideas in their theological work (see Bibl.). It is clear from all these traditions that the doctrine of i'tizāl formed the starting point for the creation of the school, that Wāṣil was the first to formulate it and that he later won over 'Amr to his teaching. This is how al-Khaiyāṭ records the origin of the idea of i'tizāl. Muslims were agreed that he who committed a grave sin deserved the name of fāsiḳ and of fādīr, but opinions varied as to the character of the individual who received these epithets. The Khāridjīs said he was an infidel. The Murdji'īs said he was a believer in spite of his fiṣḳ and his fudjūr; al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī and his circle described him as a hypocrite (munāfiḳ). Wāṣil demonstrates that the description given in the Qur'ān of a believer and an infidel cannot be applied to a believer who has committed a grave sin; the latter is therefore neither believer nor infidel. Now it is impossible to regard him as a hypocrite as al-Ḥasan wants to do, for a hypocrite must pass as a believer until his hypocrisy is brought to light. The only possible course then is to put the fāsiḳ in a special category of those who are in an intermediate state (manzila baina 'l-manzilataini). These same ideas are found in the conversation by which Wāṣil is said to have won 'Amr over to the doctrine of i'tizāl (al-Saiyid al-Murtaḍā, Amālī, i. 114 sq. = Ibn al-Murtaḍā, al-Mu'tazilah, p. 22 sq.; source probably al-Khaiyāṭ).

There are political problems concealed behind these speculations. The doctrine of manzila baina 'l-manzilataini is not the result of interest in pure speculation, but arose out of an clearly defined opinion on the individuals who took part in the quarrels that raged round the caliphate of 'Alī. It is striking how much space is occupied by the question of 'Alī, of Ṭalḥa, of al-Zubair and of 'Ā'isha in the rather scanty information which we possess regarding the theology of Wāṣil and 'Amr; we cannot doubt that here they were dealing with a central problem. Wāṣil and 'Amr took neither side in the dispute (Kitāb al-Intiṣār, p. 97–98). According to them, 'Alī, Ṭalḥa, al-Zubair and 'Ā'isha were originally true and pious believers. But the war which broke out among them divided them into two parties who could not both be right; one of these parties committed a sin but we do not know which. We must therefore leave their cause to Him who knows it but in their relations with one another we cannot regard them as true believers in the strict sense of the word. As a result if one of these individuals bears witness against another of the opposite party, we cannot accept this evidence; relatively to the one, the other is fāsiḳ and vice-versa (cf. also Baghdādī, Kitāb al-Farḡ, p. 100). If we may believe the ahl al-hadīth, 'Amr showed himself more severe than Wāṣil; he is said to have refused to accept the deposition made by any member of these parties against any member of the community on any matter whatever (Ta'rikh Baghdād, xii. 178; al-Baghdādī, Kitāb al-Farḡ, p. 100); for he declared guilty (fussāk) per se both the parties engaged in the battle of the Camel. It is therefore not surprising that Wāṣil and 'Amr have sometimes been confused with the Khāridjīs (verse of Ishāḳ b. Suwaid al-'Adawī, al-Djāhiz, Bayān, i. 13).

However, the opinion of the leaders of the Mu'tazila on 'Alī is based on quite a different foundation. To understand the position correctly it is important to note that 1. Wāṣil and the whole Mu'tazila were definitely enemies of the Umayyads and that 2. Wāṣil adopted a somewhat ambiguous attitude regarding 'Othmān and his murderers (Kitāb al-Intiṣār, p. 97–98). This tacitly implies a declaration in favour of the 'Alids, the first actors in the drama played at Mecca in the year 35. Indeed Wāṣil was on somewhat intimate terms with the 'Alids of Medina (Ibn al-Murtaḍā, al-Mu'tazilah, p. 20); the Zaidiyya revere him as one of their leaders, and Zaidi theology is essentially based on that of Wāṣil. This is true not only of the speculative theology; there is agreement also on political doctrines. The Zaidis do not say that the first caliphs Abū Bakr and 'Omar were usurpers as the extreme Shi'īs do; Wāṣil and with him the whole Mu'tazila regards the caliphate of Abū Bakr as legitimate (commentary of Ibn Abī Ḥadīd on Nahj al-Balāgha, Cairo 1329, i. 3); he left undecided the question of knowing who had the superior claim, Abū Bakr, 'Omar or 'Alī, but he credited 'Alī with a superior claim to 'Othmān. This attitude, a little complicated as regards 'Alī, and therefore prudent towards the extreme Shi'īs, at the same time unreservedly hostile to the Umayyads, can in my opinion only be interpreted in one way. All these apparently dissimilar lines converge on a common centre: the 'Abbāsīd movement. It is precisely Wāṣil's attitude which we must regard as characteristic of the partisans of the 'Abbāsīds. The latter regarding themselves as the true ahl al-bait, it was evidently in their interest to lower somewhat the preponderating position attributed to 'Alī by the extreme Shi'īs in order themselves to profit by the prestige enjoyed by the family of the Prophet; but on the other hand, they had every reason not to cut the links with the Shi'īs who were indispensable as allies to them. It is obvious that in these circumstances it was particularly important for them to win over the relatively moderate Zaidī faction to their cause. In a general way the teaching of Wāṣil on al-manzila can only be perfectly understood if we see in it the theoretical crystallisation of the political programme of the 'Abbāsids before their accession to power. Everything leads us to believe that the theology of Wāṣil and of the early Mu'tazila represents the official theology of the 'Abbāsīd movement. This gives an unforced explanation of the fact that it was the official doctrine of the 'Abbāsīd court for at least a century. It seems even probable that Wāṣil and his disciples took direct part in the 'Abbāsīd propaganda. In his kaṣida, mentioned below Ṣafwān al-Anṣārī tells us that Wāṣil had emissaries (du'āt) in all parts of the Muslim world. Ṣafwān describes them as ardent believers and ascetics who were distinguished from other men in physiognomy and dress; they were the supporters (awṭād) of God in all lands and centres in which his commandments were made manifest and in which the art of disputation (with the enemies of the faith) flourished. The period of this activity coincides exactly with that of the most intense 'Abbāsīd propaganda, in which all the forces working for the ruin of the Umayyads were co-operating; it is impossible not to believe there was a connection between the two. That Wāṣil did actually extend his propaganda very far to the west is proved by the fact that there existed long after the fall of the Umayyads a Wāṣilī community at Tāhert (Yāqūt, i. 815) numbering about 3,000 members who had allied themselves with the 'Ibādīs. They had rebelled against Maṣṣūr under Idrīs b. 'Abd Allāh al-Ḥasanī (al-Shahraṣṭānī, p. 31; on these happenings see Ṭabarī, iii. 561); they were therefore reckoned among the enemies of the first 'Abbāsīd caliphs. It is interesting to note that the connection between Wāṣil and the Khāridjīs, supposed by Ishāq b. Suwaid al-'Adawī to exist (see above) was here an actuality.

The quarrels of Wāṣil and his followers with Ḍjahm b. Ṣafwān [q. v.] form a difficult problem which has not yet been solved. On the one hand, Ḍjahm's theology left distinct traces on that of the Mu'tazila; the doctrine of the created Qur'ān which was later to become a fundamental Mu'tazila thesis was probably formulated by Ḍjahm and in the doctrine of the divine attributes there are coincidences on both sides which cannot be accidental. On the other hand, there are many serious differences which are probably practical and political in their nature. Ḍjahm professed in the most extreme form the doctrine of predestination (djabr). All the actions of man are involuntary. Wāṣil maintained the opposite thesis of free will. Now once again we have political problems hidden behind these theological controversies; the Umayyads in general preferred the dogma of predestination while the opposition accepted the dogma of free will in its widest interpretation; in Damascus, Ghailān al-Dimashqī, who figures among the fathers of the Mu'tazila (Ibn al-Murṭadā, al-Mu'tazilah, p. 15—17), was put to death by the caliph Hishām for holding the doctrine of free will (al-Ṭabarī, iii. 1733).

Once the hypothesis of a definite connection between the Mu'tazila and the 'Abbāsīds is admitted, the question of the relations between the Mu'tazila founded by Wāṣil and the early Mu'tazila of the period of 'Alī presents itself in a new aspect. It will be admitted that there is a striking resemblance between the attitude of these former companions of the Prophet and that of the 'Abbāsīds. It is true that 'Abd Allāh b. al-'Abbās entered the service of 'Alī after the death of 'Othmān but his true sentiments were somewhat ambiguous; he was a great friend of 'Othmān but a rather lukewarm partisan of 'Alī and after the latter's death he placed himself at the service of the Umayyads. His descendants did not remain at Medina, probably because the 'Alids were their rivals there; after a stay in Damascus, his son went to Humayma near Adhrūh and here a formal rapprochement took place in 98 between the 'Abbāsīds and the 'Alids (Wellhausen, Das arabische Reich, p. 312 sq.). Before this event, we may regard the 'Abbāsīds as a kind of Mu'tazila in the old sense of the word.

With 'Amr b. 'Ubaid a new element enters the Mu'tazila as founded by Wāṣil. 'Amr originally was one of the ahl al-ḥadīth; brought up in the circle of al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī, he transmitted a large number of ḥadīths from his master and he is remembered as one of the muhaddithūn. His conversion to the doctrine of ʿiṣṣā brought about a rupture between him and these circles; but with him a considerable section of the Qadārīs of the ahl al-ḥadīth joined the Mu'tazila, thus reinforcing the more politically inclined Qadāriya, of which Wāṣil was the champion. Qadārī and mu'tazilī were soon to become synonymous terms. 'Amr seems to have been decidedly anti-'Alid (see above), in any case he preferred Abū Bakr to 'Alī (Ibn Abī Ḥadīd on Nahāj al-Balāgha, i. 3). This attitude implies a certain predilection for 'Othmān, which is foreign to Wāṣil; indeed, a section of the old Baṣris, among them al-Djāhīz, is said to have belonged to the party called al-'Othmāniya. 'Amr's point of view was of great importance for the development of the Mu'tazila. After their final triumph, the 'Abbāsīds immediately dissolved the alliance with the Shī'a, which had only been a political instrument for them. As regards the extreme Shī'a, the Rawāfiḍ, the Mu'tazila unreservedly followed the direction of their new masters; but it is fairly evident that some of them did not decide to break so abruptly with the moderate Shī'a. It resulted in a schism. One section remained faithful to the alliance with the moderate Shī'a; this section was later to form a special Mu'tazila school in Baghdād. But the Mu'tazilis of Baṣra with 'Amr at their head seem to have attached themselves without protest to the 'Abbāsīd cause. 'Amr even became the intimate friend of Maṣṣūr and so to speak his spiritual father. In the west, the Mu'tazilis allied with the Khāridjīs rebelled against the 'Abbāsīds (see above).

Let us sum up the characteristic features of the Mu'tazila at the beginning of the 'Abbāsīd period. The Mu'tazila was: 1. in general devoted to the cause of the 'Abbāsīd caliphs, only a faction being opposed to them; 2. decidedly hostile to the extreme Shī'a, the Rāfiḍa; 3. hostile to the Djahmiya, by which however it was a little influenced; 4. qadārī in reuniting several of the old factions of this name; 5. in serious disagreement with the ahl al-ḥadīth, who soon declared it heretical. This position had a decisive influence in determining the structure of the Mu'tazila theology. The beginnings of this theology go back to Wāṣil and 'Amr and are connected with the fight against the Rāfiḍa. The extreme Shī'īs had quite early assimilated a good number of non-Muslim beliefs; we need not doubt that Manichaeism played a part in them; in any case certain gnostic and dualist ideas had found a way into Islām through the intermediary of these Shī'is. These tendencies, very marked in Kūfa, were also represented at Baṣra; in the house of an Azdī who was a sumanī or Buddhist, Wāṣil and 'Amr had frequent meetings with 'Abd al-Karīm b. Abi 'l-'Awdjā and Ṣāliḥ b. 'Abd al-Kuddūs, who professed dualist doctrines (al-ṭhanawīya; we should probably understand by this Manichaean views) and the poet Bashshār b. Burd [q. v.] (Kitāb al-Aghānī, iii. 24). A serious schism broke up this curious madjlis. This event decided the whole future of the Mu'tazila. Henceforth the fight against sandaka and ṭhanawīya is a cardinal point in the programme of the Mu'tazila. Wāṣil himself composed a refutation of Manichaeism which al-Bāhili (c. 300 A. H.) was still able to peruse (al-Mu'tazilah, p. 21). But they also found themselves compelled to combat these heresies in a positive fashion; to the doctrine of fire professed by Bashshār they offered a theology of earth, so to speak, a theology based on the natural philosophy of the time. The poems of Ṣafwān al-Anṣārī (al-Djāhīz, Kitāb al-Bayān, i. 16—19) afford us a specimen of this theology; here we have one of the fundamental documents for the history of Mu'tazila dogmatics. It is not yet clear whence came the philosophy put at the service of theology but its general character is apparent; it is the philosophy of the alchemists, physicists of late antiquity, a kind of summa of the scientific principles which seem to have been accepted everywhere in Asiatic Hellenism. Ṣafwān perhaps gives us a hint as to the circles from which it came to the Mu'tazila, when he tells us that Bashshār called Wāṣil and his friends Daiṣānis; this is in any case worth noting. In a general way those who handed on this natural philosophy seem to have been the school called Dahrīya by Muslims. The Mu'tazila fought these Dahrīs with a vigour which reveals the dependence on this heretical philosophy of which they were conscious. The true founder of the dogmatic system of the Mu'tazila was Abu 'l-Hudhail Muḥammad b. al-Hudhail al-'Allāf [q. v.]. Abu 'l-Hudhail, his friends and pupils, continued on a large scale the polemic against Manichaeism, a polemic which is certainly not unconnected with the persecution begun by the 'Abbāsids against the open or secret adherents of this religion. On the other hand, he fought the Rāfida most vigorously, then represented by the very remarkable theologian Hishām b. al-Ḥakam [q. v.]; and it was through his disputes with the latter that he was led to study the books of the philosophers, which furnished him with a system of dogmatics, a little bold, but full of fertile new ideas. Alongside of him there was a crowd of important theologians at Baṣra: Mu'ammār, an independent mind whose ideas have not yet been sufficiently analysed; Hishām b. 'Amr al-Fuwaṭi and al-Aṣamm, adversaries of Abu 'l-Hudhail and several others. Among the pupils of Abu 'l-Hudhail mention must first be made of Ibrāhīm b. Saiyār al-Nazzām [q. v.]. These theologians gave Mu'tazila dogmatics its essential character. This theology is: 1. apologetic: it aims at defending the revelation of the Prophet; as a result it is 2. strictly Qur'anic: the sacred book is the only source of the theological denominations (asmā') and of the precepts of religion (aḥkām); it is 3. polemical: it vigorously invaded the domains of other religions and other Muslim parties to fight them on their own ground; it is 4. speculative: it has recourse to philosophical means to refute its adversaries and formulate its dogmas; consequently it is 5. intellectualist: it envisages the problem of religion under the purely intellectual aspect. Nothing could then be less justifiable than to regard the Mu'tazila as philosophers, free thinkers or liberals. On the contrary, they are theologians of the strictest school; their ideal is dogmatic orthodoxy; philosophy for them is only an ancilla fidei; they are nothing less than tolerant. What they created was Muslim scholasticism.

Parallel to the school of Baṣra, a Mu'tazila school was founded in Baghdād by Bishr b. al-Mu'tamir (q. v.; d. 210 = 825—826). This school was pro-'Alid ('Alī preferable to Abū Bakr), and Bishr was persecuted by Hārūn al-Rashid. But under Ma'mūn (q. v.; 198—218 = 813—833), a decidedly pro-'Alid caliph, the school of Bishr gained a preponderating influence mainly through the theologians Ṭhumāma b. Aṣhras (d. in 210 = 825—826) and Ibn Abi Du'ād (d. in 240 = 854—855). This school particularly attacked those who held the doctrine of the uncreated Qur'ān [q. v.]. This attack however had disastrous consequences for the Mu'tazila. Abandoned by the caliph al-Mutawakkil (232—247) who adopted the doctrine of the uncreated Qur'ān, it rapidly fell from its influential position and soon found itself surrounded by implacable enemies. In the second half of the third century, Ibn al-Rawandī, a partisan of the Baghdād school, made a stir when he left the Mu'tazila for the most advanced Rāfida; a man of violent temperament, he criticised the Mu'tazila in a scathing way which did it much damage. Towards the end of the third century, the Ḳarmāṭian movement came on the scene, reinforcing the extreme Rāfida and causing trouble in every secular and spiritual sphere. In the struggle against the Ḳarmāṭians it is no longer the Mu'tazila who appear at the head of the defenders of orthodoxy but the ahl al-ḥadīth. In the year 300, al-Ash'arī broke with the Mu'tazila of Baṣra, of which he had been a convinced supporter, to introduce speculative dogmatics among the ahl al-ḥadīth, who were soon to give its character to Sunnī theology.

Among the Mu'tazila theologians of the third century we may mention the following. At Baṣra the tradition of Abu 'l-Hudhail al-'Allāf was propagated by a flourishing school represented by Yūsuf b. 'Abd Allāh al-Shahhām, Abū 'Alī al-Aswārī and others. 'Abbād b. Sulaimān was the pupil of Hishām al-Fuwaṭi. Ibrāhīm b. Ismā'il known as Ibn 'Ulaiya (d. 218) was the pupil of al-Aṣamm. The school of al-Nazzām developed certain special doctrines which the later Mu'tazila rejected (Faḍl al-Hadāthi and Aḥmad b. Ḥā'it, Kitāb al-Intiṣār, p. 222—223); but among the disciples of al-Nazzām we also find al-Djāhīz [q. v.]. In the second half of the century, the most important Baṣra theologian was undoubtedly Abū 'Alī Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Wahhāb al-Djubbā'i [q. v.]. In Baghdād we find in addition to the theologians already mentioned Ṭsā b. Ṣubaiḥ al-Murdār, contemporary of Bishr b. al-Mu'tamir; then "the two Djā'fars": Djā'far b. Mubashshir (d. 234) and Djā'far

b. Harb (d. 236), at a later date Muḥammad b. Shaddād al-Misma'ī Zurkān (d. in 278) und Abu 'l-Husain 'Abd al-Raḥīm b. Muḥammad al-Khaiyāt, the great authority on the history of the Mu'tazila (d. at the end of the century). On the Mu'tazila of Syria we are not well informed; and only a little better on that of Egypt. The first Mu'tazili here was Ibn 'Ulaiya (cf. above) who had disputations with al-Shāfi'ī; with him Ḥafṣ al-Fard came to Cairo; this last represented the official theology in Cairo during the miḥna of al-Wāthiq. Ḥafṣ was declared a heretic by al-Khaiyāt (Kitāb al-Intisār, p. 133—134). — In Spain the Mu'tazili teaching was disseminated by Abū Bakr Faradī al-Ḳurtubī who had visited the east and studied there with al-Djāhiz; it was therefore al-Djāhiziya — at bottom al-Nazzāmiya — that was known in Spain; very soon the Mu'tazila seems to have become undistinguishable from the Bāṭiniya (Asin Palacios, Abenmasarra y su escuela, Madrid 1914, p. 21—22).

The fourth century saw the Shī'a flourishing and 'Abbāsīd power disappearing; the favour of several Būyid governors now to some degree made good the loss of prestige which had been suffered by the Mu'tazila. The schools continued their work and the Mu'tazila spread to the east. At Baṣra, al-Djubbā'ī had left a large number of disciples but his school was soon surpassed by that of his son Abū Ḥāshim [q. v.]; representatives of the latter were among others Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Husain b. 'Alī al-Baṣrī (d. 369); Abū 'l-Husain al-Azraḳ (Aḥmad b. Yūsuf b. Ya'qūb) al-Tanūkhī (d. 377), a member of the well known al-Tanūkhī family; Abū Ishāq Ibrāhīm b. 'Aiyāsh al-Baṣrī and his pupil the Kādī 'Abd al-Djabbār b. Aḥmad al-Hamadhānī. The latter, the most remarkable of the Baṣra theologians of the period, migrated in 360 to Raiy where he founded an influential school and died in 415. In Baghdād the school of Abū Bakr Aḥmad b. 'Alī al-Ikshīdī (d. in 320) dominated the whole century. A very celebrated Baghdādī, Abū 'l-Kāsim 'Abd Allāh b. Aḥmad al-Balkhī al-Ka'bi, a pupil of al-Khaiyāt, founded a school at Nasaf, where he died in 319; among his pupils we find al-Aḥḍab Abū 'l-Ḥasan. We also find the Mu'tazila in Iṣfahān, where Abū Bakr Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm al-Zubairī of the school of Abū 'l-Hudhail had introduced Mu'tazila doctrines; at Kirmīsīn (school of Abū Ḥāshim), Gurgān, Nishāpūr and in several other towns of Khurāsān. During the fifth century it was the theology of 'Abd al-Djabbār which dominated at Baṣra; one of his pupils, Abū Muḥammad al-Ḥasan b. Aḥmad b. Mattawaihi, handed down the great work on dogmatics of his master, al-Muḥīṭ bi 'l-Taklif; another theologian, Abū Rashīd Sa'īd b. Muḥammad al-Naisābūrī (d. in 460), compiled a resumé of the questions disputed in the schools of Baṣra and Baghdād. Several theologians of Baghdād are known; some of them must have belonged to the Zaidiya and generally speaking the Baghdād school becomes more and more merged in the Zaidiya. The last great theologian of the Mu'tazila was al-Zamaḳsharī [q. v.] (d. in 538) but the schools continued to exist long after him, especially in the east. It was probably the invasion of the Mongols that put an end to them; the Mu'tazila has however survived to our day in the Zaidiya.

It was not speculative dogmatics alone that formed the subject of Mu'tazila activity. Their part in the history of the exegesis of the Qur'ān is a very considerable one; it was they who introduced the strictly grammatical method. There is a very close connection between them and the philological school of Baṣra, the representatives of which in general taught Mu'tazila doctrines (e. g. al-Aṣma'ī). The exegetical works of the Mu'tazila, for the most part now lost, were utilised to a large extent by their adversaries, e. g. Fakhr al-Dīn al-Rāzī. — All questions of fiqh were vigorously discussed in the Mu'tazila schools; the influence of the Mu'tazila on the uṣūl al-fikh and the madhāhib has still to be examined. — Lastly the science of ḥadīth certainly received various stimuli from the Mu'tazila criticism of the ahl al-ḥadīth.

Madhhab. Mu'tazila theology is summed up under five principles (uṣūl) or fundamental doctrines which one must accept in their integrity to be recognised as a Mu'tazili (al-Mas'ūdi, Murūdj, vi. 22). As these were probably in origin the principal points in the programme of Mu'tazili propaganda, these uṣūl later became a kind of framework of speculative dogmatics.

1. Aṣl al-tawḥīd: the strictest profession of monotheism (against any kind of dualism); denial of all resemblance between Allāh and his creatures (against the anthropomorphisms of the muhaddithūn on the one hand and those of the Rāfiqa and Manichaeans on the other); the divine attributes recognised (against the Djahmiya) but deprived of their real existence: they are not entities added to the divine being (this would be shirk; against the Ṣifātiya among the ahl al-ḥadīth) but identical with the being (Wāṣil, Abū 'l-Hudhail); allegorical interpretation of the anthropomorphisms of the Qur'ān; denial of the beatific vision; vigorous affirmation of a personal God and creator (against the Dahriya); integral affirmation of the revelation of the Prophet but distinction between a natural theology and a revealed theology. Problems discussed here: 1. The nature of God and his attributes: a. omnipresence: God is in all places, in the sense that he directs everything (Abū 'l-Hudhail; al-Djubbā'ī) — he is not in any place (general thesis); b. perceptibility: he is not perceived by the senses (thesis generally adopted) — he is perceived by the heart (Abū 'l-Hudhail) — he has a hidden māhiya which will be perceived in another world with the help of a sixth sense which God will then create (Ḥafṣ al-Fard and others; thesis declared heretical); c. the attributes (eternal; names of the essence): identical with the essence (Abū 'l-Hudhail; thesis generally adopted) — inherent in the essence through ma'ānī (Mu'ammār) — through aḥwāl (Abū Ḥāshim); expressing positive aspects (Abū 'l-Hudhail and generally) — negative (knowledge: negation of ignorance etc.; al-Nazzām). 2. The structure of the created world: a. starting-point anthropology treated in a positive way (exact definition of religious duties) and negative (refutation of thanawiya): man is the empirical phenomenon which we see, the body (djism) which is composed of a certain number of indivisible entities (atoms) and which supports the accidents: life, the senses, colours etc.; nafs is ma'nā and distinct from rūḥ (Abū 'l-Hudhail) — man is composed of body (badan) and rūḥ (identical with nafs) which are mutually interpenetrant (mudākhala); the colours, senses, sensations, forms and spirits form different categories of djavāwhir (not accidents; not atoms); all that is living forms a single category (mudjānasa) (al-Nazzām) — man is an indivisible entity (djawhar) characterised by hayāt, ilm, kuḍra; the body is the instrument of this djawhar; the accidents (movement, rest, colours etc.) are inherent in it through ma'ānī which are inherent in other ma'ānī etc. in infinitum (Mu'ammār) — man is bashar ('Abbād b. Sulaimān) — the nafs is an instrument which the body uses; the rūh is an accident (Dja'far b. Harb) — the rūh is a body and distinct from the life which is an accident (al-Djubbā'i); b. the physical world: dead nature is distinct from that which is living in as much as nature acts through darūra while living beings act through their free will (ikhtiyār); for the rest, the one and the other category are of the same structure, the problems of physics being those of anthropology (substance, accidents, bodies, atoms etc.); theory of zuhūr and kumūn formulated by al-Nazzām and which correspond to his theory of penetration (mudākhala): things are hidden one in the other, physical development consists in the hidden things becoming manifest (e.g. the fire hidden in the stone). 3. The relation between God and the created world: a. laisa ka-mithlihi shai'un: a rigorous distinction between qadīm and muhḍath (no hulūl); b. the activities of God, expressed by his attributes, have for their objects the things of the created world. If these activities are eternal, the things ought to be so also; now these things are created i.e. put into existence after having been non-existent; several solutions of the problem: "thing" is only what exists and before the reaction the thing was not thing which implies that divine knowledge is born with the things (Djāhmī thesis adopted by Hishām al-Fuwaṭī) — before the creation things were posited (thābit) as non-existent in God's eternal knowledge but without the accidents which characterise them in existence (al-Shahhām and others) — with these accidents (al-Khaiyāt, al-Ka'bī and several theologians of Baghdād [school of ma'dūniyya]). God created all things at one time, one in the other and these things are manifested in the created world one after the other (al-Nazzām); c. are the objects of divine knowledge and power limited? Yes (Abu 'l-Hudhail) — no (the others); d. divine power does not extend to the accidents (Mu'ammār) — to the phenomena resulting spontaneously from human action (tawallud, see under aṣl al-'adl). 4. Revelation: prophecy: a prophet is ma'sūm, i.e. free from grave sins; b. the Qur'an: created; God creates the word in a substratum (lawh al-mahfūz; the Prophet; the bush etc.). The Qur'an is miraculous in composition and style — denied by al-Nazzām; distinction (which goes back to Wāsil) between muḥkam, the precepts of the Qur'an which are clear and without ambiguity and mutashābih, the precepts which are not immediately clear and evident; distinction between nāsikh and mansūkh.

II. Aṣl al-'adl: God is just; all that he does aims at what is best for his creation (aṣlah); he does not desire evil and does not ordain it (amr and irāda identical). He has nothing to do with man's evil deeds; all human actions result from man's free will; man has a kuḍra and an istiṭā'a qabla 'l-f'i'l; man will be rewarded for his good deeds and punished for his evil ones. Problems discussed here: 1. Divine power: a. can God commit an injustice? No: al-Nazzām — yes, but he does not: general thesis; b. theodicy: could God prevent evil? yes, for he possesses a store of hidden grace (tuṭf) which would be sufficient to destroy evil completely at once: Bishr b. al-Mu'tamir and several Baghdād theologians — no, for he always does what is best and wisest for his creation: general thesis. 2. Human power: created by God; physical evils, diseases etc. are not subject to the human will; man's actions are movements; distinction between af'al al-kuṭūb and af'al al-djawāriḥ; problem of tawallud stated by Abu 'l-Hudhail and particularly discussed in the school of Baghdād: the effects of an action are attributed to him who performs it, and even after his death he remains responsible for it.

III. Aṣl al-wa'd wa 'l-wa'id (or al-asmā' wa 'l-aḥkām): practical theology. Problems here discussed: a. belief and unbelief: belief consists in all the acts of obedience, obligatory or supererogatory; sins (ma'āṣi) are divided into grave (kabā'ir) and petty (ṣaghā'ir); the following are kabā'ir: tashbīh Allāh bi khalqihī, tadjiwiruhū fī ḥukmihi and takdhībuhū fī khabarihi, radd al-idjīmā' 'anī 'l-nabī; God of his grace may forgive ṣaghā'ir; he who is not a Muslim obeys God if he does something which God has commanded in the Qur'an (qā'a lā yurādu 'llāhu bihā): Abu 'l-Hudhail (thesis rejected by al-Nazzām and the Baghdād school); distinction between imān bi 'llāh and imān li 'llāh from Hishām al-Fuwaṭī onwards; belief consists in avoiding kabā'ir i.e. acts regarding which God has laid down a threat (wa'id): al-Nazzām; b. al-asmā' wa 'l-aḥkām: the good (al-ḥasan) is what God has ordained in the Qur'an, evil (al-kabīh) what he has forbidden. Questions of fiqh in general; c. Tradition: the authenticity of a tradition is only guaranteed by 20 believers one of whom is predestined to Paradise; there are in each generation 20 believers who are free from grave sins (ma'sūm): Abu 'l-Hudhail and Hishām al-Fuwaṭī; the tawātur does not necessarily presuppose believers; the Muslim community can agree upon what is an error or a mistake: al-Nazzām and others.

IV. Aṣl al-manzila baina 'l-manzilataini: 1. Problems of theocracy: a. the caliphate of Abū Bakr was legitimate but not based on a divine revelation: general thesis; b. superiority of Abū Bakr over 'Alī (Abū Bakr superior to 'Omar, the latter to 'Othmān, the latter to 'Alī): the old Baṣrīs and Thumāma; superiority of 'Alī to Abū Bakr: the Baghdādīs and some later Baṣrīs (al-Djubbā'i towards the end of his life; 'Abd al-Djabbār); neutral attitude (tawakkuf) on all that concerns the question of knowing who was entitled to the superiority: Abū Bakr, 'Omar or 'Alī; 'Alī superior to 'Othmān: Wāsil, Abu 'l-Hudhail, Abū Hāshim. 2. The problems of fāsiḳ; the old problem being no longer a live one, petty sins (al-ṣaghā'ir) were discussed under this head.

V. Aṣl al-amr bi 'l-ma'rūf wa 'l-nahy 'anī 'l-munkar: programme of Mu'tazila activity before the coming of the 'Abbāsids; the faith must be spread by the tongue, the hand and the sword; later this aṣl is little discussed; al-Aṣamm denies its obligatory character.

AL-MU'TAZZ BI 'LLĀH, ABŪ 'ABD ALLĀH MUḤAMMAD (OF AL-ZUBAIR) B. DJĀ'FAR, an 'Abbāsīd

caliph, son of al-Mutawakkil and a slave-girl named Kābiḥa. After al-Musta'in had been forced to abdicate, al-Mu'tazz was proclaimed caliph on 4th Muḥarram 252 (Jan. 25, 866). When he wanted to get rid of the two Turkish generals Waṣīf and Bogha the younger, they got wind of his intentions and went back to Sāmarrā. On the other hand, he succeeded in putting his brother and successor designate al-Mu'aiyad to death and throwing the third brother Abū Aḥmad into prison. In the following year Waṣīf was killed by the troops when they mutinied for their pay and he attempted to appease them. After the death in Dhū 'l-Kā'da 253 (Nov. 867) of the governor Muḥammad b. 'Abd Allāh [q.v.], trouble broke out in Baḡhdād and in the following year Bogha was murdered at the caliph's instigation. As the latter could not pay the troops they mutinied. Al-Mu'tazz applied to his mother who possessed immense wealth, but she refused to help him and at the end of Rabiab 255 (July 869) the cruel and faithless caliph was deposed. He was put in a subterranean dungeon where he died of starvation in 3 days at the age of 24. In his reign the dynasty of the Ṭūlūnids was founded and Ya'kūb b. Laith [q.v.] was recognised as governor of Siḡdīstān. The Khāridjīs sacked al-Mawṣil and in Asia Minor the Muslims were defeated by the Byzantines. Cf. also the articles AL-MUTAWAKKIL, AL-MUNTAṢIR and AL-MUSTA'IN.

MUTHALLATH, also MUTHALLATHA, plur. always muthallathāt, triangle; it forms the first category of plane surfaces bounded by straight lines (al-basā'it al-musattāha al-mustakīmat al-khuṭū') (cf. al-Khwarizmi, Mafātīḥ, p. 206). Following Euclid's Elements, i., "Ὅπως 24–29, the Arab mathematicians classify triangles from two points of view: either according to the sides (dīl', pl. adlā') into equilateral (al-muthallath al-mutasāwi 'l-adlā', in Euclid τρίγωνον ἰσοπλευρον), isosceles (al-muthallath al-mutasāwi 'l-dīl'ain, τρίγωνον ἰσοσκελές) and scalene (al-muthallath al-mukhtalif al-adlā', τρίγωνον σκαληνόν), or according to the angles (zāwiya, pl. zawāyā), into right-angled (al-muthallath al-kā'im al-zāwiya, τρίγωνον ὀρθογώνιον), obtuse-angled (al-muthallath al-munfaridj al-zāwiya, τρίγωνον ἀμβλυγώνιον) and acute-angled (al-muthallath al-hādd al-zāwiya [zawāyā], τρίγωνον ὀξυγώνιον).

In the equilateral triangle the base is called al-kā'ida, the apex al-ra's, the sides al-dīl'an (see above), in the right-angled triangle the hypotenuse is called al-kutr, i. e. "diameter" (because the hypotenuse represents the diameter of the circle described around the right-angled triangle); for the two sides the term al-dīl'an is generally used.

Misāḥat al-muthallathāt as a technical term means trigonometry (cf. Dozy, Supplément, i. 163a).

MUTHALLATHA (always with the feminine ending) is a technical term in astrology. Astrology divides the zodiacal circle (minṭaḡa [q. v.]) into four muthallathāt (Gr. τρίγωνα, Lat. trigona, triguetra), each of which includes three signs 120° apart. These "are situated together in the trigonal plane" (tathlith, Gr. τρίγωνον, Lat. aspectus trinus); the word tathlith itself is frequently found as a synonym of muthallatha which comes from the same root (th-l-th) (cf. Dozy, op. cit., p. 162b).

In star nomenclature Kawkab al-Muthallath is the constellation of the (northern) Triangle (in Eratosthenes Δελτωπτόν, in Ptolemy Τρίγωνον) which is adjoined in the east by Perseus, in the north by Andromeda, in the west by Pisces and in the south by Aries. According to Ptolemy (Almagest) and al-Sūfī (ed. Schjellerup, p. 123 sq.), it consists of three stars of the third magnitude and one of the fifth. The star at the apex (α Trianguli) is an astrolabe star and is called Ra's al-Muthallath. The latter name is found in Libros del saber de astronomia del rey D. Alfonso X de Castilla in the corrupted form "alcedeles".

AL-MUTṬĪ. [See ALLĀH, ii.]

AL-MUTṬĪ LI 'LLĀH, ABU 'L-ḲASIM AL-FADL, an 'Abbāsīd caliph, son of al-Muktadir [q. v.], brother of al-Rāḍī and of al-Muttaḳī [q. v.]. Al-Muṭṭī was a bitter enemy of al-Mustakfi [q. v.] and therefore went into hiding on the latter's accession and after Mu'izz al-Dawla [q. v.] had become the real ruler, al-Muṭṭī is said to have taken refuge with him and incited him against al-Mustakfi. After the deposition of the latter in Djumādā II or Shābān 334 (Jan. or March 946) al-Muṭṭī was recognised as caliph. His reign marks a very unfortunate period in the history of the 'Abbāsids. The caliph himself had not the slightest authority; the power was in the hands of Mu'izz al-Dawla and after his death (356 = 967) in those of his son Bakhtiyār. The Fātimids were growing more and more powerful and the Sāmānids also declined to recognise al-Muṭṭī as the legitimate suzerain. The Ḥamdānids were weakened by their wars with the Būyids and the Fātimids. In Baghdad the Sunnis and Shī'is were fighting one another and several Shī'ī usages were introduced by the Būyids who had 'Alid sympathies. At last the weak and sickly caliph was forced by the Turks to abdicate in favour of his son 'Abd al-Ḳarīm al-Ṭā'īf (13th Dhu 'l-Ḳa'da 363 = August 5, 974). Al-Muṭṭī died in Muḥarram 364 (September—October 974) in Dair al-Aḳūl.

MUTLAḲ (A.), part. pass. IV from t-l-ḡ, "to loose the bond (ḡaid) of an animal, so as to let it free" (e. g. Muslim, Djihād, trad. 46; Abū Dāwūd, Djihād, bāb 100). The term is also applied to the loosening of the bowstring (Bukhārī, Djihād, b. 170), of the garments, the hair etc. Thence the common meaning absolute, as opposed to restricted (muḳaiyad), and further the accusative mutlaḳan "absolutely". The use of the term is so widely diffused, that a few examples only can be given.

In grammar the term ma'fūl mutlaḳ denotes the absolute object (cognate accusative), i. e. the objectivated verb of the sentence, such as "a sitting" in the sentence: he sat a sitting.

In the doctrine of the roots of fikh the term is applied to the muḍṭahids of the heroic age, the founders of the madhhabs who are called muḍṭahid mutlaḳ, an epithet which none after them has borne [cf. ḌJTIHĀD].

In dogmatics the term is applied to existence, so that al-wuḍjūd al-mutlaḳ denotes Allāh, as opposed to His creation, which does not possess existence in the deepest sense.

In ontology the term is also applied to existence (wuḍjūd) in connection with the question of the nature of the latter. Here al-wuḍjūd al-mutlaḳ is opposed to al-wuḍjūd al-mahmūl li 'l-mawḍū'. See the art. MANTIḲ, supra p. 259b.

In other surroundings the term has the meaning "general" as opposed to khāṣṣ; cf. the definition in Djurdjānī's Ta'rifāt: Mutlaḳ denotes the one without specification. Cf. further the Dictionary of the Technical Terms.

On the meaning of rawī mutlaḳ in prosody, cf. Freytag, Darstellung d. arab. Verskunst, Bonn 1830, p. 311.

AL-MUTTAḲĪ LI 'LLĀH, ABU ISHĀḲ IBRĀHĪM, an 'Abbāsīd caliph, son of al-Muktadir [q. v.] and a slave-girl named Khalūb. In Rabī' I 329 (Dec. 940) he succeeded his brother al-Rāḍī [q. v.]; by this time the caliphate had sunk so low that five days passed after the death of al-Rāḍī before steps were taken to choose his successor. Al-Muttaḳī at once confirmed the Amīr al-Umarā' Bedjekem [q. v.] in office; after his death however, the Turks and Dailamis in the army began to quarrel with one another. Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Barīdī [see AL-BARIDĪ] seized the capital but could only hold it a few weeks. He was driven out by the Dailamī chief Kürtegin who however was soon overthrown by Ibn Rā'īḳ [q. v.]. When Abū 'Abd Allāh sent his brother Abū 'l-Ḥusain with an army against Baghdad, the caliph and Ibn Rā'īḳ escaped to al-Mawṣil to the Ḥamdānids (Djumādā II 330 = Feb.—March 942). After the assassination of Ibn Rā'īḳ the Ḥamdānīd Abū Muḥammad al-Ḥasan was appointed Amīr al-Umarā' and received the honorific title of Nāṣir al-Dawla. The occupation of Baghdād offered him no difficulty; the Turkish general Tuzun rebelled a little later and Naṣir al-Dawla had to evacuate the capital which was entered by Tuzun in Ramaḍān 331 (Juni 943) as Amīr al-Umarāʾ. Al-Muttaqī soon found himself forced to seek the protection of the Ḥamdānids again and at the beginning of the following year (autumn 943) he fled to al-Mawṣil. Then he settled in al-Raḡḡa but when Tuzun made peace with Naṣir al-Dawla, al-Muttaqī appealed for help to the Ikhshīd of Egypt; the latter came to al-Raḡḡa in Radjab 332 (March 944); the negotiations however were unsuccessful and finally the caliph put his trust in Tuzun, who after assuring him of his loyalty by the most sacred oaths had him blinded (Ṣafar 333 = Oct. 944). Al-Muttaqī was then declared to have been deposed. He died in Shaʿbān 357 (July 968).

AL-MUTTAQĪ AL-HINDĪ, author of several works in Arabic, whose real name was ʿALĪ B. ḤUSĀM AL-DĪN ʿABD AL-MALIK B. QĀDĪ KHĀN AL-SHĀDHILĪ AL-QĀDIRĪ, was born at Burhānpūr in Guḍjarāt of a respectable family of D̲j̲awnpūr [q. v.]. He first joined the Čishtī order, as a disciple of ʿAbd al-Karīm b. Shaikh Bāḍjan at Burhānpūr and afterwards went to Multān where he read with Ḥusām al-Dīn al-Muttaqī, after whom he is called al-Muttaqī. He spent the remaining portion of his Indian life at Aḥmadābād during the reign of Bahādur Shāh, but left India for Mecca after Ḥumāyūn defeated Bahādur Shāh in 941 (1534). He spent his last days in Mecca where he lived for thirty years more, during which he read with Ibn Ḥaḍḡar al-ʿAsḡalānī and others and entered the Qādirī and Shādhilī orders. His high spiritual life and learning led many people to become his murīd (spiritual disciple). He died a highly respected saint and scholar in Mecca 975 (1567) at the age of ninety. He is the author of the following works:

1. al-Burhān fī ʿĀlāmāt Maḥdī ākḥīr al-Zamān, an account of the Maḥdī and of his coming at the end of the world;

2. al-Burhān al-d̲j̲alī fī Maʿrifat al-Walī;

3. Talkḥiṣ al-Bayān fī ʿĀlāmāt Maḥdī ākḥīr al-Zamān;

4. D̲j̲awāmiʿ al-Kalīm fī ʿl-Mawāʿiḡ wa ʿl-Ḥikam, a collection of sentences on morals;

5. Ḥidāyat Rabbi ʿinda Faḡḡad al-Murabbī;

6. al-Ḥikam;

7. Kanz al-ʿUmmāl fī Sunan al-Aḡwāl, a combined edition of Suyūṭī's D̲j̲āmiʿ al-Masānīd or D̲j̲āmiʿ al-D̲j̲awāmiʿ or al-D̲j̲āmiʿ al-kabīr, newly arranged according to chapters (printed in Haidarābād 1312);

8. al-Mawāḥib al-ʿaliya fī D̲j̲āmiʿ al-Ḥikam al-kurʿāniya wa ʿl-ḥadīthiya;

9. Minḥaḍj al-ʿUmmāl fī Sunan al-Aḡwāl, an abridgement of Suyūṭī's well-known alphabetically arranged work al-D̲j̲āmiʿ al-saḡḡir containing a collection of traditions from authentic sources, newly arranged according to chapters together with a supplement;

10. Mukḥṭaṣar al-Nihāya, an abridgment of D̲j̲azarī's dictionary of traditions entitled al-Nihāya fī Ḡharīb al-Ḥadīth;

11. Niʿam al-Miʿyār wa ʿl-Miḡyās li-Maʿrifat Marātib al-Nās, a short tract on the classification of man.

MUWALLAD (A.) means properly one born of non-Arab parents but brought up among Arabs. This is how it is usually to be translated in the Ḥadīth (e.g. Mālik, Nikāḡ, bāb 42). Later it was used to distinguish from the new convert the children of converts, who were brought up in Islām. The common translation "renegade" is wrong as is the adoptado of Pedro de Alcalá. In theory they had equal rights with the old Muslims but the caliph ʿOmar in the interest of the state's finances ordered that they should pay the land-tax (kharaḡ) while the old Muslims only paid a tenth of the yield. The muwalladūn were of special importance in Muslim Spain, especially from the time of ʿAbd al-Raḡmān II, when conversions to Islām became more and more numerous. Some even retained their old family-names (Banū Angelino, Banū Sabarico). This section of the population among whom were often crypto-christians (Christiani occulti) played the largest part in the frequent revolutions against Muslim authority in Spain.

The post-classical poets were called muwalladūn in contrast to the Islāmiyūn, their language was no longer considered a model of grammar, lexicography and prosody. The boundary between the two lies about the end of the first century. Among best known muwalladūn were al-Buḡturī, al-Mutanabbī and, according to some, also al-Farazḡaḡ and D̲j̲arīr.

(HEFFENING)

MUWASHSHAḤ, MUWASHSHAḤA or TAWSHĪḤ, an ode or poem intended to be sung, is so called by comparison with the wishāḡ, which is a double belt ornamented with pearls and rubies or a band of leather studded with pearls which a woman wears across her body from the shoulder to the opposite hip, thus going round the body. The muwashshaḡ is composed of two parts one of which contains complete lines and the other hemistiches.

The muwashshaḡ, which belongs to the "seven kinds or branches" (funūn) considered to be post-classical, is composed according to the rules of the purest syntax.

The muwashshaḡ is divided into "stanzas", the technical name of which is not exactly settled; they are usually called d̲j̲us or bait. In its most perfect form, it usually begins with one or two lines, a sort of prelude to the actual poem; this prelude is called madḡḡhab, ghuṣṣn or maḡla; we also sometimes find the taṣrīʿ; if it is a distich, the first hemistich of each verse rhyme together and the two second hemistichs also. If A be the rhyme of the first hemistich and B that of the second, the madhhab or ghuṣn is of the following form:

2 lines	}	_____ A _____ B
		_____ A _____ B
1 line	}	_____ A _____ B

After the madhhab or ghuṣn come the stanzas proper called: djuzʿ or bait.

The djuzʿ or bait contains two parts: the first consisting of a varying number of hemistichs with the same or alternate rhymes, which however are never those of the madhhab or ghuṣn. This first part is called dawr or simt. The second part which is exactly like the madhhab or ghuṣn, both as regards number of lines and rhymes, is called kafla or kust. The stanza therefore presents the following form:

First type	_____ C
	_____ C
	_____ C
	_____ A _____ B
Second type	_____ C
	_____ D
	_____ D
	_____ D
	_____ D
	_____ A _____ B
	_____ A _____ B

The rhyme or rhymes of the dawr or simt vary from one stanza to another; but those of the kafla are always the same as those of the madhhab or ghuṣn. The kafla is a sort of refrain which does not fail to make an impression on the listeners by the repetition of the same sounds and rhythms.

These are the most usual models of the muwashshah; but the poets, not being bound by hard and inflexible rules, have, each according to his temperament, exercised their imagination considerably in this genre.

Thus Ibn Sanāʾ al-Mulk composed a poem in which the first foot of each hemistich is fāʿilun and has the same rhyme as the hemistich of which it forms part. This is the scheme:

madhhab or ghuṣn	}	_____ A _____ A
		_____ A _____ A
dawr or simt	}	_____ B _____ B
		_____ B _____ B
		_____ B _____ B
kafla	}	_____ A _____ A
		_____ A _____ A
dawr	}	_____ C _____ C
		_____ C _____ C
		_____ C _____ C
kafla	}	_____ A _____ A
		_____ A _____ A

etc.

The blind poet of Tudela shortened the hemistichs which gives a more lively rhythm:

_____ A _____ B
_____ C
_____ A _____ B
_____ C

It would be wearisome to give all the forms of stanzas which are found in the muwashshah.

From the point of view of metre, very great variety is found. Martin Hartmann recognised 146 which may go back to the 16 classical metres. Three other types which are found do not seem to be derived from any well defined form:

maʿūlātu new type mutafāʿilatun type approaching the ḥabab mustafʿilatun mustafʿilun
 a type which might be connected with dū bait

From the historical point of view, Freytag thinks that the muwashshah belongs to an old type which has now disappeared. There is certainly no doubt that the pre-Islamic poets composed poems similar to the muwashshah; these are known as musammaʿ; we find here again the word simt applied to the longest part of the stanza or couplet of the muwashshah.

The musammaʿ began with an opening line with taṣrīʿ; then came four hemistichs rhyming together on a different rhyme from the first line; next came a fifth hemistich rhyming with the first and completing the stanza. A new stanza followed with four hemistichs not rhyming with those of the first stanza; it ended with a hemistich rhyming with the opening line. Here is the scheme:

_____ A _____ A
_____ B _____ B
_____ B _____ B
_____ A
_____ C _____ C
_____ C _____ C
_____ A

Imru 'l-Kais is said to have composed a piece of this nature but it does not seem to be genuine.

The inventor of the muwashshah is said to have been Muḥaddam b. Muʿāfā, a poet at the court of ʿAbd Allāh b. Muḥammad al-Marwānī who ruled in Spain (275—300 = 888—913). He was followed by Ibn ʿAbd Rabbihi, author of al-ʿIḥd al-farīd. Their muwashshah are however believed to be lost.

The first to shine in this genre was ʿUbādat al-Ḥazzāz, a poet of al-Muʿtaṣim b. Ṣumādīh, prince of Almeria. Al-Aḥam al-Baṭalyawī records that he heard Abū Bakr b. Zuhr say: "All the composers of muwashshah are simply children beside ʿUbādat al-Ḥazzāz". In the opinion of all men of letters no contemporary writer could rival ʿUbādat al-Ḥazzāz in the days of the mulūk al-ṭawāʾif.

After him comes Abū ʿAbd Allāh Irfaʿ Raʿsah, the court poet of al-Maʾmūn b. Dhū 'l-Nūn, prince of Toledo. In the time of the Almoravid dynasty there flourished a group of poets among whom may be mentioned the blind poet of Tudela, Ibn Baḳī, Abū Bakr b. al-Abyaḍ, Abū Bakr b. Bādja.

In the time of the Almohads the most famous composers of muwashshah were Muḥammad b. Abū 'l-Faḍl and Ibn Ḥaiyūn. At a later period we have Ibrāhīm b. Sahl al-Isrā'īlī, a poet of Seville and of Ceuta, Ibn Khālaf al-Djāzārī (of Algiers), Ibn Khazar of Bougie, the vizier and celebrated man of letters, Lisān al-Dīn b. al-Khaṭīb.

Eastern poets have followed those of Spain. One of them, Ibn Sanā' al-Mulk al-Miṣrī (551—608 = 1156—1212), acquired a reputation in both east and west.

As to the subjects of the muwashshah they are the same as those of the traditional qaṣidas; but as they are composed with the definite object of being sung to the accompaniment of stringed instruments they are usually love-poems.

On the musical origins of the muwashshah see the article TIK.

AL-MUẒAFFAR, the honorific laḡab by which the second of the 'Āmirid dictators of Muslim Spain is best known, the son of the celebrated al-Manṣūr [q. v.], ABŪ MARWĀN 'ABD AL-MALIK IBN ABĪ 'ĀMIR AL-MA'AFIRĪ. He was invested with the office of ḥājib by the caliph Hishām II, on the death of his father, on 28th Ramaḍān 392 (Aug. 10, 1002) and ruled as absolute master the territory of al-Andalus until his death of angina as he was setting out on an expedition against Castille on 16th Ṣafar 399 (Oct. 20, 1008).

The relatively short period of the ḥājibate of 'Abd al-Malik al-MuẒaffar was until quite recently almost unknown for lack of documents and in his Histoire, Dozy had to pass it over almost in silence in spite of its importance in the history of the early 11th century in Spain. I have been able in the course of recent years to fill this gap, thanks to the discovery of accounts of the ḥājibate of al-MuẒaffar in the Dhakhira of Ibn Bassām and the Bayān of Ibn 'Idhārī and the unpublished chapter devoted to him by Ibn al-Khaṭīb in his I'māl al-I'lām. The result is the discovery that the septennium of 'Abd al-Malik was for Muslim Spain a period of peace and prosperity, a regular golden age, just on the eve of the first upheavals which preceded the collapse of the Umayyad caliphate; the chroniclers compare this period to the first week of a marriage (sābi' al-'arūs; cf. Dozy, Suppl. Dict. Ar., i. 626—627).

Al-Manṣūr had actually left his son and successor an empire not only completely pacified and solidly organised but also enjoying an economic prosperity hitherto unprecedented. 'Abd al-Malik aimed at following scrupulously the line of conduct laid down for him in his father's last wishes: to preserve and justify the popularity of the 'Āmirid régime by peace at home and the continual harassing of the Christian foe beyond the marches (ṭughūr). Every year of MuẒaffar's rule was therefore marked by a summer expedition (ṣā'ifa) or a winter one (shātīya); in 393 (1003) he led his armies against Catalonia (bilād al-Ifranj), laid waste the country round Barcelona and destroyed 35 strongholds before returning to Cordova; in 395 (1005) an expedition was led against Castille by the ḥājib; in the following year his objective was the town of Pampeluna [q. v.], which he seems to have approached but not reached; in 397 (1007) took place, against Catalonia, the expedition known as the "victorious" (ghazāt al-naṣr): 'Abd al-Malik forced his way into Clunia and carried off a vast booty. This triumph earned for him from the nominal sovereign the title of "Victor" (al-MuẒaffar) which henceforth replaced his previous laḡab of Saif al-Dawla. In the course of the winter of 398 (1007—1008) there was an expedition which ended in the capture of a castle of San Martin which has not been identified. The last expedition undertaken by him as mentioned above came to nothing but at least enabled him to die like his father on the way to wage war on the infidel.

At home al-MuẒaffar maintained intact the strong administrative organisation which dated from the reign of 'Abd al-Raḥmān III [cf. UMAIYADS, ii.] which al-Manṣūr had maintained intact, while removing from it the representatives of the Arab aristocracy. On his accession to office, he won the good graces of the Cordovans by reducing taxes by a sixth. He was easily able to dispose of several conspiracies against him. He left to his brother 'Abd al-Raḥmān Sancho a heritage which the latter might easily have preserved if he had not at once exasperated his subjects against him by displaying a hateful partiality and attempting to arrogate to himself the caliphate completely.

AL-MUẒAFFAR B. 'ALĪ. [See 'IMRĀN B. SHĀHĪN.]

AL-MUẒAFFAR 'OMAR B. AİYŪB. [See AİYŪBIDES, HAMĀ.]

MUẒAFFAR AL-DĪN, fifth Shāh of Persia of the Kādjār [q. v.] dynasty, was born on March 25, 1853. He was Shāh Nāṣir al-Dīn's second son, the eldest son Zill al-Sultān being of lower birth by his mother. As crown prince MuẒaffar al-Dīn had been some time governor of Ādharbāidjān (a description of him as crown prince in Curzon, Persia and the Persian Question, i. 413). After his father's assassination MuẒaffar al-Dīn was enthroned on June 8, 1896. With this new reign the rivalry between England and Russia for commercial and political influence in Persia became ever more apparent. The sympathy of the high officials, which was divided between the two powers, and the economic and military strength of the country was since long too weak to enable Persia to follow an independent policy. Under the relatively strong rule of Nāṣir al-Dīn popular discontent with the increasing misery had been suppressed; the new Shāh, however, though well-intentioned, did not possess the character of a strong ruler and, besides, did nothing to check the extravagancy of the court. His financial difficulties made Persia the debtor of Russia; in 1898, 1900 and 1901 considerable loans were given by Russia, guaranteed by large parts of the custom receipts, the collecting of the custom duties being administered by Belgian officials. A good deal of the borrowed money was used for the expensive journeys to Europe undertaken by the Shāh in 1900, 1902 and 1905. In the meantime, the condition of the people became more and more miserable; headed by some influential merchants and some high ecclesiastics they protested against the heavy taxes and the tariffs as fixed in the commercial agreements with Russia and England of 1903. The growing discontent took several forms; some wished to call in the Turkish Sultān as Caliph and at other times there were outbursts against the Bābī's in Yazd and Iṣfahān. Besides there were special grievances against several high officials, amongst them the chief Belgian inspector of taxes. In December 1905 a popular movement took place in Ṭeherān, with the aim of obtaining the deposition of the then grand vizier 'Ain al-Dawla (since 1903). An ever increasing number of merchants, mulla's and citizens took refuge (bast) in the shrine of Shāh 'Abd al-'Azīm. At last the Shāh promised 'Ain al-Dawla's dismissal and some reforms, but in the course of the following year none of these promises were fulfilled. So in 1906 the discontentment reached again a culminating point, directed this time by some more or less secret patriotic associations. In July large crowds of the people of the capital went with the mullas to Ḳum, to take refuge in the sanctuary there; at the same time the British Legation accorded asylum to a considerable number of merchants and citizens. The results were that on July 30 'Ain al-Dawla was dismissed and that on August 5, all the demands of the protesting people were granted, including a constitution. The ecclesiastical leaders returned from Ḳum. There followed some friction with the government about the elections and other matters, but at last, on October 7, 1906, the first Persian Maḡlis or National Assembly was opened by the Shāh. The new Maḡlis had to face immediately some difficult problems and showed from the beginning its determination not to be a mere toy in the hands of the court party. Progress was hampered, however, by dissensions amongst clerical and non-clerical members of the popular party, while there were disturbances in Tabriz, owing to the tyranny of the crown prince Muḡammad 'Alī. The Constitution (Ḳānūn-i Asāsī; q. v.) was ratified by the Shāh only on December 30, 1906. MuẒaffar al-Dīn himself died on January 8, 1907 after a long illness, leaving his country to the eventful reign of Muḡammad 'Alī Shāh.

MUẒAFFARIDS, a Persian dynasty. Their ancestors came from Arabia and had settled in Ḳhurāsān at the time of the Muslim conquest, where they lived for several centuries. On the approach of the Mongols, the emir Ghīyāth al-Dīn Ḥādjdjī, with his three sons Abū Bakr, Muḡammad and Manṣūr, retired to Yazd. The two first named entered the service of the Atābeg of Yazd, 'Alā' al-Dawla, and when Hūlāgū [q. v.] marched on Baghdād, Abū Bakr followed him with 300 horse. After the capture of Baghdād he was sent with an army to the Egyptian frontier. Here he fell in an encounter with the Arab tribe of Ḳhāfādja whereupon his brother Muḡammad succeeded him as a vassal of the Atābeg of Yazd while Manṣūr remained with his father in the little town of Maibudh near Yazd. Manṣūr had three sons, Mubārīz al-Dīn Muḡammad, Zain al-Dīn 'Alī and Sharaf al-Dīn MuẒaffar, the latter of whom became the ancestor of the dynasty of the MuẒaffarids. Appointed governor of Maibudh by Yūsuf Shāh, 'Alā' al-Dawla's son and successor, he cleared the hills of the robber bands from Shirāz and when Yūsuf Shāh, who had put to death the envoys of the Ilkhān Arghūn had to take to flight and went to Sistān, Muḡammad followed him but left him on the way and went to Kirmān where he was kindly received by Sultān Djalāl al-Dīn Sūrghatmush Ḳara Khitāi (685 = 1286—1287). After some time he returned to Yazd and was presented to Arghūn who took him into his service. He was also on good terms with Arghūn's successors Gaikhātū and Ghāzān. The latter appointed him amīr-i hazāra "commander of a thousand", and after the accession of Uldjāitū (703 = 1303—1304) he was given custody of the roads from Ardīstān to Kirmānshāh and from Herāt and Marw to Abarkūh. MuẒaffar died on 13th Dhū 'l-Ḳa'da 713 (March 1, 1314). He was succeeded by his 13 year old son Mubārīz al-Dīn Muḡammad who is described as brave and devout but at the same time cruel, bloodthirsty and treacherous. He continued to live at the court of Uldjāitū; on the latter's death in Shawwāl 716 (Dec. 1316) and the accession of his son Abū Sa'īd he returned to Maibudh. Along with the lord of the southern coast of Persia, the emir Kaikhūswar b. Maḡmūd Shāh Indjū, he very soon fell upon the Atābeg of Yazd, Ḥādjdjī Shāh, and succeeded in taking the town from him (718 or 719 = 1318 or 1319). A short time after this event the people of Sistān, the Nikūdars, arose in rebellion; Muḥammad attacked them and their leader Nawrūz was defeated and slain. The rebels however gathered together again and Muḥammad had to fight no less than 21 battles before they were finally suppressed. After the death of Abū Saʿīd (736 = 1335–1336), complete chaos began and pretenders arose in different parts of the wide empire. The emir Abū Ishāq b. Maḥmūd Shāh Indjū endeavoured to take the town of Yazd but was driven back. After some time Muḥammad took this province from the Mongol governor in Kirmān, Malik Ḳuṭb al-Dīn. In the end however, Abū Ishāq succeeded in taking Shirāz and had the khutba read and coins struck in his name. In Ṣafar 748 (May–June 1347) he set out to subjugate Kirmān and laid waste Sirdjān, but returned when he heard that Muḥammad was ready to offer vigorous resistance to his advance. One of the viziers of Abū Ishāq then undertook a campaign against Kirmān but was defeated, whereupon Abū Ishāq put himself at the head of a new army and marched on Kirmān to take vengeance on Muḥammad. But this effort also failed; Abū Ishāq was completely defeated and had to take to flight. In 751 (1350–1351) he went to Yazd and began to besiege the town but returned, having achieved nothing. In spite of all his failures however, Abū Ishāq never lost heart. In the following year he sent a new army under the emir Beg Djakāz to Kirmān and when the latter met Muḥammad on the plain of Pandj Angusht in Djumādā I 753 (June–July 1352) a battle resulted. Djakāz was defeated. Muḥammad to follow up his victory, went to Shirāz and laid siege to it. On the 3rd Shawwāl 754 (Nov. 1, 1353), the governor had to surrender and Abū Ishāq fled to Isfahān. In the following year Muḥammad took the oath of homage to the ʿAbbāsīd caliph in Egypt. Isfahān was now besieged. But as Muḥammad had also to deal with other rebels the siege was somewhat prolonged. Resistance was in the end overcome and the town had to surrender. At the same time Abū Ishāq fell into his hands and was at once executed (21st Djumādā I 757 or 758 = May 22, 1356 or May 11, 1357). After Muḥammad had defeated all his enemies and become undisputed lord of Fārs and the ʿIrāk, an envoy appeared from the ruler of the Golden Horde, Djānī Beg Khān b. Uzbeg Khān, who announced that the Khān had taken Tabriz and wanted to appoint Muḥammad yasāwul "Marshal". Muḥammad gave the envoy an arrogant and unfriendly answer; but when he heard soon afterwards that Djānī Beg had returned home and left the emir Akhī Djūk in Tabriz he decided to take the town. Soon afterwards the news of Djānī Beg's death arrived; Muḥammad at once set out and met Akhī Djūk at Miyāna in Ādharbāidjān. The latter was defeated and Muḥammad entered Tabriz. But as a large army was approaching from Baghdad he dared not risk remaining but decided to begin to retreat. In Ramaḍān 759 (Aug. 1358) he was surprised and taken prisoner by his own son Shāh Shudjāʿ [q.v.] who believed himself suppressed and ill-treated by his father, in concert with some other relatives. Muḥammad was blinded and kept in prison for several years until his death at the end of Rabiʿ I 765 (Jan. 1364) at the age of 65. He was succeeded by Shāh Shudjāʿ who shortly before his death appointed his son Zain al-ʿĀbidīn ʿAlī his successor in Shirāz and gave his brother ʿImād al-Dīn Aḥmad b. Muḥammad the governorship of Kirmān. As soon as Zain al-ʿĀbidīn had begun to reign his cousin Shāh Yahyā b. Sharaf al-Dīn Muzaffar set out from Isfahān to attack him. Fortunately however, the threatened war was averted by a friendly agreement; but Shāh Yahyā could not stay long in Isfahān; he was driven out by the turbulent and fickle inhabitants and fled to Yazd whereupon Zain al-ʿĀbidīn appointed his maternal uncle Muzaffar-i Kāshī governor of Isfahān. In 787 (1385–1386) an envoy from Timūr arrived in Kirmān bringing assurances of his peaceful and friendly intentions and Sulṭān Aḥmad hastened to offer his humble homage to the powerful conqueror. In Shawwāl 789 (Oct.–Nov. 1387) it was reported that Timūr had invaded the ʿIrāk and that Muzaffar-i Kāshī had given him the keys of the towns and fortresses whereupon Zain al-ʿĀbidīn left Shirāz and went to Baghdad while Shāh Yahyā endeavoured to procure suitable gifts to pacify Timūr and ordered that a sufficient sum should be paid out to maintain his army. But when Timūr's officials appeared in Isfahān to take the money, they were attacked and killed by the citizens. In consequence the Mongols carried out a dreadful massacre among the people of Isfahān, in which 200,000 were said to have perished. Timūr then went to Fārs and confirmed Sulṭān Aḥmad as lord of Fārs, the ʿIrāk and Kirmān, whereupon he returned to Samarḳand. When Zain al-ʿĀbidīn had left Shirāz, he met his cousin Shāh Maṣṣūr b. Sharaf al-Dīn Muzaffar at Shūstar and was at first welcomed, then suddenly attacked and imprisoned. Shāh Maṣṣūr was now able to occupy Shirāz without opposition, while Shāh Yahyā retired to Yazd. After the former had established himself securely in Shirāz, Zain al-ʿĀbidīn was released by his jailers and brought to Isfahān where the people welcomed him. In the meanwhile he had been persuaded by Shāh Yahyā to combine with Sulṭān Aḥmad to take vengeance on Shāh Maṣṣūr. The plan failed however, the allies were defeated and Shāh Maṣṣūr seized the whole of the ʿIrāk. When Zain al-ʿĀbidīn wanted to escape to Khurāsān, he was treacherously seized by the governor of al-Raiy and brought to Shāh Maṣṣūr who at once had him blinded. The latter then tried to form a coalition against Timūr. In 795 (1393) however, Timūr left his winter quarters in Māzandarān and marched on Shūstar. After storming Ḳalʿa-i Sefid which was considered impregnable he marched on Shāh Maṣṣūr's capital and a battle was fought near Shirāz. Although Shāh Maṣṣūr's chief emir abandoned him with most of his troops, the battle lasted till far into the night. The undismayed Muzaffarid fought with desperate courage, but finally fell in the mêlée, after fighting his way to Timūr and giving him two cuts with his sword, which however the strong helmet of the Mongol leader averted. Shāh Maṣṣūr's relations then submitted; nevertheless Timūr a week later (Rajab 795 = May 1393) had all the Muzaffarids executed.

MUZĀWADJA, a term in rhetoric (badīʿ) which means the association of two things in the relation of condition (shart) and result (djazāʿ) and then employing the same combination for two other things in the same conditions. Here is an example from the Diwān of al-Buḥturī (Cairo 1329, p. 317):

Idha 'htarabat yawman fa-fādat dimū'uhū tadhakkarat al-kurbā fa-fādat dimū'uhū

"When they (the horsemen) are one day fighting and their blood flows in profusion, they remember their bonds of kinship and their tears flow abundantly". The poet associates fighting with recalling bonds of kinship in the two parts of the conditional statement, then he completes the first by adding their blood flows in profusion and the second by saying their tears flow abundantly.

AL-MUZDALIFA, a place roughly halfway between Minā and 'Arafat where the pilgrims returning from 'Arafat spend the night between the 9th and 10th Dhu 'l-Ḥijja, after performing the two evening ṣalāts. On the next morning they set off before sunrise and climb up through the valley of Muḥassir to Minā. Other names for this place are al-Mash'ar al-ḥarām, from Sūra ii. 194 and Djam' (cf. Lailat Djam': Ibn Sa'd, ii/i. 129, 6); but Djam', according to another statement, comprises the whole stretch between 'Arafat and Minā, both included, so that Yawm Djam' (Kiṭāb al-Aghānī, vi. 30, 11) is explained as the day of 'Arafat and Ayyām Djam' as the days of Minā. The rites associated with the night of Muzdalifa go back to the old pagan period, which the Arabs themselves recognise when they make Ḳuṣayy introduce the kindling of the sacred fire in this night and say that guiding of the departure for Minā is a privilege of the family of Adwān.

The sacred place in Muzdalifa was the hill of Ḳuzāḥ [q. v.]. Even after Muḥammad in deliberate contrast to the pagan practice had declared all Muzdalifa to be mawḳif [cf. HADJJI, I, c.], this hill retained its ancient sanctity. According to Azrakī, there was a thick round tower upon it on which the Muzdalifa fire was kindled; in the time of Ḥārūn al-Raṣhīd it was a fire of wood; later it was illuminated with wax-candles. In the Muslim period a mosque was built about 400 yards from the tower, of which Azrakī gives a detailed description while Muḳaddasī speaks of a place of prayer, a public fountain and a minaret. Burton also mentions a high isolated tower at Muzdalifa but the illumination in the night of Muzdalifa now takes place on the mosque.

MUZDAWIDJ means among philologists the use of two terms in which the form of one is changed to make it resemble that of the other. For example in this ḥadīth (Ibn Mādjā, Sunan, Cairo 1313, ii. 246): irdjī'na ma'zūrāt ghair ma'djūrāt, "return home laden with sin and not with rewards", the word ma'zūrāt from the root w-z-r has been changed into ma'zūrāt to give it the same form as ma'djūrāt. It is similar in the phrases (cf. Lisān, xix. 353): ghadiyāt wa-'ashiyāt, ghudaiyānāt wa-'ushaiyānāt, bi'l-ghadāyā wa'l-'ashāyā "mornings and evenings" in which the form of the first word has been adapted to that of the second.

The muzdawidj, among rhetoricians, consists in establishing a kind of alliteration between two adjacent words having the same form, the same metrical quantity and the same rhyme (rawī); e.g. in this verse of the Ḳur'ān (xxvii. 22): wa-djī'luka min Saba'in bi-naba'in "I have brought thee news from Saba'" where we have the resemblance between Saba'in and naba'in. We may give as another example this ḥadīth (Ibn al-Aṭṭār, Nihāya, Cairo 1911, iv. 291 under h-y-n): al-mu'minūna hainūna lainūna "Believers are peaceable and mild in character" and the phrase (cf. Lisān, xvii. 280, 331) hainun lainun, haiyinun laiyinun.

The object of the muzdawidj among poets is to make the hemistichs of a poem rhyme together two by two. As a rule, it is only used in didactic urdjuzas (like the Alfiya of Ibn Mālik); al-'Amīlī, however, in his Kashkūl (Cairo 1302) has used it with the wāfir and ramal metres (p. 76, 78, 83). In Persian and Turkish, it is called maḥṣawī (masnawī) and composed in the metres ramal, hazaj and mutakārib. In this kind of composition, it is necessary that the last foot of the two hemistichs should be alike. Among the Arabs there is a kind of poem in the radjaz metre (and sometimes some verses follow strictly the sarī' metre) called muzdawidjāt (a collection of them was published in Cairo in 1299); they consist of strophes of five hemistichs in which the first four hemistichs rhyme together and the fifth have a common rhyme. Sometimes the strophe has only four hemistichs, the first three rhyming together and the fourth rhyming jointly as in al-l'ām bi-Muthallath al-Kalām of Ibn Mālik (Cairo 1329) and Nail al-Arab fī Muthallathāt al-'Arab of Ḥasan Ḳowaidir al-Khalilī (Bulāḳ 1301).

AL-MUZZAMMIL, title of sūra lxxiii, taken from the first verse: "O thou wrapped up", viz. Muḥammad, who wrapped himself up in his garment or was wrapped up by others. For explanations of the allusion cf. Sale's note as well as the commentaries on the Qurʾān. Variants of al-muzzammil, which stands for al-mutazammil, are al-muzammal, al-muzammil (Baidāwī).

NABATAEANS, an Arab people who lived in ancient times in Arabia Petraea. — As early as the seventh century B. C. the Nabayāti are mentioned by Assurbanipal (Keilinschr. Bibl., ii. 216 sqq.). Whether the Nebayōth of the Old Testament are to be identified with them is uncertain (against the identification: Nöldeke in Schenkel's Bibelllexicon, s.v. Nabatäer; for it amongst others: Musil, Arabia Deserta, New York 1927, p. 492). The Nabataeans were never completely subjected either by the Assyrians, or the Medes, Persians or the Macedonian kings (Diodor. ii. 48). In 312 B.C. Antigonos sent two expeditions against them without success. They were then a nomadic people of shepherds and traders, with a few natural fortresses like Petra, Boṣrā, Salkhad, al-Ḥidjr which served as depots for their arms and riches. Living round the Dead Sea they exploited from time to time the remunerative asphalt deposits on its eastern shore. They were often on friendly terms with their neighbours; e.g. with the Jews under the Maccabees and especially with the Salamians (Arab. Sulaim; cf. Yāḳūt, Muʿdjam, ed. Wüstenfeld, ii. 594, s.v. Birma), with whom according to Stephanos Byzantios and the testimony of the Nabataean inscriptions, they were in close alliance (cf. SULAIM B. MANṢŪR and B. Moritz, Salamii, in Pauly-Wissowa's Realenzykl., vol. i. A, col. 1824 sq.). The capital of the kingdom, called Nabātu in the inscriptions, was Petra on the Ḍjabal Ḥārūn, according to Nöldeke (Z. D. M. G., xxv. 259 sq.) Hebrew Selaʿ, Arab. Ḥiṣn Salʿ in the Wādī Mūsā in the hills of al-Sharā (Yāḳūt, Muʿdjam, iii. 117, 13; Mushtarak, p. 252, 2), while Musil (Arabia Petraea, II/i. 337, note 2, on p. 318) identifies this with Kṣēr es-Selʿ. The ruins reveal a peculiar mixture of Nabataean and Hellenistic architecture while they have yielded remarkably few Nabataean inscriptions (on these see Dalman, Petra und seine Felsheiligtümer, 1908; do., Neue Petra-Forschungen, 1912; Bachmann, Watzinger, Wiegand, Petra, 1921; A. B. W. Kennedy, Petra, its History and Monuments, 1925).

The Nabataean kingdom comprised the lands of southern and eastern Palestine as well as Idumaea and Peraea, from 88 B. C. also Ḥawrān; twice (85 B. C. and c. 34—62 A. D., perhaps also in the interval, cf. Mommsen, Röm. Gesch., v. 476, note 3), Damascus also belonged to it [cf. i., p. 903]. In the southwest it stretched over the ancient Midian as far as the coast of the Red Sea where ʿObodat I founded the town of Ḥawarā (Steph. Byz., s.v. Ἀβαρα, probably = Δευκή κάμη, now perhaps al-Ḥawrāʾ), in the interior as far as al-ʿUla (Dedan) and al-Ḥidjr [q.v.] on the frontier of the Ḥidjāz. The Nabataeans also penetrated into the nome of Arabia in the eastern Nile delta as an inscription from Tell el-Shughāfiye in the Wādī Tūmilāt shows (Clermont-Ganneau, Les Nabatéens en Egypte, in Recueil d'Arch. Or., viii. [1924], p. 229—257). A number of their kings can be dated with approximate exactness: Ḥārithat (Aretas) I 169 B. C., Ḥārithat II c. 110—96, ʿObodat (Obodas) I c. 90, Rabbʿel Rabilos I c. 87, Ḥārithat III (Ἀρέτας Φιλέλλην) c. 86—62, [ʿObodat II c. 62—47?], Māliku (Malichos) I c. 47—30, ʿObodat II (III?) before 25—c. 9 B. C., Ḥārithat IV Raḥem-ʿammeh (Φιλόπατρις) c. 9 A. D.—40 A. D., Māliku II 40—70/71, Rabbʿel II Σωτήρ 70/71—106 A. D. [Māliku III, 106 A. D.?, cf. Clermont-Ganneau, Recueil, viii. 247]. The real founder of their power is said to have been king Erotimos, who is probably the same as Ḥārithat III whose reign fell in the period of decline of the Seleucid empire (E. Täubler, in Klio, x. 251—253). As "allies", the Nabataeans were able to maintain to some extent their independence of the Romans. At a very early date, like the Palmyrans, they attained through their trade the position of monopolists in Nearer Asia. At the beginning of the Roman empire they dropped their nomadic life and became peacefully settled. Just as in the east they have left their inscriptions particularly on the trade-routes followed by their caravans, e.g. from Petra to Damascus and Tadmor, to Forat at the mouth of the Euphrates, to Gerrha (Arab. al-Djarʿāu near al-Katif), to the Sinai peninsula and Egypt and to Gaza, so we find in the Roman empire epigraphic traces of Nabataean merchants as far as Upper Egypt (Dendera), in Miletus, Rome and Puteoli. In 106 A. D. the emperor Trajan conquered Petra and made the most important part of the Nabataean kingdom the Roman Provincia Arabia. The remainder of the territory left to the Nabataeans in the desert suffered economic ruin about 200 A. D. when the Palmyrans gradually obtained control of the remunerative carrying trade.

The king, who was assisted by a vizier, the highest official (Greek ἐπίτροπος), with the title "brother", had under him a number of shaikhs (ἐπαρχοί) of the separate tribes (φυλαί); we also find the titles eparchos and strategos. The high social position of women is noteworthy; they could possess property independently and dispose of it as they liked (Nöldeke in Euting, Nabat. Inscr., p. 79 sq.); the coins often bear portraits of the queens (Kammerer, Petra et la Nabatène, Paris 1929, p. 377; Brit. Mus. Cat. of Greek Coins: Arabia etc., London 1922, Plates I and II).

Our only source for Nabataean law is their epitaphs, the threats of punishment in which are based on a formula of the Greek law of property and contract which elsewhere is only found in tomb-inscriptions in Asia Minor (B. Keil, Hermes, xliii. [1908], p. 567—572).

As nomads, simple in their customs and rarely owning slaves, the Nabataeans, as a trading people, had a great respect for wealth. The mention in inscriptions of physicians, wise men and poets, shows a certain level of intellectual culture. Whether circumcision was practised among them is uncertain (Kammerer, op. cit., p. 375 sq.).

The Nabataean pantheon is known to us mainly from tomb and votive inscriptions. The principal god was Dūsharā [cf. DHU 'L-SHARĀ], the principal goddess Allāt [cf. AL-LĀT]; the goddesses Manūthu (= Aram. Menāwātā; cf. MANĀT), Kaisha, Mutaba and Hubal [q.v.] are also mentioned. Their kings were perhaps worshipped as gods after their deaths (cf. C. I. S., ii. 354).

As Nöldeke was the first to emphasise, the Nabataeans were pure Arabs as their names show; but in written intercourse they used Aramaic, the usual written and business language of Nearer Asia. Many aramaisms thus entered their language in the north of the country (like kabrā, nafshā, arnā). Arab writers therefore even used the term "Nabataean" for "Aramaic"; in the southern Hīrā (al-Hidjr) on the other hand, the Nabataean Arabic retained its greatest purity; the Arabic script developed out of the Nabataean cursive at the close of the ancient period [cf. ARABIA, d.].

In the Muslim period the Arabs called those inhabitants of Syria and of the 'Irāk, who were neither shepherds nor soldiers, "Nabataeans" (Ibn al-Kalbī in Yāqūt, Mu'djam, iii. 634), a term also applied in a somewhat contemptuous tone to the Aramaic-speaking peasants (Nöldeke, in Z.D.M.G., xxv. 124). When then we find "Nabataeans" (Nabīṭ, Nabṭ etc.) mentioned in Malatya as well as on the Djaīhān, in Syria, on the Khābūr and in the 'Irāk, in 'Omān and Bāhrain, the name is not to be taken in the ethnographical sense (Nöldeke, op. cit., p. 125). As the grammarians of the 'Irāk paid special attention to the "Nabataean" language of the Aramaic country people, by "Nabataeans" was frequently meant the inhabitants of the 'Irāk and especially of the Baṭā'ih (Nöldeke, op. cit., p. 127).

The inhabitants of the district of Hismā in the most northern part of the Hīdjāz, once the Djudhām [q.v.], now the Huwaitāt [q.v.], are regarded as the descendants of the Nabataeans [cf. ARABIA, a.].

NABI (A.), prophet, borrowed from Hebr. nābī or Aram. nebīā, is found in the Qur'an from the second Meccan period in the singular and plural nabīyūn; in the Medina period we find also the broken plural anbiyā'. Lists of the nabīyūn are given in Sūra vi. 83 sqq.; iii. 34; iv. 161 sqq.; further information about them is given in several passages of Sūra xix. and in xvii. 57. The list consists exclusively of names from the Old and New Testaments (if we leave out Idrīs in Sūra xix. 57, whose name Muḥammad had however also learned from a Christian source; see above ii., p. 442—450; Horovitz, Koran. Unters., p. 88 sq.); while messengers of God (rasūl [q.v.], plur. rusul; mursalūn) had also been sent to other peoples of the past — e.g. Hūd or Šālīh —, according to the Qur'anic idea "prophets" had appeared only among the Ahl al-Kitāb [q.v.]. Only a minority of the individuals called prophets in the Qur'an are so described in the Bible, and Yūnus b. Mattai [q.v.] is the only one of the anbiyā' of the Qur'an who appears among the literary prophets of the Bible. Muḥammad himself did not claim the name nabī until he was in Medina when he was addressed as the Prophet (yā aiyuha 'l-nabī) and, as finally closing the series of prophets, is called their "seal" (khātam). When Muḥammad in Sūra vii. 156 and 158 is called al-nabī al-ummī, this is to distinguish him as the prophet who has arisen among the heathen; the Jews called the heathen ummūt ḥā-ḍām ("peoples of the world") and also recognised prophets who had arisen among them: among these they included e.g. Balaam and Job. This Jewish name for the heathen became the al-ummīyūn of the Qur'an (Sūra lxii. 2; iii. 19, 69); that ummiyūn refers to the heathen is quite clear from Sūra iii. 19, where they are contrasted with those who have received the scripture. When Sūra ii. 73 refers to the ummiyūn min Ahl al-Kitāb, the reference is most probably (with Wellhausen, Skizzen, iv. 13, note 2) to originally pagan Arabs who had adopted Judaism. The derivation of ummi from Hebrew ummōt hā-ʿōlam therefore fits all the Qurʾānic passages, while that most generally adopted from Hebrew ʿam hā-ʾāres "people of the country", a term for Jews who did not know the Jewish law, would at best fit only Sūra ii. 73, but even for this passage is not absolutely essential.

The post-Qurʾānic ideas about the prophethood of Muḥammad are discussed in the article MUḤAMMAD (cf. also Tor Andrae, Die Person Muhammads in Lehre und Glaube seiner Gemeinde, Stockholm 1918). The accounts of the other prophets which found a way into Islām in the post-Qurʾānic period are collected in the works on the Kiṣaṣ al-Anbiyāʾ. These, however, are not confined to the prophets proper who appear in the Qurʾān by name or anonymously, and to other figures of Jewish and Christian Biblical and post-Biblical tradition, but deal also with the history of such personalities as Djirdjis and Bulukyā to whom there is not the slightest reference in the Qurʾān.

NĀBĪ, YŪSUF, an Ottoman poet; Yūsuf Nābī came from Urfa (Ruhā, hence Ruhāwī, not Rūhānī as one often finds). From there he came in the reign of Muḥammad IV to Stambul and became a favourite of the grandvizier Kara Muṣṭafā. He held a post as kiaya, made the pilgrimage after Kara Muṣṭafā's death and later settled in Aleppo. When the governor there, Muḥammad Balṭadji [q. v.], became grandvizier, he took Nābī to Stambul and gave him the post of superintendent of the department of the Anatolian chief accountant (Anadolu mühasebedjisi). Later he gave up this office for another and died aged about 90 on 3rd Rabiʿ I 1124 (April 10, 1712). He was buried in Skutari in the Qaradja Aḥmad cemetery near the Miskinler monastery; the inscription on his tombstone is given by Saʿd al-Din Nūzhet, Mezār Kitābelerī, Stambul 1932, p. 11.

Nābī wrote several historical works in a florid style which was considered classical in his time and even later, such as an account of the conquest of Kameniec in Podolia (1083 = 1672) called Taʾriḫ-i Weḳāʾi-i Kaminā, Fethnāme-i Kaminā or simply Taʾriḫ-i Kaminā. He also wrote in prose and verse a description of his pilgrimage to the holy places (1089 = 1678; the work was written only in 1093 = 1682) entitled Tuḥfat al-Ḥaramain. His very popular Dirwān with supplement earned him the title of "king of poets". In his Khairi-nāme, usually called Khairiye, he gives his son Abu 'l-Khair moral admonitions and advice. His letters (Munshaʾāt) were at one time highly esteemed and are of some historical value. He continued Waisi's Siyar in a Dhail-i Siyar-i Waisi. Printed works: Dirwān, Bulāḳ 1257 and Stambul 1292; Dhail-i Siyar-i Waisi, Bulāḳ 1248; Khairiye in: Conseils de Nābī Efendi à son fils Abou 'l-Khair, publiés en turc avec la traduction française et des

NĀBĪ YŪNUS. [See NINAWĀ.]

NABĪDH (A.), a comprehensive designation for intoxicating drinks, several kinds of which were produced in early Arabia, such as misr (from barley), bit (from honey: Bukhārī, Maghāzī, bāb 60; Ashriba, bāb 4; Adab, bāb 80; or from spelt: Aḥmad b. Ḥanbal, iv. 402), faḍīḫ (from different kinds of dates: Bukhārī, Ashriba, bāb 3, 21).

Grapes being scarce in Arabia, it is said that in al-Madīna "wine" was usually prepared from kinds of dates, exceptionally from grapes (Bukhārī, Ashriba, bāb 2, 3; Muslim, Ashriba, trad. 3, 6). This may be true. Yet even these traditions betray a tendency connected with the question whether the prohibition of wine included that of intoxicating drinks. Generally speaking ḥadīth favours the affirmative answer and is consequently anxious to point out that the ḥamr which was prohibited by Muḥammad included nabīdh.

The question was difficult in so far as these kinds of drinks were intoxicating to degrees which partly depended upon the duration of the process of fermentation. This appears e.g. from the copious traditions in which ʿĀʾisha relates how nabīdh was prepared for Muḥammad and at what time the beverage was done away with [cf. KHAMR], as well as from the traditions in which the previous prohibition of certain vessels (ḥantam, muzaffat, etc.) was abrogated and all kinds of vessels declared allowed, provided the drinks prepared in them were not intoxicating (Muslim, Djanāʾiz, trad. 106; Ashriba, trad. 63—65, 67—75 etc.). A series of traditions which could be adduced by the Ḥanafites in favour of their view, according to which nabīdh is not included in the prohibition of wine, is to be found in al-Nasāʾī's collection, Ashriba, bāb 48. Cf. further the art. KHAMR.

Side by side with milk and honey nabīdh was also the beverage that was offered to the pilgrims in Makka. The institution, al-sikāya (also the name of the building, close to Zamzam, where the distribution took place), was an office held by the ʿAbbasids (Aḥmad b. Ḥanbal, Musnad, i. 372; Muslim, Ḥadīdī, trad. 347; Abū Dāwūd, Manāṣik, bāb 90). The descriptions by Ibn Saʿd († 230 = 845) and al-Azraqī († 244 = 858) give the impression of referring to the present state of things; in the time of al-Muḥaddasī († about 1000 A.D.) the institution had already passed into desuetude. For details, cf. the work of Gaudefroy-Demombynes.

NĀBĪGHA AL-DHUBYĀNĪ, a famous poet of the pre-Muḥammadan period. His real name was Ziyād b. Mu'āwīya and he belonged to the tribe of Dhubyān. He probably flourished in the second half of the century which preceded Muḥammad and died shortly before the beginning of Islām. Caussin de Perceval (Histoire des Arabes, 2nd ed., ii. 502) puts the date of his birth in 535 A. D. and Father Cheikho (Poètes arabes chrétiens, p. 640) dates his death in 604 A. D. These dates however can only be conjectural.

The surname Nābigha has been variously interpreted by Arab writers. According to some, our poet was so called because in one of his verses he uses the verb nabagha: "She stopped among the Banū Kain b. Djasr and they felt the effects of our attacks". But this verse is apocryphal and the process recalls that used to justify the etymologies of Muhāhil and of Mutalammiṣ [q. v.]. According to others, he was so called because he did not write poetry until he reached manhood or more simply because in Nābigha poetry "flows from the spring".

We know nothing about his family; his noble birth asserted by the Kitāb al-Aghānī (ix. 162) and Ibn Qutaiba (ed. de Goeje, p. 74) is doubtful and we know nothing definite about his childhood and youth.

At some date which it is impossible to ascertain definitely, Nābigha was admitted to the court of the Lakhmid princes [cf. LAKHM] of al-Hira, vassals of Persia; in the reigns of the kings al-Mundhir III and al-Mundhir IV in particular this Christian semi-Persian, semi-Arab city had become an important literary centre and the focus of a brilliant culture.

Our poet sang the praises of these two sovereigns and received gifts from them but his fortunes reached their zenith in the reign of Nu'mān Abū Qabūs whose boon companion and favourite singer he became. The poet lived on intimate terms with the king in the lap of luxury and opulence. Such favour could not fail to excite the envy and jealousy of the other courtiers: hence his enemies, notably Murra b. Ša'd, resolved to break the king's attachment to him. The trick attempted by his enemies was a crude one and the king was not deceived by it: the attack on the poet failed.

Far from being discouraged, Murra patiently awaited another opportunity to avenge himself: this soon appeared. According to the Kitāb al-Aghānī, Nābigha, who had free access to the palace of Nu'mān, one day unexpectedly entered the apartments of queen Mutadarrida, famous for her beauty. Taken by surprise, she dropped her veil, showing to the delighted eyes of the poet "a part of her statue-like body". By the time she could replace it, it was too late. Struck to the heart, Nābigha composed in honour of this "beauty" his famous poem which begins with the line "Go and leave Maiya in all haste . . ." (Derenbourg, Divan, xiv.). Unfortunately he was imprudent enough to recite it to his enemy Murra who hastened to report it to Nu'mān. The latter in his anger decided on the poet's ruin.

According to another tradition, one evening when Nābigha was seated beside the queen in company of the king and another poet, Munakhkhal al-Yashkuri, Nu'mān asked Nābigha to describe Mutadarrida to him. Nābigha at once obeyed and recited the poem which he had composed shortly before. Munakhkhal, who was said to be the queen's lover, exclaimed: "Sire, this description is that of an eye-witness"; and the poet's days were now numbered. Warned by his friend, the chamberlain 'Isām, the poet hurriedly fled and sought refuge with the princes of Ḡhassān.

These stories, on the whole little probable, seem to have been invented to explain Nābigha's disgrace. In his book Fi 'l-Adab al-ādhilī (Cairo 1927, p. 332), Ṭahā Ḥusain disputes their authenticity and acutely points out that nothing in poem viii.: "It has reached me, mayest thou avoid the censure etc." supports these stories. He supposes on the other hand, relying on this ḡaṣida, that the princes of Ḡhassān won the good graces of Nābigha at some time by their largesse and the poet showed his gratitude by singing their praises; this having come to the ears of Nu'mān, the latter took umbrage and decided on the ruin of his favourite.

Nābigha was by no means unknown to the Ḡhassānids, phylarchs of Byzantium and rivals of al-Hira. He had been very well received by the princes al-Hārith b. Abū Ṣhammār and al-Hārith al-Aṣḡhar. The former at the poet's request had released a large number of the Banū Asad taken prisoner at the battle of Ḥalima; the latter, also at Nābigha's request, had released a number of the Banū Asad and Banū Fazāra after the battle of 'Ain Ubāgh. This leads us to say a word about Nābigha's political activities.

The poet in the course of the wars of his tribe never lost interest in his fellow tribesmen and their allies; we have mentioned his interventions on their behalf with the Ḡhassānids; during the celebrated war of Dāḥis between 'Abs and Dhubyān, it was his constant care to maintain the alliances contracted with the Banū Asad and Banū Tamīm. In the reign of the Ḡhassānid Nu'mān b. Hārith Abū Karib, he had once more to intercede on behalf of the Banū Dhubyān defeated in the battle of Dhū Ukur; later, in view of his devotion to his patron and his love for his own tribe, he appealed to Nu'mān to abandon his war on the Banū Dhubyān allied with the Banū Hunn. As a result of refusing to listen to him, the king was defeated.

At the court of Ḡhassān, Nābigha was overwhelmed with favours by 'Amr b. Hārith and later by his successor Nu'mān. He celebrates the former's generosity in a ḡaṣida full of gratitude (Derenbourg, iii.) and his elegy on the death of Nu'mān (Derenbourg, xxiv.) is characterized by deep emotion.

In spite of his luxurious life, Nābigha felt his heart and his thoughts turning towards al-Ḥīra and its king. Therefore on the death of Nu'mān b. Ḥārith Abu Karib he decided to return to al-Ḥīra to attempt to regain the favour of the son of al-Mundhir.

Learning that Nu'mān was ill, he set out accompanied by two Fazāris, Manthūr b. Zabbān and Saiyār b. 'Amr, friends of the prince; when they arrived at al-Ḥīra, Nu'mān had recovered. Hearing of the arrival of his two friends, he had a tent of leather pitched for them and sent them a woman singer to entertain them. He himself often came to visit them. One evening at a party the singer sang Nābigha's poem "O abode of Maiya" (Diwān, i.); the prince delighted exclaimed: "That is an excellent poem!". The Fazāris thereupon seized the opportunity to intercede on behalf of Nābigha and the generous prince forgave the poet. A little later Nu'mān was put to death by order of the Sāsānian king Kisrā Parwiz for having refused to give him one of his relatives as a wife. Nābigha lamented his patron and retired to his tribe. We do not know when he died.

Before giving an estimate of Nābigha as a poet, we have still to discuss his religion. Derenbourg makes him a monotheist, and in support of his opinion quotes a number of verses in which the poet speaks of God, of the feast of palms, of the cross of Zawra'. On the other hand, Cheikho thinks he was a Christian. We find, he says (Christianisme en Arabie avant l'Islam, Bairūt 1923, p. 429—430), in the poems of Nābigha evidence of his belief in God, of his religion and piety, but the arguments are not numerous or of great cogency: a vague mention of God, of David and his son Solomon, of priests present at the obsequies of Mundhir, of the cross of Zawra'. As a matter of fact, Nābigha was a pagan and there is nothing Christian in his poems. The allusions in his poems, even if we accept them as authentic, are in reality only rather faded memories of the Christian ceremonies which the poet had witnessed at al-Ḥīra, and Ghassān and a distant echo of the religious ideas current in the peninsula at this period. As to the word Allāh, it is undoubtedly the result of a substitution for al-Lāt [q. v.] made at a later date by some Muslim purist.

Nābigha al-Dhubyānī holds a high position among the poets of ancient Arabia; he is unanimously placed "in the first rank of poets".

In our opinion he possesses in a high degree the two qualities which make a great poet: sensitiveness and imagination. To sincerity of feeling, he adds splendour of imagery and freshness of expression. In him ideas and words, feeling and turn of phrase, matter and form are in perfect harmony. His satires are often bitter, ironical and scathing.

He is also an artist who skilfully uses all resources, all effects and all artifices. His verse is compact, solid and uniform and readily impresses itself on the memory with the idea which it expresses. Of course it is not without its faults: we find a few weaknesses and examples of lack of care.

Ṭāhā Ḥusain (al-Shi'r al-djāhili, Cairo 1926) has recently raised the question once more of the authenticity of the poems of Nābigha and other pre-Islāmic poets. Rejecting all that has been handed down about it he regards the old poetry as apocryphal. The discussion of this question however, as can readily be understood, lies outside the scope of this article.

NABOB. [See NĀ'IB.]

NĀBULUS, a town in central Palestine, the name of which is derived from that of Flavia Neapolis built in honour of Vespasian. Its Old Testament predecessor was Shechem, which however lay more to the east, on the site of the present village of Balāṭa (the name is explained by S. Klein, in Z. D. P. V., xxxv. 38 sq.; cf. R. Hartmann, ibid., xxxiii. 175 sq., as "platanus", from the evidence of the pilgrim of Bordeaux and the Midrash Gen. rb., c. 81, § 3). According to Eusebius, the place where the old town stood was pointed out in a suburb of Neapolis. The correctness of this identification of the site of Shechem has now been completely proved by Sellin's excavations; and this also explains how the old name did not as usual drive out the late Greek one. In the time of the Arab writers, the name Shechem was long forgotten and what they tell us refers to Neapolis-Nābulus.

Nābulus is in a long valley (running from east to west) formed by two chains of hills, on the south side Garizim, Arabic Djabal al-Ṭūr or al-Kibli (2,900 feet high), on the north side Ebal, Arabic Djabal Eslāmiya or al-Shamālī (3,140 feet high). G. Hölscher (Z. D. P. V., xxxiii. 98) refers the older name of Neapolis: Mabartha (Mamortha) in Pliny and Josephus (i. e. "crossing", ma'barta) to the low saddle running right across the valley. The town with its 22 springs is unusually rich in water, which is heard running everywhere and produces a very luxuriant vegetation. Where the road from the south turns westwards into the valley there is a well with the ruins of a church. Unanimous tradition since the fourth century A. D. locates here Jacob's well and it is undoubtedly the same as is mentioned in John iv. 5. About a thousand yards to the north is a building where tradition locates Joseph's grave.

In the post-exilic period Shechem belonged to the territory of the mixed people of the Samaritans whose capital it became after they had built on the hill of Garizim (the Samaritan text of Deut. xxvii. 5 has this name instead of Ebal) a temple as a rival to that of Jerusalem. They were continually at strife with the Jews and in the end John Hyrcanus in 129 B.C. destroyed Shechem and its temple. At a later date this always turbulent people was equally hostile to the Romans, which caused Vespasian to attack them on Garizim when a large number were slain. Christianity gradually spread in the country and Neapolis became a bishopric. The result was that the Samaritans now turned their arms against the Christians and treated them with great cruelty. After a deadly raid by them, the Byzantine emperor Zeno (474—491) had them driven from Garizim and built a church there. They wrought still greater havoc in the time of Justinian who punished them with great severity and destroyed their synagogues while he rebuilt the churches. This finally broke their spirit; many of them fled to Persia while others became Christians. Their part had been played by the time when Nābulus with many other towns fell into the hands of the Muslims.

The notices of the Arab authors about the town are very scanty. They know that it was inhabited by Samaritans [cf. AL-SĀMIRI] and some add that, according to the Jews, they are found nowhere else, but it should be noted that Balādhuri (ed. de Goeje, p. 158) speaks of Samaritans in Filāṣṭīn and Urdunn. Ya'qūbī mentions (p. 328), Nābulus a town near two sacred hills with a population of Jews, foreigners and Samaritans. Below the town is a subterranean city, hewn out of the rock. Muḳaddasī says "Nābulus lies in a valley between two hills, is rich in olive-trees and a stream flows through it. The houses are of stone and there are mills there; the mosque in the centre has a beautiful paved courtyard". In the Crusading period Nābulus is mentioned as unfortified. On Jan. 23, 1120, an assembly of prelates and secular notables was held here with the object of improving the morals of the Christians. Idrīsī mentions the well of Jacob where Christ had the conversation with the woman of Samaria; a fine church had then been built on the spot. The Jewish traveller Benjamin of Tudela (1160—1173) records that there were no Jews in Nābulus, but about 100 Kutaeans (Samaritans) who offered burned offerings on the altar on Garizim at the passover and on other feast-days. His contemporary 'Alī al-Harawī says the Samaritans are very numerous. He, as does Yāqūt, always writes Garizim as Kazirim, a corruption which we already have in the "Agazaren" of the pilgrim of Bordeaux. A terrible earthquake in 1202 added to the miseries inflicted on the town by the continual wars between Franks and Muslims. Under the great Mamlūk Sultān Baibars [q.v.] it finally passed into possession of the Muslims. Yāqūt remarks on the wealth of water and fertility of the district; here, he says, is the hill on which according to the Jews, Abraham wanted to sacrifice Isaac (not Ishmael as the Muslims say). When praying, the Samaritans turn towards Garizim. Dimashqī says that Nābulus is like a palace surrounded by gardens; he mentions the pilgrimages of the Samaritans to Garizim where they sacrificed lambs. The Muslims had a fine mosque in the town, where the Qur'an was recited day and night. According to Khālil al-Zāhiri (d. 872=1467), the area included 300 villages.

The people of Nābulus retained their unfriendly character and fondness for rebellion so that the town was less visited by pilgrims. Only the modern period has brought order and greater security, but even now the dislike of the Samaritans to strangers as spectators during their passover sacrifices may give rise to trouble.

AL-NĀBULUSĪ. [See 'ABD AL-GHĀNĪ.]

NADHR (A., plural nudhur; Sūra liii. 57), used as a nomen agentis from n-dh-r iv., with the meaning of warner; sometimes also as an infinitive, e.g. Sūra lxvii. 17. The plural nudhur is also found in the sense of an infinitive, e.g. Sūra lxxvii. 6. The term occurs frequently in the Qur'an; it is even said to be synonymous with rasūl; its opposite is bashīr, mubashshir. Nadhr as well as bashīr are applied to the prophets, the former when they are represented as warners, the latter as announcers of good tidings (cf. Sūra xvii. 106; xxv. 58; xxxiii. 44; xlviii. 8: mubashshiran wa-nadhīran). As an epithet it is used especially in connection with Noah, the great warner before the Deluge, and with Muḥammad himself who thereby receives the stamp of a second Noah (cf. Sūra xxvi. 115; l. 51; lxxi. 2 with Sūra xxix. 49; xxxv. 21; xxxviii. 70; lxvii. 26). Sometimes Muḥammad emphasises his being only a warner (Sūra xli. 8), or his being the first warner who was sent to his people (Sūra xxviii. 46; xxxiv. 43).

The term is found in ḥadīth apart from the common use, known from the Qur'an, in the curious expression nadhīr 'uryān (Bukhārī, Riḳāḥ, bāb 26; I'tisām, bāb 2; Muslim, Faḍā'il, tr. ad. 16) with which Muḥammad denotes himself. The tradition runs as follows: "Myself and my mission are like a man who went to some people saying: I have seen the army (of the enemy) with my eyes and I am the naked warner". Several anecdotic stories are told by the commentators in explanation of this expression. It is also said by some of them, that in early Arabia a man who saw an approaching danger, stripped himself of his clothes and wound them around his head in order to warn his tribespeople. — The meaning Nazirite which in several dictionaries is given to the term nadhīr in the first place does not occur in the Qur'an, nor in ḥadīth, nor in Lisān al-ʿArab nor in Tāj al-ʿArūs; it is, however, used in translations of the Bible.

(A. J. WENSINCK)

NADHR, v o w, was taken over into Islām from the pre-Muḥammadan Arabs and underwent modification by the new religion. The idea of dedication is associated with the root n-dh-r which is also found in South Arabic, Hebrew and Aramaic and to some extent in Assyrian. An animal could be the object of dedication among the Arabs. For example, they dedicated by *nadh*r certain of their sheep etc., for the ‘atira feast in Rādjab (Lisān al-‘Arab and Djawhari, s.v.); the dedication which was expressed in solemn formulae signified that the animals were removed from the mundane sphere and placed in the sacred one.

As a rule, a sacrifice was dedicated in order to obtain good fortune in a particular respect. The promise to dedicate an animal when the herd had reached the number of a hundred (op. cit.) had an effect on the prosperity of the animals because the word anticipated the fact. According to the story, ‘Abd al-Muṭṭalib similarly dedicated a son to be slain beside the Ka’ba if he should have ten sons and they grew up (Ibn Hishām, p. 97 sq.) but for his *nadh*r 100 camels were substituted. — A childless woman could also vow if she had a son to dedicate him to the sanctuary (ibid., p. 76; perhaps this story is a literary borrowing). According to the ḥadīth of Maimūna bint Kardam, her father promised to sacrifice 50 sheep if he had a son (Yāqūt, i. 754; Abū Dāwūd, Aimān, bāb 19; Ibn Mādjā, Kaḥḥarāt, bāb 18). If a child was sick, its mother could dedicate it by a vow as aḥmas (from ḥums) if it recovered (Azrakī, p. 123, 8 sqq.). Escape from every difficulty was sought by a *nadh*r. During a battle a camel used to be dedicated as a sacrifice (Wākidi-Wellhausen, p. 39). The traveller in the desert used to make a vow on account of the danger (see the verse in Lane and Lisān al-‘Arab, s.v.). In distress at sea one promised offerings to God or a saint or vowed to do something oneself, such as fasting (Sūra x. 23; xxix. 65; Abū Dāwūd, Aimān, bāb 20; see also Goldziher, Muh. Stud., ii. 311). During a drought ‘Omar vowed to taste neither samn, nor milk nor meat till the rain fell (Ṭabari, ed. de Goeje, i. 2573, 12 sq.).

Even if a sacrifice were promised, the vow also affected the person concerned, as we see from the fact that he had his hair shorn not only on the ḥadjj but also, for example, when sacrificing after a journey (Ibn Hishām, p. 15, 749; Wākidi-Wellhausen, p. 324, 381, 429 sq.; Bukhārī, Ḥadjj, bāb 125); for the cutting of the hair ended, as in the case of the Israelite Nazirite, the state of consecration. The vow therefore had always more or less the character of a self-dedication. This aspect was often quite prominent. Ordinary sacred duties such as participation in the ḥadjj were assumed as a consecration by *nadh*r (Sūra xxii. 30) at which special obligations were assumed e.g. to go to the sanctuary on foot, or barefooted (Bukhārī, Ḍjaṣā’ al-Ṣaid, bāb 27; Tirmidhī, al-Nuḍhūr wa ‘l-Aimān, bāb 17). The sacred condition of ‘itikāf was assumed as a *nadh*r; thus before his conversion ‘Omar vowed to make a nightly ‘itikāf in the Meccan sanctuary (Bukhārī, Maḡhāzī, bāb 54; Aimān, bāb 29). Such a vow to separate oneself from everyday life in some special way was very frequent among the ancient Arabs; for Labīd (p. 17, 17) compares an antelope buck alone among the bushes to one fulfilling his vow (kāḍi ‘l-nuḍhūr).

This isolation had the definite object of spiritual concentration and strengthening the soul and thereby influencing the deity. Abstinence was therefore practised in preparation for great deeds, especially in war. The Arabs “touched no perfume, married no woman, drank no wine and avoided all pleasures when they were seeking vengeance, until they attained it” (Ḥamāsa, p. 447, v. 5 schol.); avoidance of wine (Ḥamāsa, p. 237, v. 4 sqq.) and women (Kitāb al-Aghānī, xv. 161; 2nd ed., p. 154) is specially mentioned. These abstentions like the ḥadjj rites and the ‘itikāf are also the objects of a *nadh*r. The form of this vow is for example “wine and women are ḥarām to me until I have slain 100 Asadis” (Aghānī, viii. 68; 2nd ed., p. 65). A definite term may be fixed, such as drinking no wine for 30 days in order to obtain vengeance (Ḳais b. al-Ḳhaṭim, ed. Kowalski, iv. 28). Forms of abstention are not to eat meat, not to wash the head, so that the ḡjanāba is not removed (Aghānī, ix. 149; 2nd ed., p. 141; xiii. 69; 2nd ed., p. 66; Ibn Hishām, p. 543, 980; Hudhailienlieder, ed. Wellhausen, N^o. 189), not to anoint oneself (Wākidi-Wellhausen, p. 201). Refraining from meat, wine, ointment, washing and sexual intercourse are mentioned together (Aghānī, vi. 99; 2nd ed., p. 97; viii. 68; 2nd ed., p. 66; Ibn Hishām, p. 543; Wākidi-Wellhausen, p. 73, 94). There is also evidence of complete fasting (Wākidi-Wellhausen, p. 105, 402). The abstentions, the offering and the deed to be done form the content of the *nadh*r. It is said: *nadh*hartu ‘alā nafsi and *nadh*hartu malī (Djawhari and Lisān al-‘Arab, s.v.) as well as *nadh*hara dama fulān (‘Antara, p. 21, 84; Ḳais al-Ruḳaiyāt, p. 52, 5). After a wish has been fulfilled a vow of gratitude may also be taken (Wākidi, p. 290).

The consecration placed the person making the vow in connection with the divine powers, the *nadh*r was an ‘ahd (Sūra ix. 76; xxxiii. 27; xlviii. 10), whereby he pledged himself. A neglect of the *nadh*r was a sin against the deity (Imra’ al-Ḳais, p. 51, 10). The sacred obligation of living made this a *nadh*r or (synonymous) naḥḥ, which one should fulfil (kāḍā), instead of wandering aimlessly (Sūra xxxiii. 23; Wākidi, p. 120; Labīd, p. 41, 1; Kumait, Hāshimiyāt, ed. Horowitz, p. 4, 48). The importance of the binding pledge gradually becomes more prominent (cf. Lisān al-‘Arab, where *nadh*hara is explained by awḍjaba, ironically Aṣma’iyāt, p. 7, 2); the emphasis on the material dedication gradually became less. The abstinences mentioned receive their importance on the one hand from works meritorious to the deity, on the other from the unpleasant deprivations, by which the person taking the vow disciplines himself. Both points of view are seen in the examples quoted. The releasing of slaves or divorcing of wives often form the subject of a kind of vow by which a man pledges himself under certain conditions. A man many also vow to sacrifice all his camels if he is lying (Ḥamāsa, p. 667, v. 3). The strict obligation inherent in the *nadh*r makes it closely related to the oath [see ḲASAM].

One can also bind one’s family by a vow. A mother swears not to comb her hair or to seek shade until her son or daughter fulfils her wish (Aghānī, xviii. 205; 2nd ed., p. 205; Ibn Hishām, p. 319; ii. 90). The strength of this kind of “conjuración” is based on the relationship between the two partners. If a dying man vows that his tribe shall slay 50 to avenge him, this binds the tribe (Ḥamāsa, p. 442 sq.). There thus arose in Islām the problem of how far unfulfilled vows had to be fulfilled by the descendants (Muslim, *Nadh*r, trad. 1; Bukhārī, Waṣāya, bāb 19; cf. Goldziher, Zāhiriten, p. 80).

In Islām the vow and the oath are treated together. In the Qur'ān it is prescribed that unconsidered expressions (laghw) in an oath may be broken and expiated (Sūra ii. 225; v. 91). The context shows that the reference is to vows of abstinence, especially relating to food and women. Sūra ii. 226—227 in continuation says that those who bind themselves by ilā' not to touch a woman should either break the vow after 4 months or pronounce the formula of divorce. The breach of the oath then requires the kaffāra. The ḡihār formula is absolutely forbidden (Sūra lviii. 1—5; cf. xxxiii. 4); it is a great sin in the eyes of the law, while the ilā' is not a sin (see Juynboll, Handbuch, p. 284 sqq.; Sachau, Muh. Recht, p. 13, 68 sqq.). The "release from the oath" promised in Sūra lxvi. 2 refers to a vow of continence. The same kaffāra holds for a broken vow as for an oath. It is probable in this case that we have Jewish influence (cf. Mishna, Nedārīm) but the principle of releasing oneself from a vow by doing something else is certainly also originally Arab. But with Islām comes the view that nudhūr are useless because they cannot influence God (Bukhārī, Aimān, bāb 26; Ḳadar, bāb 6; Muslim, Nadhr, trad. 2). Thus we find ḥadīths which urge the fulfilment of vows as well as those that forbid them. Following hints in the ḥadīths, we find a systematic division into vows of piety (nadhr al-tabarrur), which are intended to acquire merit by a pious deed (ṭā'a), and vows by oaths which, since they are conditioned, serve to incite, prevent or strengthen. The latter are called nadhr al-ladjiādī wa 'l-ghadab. They are deprecated but must be treated like oaths. Their matter must not be sinful; according to some, such a vow is invalid, according to others, it is valid but must be broken. Their matter must not already be an individual duty (wādji'b aini). The person taking the vow must, like him taking an oath, be mukallaf and be acting of his own free-will.

AL-NADİM, ABU 'L-FARAJ MUHAMMAD B. ABI YA'QUB ISHĀK AL-WARRĀK AL-NADİM AL-BAGHDĀDĪ, Arabic bibliographer, compiled the Fihrist in 377 (987—988). Little is known about his life. According to a statement which goes back to Ibn al-Nadji'djār's (d. 643 = 1245) Dhail Ta'rikh Baghdād (see Flügel's edition, p. xii., note 2), he died in 385, according to another statement (see Ibn Hadjar al-'Askalānī, Lisān al-Mizān, v. 72) probably 388 (? the figure is damaged in the Haidarābād edition). Both dates are in contradiction to the fact that in the Fihrist events of 392 (p. 87, 6) and "after 400" (p. 169, 13) are mentioned, unless these are additions by another hand. A clue to the date of his birth is given from his account (p. 237, 6) of a meeting with a learned man in the year 340; this suggests 325 as the latest date for his birth. Nothing is known of his family. There is no reason to connect him with Ishāk b. Ibrāhīm al-Mawṣilī al-Nadīm (d. 235 = 849) or with Yaḥyā b. al-Nadīm, a pupil of al-Balādhuri (d. 279 = 892). His father was a bookseller (warrāk) (p. 303, 24, 318, 6, 351, 14). Whether the epithet al-Nadīm "table companion", i. e. member of the circle of a caliph or other great man, refers to the father or to a remoter ancestor is unknown. It is not impossible that it refers to the author of the Fihrist himself; against this however is the fact that he is usually quoted as Ibn al-Nadīm. That Baghdād, if not his birthplace, was at least his place of abode is evident from passages, like p. 337, 26, 349, 17 (see below) and the frequent mention of Baghdādīs among his acquaintances (p. 132, 6, 219, 25, 236, 12, 266, 2). He several times mentions a stay in Mōsul (p. 86, 12, 160, 2, 190, 2, 265, 23; cf. also p. 283, 2). We know nothing of other journeys by al-Nadīm (Dār al-Rūm, p. 349, 14 is the name of the Latin quarter in Baghdād as V. v. Rosen has shown). His teachers and authorities also point to Baghdād. He most frequently quotes the authority of the grammarian al-Sirāfi (d. 368) (all the quotations can be found in the latter's Akhbār al-Nahwīyīn al-Baṣriyīn). Personal relations are indicated by p. 56, 13 and the mention of his sons (p. 31, 23, 45, 11, 62, 23). Al-Nadīm also studied under Ibn al-Munadjjim (p. 144, 11). He gives traditions heard from Muḥammad b. Yūsuf al-Nākiṭ (p. 24, 14, 25, 8). He also gives traditions from Abu 'l-Faraj al-Isfahānī (p. 141, 17 = *Kitāb al-Aghānī*³, i. 5 sq.) and from Abu 'l-Faḥ b. al-Nahwī (p. 145, 25) celebrated for the reliability of his transcripts (p. 145, 25). He also mentions as his teacher Abū Sulaimān al-Manṭiqī (p. 241, 14) whom we know from Abū Haiyān's Muḳābaṣāt. He was friendly also with the logician Ibn al-Djarrāḥ (p. 244, 6, 245, 12) and with the Christian philosopher Ibn al-Khammār (p. 245, 12) and with Yaḥyā b. 'Adī (p. 264, 8). This circle of friends is very much in keeping with al-Nadīm's friendly nature, the breadth of his intellectual interests, his intelligent interest in other religions and his tolerance, which finds expression in Maḳāla's 5 and 9 of his work. That he was a Shī'ī and Mu'tazilī did not escape his biographers (cf. Goldziher, in Z.D.M.G., xxxvi. 278 sqq.); thus he uses khāṣṣī and ammī in the sense of Shī'ī and Sunnī respectively, calls the Sunnī traditionalists al-Hashwīya (p. 231, 12), claims many of their leaders for the Zaidiyya (p. 178, 9, 25), says that al-Shāfi'ī was a man of decidedly Shī'ī outlook (p. 209, 19) and praises al-Wākidī (p. 98, 20) as a Shī'ī. Shī'īs were numerous among his friends (p. 139, 27 and p. 154, 25) and acquaintances (p. 178, 6, 190, 2, 11, 197, 11, 198, 4). Al-Nadīm like his father was a bookseller. This is nowhere expressly stated but is evident from the whole plan of his work in which he faithfully records not only scientific literature but also the numerous diwāns of contemporary poets and the vast mass of anonymous light literature, love stories, fairy tales and books of adventure, indeed even works of a popular nature neglected alike by scholars and bibliophiles, books on good manners, cookery books, books on poison, books dealing with hunting and sport, down to collections of farces, books on magic and on prophecy, in brief everything that was on the Baghdād book market in the fourth (tenth) century. That he was a bookseller is also indicated by the frequent particulars about the size of the books dealt with (cf. especially, p. 159, 18), about copies in the hand of famous scholars, about the demand for books (p. 70, 5; 8; 77, 14; 79, 23) and about the book trade (p. 271, 5; 359, 20). He several times mentions other booksellers (p. 264, 8; 299, 4; 355, 12).

The Fihrist exists in two recensions (on the manuscripts, see Z.D.M.G., lxxxiv. 111 sqq. and the literature there given; to these may now be added a fragment in Tonk and a private manuscript in Medina). Both were made in the year 377 (987). The longer contains ten maḳālāt, of which the first six deal with the literature of Islām (1. Qurʾān, 2. grammar, 3. history etc., 4. poetry, 5. dogmatics, 6. law), while the last four deal with non-Islāmic literature (7. philosophy and "ancient sciences", 8. light literature, 9. history of religion, 10. alchemy). The shorter version contains only the four last maḳālāt of the longer one, i.e. the Arabic translations from the Greek, Syriac, Persian and Sanskrit and the other literature based on these models. It is mentioned by Ḥādjdī Khalifa (Sambul, ii. 211) under the title Fawz al-ʿUlūm. The two recensions have in common an introductory section on the various forms of writing. — A survey of the contents of the Fihrist follows the preface (see also Flügel, in Z.D.M.G., xiii. 190 sqq.). The arrangement there given is strictly adhered to in the book. The special quality of the book and its value lies in the fact that it gives the Arabic literature of the first four centuries in a bibliographical arrangement while the biographical method is the only one used in other contemporary sources. Al-Nadīm, it is true, as a rule treats of his subjects in biographical sketches but it is the list of works of the author that is the main thing. Sometimes a branch of literature is treated purely bibliographically under its various branches (e.g. the literature of Qurʾān exegesis, p. 33, 20—37, 11; also p. 87, 88, 170, 171). This arrangement was necessary with the anonymous literature, especially in the eighth maḳāla (p. 305 sqq.). A further step towards treatment from the point of view of the literary historian is found in the brief introductions and surveys (e.g. on the pre-Othmānic recensions of the Qurʾān, p. 26 sqq., on the beginnings of Arabic grammar, p. 40 sqq.). In the last four maḳālāt, such sections (e.g. on the origins of philosophy, of medicine, of alchemy, the beginning of the translated literature, the origin of the "1000 tales") are so extensive that they have the character of a regular history of literature to a much greater degree than the more bibliographical first six maḳālāt. The ninth maḳāla occupies a special position; it is a treatise on the history of religion in which the bibliographical element is not at all prominent. — The sources used by al-Nadīm are mainly of a literary nature. He prefers to use works in copies from the hand of reliable copyists. He comparatively rarely quotes personal authority. — Although a younger contemporary of al-Nadīm's, al-Wazīr al-Maghribī (d. 418 = 1027), prepared an improved edition of the work, it seems at first to have had only slight influence. The earliest author to make considerable use of the first four maḳālāt (in al-Maghribī's edition) was Yāqūt (d. 626 = 1228) (see Bergsträsser, in Z.S., ii. 185). He claims to have consulted a copy in al-Nadīm's own hand, as does the lexicographer al-Ṣaghānī, d. 650 (1252) (see Khizānat al-Adab, iii. 83 pu). Ibn al-Kifī (d. 624 = 1226) and Ibn Abī Uṣaib'a (d. 668 = 1269) copied much from the Fihrist. In later times it is only occasionally quoted, e.g. by al-Dhahabī (d. 748 = 1347) and Ibn Ḥajar al-ʿAsḳalānī (d. 852 = 1448) and lastly by Ḥādjdī Khalifa (d. 1067 = 1656) and al-Khafādī (d. 969 = 1561). — Al-Nadīm also wrote a Kitāb al-Awṣāf wa'l-Tashbihāt (Fihrist, p. 12, 2) which has not come down to us.

NADİM, AḤMAD, an Ottoman poet, born in Sambul, the son of a judge named Muḥammad Bey who had come from Merzifun. His grandfather (according to Gibb, H. O. P., iv. 30) was a military judge named Muṣṭafā. Aḥmad Rafīk mentions as his great-grandfather Kara-Čelebi-zāde [q.v.] Maḥmūd Efendi who also was a military judge. The genealogy given by Aḥmad Rafīk is however wrong because he confuses Karamānī Muḥammad Paṣha [q.v.] with Rūm Muḥammad Paṣha. The statement that Aḥmad Nadīm is descended from Djalāl al-Dīn is therefore simply the result of confusion. Little is known of his life. He was a müderriş, later on intimate terms with Aḥmad III and his grandvizier Dāmād Ibrāhīm Paṣha [q.v.]. He probably got his laḳab al-Nadīm from this friendship. Latterly he held the office of librarian in the library founded by his patron Dāmād Ibrāhīm Paṣha. On hearing of the end of Ibrāhīm Paṣha and the deposition of the sultān, Nadīm lost his life at the beginning of October 1730 (Rabīʿ I, 1143) in a horrible way; while escaping from the mob leaving the grand-vizier's palace he fell from the roof and was killed. He was buried in Ayās Paṣha in Pera beside the historian Fındıklı Silāhdār Muḥammad Agha.

Aḥmad Nadīm is regarded as one of the greatest of Ottoman poets, who is still appreciated for his pure language, free from foreign additions. Many literary historians have discussed his merits as a poet (cf. the specimens collected by Gibb, H. O. P., iv. 30 sqq.). His collected poems (Diwān; printed Būlak, n. d.; a more recent critical edition with introductions by Aḥmad Rafīk Bey and Muḥammad Fuʿad Bey appeared in 1338—1340 in Sambul; there are manuscripts of the Diwān in Europe in Munich, London and Vienna) enjoys great popularity. Nadīm translated into Turkish the history of Mūnedjdīm-bāshī Aḥmad Efendi (cf. F. Babinger, G. O. W., p. 234 sq.; cf. thereon J. A., ser. 7, xiii. 272); he was also one of the Turkish translators of 'Aini's history (cf. F. Babinger, G. O. W., p. 259 sqq.; the edict relating to this is in Aḥmad Rafīk, Hicri on ikinci asırda İstanbul hayatı, 1100—1200, Stambul 1930, p. 84 sq.) but the MS. seems to be lost.

Bibliography: Aḥmad Rafīk's preface to the new edition of the Diwān; Sidjill-i 'othmānī, iv. 549 (very superficial; here his grandfather is said to have been a certain Şadr Muşlīh al-Dīn and his father the judge Muḥammad); Brūsālī Muḥammad Fu'ād, 'Othmānī Müellifleri, ii. 453 sq.; J. von Hammer-Purgstall, G. O. D., iv. 310 sqq. (who does not appreciate him highly); Gibb, H. O. P., iv. 30 sqq.

(FRANZ BABINGER)

NĀDIR SHĀH, king of Persia (1147—1160 = 1736—1747).

Origins. Nādir b. Imām-kūli b. Nadhr-kūli belonged to the Kīrīklū clan of the Turkoman tribe of the Afshārs, of which a section had settled in northern Khurāsān, and was born on the 28th Muḥarram 1100 (Oct. 22, 1688) at Kūbkān. Entering the service of Tahmāsp II, he was called Tahmāsp-kūli Khān but after his coronation his original name was improved to Nādir, "the rare one". At an early date Nādir distinguished himself in the incessant fighting with the Turkomans of Nasā, the Čamishgazaḳ Kurds of Kha-būshān (Kūcān), the Ōzbeks, the Tatars of Marw and even against his Afshār fellow tribesmen. The little nucleus around Nādir consisted of his Afshār relatives, some Kurds of Daragaz and Abīward, and 300—400 families of Djalāyir Turkomans with their chief Tahmāsp-kūli Wakil.

Fighting in Khurāsān. During the Afghān invasion of Persia, Mashhad was occupied by Malik Maḥmūd, a scion of the Sistān family. Nādir fought against Malik Maḥmūd at first on his own initiative. When the Šafawid Tahmāsp II, driven from his other lands, arrived in Khurāsān, Nādir very cleverly supplanted the commander-in-chief Fath 'Alī Khān Kādjār and on 16th Rabi' II (Dec. 22) captured Mashhad with the help of treachery. Henceforth it became his headquarters. There were already signs of a breach between Nādir and Tahmāsp II at this time.

The Shāh urged Nādir to set out against his enemies the Ghilzā'i Afghāns but Nādir wished first of all to dispose of the nearer enemy, the Abdālī Afghāns of Herāt, but the campaigns of 1728 (against the Abdālī and the Turkomans) had no success. Nādir however was able to extend the sphere of his activities; he ousted from Astarābād and Māzandarān the governors appointed by Tahmāsp and came into conflict with the Russians and the Ghilzā'i Afghāns.

The Abdālī. In the meanwhile trouble had broken out in Herāt between Allāh-yār Khān and Dhu 'l-Fiḳār Khān. Nādir re-established Allāh-yār Khān but transplanted many tribes to Khurāsān (1141 = 1727).

The Ghilzā'i. At this time Ashraf Ghilzā'i laid siege to Simnān while his general Saydāl had gone to Bistām. On the 6th Rabi' I (Nov. 27, 1729), Nādir defeated the Afghāns on the banks of the river Mihmāndūst. This victory he followed up by others.

Nādir in S. W. Persia. Tahmāsp appealed to Nādir to complete the deliverance of the country. Leaving Shirāz and crossing Luristān, Nādir arrived in Burūdjird where the Shāh sent him a crown set with precious stones and a commission ('ahd-nāma) as wālī of all Khurāsān along with Māzandarān, Yazd, Kirmān and Sistān (cf. also 'Alī Ḥazīn, p. 189). Tahmāsp also gave his sister Gawhar-šād to Nādir and betrothed his other sister Fāṭima-sultān to Riḍā-kūli Mirzā.

The Ottomans who then occupied the whole of western Persia and the greater part of Transcaucasia were reluctant to leave Persia. Nādir occupied Nihāwand, defeated the Turks at Malāyir, retook Hamadān and on the 27th Muḥarram 1143 (Aug. 13, 1730) Tabriz was retaken.

Nādir returns to the east. Nādir learned in Tabriz that Dhu 'l-Fiḳār Abdālī having driven Allāh-yār Khān from Herāt was fighting Nādir's brother Ibrāhīm Khān under the walls of Mashhad. Nādir at once set out for Khurāsān, crossing the steppe of the Yomut Turkomans and towards the end of Rabi' II (Nov. 1730) was at Mashhad where he reviewed 56,000 families of the tribes transplanted from other provinces.

On the 4th Shawwāl (April 12, 1731) Nādir was 3 farsakhs from Herāt. In the month of August the Abdālī restored Nādir's candidate Allāh-yār Khān but the latter regaining contact with his tribe now rebelled. It was not till Ramaḍān 1, 1144 (Feb. 27, 1732) that Herāt was taken.

Failure of Tahmāsp II. Taking advantage of the absence of his commander-in-chief, the Shāh resumed the initiative in the military operations and in Djumādā II 1143 (end of Dec. 1730) set out against the Ottomans. Fearing the return of Nādir the Ottomans on Jan. 10, 1732 signed a preliminary treaty at Baghdad by which the Persians retained only the lands south of the Araxes. Later on Jan. 21—Feb. 1, 1732 the Shāh's representatives signed at Rasht a treaty with the Russians by which the latter bound themselves to evacuate the lands south of Sāliyān (on the Kur) while the return of Bākū and Darband was made dependent on the reconquest of Transcaucasia by the Persians.

Deposition of Tahmāsp II. Nādir was indignant at the peace with the Turks signed after a defeat. Setting aside the Shāh's authority, Nādir Shāh denounced the treaty and appointed his own governors everywhere. Tahmāsp was deported to Khurāsān and his son 'Abbās III, an infant in the cradle, proclaimed king on the 17th Rabi' I 1145 (July 7, 1732).

First campaign against the Ottomans. Having punished the Bakhtiyāris and the Kurds, Nādir occupied Zohāb and besieged Baghdad (Jan. 1733). Aḥmad Pāshā made the negotiations drag on until the army commanded by Topal 'Othmān Pāshā had time to come to Mesopotamia. On 6th Šafar 1146 (July 19, 1733) Nādir Shāh lost the battle fought on the Tigris and returned to Hamadān via Bahrīz and Mandaldjīn (Mandalī).

Arriving there on 22nd Šafar (Aug. 4) Nādir set out again for Zohāb on the 22nd Rabi' II (Oct. 2) and then attacked Memiş Pāshā who had occupied the pass of Agh-darband (1st Djumādā II = Nov. 9, 1733). Then Topal 'Othmān Pāshā with the bulk of his army intervened in the battle but lost it and had his head cut off. The Ottomans hastened to abandon Aḥdarbājdjān. By the 15th Radjab (Dec. 22) Nādir was already on his way to Persia via Baghsāy (Bā-kusāyē), Bayāt, Bayān and Shūshār.

Maḥmūd Balūč. The reason of this hurried move was the rebellion raised by Maḥmūd Khān Balūč in S. W. Persia. Maḥmūd Khān was quickly driven from the pass of Shulistān and on 27th Shābān (Feb. 1, 1734) Nādir reoccupied Shīrāz.

Campaign in Transcaucasia. In Iṣfahān Nādir received the Turkish ambassador ʿAbd al-Karīm Efendi and informed him that the retrocession of Transcaucasia was a sine qua non of peace. On the other hand, prince S. D. Golitsine was received at Iṣfahān on May 20–31, 1734 and thereafter by Nādir's order accompanied him everywhere (his itinerary in Lerch-Schneise). On the 12th Muḥarram 1147 (June 17, 1734) Nādir left Iṣfahān for Ādhar-bāidjān and as the Turks did not reply, Nādir began by attacking the Daghestān chief [Ghāzī-Kūmūk] Surkhāy whom the Porte had appointed governor of Shīrwan. Tahmāsp Quli Djalāyir defeated the Daghestānians near Dāwā-batan (in the district of Kābala) while Nādir to cut off the retreat penetrated into the heart of the extremely difficult region of Ghāzī-Kūmūk. In spite of the exploits of the Abdālī the success gained in Daghestān was only partial for Surkhāy had escaped to the north.

On 6th Djumādā II (Nov. 3, 1734) Nādir was before the walls of Gandja, which was defended by ʿAlī Pāshā. The siege necessitated considerable works and prince Golitsine procured Russian engineers for Nādir. On March 21, 1735 a treaty was signed at Gandja by which Russia and Persia became practically allies.

On 1st Muḥarram 1148 (May 26, 1735) Nādir went first to Kars but the encounter with ʿAbd Allāh Pāshā Köprülü-zāde took place near Eriwān on the plain of Baghāward; on 26th Muḥarram (June 18, 1735) the Ottomans were defeated. Gandja thereupon capitulated on the 17th Ṣafar (July 8) and Tiflis on 22nd Rabīʿ I (Aug. 13).

Nādir returns to Daghestān. Via Tiflis [q. v.], from which 6,000 families were transferred to Khurāsān, Nādir attacked the Lezgī of Djār and Tala (north of the Alazan). The Khān of the Crimea Kaplan Girāy, who had in the meanwhile advanced as far as Darband and had placed his nominees everywhere, withdrew to the Crimea and Nādir endeavoured to pacify Daghestān but Surkhāy still evaded capture.

Nādir proclaimed king. On 13th Ramaḍān (Jan. 27, 1736) Nādir came to Mughān [q. v.] where in the meanwhile the governors and notables of the province had assembled. It was explained to them that Nādir, having liberated Persia, wished to retire to Khurāsān and that the delegates were free to put the government in the hands of Tahmāsp II or ʿAbbās III "who were alive". Nādir finally accepted the crown but on condition that the Persians abandoned the Shīʿa practices introduced by Ismāʿīl I which were "contrary to the beliefs of Nādir's ancestors". The Persians were to form a fifth orthodox madhhab, placed under the patronage of the Imām Djaʿfar Ṣādiq. A document to this effect was sealed by the assembly. The five clauses of the treaty to be proposed to Turkey were next drawn up: 1. the Turks were to recognise the new Djaʿfarī rite; 2. the latter was to be given a place of prayer (rukṇ) at Mecca; 3. Persia was to send an amīr al-ḥadjj every year through Syria; 4. prisoners should be exchanged and 5. ambassadors were to be exchanged after mutual approval of the appointments. The formal coronation of Nādir took place on Thursday, 24th Shawwāl 1148.

Kandahār. This principality in which Husain Khān, brother of Maḥmūd, still asserted himself remained the only black spot on the horizon. Leaving Iṣfahān on 2nd Shawwāl (Feb. 3, 1737), Nādir was before Kandahār before Nawrūz 1149 (March 1737) and had a new town built on the site of his camp (Surkha-Shīr) which was called Nādirābād.

Kandahār capitulated on the 2nd Dhu 'l-Kaʿda 1150 (March 23, 1738). The citadel was dismantled.

Expedition into India. So far Nādir's military expeditions had been dictated by a desire to reestablish the old frontiers of the Ṣafawid empire. The expedition to India was provoked solely by the attraction of ill-guarded provinces and by the desire to replenish the treasury exhausted by repeated campaigns. Ghazni was occupied on the 22nd Ṣafar 1151 (June 11, 1738), Kābul on 12th Rabīʿ I (June 30), Djalālābād on 8th Djumādā II (Sept. 17). From the neighbourhood of the latter town, the prince Riḍā-Quli was sent back to Persia to act as regent; he and his brother Naṣr Allāh were given crowns.

Going via Sarṭōba Nādir avoided the Khaibar Pass and took prisoner Naṣir-Khān, governor of Peshāwar. On 15th Ramaḍān (Dec. 27) Nādir left this town. He next took Lahore and reappointed the local governor Zakariyā-Khān (a Khurāsānian). (Naṣir-Khān also was restored to his post). Leaving Lahore on 26th Shawwāl (Feb. 6, 1739) Nādir learned that Muḥammad Shāh had reached Karnāl and was in a place between the jungle and the river. He succeeded in cutting Muḥammad Shāh off from his capital and hastened to attack the reinforcements which Saʿadat-Khān (a Khurāsānian) was bringing from the province of Oudh. Thus began the decisive battle of 15th Dhu 'l-Kaʿda 1151 (Feb. 24, 1739) in which the commander-in-chief Khān Dawrān was mortally wounded and Saʿadat-Khān captured. Nādir and Muḥammad Shāh entered the capital where Nādir's name was inserted in the khutba and coins struck in his name. On the 15th Dhu 'l-Hidjdja (March 26, 1739) a rumour spread that Nādir had been assassinated and the populace massacred 3,000–7,000 of his soldiers. Next morning Nādir went to the mosque and gave the signal for the massacre of the inhabitants. On 26th Dhu 'l-Hidjdja (April 6) Naṣr Allāh Mirzā was married to a Mughal princess. On 3rd Ṣafar 1152 (May 12, 1739) a great council was held in Dihlī in the course of which Nādir replaced the crown on the head of Muḥammad Shāh but the latter had in return to cede to Nādir all the provinces north of the Indus. The amount levied by Nādir cannot be estimated. According to Ānandrām, who was attached to the vizier's office, it amounted to 6,000,000 rupees in specie and 500,000,000 in jewels and precious stones, including the Kōh-i Nūr diamond and the Peacock throne. Large sums were distributed among the soldiers and the people of Persia exempted from taxation for three years.

Nādir left Dihlī and reached Kābul on 1st Ramaḍān (Dec. 12). Now took place one of the most remarkable of his expeditions. He suddenly turned back to reduce the lord of Sind Khudā-yār Khān ʿAbbāsī (a native of Siwī, cf. Malcolm, op. cit., ii. 88) and going via Bangash, Lārkāna and Shahdādpūr penetrated into the desert south of the Indus and took Khudā-yār prisoner; he had shut himself up in 'Umarkot (north of Thar and Parkar in the province of Bombay). Having organised his Indian possessions in three provinces Nādir returned to Nādir-abād (via Siwī and Shāl) on 7th Šafar (May 5, 1740).

Nādir in Turkeṣtān. Nādir returned to Herāt on 10th Rabī' I (June 5) and after a fortnight devoted to festivities set out for Balkh which he reached on 7th Djumādā I (July 31). Arriving before Bukhārā on 19th Djumādā II (Sept. 22), Nādir treated Khān Abu 'l-Faiḍ kindly and renewed his investiture by crowning him with his own hands. The Oxus was proclaimed the frontier and the Khān had to supply Nādir with 20,000 Özbegs and Turkomans, which indirectly left in the hands of the conqueror the control of the internal affairs of Bukhārā.

On the 16th Radjab (Oct. 7), Nādir had set out for Khwārizm. The fleet followed the army. The Khān II-Bars of Hazārasp retired to his fortress of Khanqah which surrendered on 24th Sha'bān after bombardment. Finally Kīhiwa, the capital of the kingdom, also capitulated. By 4th Shawwāl (Dec. 23) Nādir had returned to Čardjūy and entered Mashhad at the end of Shawwāl.

Nādir sets out again for Transcaucasia. While in India, Nādir had learned of the death of his brother Ibrāhīm Khān who had been killed by the Lazgī rebels of Džār and Tala. To punish them, Nādir left Mashhad and on his way learned that the Abdālī troops who had been sent in advance had already ravaged Džār, Djawukh (?) and Akzibir, but the pacification of Daghestān was by no means complete.

An incident that followed marks the turning-point in the career of Nādir Shāh. On the 28th Šafar (May 15, 1741) near Kal'a-yi Awlād (Māzandarān) an unknown man concealed in the brush wood shot at Nādir, wounding him slightly. Connecting this with events in Daghestān Mahdī Khān says that the crime was committed by a slave of the son of Dilāwar Khān Tāimani [q. v.] but suspicion very soon turned upon the prince Riḍā-Kūli who had besides not behaved well during his regency. He was sent for the time to Tihrān while Nādir continued his march via Kaḏwīn, Kaḏjadagh, Barda' and Kaḏala.

In June 1741, for the third time, Nādir entered Daghestān and remained there a year and a half. The shamkhāl of Tarkhū, the usmi of the Kara-Kaytak and Surkhāy Khān of the Ghāzi Kumūk came over to Nādir but new difficulties kept cropping up. Relations with Russia became somewhat strained for the Russian representatives suspected Nādir of designs on the northern Caucasus. As a precaution the Russians in May 1742 concentrated 42,000 men at Kizlar (s. Butbow, i. 220). Cares were undermining the health and character of Nādir. At the beginning of Dec. 1742 when the camp was at Baṣlu the heir to the throne Riḍā-Kūli, denounced by the author of the attempt on Nādir in Māzandarān, was blinded after a form of trial. Nādir himself was thoroughly upset by this incident. Rebellion was now threatening everywhere (in Khwārizm and in Balkh).

Third campaign against the Turks. In Dhu 'l-Kāda I 1742, the Turkish ambassador brought from Constantinople a letter from the Sulṭān refusing to recognise the fifth madhhab. Nādir then reminded the Sulṭān that the whole of Persian territory had not been regained from Turkey and added that he soon would take the field to make his own terms.

Nādir left Daghestān on the 16th Dhu 'l-Hidjja (Feb. 7, 1742) and came to Kirkūk (14th Djumādā II = Aug. 5, 1742) which capitulated as did Irbil. On the 26th Radjab (Oct. 5) Nādir arrived near Mawṣil but the siege of this fortress was unsuccessful and on 2nd Ramaḍān (Oct. 20) he retreated to Kirkūk and Khanāqīn. Friendly relations were established with Aḥmad Paṣha of Baghdād. Nādir with his wives made the pilgrimage to the Shī'ī and Sunnī sanctuaries of Mesopotamia and on the 24th Shawwāl 1156 (Dec. 12, 1743) summoned a great assembly of ecclesiastics at Nadjaf. The document drawn up by Mahdī Khān summing up the discussions confirmed the renunciation by the Persians of the "heresy of Shāh Ismā'īl", while the 'ulamā' of Mesopotamia and Transcaucasia recognised the claims of Dja'far al-Šaḍīq and declared the special features (furū'āt) of the Persian beliefs compatible with Islām. The Sunnī theologian 'Abd Allāh b. Ḥusain al-Suwaīdī, Kitāb al-Hudjjaḍi al-kaḍ'iya li'ttifāk al-Firaq al-Islāmiya, Cairo 1324, also gives a very interesting summary of this dispute; cf. Ritter, Isl., xv., 1926, i. 106 and the detailed account by Prof. A. E. Schmidt, Istoriia sunnitsko-shiitskikh otnosheniy in the Ikḍ al-Djumān (Barthold Festschrift, Tashkent 1927, p. 69-107).

Rebellions. The strange abandonment of the campaign in Mesopotamia is to be explained by the new risings in the east. Much more important was the rising in Fārs led by the beglerbegi Taqī Khān, a great favourite of Nādir. He was ultimately captured and castrated. In Astarabād the Kādjārs rose against the oppression of the governor's son (Hanway, Hist. Account, i. 192). Nādir had to send his nephew 'Alī Kūli to Khwārizm. Finally the Ottomans of Kaḏs disseminated in Ādharbāidjān letters from the new pretender Šafī Mirzā (Muḥammad 'Alī Rafsindjānī) and then refused to begin an exchange of prisoners.

Fourth Campaign against the Turks. In the meanwhile the Porte equipped a new army (150,000 horse and 40,000 janissaries) which advanced on Erzerum and Kaḏs under the command of the former vizier Yegen Muḥammad Pāshā while 'Abd Allāh Pāshā Djebedji's army went via Diyārbakr and Mawṣil. On the 21st Radjab (Aug. 20) came the news of the victory won by Naṣr Allāh Mirzā over 'Abd Allāh Pāshā's army (near Mawṣil) and at the same time Yegen Muḥammad Pāshā died leaving his army in complete disorder. Nādir again won a brilliant victory (on the very scene of his first victory in 1735) but then, quite unexpectedly, wrote to the Sulṭān saying he was abandoning the first two clauses of Muḡhān. Personal fatigue may explain why Nādir could not exploit his success.

On Sept. 4, 1746, peace was signed with the Turkish envoys and on 10th Muḥarram 1160 (Jan. 22, 1747) the Shāh's representatives (Muṣṭafā Khān Shāmlu and the historian Mahdī Khān) set out for Constantinople with the ṣulḥ-nāma. Nādir renounced his famous religious clauses in favour of the Sulṭān, "the Khālifa of the people of Islām and the glory of the Turkoman race". By the treaty the frontier was restored to that of the time of Murād IV [cf. TABRIZ] but in a platonic fashion, Nādir expressed the wish to receive one of the provinces which had belonged to the "Turkoman Sultāns".

On the 10th Muḥarram, Nādir left for Kirmān marking his route by piles of skulls erected everywhere. After the Nawrūz, Nādir returned to Mashhad and devoted himself to "spilling the blood of the innocents". His conduct was now clearly abnormal. In an epilogue to his history written after the death of Nādir, Mahdī Khān records the denunciations, executions and extortions carried out by the agents of the treasury and the ruin of the country, which had however begun before the Indian expedition (Otter, Résidents russes, Hanway, i. 230). The Shī'ī opposition must also have been intensified in view of the frankly Sunni turn which Nādir's "Khurāsānī" policy had taken.

The rising in Sīstān, which brought matters at a head was provoked by the activities of the tax collectors who were demanding a contribution of 300,000 tumāns from the province. 'Alī Qulī Mirzā, nephew of Nādir, put himself at the head of the rebels. Even Tahmāsp Qulī Khān Djalāyir, the most faithful prop of the throne, wanted to proclaim one of Nādir's sons as king. The troubles spread to Khurāsān and the Kurds of Khabu-shān raided the royal stables at Rādkān. Nādir marched on them but on the eve of 11th Djumādā II 1160 (June 20, 1147) he was assassinated in his camp near Fathābād by the Kādjar and Afshār chiefs in conspiracy with the bodyguard. Father Bazin was a witness of the disorder which broke out in the camp after the assassination. On the 27th Djumādā II (July 5, 1752) 'Alī Qulī Mirzā came from Herāt and was proclaimed king. All the royal princes were massacred.

The treasure amassed by Nādir was soon scattered to the winds; the country, utterly exhausted, was in the throes of crisis. Nādir's attempts to compose religious difficulties had failed completely, but Persian territory and its periphery were cleared of enemies. But for Nādir Shāh, Persia would probably not exist, even in its present bounds.

A thesis on Nādir for a doctorate of London is in preparation by I. Lockhart. Cf. also R. Stuart Poole, The Coins of the Shahs of Persia, Brit. The career of Nādir Shāh impressed the imaginations of the peoples whom he conquered. In addition to Indian and Persian panegyrics there is a poem in the Gurānī dialect (spoken in Kurdistān): on Nādir Shāh and Topal 'Othmān Pāshā and a Daghestānian song collected in the district of Ghunib: on the highlanders' fight against Nādir (cf. Daghestanskii sbornik, Makhač-Kal'a, 1927, iii. p. 51—53). In Europe of the xviiith century it was seriously discussed whether Nādir Shāh was a European adventurer: there are also several contemporary works in French, German and Portuguese, the subjects of which are the deeds real or imaginary of Nādir Shāh like L'espion de Thamas Kouli kan dans les cours de l'Europe by the Abbé Rochebrun, Cologne 1746 etc. (V. MINORSKY).

NADIR (NAZĪR AL-SAMT or AL-NAZĪR naṭ' ἐξοχήν), the bottom, the pole of the horizon (invisible) under the observer in the direction of the vertical, also the deepest (lowest) point in the sphere of heaven. The nadir is the opposite pole to the zenith [q. v.].

The word naẓir (from naẓara, "to see", "to observe") originally (and generally) means the point diametrically opposite a point on the circumference of a circle or the surface of a sphere; we find muḳābal as a synonym of naḍīr in this general meaning [cf. also MUḲĀBALA].

(WILLY HARTNER)

NADĪR (BANU 'L-'), one of the two main Jewish tribes of Madīna, settled in Yathrib from Palestine at an unknown date, as a consequence of Roman pressure after the Jewish wars. Al-Ya'qūbī (ii. 49) says they were a section of the Djudhām Arabs, converted to Judaism and first settled on Mount al-Naḍīr, whence their name; according to the Sira Ḥalabiya (Cairo, iii. 2) they were a truly Jewish tribe, connected with the Jews of Khaibar. This seems the more probable, but a certain admixture of Arab blood is possible; like the other Jews of Madina they bore Arabic names, but kept aloof from the Arabs, spoke a peculiar dialect, and had enriched themselves with agriculture, money-lending, business in armour and jewels.

They were clients of the Aws, siding with them in their conflicts with the Khazraǧ, and entering with them into the compact with Muḥammad known as the Constitution of Madina in 1 A.H. Their most important chief at this time was Ḥuyayy b. Akḥṭab, whose daughter Ṣaḥīya became Muḥammad's wife in 7 A.H. For a list of Muḥammad's worst enemies among the Banu 'l-Naḍīr see Ibn Hishām, Sira, p. 351—352.

Their fortresses were half a day's march from Madina, and they owned land in Wādī Buḥān and Buwaira; their dwelling places were south of the city.

The Banu 'l-Naḍīr seem to have been in (commercial?) relations with Abū Sufyān before the battle of Uhud. In 4 A.H., in Rabi' I, owing to difficulties about the Banu 'l-Naḍīr's contribution to certain blood-money which was being collected from the whole Muslim community in Madina, Muḥammad, who had personally negotiated the matter with their chiefs, became convinced of their enmity towards himself and suspected them of intending to kill him. He decided to get rid of such dangerous neighbours, and ordered them through Muḥammad b. Maslama al-Awsī to leave the city within ten days, under penalty of death, allowing them to take with them all their movable goods, and to return each year to gather the produce of their palm-groves.

The tribe, having no hope of help from the Aws, agreed to leave, but 'Abd Allāh b. Ubayy al-Khazraǧī, chief of the munāfiqūn, persuaded them to resist in their fortresses, promising to send 2,000 men to their aid. Ḥuyayy b. Akḥṭab, hoping the Banū Ḳuraiza would also help them, prepared to resist, in the face of opposition from moderate elements in the tribe.

The siege lasted about a fortnight, help from the munāfiqūn was not forthcoming, and when the Muslims began to cut down their palms the Banu 'l-Naḍīr surrendered. Muḥammad's conditions were much harder than formerly; their immovable property was forfeited, and nothing left them but what they could take away on camels, arms alone excepted. After two days' bargaining the tribe departed with a caravan of 600 camels; some went to Syria, others to Khaibar.

The Banu 'l-Nadīr's booty Muḥammad did not divide in the usual manner; the land was distributed among the muḥāǧirūn, so as to relieve the Anṣār of their maintenance; part of it the Prophet kept for himself.

Sūrat al-Ḥaṣr (lix.) was revealed upon the expulsion of the Banu 'l-Naḍīr.

From Khaibar the exiles planned with the Ḳuraish the siege of Madina in Dhū 'l-Ḳa'da 5 A.H. The treasure of the Banu 'l-Naḍīr was captured by Muḥammad in Khaibar in 7 A.H.

AL-NADJAF (MASHHAD 'ALĪ), a town and place of pilgrimage in the 'Irāq 6 miles west of al-Kūfa. It lies on the edge of the desert on a flat barren eminence from which the name al-Nadjaḥ has been transferred to it (A. Musil, The Middle Euphrates, p. 35).

According to the usual tradition, the Imām al-Mu'minīn 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib [q.v.] was buried near Kūfa, not far from the dam which protected the city from flooding by the Euphrates at the place where the town of al-Nadjaḥ later arose (Yāqūt, Muḍjam, ed. Wüstenfeld, iv. 760), also called Nadjaḥ al-Kūfa (Zamakhshari, Lexicon geographicum, ed. Salverda de Grave, p. 153). Under Umayyad rule the site of the grave near al-Kūfa had to be concealed. As a result it was later sought in different places, by many in al-Kūfa itself in a corner above the ḡibla of the mosque, by others again 2 farsakhs from al-Kūfa (al-Iṣṭakhrī, ed. de Goeje, B. G. A., i. 82 sq.; Ibn Ḥawqāl, ibid., ii. 163). According to a third story, 'Alī was buried in al-Madīna near Fāṭima's grave (al-Mas'ūdi, Murūǧ al-Dhahab, ed. Barbier de Meynard, viii. 289), according to a fourth, at Ḳaṣr al-Imāra (Caetani, Annali dell' Islam, x., 1926, p. 967 sq., A.H. 40, § 99). Perhaps then the sanctuary of al-Nadjaḥ is not the real burial-place but a tomb held in reverence in the pre-Islāmic period, especially as the graves of Adam and Noah were also shown there (Ibn Baṭṭūta, Tuhfa, ed. Defrémery and Sanguinetti, i. 416; G. Jacob in A. Nöldeke, Das Heiligtum al-Husains zu Kerbelā, Berlin 1909, p. 38, note 1). It was not till the time of the Ḥamdānid of al-Mawṣil Abū 'l-Haidǧā [see 'ABD ALLĀH B. ḤAMDĀN] that a large ḡubba was built by him over 'Alī's grave, adorned with precious carpets and curtains and a citadel built there (Ibn Ḥawqāl, op. cit., p. 163). The Shī'ī Būyid 'Aḍud al-Dawla [q.v.] in 369 (979—980) built a mausoleum, which was still in existence in the time of Ḥamd Allāh Mustawfī, and was buried there, as were his sons Sharaf and Bahā' al-Dawla. Al-Nadjaḥ was already a small town with a circumference of 2,500 paces (Ibn al-Aṭhīr, ed. Tornberg, viii. 518; Ḥamd Allāh Mustawfī, Nuzhat al-Ḳulūb, ed. Le Strange, p. 32: in the year 366 = 976—977). Ḥasan b. al-Faḍl, who died about 414 (1023—24) built the defensive walls of Mashhad 'Alī (Ibn al-Aṭhīr, ix. 154). The Mashhad was burned in 443 (1051—1052) by the fanatical populace of Baghdād but must have been soon rebuilt. The Saldjūq sultān Malikshāh and his vizier Nizām al-Mulk who were in Baghdād in 479 (1086—1087) visited the sanctuaries of 'Alī and Ḥusain (Ibn al-Aṭhīr, x. 103). The Ilkhān Ghāzān (1295—1304), according to Ḥamd Allāh Mustawfī, built in al-Nadjaf a Dār al-Siyāda and a dervish monastery (khanqāh). The Mongol governor of Baghdad in 1263 led a canal from the Euphrates to al-Nadjaf but it soon became silted up and was only cleared out again in 1508 by order of Shāh Ismā'īl. This canal was originally called Nahr al-Shāh (now al-Kenā') (Lughat al-ʿArab, Baghdad, ii., 1930—1931, p. 458). This Shīʿī Safawid himself made a pilgrimage to the maṣḥadān of Kerbelā' and al-Nadjaf. Sulaimān the Magnificent visited the holy places in 941 (1534—1535). A new canal made in 1793 also soon became silted up, as did the Zeri al-Shaikḥ and al-Ḥaidariya canals, the latter of which was made by order of ʿAbd al-Ḥamid II. In 1912 iron pipes were laid to bring water from the Euphrates to al-Nadjaf (Lughat al-ʿArab, ii. 458 sq., 491). A considerable part of the ʿIrāk with Baghdad, al-Nadjaf and Kerbelā' was temporarily conquered by the Persians in 1623.

According to the Arab geographers, al-Ḥira lay on the eminence of al-Nadjaf (al-Yaʿqūbī, Kitāb al-Buldān, ed. de Goeje, B. G. A., vii. 309). Massignon thinks (M. I. F. A. O., xxviii. 28, note 1) that al-Ḥira lay on the site of the present al-Nadjaf, while Musil (The Middle Euphrates, p. 35, note 26) places the centre of the ruins of al-Ḥira S. E. of the tell of al-Knēdre which lies halfway between al-Kūfa and al-Khawarnaq. Ibn Baṭṭūṭa entered Maṣḥad ʿAlī which he visited in 726 (1326) through the Bāb al-Ḥaḍra gate which led straight to the Maṣḥad. He describes the town and sanctuary very fully. According to al-Yaʿqūbī (loc. cit.), the ridge on which al-Nadjaf stands once formed the shore of the sea which in ancient times came up to here. For the number of its inhabitants and its architectural beauty, Ibn Baṭṭūṭa reckoned the town among the most important in the ʿIrāk. It has now about 20,000 inhabitants (Persians and Arabs), has a Shīʿī college and celebrated cemetery in the Wādī al-Salām. Near al-Nadjaf were the monasteries of Dair Mār Fāṭhiyūn (Yāqūt, Muʿdjam, ii. 693) and Dair Hind al-Kubrā' (Yāqūt, ii. 709), also al-Ruḥba (5 hours S. W. of the town; Yāqūt, ii. 762; Musil, The Middle Euphrates, p. 110, note 61) and Kaṣr Abi ʿl-Khaṣīb (Yāqūt, iv. 107). The lake of al-Nadjaf marked on many older maps has long since completely dried up (Nolde, Reise nach Innerarabien, p. 105).

BANU NADJĀḤ, a dynasty of Abyssinian Mamlūks at Zabīd [q. v.] from 412 to 553 (1022—1158). When the last Ziyādi [q. v.] had been put to death in the vizierate of the Abyssinian Mardjān by one of his Mamlūk governors Nafīs, the other Nadjāḥ came forward to avenge him. After desperate fighting, Nafīs was slain and Nadjāḥ in Dhū ʿl-Ḳaʿda 412 (Feb. 1022) entered Zabīd where he had the vizier built alive into a wall in exact revenge for the Ziyādi. As his rival Nafīs had already done, Nadjāḥ assumed the insignia of royalty, struck his own coins and inserted his own name in the khutba after that of the ʿAbbāsīd caliph. The latter found himself forced to recognise him under the title al-Muʿaiyad Naṣīr al-Dīn. His kingdom extended over al-Tihāma, while the highlands beyond remained divided up among petty chiefs. When among the latter the Ṣulāihīs [q. v.] came to considerable power, their relationships with the Banū Nadjāḥ decisively affected the history of the latter. The first Ṣulāihī ʿAlī is said to have had this first Nadjāḥ poisoned about 452 (1060) through a slave girl sent him as a present. In the confusion that followed, ʿAlī occupied Zabīd itself and Nadjāḥ's sons fled to the island of Dahlak [q. v.]. While the eldest Muʿārik committed suicide, the other two resolved to regain their lands: Saʿīd al-Aḥwal and Abu ʿl-Ṭāmi Djaīyāsh, whose lost work al-Mufīd fī Akhbār Zabīd was the foundation for ʿUmāra's work (in Kay, see Bibl.). Saʿīd made his preparations in a place of concealment in Zabīd and had Djaīyāsh come later; the two then came out openly, fell upon and killed ʿAlī al-Ṣulāihī, who was on a campaign against Mecca, probably in 473 (1081). Zabīd at once recognised Saʿīd as its lord; he had appealed less to the Sunnis against the Shīʿīs than to the racial feeling of the numerous Abyssinian soldier-slaves (anā radjūlun minkum wa ʿl-ʿizzu ʿizakum: Djaīyāsh in ʿUmāra, p. 63, 3—4). But Asmā, the widow of ʿAlī al-Ṣulāihī who was kept a prisoner in Zabīd, persuaded her son al-Mukarram to relieve the town (475 = 1082—1083). The Nadjāḥ again escaped to Dahlak. In 479 (1086) Saʿīd again returned as ruler but in 481 (1088) was put to death at the instigation of the Ṣulāihī queen al-Saiyida, the wife of al-Mukarram. Djaīyāsh escaped to India with his vizier Khalaf b. Ṭāhir, said to have been an Umayyad, returned to Zabīd disguised as an Indian, plotted with his compatriots and easily regained power in 482 (1089). With his death in 498 or 500 (1105—1106) disruption set in. He himself had had domestic difficulties. He executed the qaḍī Ibn Abī 'Akāma whose ancestor had come to the country with the first Ziyādī; his former helper Khalaf had to seek refuge in flight. A certain degree of strain in his relations with his brother Sa'īd is already evident from Djajyāsh's account and there were fierce family feuds among his descendants. His son Fātik I, the son of a girl bought in India, had to defend himself against his half-brothers Ibrāhīm and 'Abd al-Wahid and died young in 503 (1109—1110). The latter's infant son al-Manšūr was set aside by his uncles, who were quarrelling with one another, and fled to Saiyida, whose favourite al-Muzaffar b. Abi 'l-Barakāt brought him back in 504 (1110—1111) as vassal of the Ṣulaiḥis.

On account of the new ruler's minority, events repeated their course under the Ziyādīs. The Mamlūk Anīs was Manšūr's vizier and he even assumed royal honours. When he attained his majority Manšūr disposed of him by murdering him with his own hand in 517 (1123) after inviting him to the palace. Manšūr however was at once poisoned at the instigation of the next vizier Mann Allāh. In the following year, the latter defeated under the walls of Zabīd Nadjīb al-Dawla, whom the Fātimids had sent as the Ṣulaiḥī power was weakening to restore their suzerainty in the land. Mann Allāh had made the boy Fātik II nominal king, the son of Manšūr and a slave girl singer 'Alam who had been purchased from Anīs's estate. This woman (d. 545 = 1150) endeavoured with great skill to preserve the rights of her house against the encroachments of the viziers and played among the Nadjāḥ a part similar to that of Saiyida among the Ṣulaiḥī. In particular she equipped and led regular caravans of pilgrims and thus unconsciously furthered the rise of 'Alī b. Mahdī who was finally to drive her own family from power. Mann Allāh in 524 (1130) was killed in his harem through a plot of 'Alam's. His successors were the Mamlūks Ruzaiḥ and then al-Mufliḥ. Against the latter 'Alam put forward her favourites Surūr and Iḳbāl, who were however not on good terms. In their quarrels the various parties several times brought the petty Arab princes who lived around it against Zabīd. Iḳbāl had Fātik II poisoned (531 = 1137). As he had no heirs, he was followed by his cousin Fātik III b. Muḥammad b. Fātik I b. Djajyāsh. The government had been in the hands of Surūr since 529 (1135). His career of indefatigable activity was ended in a mosque in Zabīd on the 12th Raddjāb 551 (Sept. 1, 1156) by an assassin, a "Khāridjī" envoy of 'Alī b. Mahdī. When the Zaidī Imām al-Mutawakkil Aḥmad b. Sulaimān was summoned to help them by the Abyssinians, he made it a first condition that Fātik should be deposed and he himself recognised as lord of Zabīd. The troops agreed to this but the victory lay with 'Alī b. Mahdī [q.v. and the article MAHDĪ]. On 14th Raddjāb 554 (Aug. 2, 1159) he entered Zabīd.

The Banū Ziyād and the Banū Nadjāḥ continually brought over shiploads of Abyssinian slaves to recruit their troops and thus continued that mixture of races, which already existed before Islām and is still very marked in the Yaman plains. These Mamlūks however became a great danger for the Ziyādīs and also for the Nadjāḥ themselves. Djajyāsh had attempted to counteract them with a bodyguard of Turkish Oghuz [cf. GHUZZ]. But they were not suited to the climate; in particular it was impossible to establish a colony of them there permanently as their children, if they did not die, remained weaklings. The Abyssinian admixture was still further increased by the many slave-girls, who, particularly when they became mothers, exerted some political influence. The enormous harems of the notables created the most complicated family relationships. For example the settlement of the estate of the vizier Ruzaiḥ became a notoriously difficult case in the law of inheritance which occupied the ablest fuḳahā for years until finally a very aged Ḥaḍramawtī found a solution in accordance with the Sharī'a.

AL-NADJĀSHĪ, designation in Arabic of the king of Abyssinia. It is a loanword from Aethiopic ነገሥት "king, prince" etc. In Arabic it is sometimes used as a proper noun, sometimes as a nomen appellativum. The word is also genuine Arabic, but as such it has the meaning of driver of game. It does not occur in the Qur'ān. In Ḥadīth it is the designation of the king of Abyssinia, just as Qaiṣar [q.v.], Kisrā [q.v.] and al-Muḳawḳas [q.v.] are the designations of the rulers of Rūm, Fāris and Miṣr. In their totality they represent the Great Powers which in the time of Muḥammad surrounded the territory of Islām. On the fresco in the hall of the castle of Ḳuṣair 'Amra [cf. 'AMRA], dating from the middle of the viiith century A.D., al-Nadjāshī appears as the fourth of these Powers, the place of the Muḳawḳas being taken by Roderick the Visigoth.

In the Sīra the Nadjāshī occupies a place of some importance, chiefly in connection with the two hidjra's to Abyssinia, with Muḥammad's letter persuading him to embrace Islām, with his conversion from Christianity to Islām and with his equipping two ships in behalf of the return of the emigrants to Arabia, amongst whom was Umm Ḥabiba, who was to marry Muḥammad (A.H. 7).

These traditions have been critically examined by Grimme, Caetani and Mrs. Vacca. Grimme denied the historical foundation of the traditions concerning Muḥammad's letters to the Great Powers. Caetani submitted the question to an elaborate enquiry. Mrs. Vacca reduces the traditions to the following historical facts: a. the return of Dja'far b. Abī Ṭālib from Abyssinia in 7 A.H., when Muḥammad was besieging Khaybar; b. the expedition of 'Amr b. Umaiya in A.H. 6 in order to reconduct the emigrants from Abyssinia to al-Madīna; c. vague traditions concerning the emigration from Makka to Abyssinia. To these groups several episodes agglomerated, viz. to a. the story that Umm Ḥabiba, Abū Sufyān's daughter and widow of 'Ubaid Allāh b. Djahsh, was asked in marriage by Muḥammad and provided with a marriage-gift of 400 dīnārs by the Nadjāshī; to b. the story of Muḥammad's letter to the Nadjāshī, his embracing Islām and his becoming the intermediary of the conversion of 'Amr b. al-ʿĀṣ.

In Ḥadīth the Nadjāshī is also mentioned in connection with the story that his death in Ramaḍān 9 A. H. was proclaimed, without previous intimation, by Muḥammad, who held on the muṣallā [q. v.] a funeral service in behalf of this fellow Muslim. As his proper name is given Aṣḥama or Aḍḥama b. Abḥar.

The title al-Nadjāshī is also given in Arabic literature to later kings of Abyssinia, as may be seen from this article.

AL-NADJĀSHĪ, KAIS B. 'AMR AL-ḤĀRITHĪ, an Arab poet of the seventh century A. D., lived at first in Nadjran [q. v.] and quarrelled with 'Abd al-Rahmān, son of Ḥassān b. Thābit [q. v.], because the latter had addressed in song a married female relative of Nadjāshī in Medina. After an exchange of lampoons with his opponent from his native place, he met him at the annual fair at Dhū 'l-Madżaz and again in Mecca when 'Abd al-Rahmān not only proved inferior as a poet but suffered bodily injury, so that his aged father had to interfere on his behalf. Nadjāshī had a second conflict with Ibn Mukbil, the poet of the Banū 'Adjlān; he was so unbribled in his defence that the caliph 'Omar punished him with imprisonment after procuring an opinion on his verses from Ḥassān and al-Ḥuṭai'a. After 'Othmān's assassination, al-Nadjāshī appeared in Kūfa as one of 'Alī's poets, and for the latter exchanged political lampoons with Mu'āwiya's poets at the battle of Šiffin. But his disorderly life lost him the favour of 'Alī and after a drinking-bout in Ramaḍān he was given the thrashing prescribed by law and put in the pillory. After a conflict with Kūfan notables, in which he expressed his wrath at this punishment in satirical verses, he was expelled by 'Alī and went over to Mu'āwiya. He then went back to his native country Yaman and died in Laḥdj in the year 40 (669), in which year he wrote a lament on the death of Ḥasan.

MIR 'ABD AL-ʿĀL NADJĀT, a Persian poet, born about 1046 (1636—1637), the son of a Ḥusainī Saiyid Mir Muḥammad Mu'min of Isfahān. Little is known of his life. Only this much is certain, that he, like many other Persian poets of this time, worked in the offices of different Persian dignitaries. For example he was a mustawfi [q. v.] with Šadr Mirzā Ḥabīb Allāh, later occupied the same office in Astarābād and ended his career in 1126 (1714) after being for many years munshī with the Šafawid princes Shāh Sulaimān (1667—1694) and Shāh Sulṭān Ḥusain (1694—1722). He owes his fame mainly to a long poem Gul u-Kuṣhtī ("Wrestling") which he finished in 1112 (1700—1701) and which deals with the theme of the zūr-khāna [q. v.] still very popular in Persia. As the Persian athletes still form a special closed corporation they use a special language (a kind of slang) which is full of the technical terms of their art and is not intelligible to the outsider. Nadjāt used these technical terms very skilfully in his poem which makes it very difficult for laymen to understand. This produced several commentaries on his work, of which those of Ārzū, Ratan Singh Zakhmī (printed Lucknow 1258) and Gobind-rām (lith. Morādābād 1884) are the best known. Of Nadjāt's contemporaries some did not approve of his peculiar style and thought his poem degraded the poet's art with its vulgar expressions and low humour. As a matter of fact, Nadjāt's tone differs considerably from the traditional lofty style of Persian court poetry and approaches the language of the Persian middle classes; this makes his work of considerable importance for the history of the Persian language. Besides the poem, we only know of a collection of lyrics by Nadjāt of which there are manuscripts in several libraries (see below).

NADJĀTĪ BEY, properly 'Isā (Nūḥ, also given, is not certain), the first great Turkish lyric poet of the pre-classical period, one of the founders of the classical Ottoman poetry. Born in Adrianople (Amasia and Kaṣtamūni are also given), the son of a slave, obviously a Christian prisoner of war for which reason he is called 'Abd Allāh, the name given to every one, he was adopted by a well-to-do lady of Adrianople, received a good education and was trained by the poet Sā'ilī. In spite of the fact that his non-Turkish origin was generally known, he was regarded as their equal in every way by the Turks in keeping with their democratic ideas. He early came to Kaṣtamūni and there began his poetic career and soon gained a great reputation. His poems are said here and there to bear traces of the Kaṣtamūni dialect. Coming to Constantinople, he at once gained the favour of Sulṭān Mehmed II by a kaṣida on winter; in 886 (1481) he celebrated the accession of Bāyazīd II in a kaşida and was rewarded by an appointment as secretary in the Diwān. He gained such favour with the Sultān that he was appointed secretary to his eldest son 'Abd Allāh and was given the title of bey when the prince went to Karamān as governor (mütesarrif). After the prince's early death (888 = 1483) Nadjāti returned to Constantinople with an elegy on the death of the prince which showed deep emotion. After a long interval in which he wrote a great deal but was in continual need, through the influence of Mu'ayyad-Zāde [q. v.] he became nishāndji to Bāyazīd's younger son Maḥmūd when the latter went to Şārūkhān in 910 (1504). Nadjāti wrote his finest verse while on the staff of this prince; this was the happiest period of his life. Maḥmūd also died prematurely in 913 (1507) in Manissa, the capital of Şārūkhān, and Nadjāti again lost his patron. He returned with a beautiful elegy to Constantinople and finally retired from the service of the court on a modest pension. He took a house on the Wefā Maidān where many friends gathered round him, especially his pupils, the poet and tezkeredji Edirneli Sehi and the poet Şun'ī. Nadjāti died on the 25th Dhu 'l-Ḳa'da 914 (March 17, 1509). He was buried near his own house, at the monastery of Shaikh Wefā and a tombstone was put up by Sehi for him.

He left a Diwān which he had collected on the advice of Mu'ayyad-Zāde and dedicated to prince Maḥmūd. There is also attributed to him a mesnewī, which is not otherwise known, entitled Münāzara-i Gül u-Khosrew, also quoted as Laila u-Medjūn and Mihr u-Māh. Even more uncertain seems to be the existence of the mesnewī mentioned by Sehi: Gül u-Şabā. Nadjāti is also mentioned as a translator of Persian works but his pupil Sehi says nothing of this. He is said to have translated for prince Maḥmūd the Kimīyā-i S'ādet of Imām Ghazālī (the Persian version of the Arabic Ihyā') and the Djāmi' al-Hikāyāt (properly Djāwāmi' al-Hikāyāt wa-Lawāmi' al-Riwayāt) from the Persian of Djāmāl al-Dīn al-Awfi.

His Diwān which is still unprinted, gives Nadjāti a very prominent place in Ottoman literature; the Diwān was regarded as a model for all Ottoman poets. Nadjāti, whom Idrīs Bidlīs in his Hesht Bihisht calls Khosrew-i Şu'arā'-i Rūm and others Malik al-Shu'arā' and Tusi-i Rūm (= the Firdawsī of Asia Minor), was regarded as the best poet of Rūm. He does not, it is true, reach the heights that Nesimī does but he surpasses all his predecessors, of whom Aḥmad Paşa and Zāti were the greatest, in originality and creative power. Only Bākī and Fuzūlī have surpassed him. The problem to be solved by Aḥmad Paşa, Nadjāti and Zāti was to incorporate completely into Turkish the matter borrowed and translated from Persian literature, which was still felt to be foreign, to adapt Turkish to Perso-Arabic metres and to domesticate fully the Arabic and Persian vocabulary. This was a great achievement for the time. Nadjāti brought about a great change in the literature as regards outlook, feeling and language. In him the age of Sultān Bāyazīd is most clearly reflected. Although he is not to be claimed as a very great poet, he was the king of the gild of poets of his time, who started a great literary movement. Nadjāti combined a thorough knowledge of Persian with a masterly command of Turkish. In the number of his ghazels he far surpasses Bākī. His work as a poet of kaşidas was original and stimulating. He was specially celebrated for his skill in the use of the proverb.

NADJDA B. 'AMIR. [See KHARIDJITES.]

AL-NADJDJĀR, AL-ḤUSAIN B. MUḤAMMAD ABŪ 'ABD ALLĀH, a Murdji and Djabari theologian of the period of al-Ma'mūn, a pupil of Bishr al-Marisi whose views were combated by Abu 'l-Hudhail al-'Allāf and al-Nazzām. He probably lived in Bamm where he was a weaver. According to him, the divine attributes are identical with the essence and express its negative aspects. Vision of God is only possible through a divine act which transforms the eye into the heart by giving it the power of recognition. The word of God is created, accident when it is read, body when it is written. God who knows from all eternity all worldly things, wills them all, good as well as evil, faith as well as unbelief. God has a hidden essence (theory of māhiyyā); there is in him a hidden fund of grace (lutf) which would suffice to bring all the infidels back to him. Problems of the body and accidents: atom = accident; the body then consists of a conglomerate of accidents (= Dirār) which are in juxtaposition without interpenetrating one another (against the mudākhalā of al-Nazzām); momentariness of the accidents. This orientation of the problem is due to the theocentric tendencies of al-Nadjdjār. All that takes place in the world comes from the incessant and unrestrained activity of God beside whom there is neither reality nor agent. God creates the actions of man. He gives his assistance to every good action and shows his desertion of every bad one; this assistance and desertion constitute the faculty of doing which accompanies the action (al-isti'ā'a ma'a 'l-fī'l against the Mu'tazila). The activity of man consists in his appropriation of the divine will (kaşb). Man carries out one action only by one isti'ā'a: the secondary effects (al-muwalladāt) do not depend on man but on God (against the Mu'tazila theory of tawallud). Faith consists in the knowledge of God, of his apostles and his commandments and in the profession of this knowledge by the mouth. Faith consists of several qualities (khiṣāl) each of which is an act of obedience (tā'a); complete faith is the sum of all tā'āt. Faith may increase but not diminish; it can be completely lost only through unbelief. He who commits a heinous sin and dies impenitent is doomed to hell from which he will emerge however, unlike the complete infidel. Al-Nādjī denied the punishment of the tomb (adhāb al-kabr), probably as a result of his determinism. — Al-Nādjī like his master Bishr represents the reformed and modified Djahmiya. The influence of Mu'tazila theology on this school is manifest; on the other hand, the Mu'tazila itself, especially that of Baghdād, seems to have received certain quite important stimuli from his school in spite of its opposition to it. Several of al-Nādjī's doctrines are found at a later date in al-Ash'ari. — The Nādjīyā flourished in Raiy and Gurgān. It was divided into three schools: 1. the Burghūthiyya, the followers of Muḥammad b. 'Isā Burghūth; 2. the Za'farāniyya, the followers of a certain Abū 'Abd Allāh b. al-Za'farāni; 3. the Mustadrika, a reforming party which taught paradoxical doctrines on the divine word.

MU'ALLIM NĀDJĪ, properly 'ÖMER, an important Ottoman author, poet, critic and man of letters, who occupies a special and somewhat hybrid position in the history of the Turkish moderns and has given his name to a whole literary period. Born in 1266 (1850) in Constantinople, the third son of a master saddler 'Alī Agha (not Bey, as some literary historians say), he lost his father at the age of seven. The widow Fāṭime al-Zehrā, who was descended from a muhājir who had come to Constantinople from Rumelia, went to Varna to her brother, the Ḳalaydī Aḥmad Agha. The latter in spite of his limited means, made it possible for 'Ömer to be educated at the medrese and 'Ömer's elder brother Sālim gave him considerable assistance. 'Ömer devoted himself at first to calligraphy and for his lewḥas used the makhḥaṣḥ Khulūṣi. A certain Khōdjā Ḥāfiz aroused in him a fondness for poetry and he took the makhḥaṣḥ Nādjī for his poems (from a passage in the Mukḥaiyalāt of 'Aziz 'Alī Girīdī). He also tried to obtain the title of hāfiz. His training in the medrese left a permanent influence on him. It was long before he decided to put off the turban and the djūbbe. The spirit of the mollā and a certain intolerant fanaticism however never left him.

In 1284 (1867) Nādjī received an appointment as second master in the Rūshdiyye school in Varna. At an inspection the then müteṣarrif of Varna, Kurd Sa'īd Paṣha (later Foreign Minister, President of the Council of State and several times an ambassador), made the acquaintance of the intelligent young teacher. He took him into his service as secretary, when he was moved to Tulḥa just before the outbreak of the Russo-Turkish war in 1877; thence he was moved to Tirnowo and later to 'Osmān Pazarı. Nādjī accompanied the much travelled Paṣha on his moves and journeys. After a brief stay in Constantinople, he went to Yeñi Shehir Fenār (= Larissa in Thessaly) where Nādjī made the acquaintance of the poet and Mewlewī 'Awnī Bey, who had a very good knowledge of Persian. Nādjī who acted as secretary to the court and judge of investigation had here finally to lay aside the turban. When Sa'īd Paṣha set out on a nine months' tour of inspection in Asia Minor, the Euphrates and Erzerum, Nādjī again accompanied him. He recorded his impressions in the poem Shān-i Gharībān. he had abandoned himself with other congenial wits to a life of dissipation at Tawḥ Pazarı, both earlier and after his return to Constantinople. The transfer of the Paṣha as wālī of the Aegean islands to Chios, where Nādjī acted as mimeliyā saved him from this. Here he was able fully to develop his literary leanings. Already in 1292 he had published poems and articles in Varna in the Tuna newspaper of which some were even reprinted by the Constantinople paper Baṣiret, such as his Bir Mu'allimīn Shāgirdanına Kḥitāb. From Chios he began his association with Aḥmad Midḥat Efendi who was then editing the Terdjümān-i Haḳīkat; from his contributions in poetry and prose, which appeared in the Terdjümān over the pseudonym Aḥmad Mas'ūd and Mas'ūd-i Ḳharābātī, a close friendship arose which proved of decisive influence on his future career. When Sa'īd Paṣha went as ambassador to Berlin, Nādjī declined to go with him, which was much to be regretted in the interests of his literary development. He therefore resigned his post in the Foreign Ministry and devoted himself entirely to authorship. Midḥat gave him the editorship of the newly formed literary section of his paper. At the suggestion of Midḥat, whose son-in-law he had become, he learned French although he was now over 30. When he left the Terdjümān for literary reasons, he undertook the editorship of the Sa'ādet newspaper.

By his great literary and critical activity, he gained an influence which can hardly be estimated high enough on the intellectual life of Turkey in his time, not least through his position as lecturer on Turkish literature at the Mekteb-i Sultānī in Galata Serai and in the law school. He became celebrated under the name Mu'allim (teacher) of which he was particularly proud. In 1307 (1889) he was appointed by imperial irāde Turkish historiographer, Ta'riḫ-nüwīs-i 'Alī 'Osmān, as a reward for his historical poem Ertoḡhrul Ghāzī. But he did not live to do anything serious in this field except an introduction which survives in MS. He died on 27th Ramaḍān 1310 (April 14, 1893), at the age of 43 from heart failure and was buried in the garden of the türbe of Sultān Mahmūd.

As a literary figure, Nādjī revealed two aspects. On the one hand, he was a fanatical admirer of the old literature out of which he had developed and for which he endeavoured to revive the taste of his milieu by every means, by his modest poetic talent and considerable skill in versification; on the other hand, he seemed in sympathy with the moderns but in view of his convinced belief in the decadence of western culture he had little real understanding of them.

Nādjī's services to Turkish prose are undeniable. Over 50 years ago he was already writing the prose of the future, a model, clear, simple, style in the language of a master who could not be surpassed. Two years before Sezāyî's celebrated Kütük Şailler (1309) with its complicated prose, Nâdjî gave a classic specimen of simple prose, in his Ömerîîñ Cödjuklughu (1307) which was only properly appreciated and imitated at a much later date. In it we find the first suggestions of Turkish realism.

The forms not cultivated by the old writers, the story and the drama, he did not, it is true, entirely omit, but apart from autobiographical sketches and a translation from Zola, he wrote no stories and he was a failure as a dramatist. In theory, it seemed sufficient to him and his followers to put French stories of crime into the orta oyunu form in order to produce regular Turkish "dramas". Here also he approximated to the moderns but did not reach their level or ability.

As a poet and artist he is weak. He lacks fervour and creative fancy. He lacks that depth of feeling which carries one away; with him everything is trivial and superficial, and he never feels or expresses anything deeply. His prose style is simple and easy, the sentences short, the mode of expression concise and clear.

His main importance lies in his wide influence as a teacher, which he exercised not so much in the actual class-room as through his whole literary activity.

As a critic he confines himself to externals and goes no further.

Nâdjî's prolific versatility is best shown by a list of his works. He wrote on many subjects and frequently lacked the time for adequate preparation.

Of his poetical works, the most celebrated is the collection Atesh-pâre (1300, 2nd edition 1303), which contains 52 poems in the new western manner. The best in it are: Tewhîd, Kebûter, Kuzu, Shâm-i Gharibân, Nisibin djiwârinde bir Wâdi, Tesarriû, Sedjîdâde, Awjî. — Next come two collections of ghazels in the old style: Şerâre, 1301 and Fürûzân; then three historical poems: Hamîyet yakhod Musâ b. Ebi 'l-Ghazân, a description of heroic deeds in Granada in the time of the last king Abû 'Abd Allâh al-Şaghîr; Zât al-Niṣṣâḩain, the heroic conduct of Esmâ, daughter of Abû Bakr, at the siege of Mecca with regard to her son 'Abd Allâh b. Zubair; Ghâzî Ertoghrul Bey, cf. above; first printed after his death in Khazine-i Fünûn, 1310, ii., No. 11, 12. On the Esh'âr-i Shâhâne-i 'osmâniye written in conjunction with A. Midhat cf. 'Ali Emîrî, in T.O.E., v., No. 27, 1330, p. 131; other poetical works are: Terdjî Bend or Terkeb Bend, an imitation of Rûhî-i Baghdâdî and Ziyâ Pasha; Takṭî yakhod 'Arûz Nümûnesi, Mesnevî-i Mu'allim Nâdjî and a collection of fugitive pieces edited by Shaikh Waṣfî after Nâdjî's death: Yadigar-i Nâdjî, 1314.

Of his prose works the best known and most important is Sünbûle (1299 and 1307). The first part contains poems like Kütük bir Mushike, which is very important for the development of the Turkish poem, and translations from the French. The second part: Ömerîîñ Cödjuklughu, gives in unaffected style intimate memories of his childhood up to the age of eight and has several times been translated: into German by A. Merx, Aus Muallim Nadschi's Sünbûle: Die Geschichte seiner Kindheit, Berlin 1898; into Russian: Vl. Gordlevskij, Détstvo Omara. Aftobiografîteskiye oçerki,

Moscow 1914; and into Czech: Jan Rypka, Omarovo Dětství až do jeho osmého roku, in Bibl. Světová Knihovo, Prag. — Memories of his student days were published in the Terdjümân-i Hakikat and entitled Medrese Khâṭirleri, 1302; to the same year belongs Şemendüfer Seyḩallî (Medjmu'a-i Ebu 'l-Ziyâ, No. 41); also Yasmîsh bulundum, 1301 (letters and verses in simple language); Khurde Furûsh (verses and sayings of Arab and Persian men of letters, 2 parts). — A strongly personal note marks his Demdeme (the title is chosen in allusion to Ekrem's Zemzeme), a criticism of Menmenli-Zâde Tâhir's Takḩîr-i Elḩân, but it is primarily directed against Ekrem and his pronouncements on the stupidity of writing ghazels; it was so personal that its continuation was officially forbidden. — Equally vigorous is the criticism of the newspaper Mizân and its owner Murâd Bey in Nâdjî's Mudâfa'a-nâme. — Translations and commentaries are found in Şâ'ibde söz, 1303 (first published in Imdâd el-Medâd: verses of the Persian poet Şâ'ib-i Tebrîzî with commentary); Saniḩât el-'Arab (over 1,000 Arabic maxims with notes); Saniḩât el-'Adjem (Persian maxims). — Religious in content are: I'djâz-i Kur'an, 2nd ed., 1308 (translation of the treatise by Fakhr al-Din al-Râzî on the Fatiḩâ: Esrâr-i 'akliye in the Mefâtiḩ el-Ghaib, first appeared in the Terdjümân); Ta'lim-i Kur'an; Mu'ammâ-i ilâhî (on the Hurûf-i muḩaṭṭa'a at the beginning of certain Sûras); Khulâṣât al-Iḩtlâs, 1304, the commentary on Sûra cxii. (Iḩhlâs) translated from the Tefsîr-i kebir; Emsâl-i 'Ali, sayings of the caliph 'Ali (Kitâb-ḩhâne-i Ebu 'l-Ziyâ, No. 1); Hikem al-Rifâ'î (sayings of Saiyid Aḩmad al-Rifâ'î); Newâdir el-Ekâbir (wise sayings of Muslim celebrities); 'Ubaidiye, 1305 (Persian originals and translations); Müterdjim, 1304: translations from Arabic, Persian and French; Muḩammed Muzaṣfer Medjmu'ası, 1306: literary essays based on a collected volume in MS. by an otherwise unknown M. Muzaṣfar 1279; Nümûne-i suḩhan (an able selection from celebrated authors). — His correspondence: Mektûblarım, 1303 and 1311 (correspondence with his friends and pupils); Muḩḩaberât we-Muḩâwerât, 1311 (correspondence with A. Midhat); Şköile böile (correspondence with Shaikh Waṣfî); Intikâd, 1304 (correspondence with Beshîr Fu'ad on V. Hugo). — Works on literary criticism: Mu'allim: a collection of expositions of his critical theory which had appeared in the Terdjümân and were regarded in their days as of fundamental importance; Medjmu'a-i Mu'allim, 1305—1306: a collection of the literary lectures which he had given in the Sulṭânî and the Law School (58 in number, No. 1—3 even reached a third edition); Iṣṭilâḩât-i edebiye, 1307 and 1314, his celebrated masterpiece on literary history, really only concerned with style; also Mekteb-i Edeb, 1320. — His important lexicographical works include: ḩamûs-i 'osmâni, 1308, only 5 parts; first appeared in the Mürüvvet; Lughât-i Nâdjî = Lughât-i 'osmâniye, 1317. Nâdjî only wrote the text as far as art. Fetwâ, p. 832; the remainder p. 833—1426 was prepared by his friend Müstedjâb-zâde İsmet Bey. — The biographical works: 'Osmânî Şâ'irleri, 1307, 2 parts (biographies of 13 Ottoman poets); Esâmî, 1308, about 850 somewhat arbitrarily chosen biographies in the style of the old Tezkere's. — His only drama Hedr (ḩâzîm Bey yakhod Hedr), 1326; Teren Rakin, the translation of Zola's Thérèse Raquin; a promised translation of Fénelon: Terbiyet-i Benāt never appeared.

The four parts of his much used Ta'lim-i Kīrā'et, from 1300 on, were largely responsible for the development and spread of Nādjī's style in the widest circles. The first part reached the 31st edition by 1320.

Announced but never published were the following: Ahenk-i millî, Musāmeḥāt-i Rāghīb (on Kodja Rāghīb), Ferā'id-i ta'rīkhīye, Terdjemeden Terdjeme.

Nādjī was a contributor to a number of papers and magazines: the Terdjümān-i Haḳīkat; the Sē'adet, Waḳīt, the periodicals Āfāk, Genḍi Kalem-ler, Medād el-Imdād, Çodjuḳ Baghçesi etc.

With Nādjī neo-classicism came to an end although his followers, especially 'Alī Kemāl, made several attempts to revive it again in the İkdam against H. Djahid and in the Şabāḥ against Djenāb Shihāb al-Dīn. The movement did not get beyond these efforts, for his followers were as little able as Nādjī himself to produce works of permanent value. The present generation has advanced quite out of Nādjī's world.

NADJIS (A.), impure, opp. ẓāhir, cf. TAHĀRA. According to the Shāfi' doctrine, as systematised by al-Nawawī (Minḥādj, i. 36 sqq.; cf. Ghazālī, al-Wadī'iz, i. 6 sq.), the following are the things impure in themselves (naḍjāsāt): wine and other spirituous drinks, dogs, swine, maita, blood and excrements; milk of animals whose flesh is not eaten.

Regarding these groups the following may be remarked. On wine and other spirituous drinks cf. the artt. KHAMR and NABİDH. — Dogs are not declared impure in the Qur'ān; on the contrary, in the description of the sleepers in Sūra xviii, the dog is included (verses 17, 21). In Ḥadīth, however, the general attitude against dogs is very strong, as may be seen in the art. KALB. Goldziher considers this change due to an attitude of conscious contrast (mukhālafā) to the estimate of dogs in Parsism. It must not, however, be forgotten that the Jews also declared dogs impure animals, just as swine. The latter are already declared forbidden food in the Qur'ān (Sūra xvi, 116; vi. 146; v. 4; ii. 168). — As to maita, cf. the article. — Blood is mentioned in the Qur'ān (Sūra xvi, 116; vi. 146; v. 4; ii. 168) as prohibited food. As to the religious background of this prohibition cf. the art. MAITA. — As for excrements and several kinds of secretions of the body, the theory and practice of Jews and Christians sufficiently explain the attitude of Islām in this respect. It must also be admitted, though data are very scarce, that in early Arabia religious impurity included some of these things. — Details are to be found in the large legal works of each of the madhāhabs (cf. Bibl.).

Of the differences of the schools regarding this subject the most important only may be mentioned. Spirituous drinks are not impure according to the Hanafis [cf. NABİDH]. Living swine are not impure according to the Mālikis. — The Shī'a adds to the things mentioned above the human corpse and the infidels. The human corpse was one of the chief sources of impurity according to Jewish ideas (cf. already Numbers, ch. xix.). A current in early Islām tending to follow the Jewish customs in ceremonial law was very strong; the Shī'i view regarding the human corpse may be a residuum of it. — The impurity of infidels is based upon Sūra ix, 28, where the polytheists are declared to be filth (naḍjas). The Sunnī schools do not follow the Shī'a in the exegesis of this verse.

The naḍjāsāt enumerated above cannot be purified, in contradistinction to things which are defiled only (mutanadjjis), with the exception of wine, which becomes pure when made into vinegar, and of hides, which are purified by tanning. On purification cf. the artt. TAHĀRA, GHUSL, wuḍū'.

NADJM AL-DĪN KUBRĀ, the founder of the order of the Kubrawiyya or Dhahabiyya, is one of the most striking personalities among the Persian Šūfis of the xiith-xiiith century A. D. A large number of popular legends are associated with his name, many of which are not yet forgotten at the present day in Central Asia. His importance for the development of Šūfism is very considerable and in the long series of his pupils we find many distinguished representatives of Šūfi teaching. Nadjm al-Dīn, whose full name was Ahmad b. 'Umar Abu 'l-Djannāb Nadjm al-Dīn al-Kubrā al-Khiwākī al-Khwārizmī with the honorific title al-Ṭammat al-kubrā (the "greatest visitation": Sūra lxxix. 34) and Shaiḫ-i Walī tarāsh (the Shaikh who prepares saints) was born in the town of Khiwāk in Khwārizm in 540 (1145), spent his youth in travel during which he met in Egypt the famous Shaiḫ Rūzbihān al-Wazzān al-Miṣrī. He became his murīd and under the supervision of the Shaiḫ went through a course of most rigid ascetic discipline. The youth won the favour of his teacher who gave him his daughter to wife and adopted him as a son. Nadjm al-Dīn spent some years in Egypt where two sons were born to him. One day he heard the lectures on the sunna given by Imām Abū Naṣr Ḥafḍa in Tabriz highly praised. He at once went off to Tabriz and studied there under the direction of this theologian who lived in the Khānqāh Zāhida in the Sarmaidān quarter. There Nadjm wrote his first theological treatise, a kind of inaugural dissertation entitled Sharḥ al-Sunna wa 'l-Maṣāliḥ. During a disputation which arose out of this work he made the acquaintance of the Shaiḫ Bābā Farādj Tabrizī under whose influence he decided to give up the study of theology and devote himself entirely to the contemplative life of the mystic. Bābā Farādj regarded all learning as something superfluous; in his view true knowledge could only be obtained through divine illumination. Nadjm al-Dīn soon recognised that he could hardly come any nearer his goal by this route. He turned to Shaiḫ 'Ammār-i Yasir who advised him to train as a complete Ṣūfī in the school of Ismā'il Kaṣrī. Nadjm al-Dīn received his second khirka at the hands of the latter, a so-called khirka-i tabarruk ("khirka of blessing"). After his return to his first teacher Shaiḫ Rūzbihān the latter found that he had thoroughly grasped all the depths of Ṣūfī learning and recommended him to transfer his activities to his native land of Khwārizm. Nadjm al-Dīn settled there with his family, built a khānqāh and founded the order of the Kubrawīya or Dhahabiya. His teaching met with great success and he soon found himself surrounded by pupils among whom were the most distinguished Ṣūfis of the xiith—xiiith century such as Maḍjd al-Dīn Baghdādī (the Shaiḫ of the famous poet Farid al-Dīn 'Aṭṭār), Sa'd al-Dīn Ḥamawī, Bābā Kamāl Djandi, Shaiḫ Raḍī al-Dīn 'Alī Lālā, Saif al-Dīn Bakharzī, Nadjm al-Dīn Rāzī and many others. Bahā' al-Dīn Walad, the father of the great Djalāl al-Dīn Rūmī, is also said to have been his pupil, but this is hardly possible. Nadjm al-Dīn met his death on 10th Djumādā I 618 (July 13, 1226) at the taking of Khwārizm by the Mongols. All his biographers are agreed that the Shaiḫ had gone out to meet the enemy in the open field and met a martyr's death with weapon in hand. The Institute for Oriental Research in Leningrad possesses a manuscript in Eastern Turki entitled Shaiḫ Nadjm al-Dīn Kubrā-nij Shahid kilip Shahr-i Khwārizm-ni Kharab kilghanlān Bayānī (How Shaiḫ Nadjm al-Dīn was martyred and the town of Khwārizm destroyed). It is a kind of historical novel dealing with the last days of Khwārizm and its fall. Nadjm al-Dīn appears in it as the protector of the city against the Mongols. By his power he makes Khwārizm invisible to the enemy and it only falls into the hands of the conquerors after the Shaiḫ decides to surrender it. It is possible that this book is a version of a Persian biography of Nadjm al-Dīn called Tuḥfat al-Fuḳarā and mentioned by Ḥādjdjī Khalifa (i. 234).

Nadjm al-Dīn was a prolific writer and left a number of valuable treatises on different questions of Ṣūfism. The greater part of his works are written in Arabic. Ḥādjdjī Khalifa gives the following list of his works: 1. al-Uṣūl al-'ashara (i. 339) — a brief exposition of the ten fundamental principles of Ṣūfism (printed in Constantinople in 1256 with a Turkish commentary); 2. Risāla fi 'l-Sulūk (iii. 410—411) — or more correctly fi 'Ilm al-Sulūk, described in Ahlwardt N^o. 3456; 3. Risālat al-Turuk (iii. 418) — in Ahlwardt, N^o. 3272—3273 fi 'l-Turuk (possibly identical with N^o. 1); 4. Tawālī al-Tanwir (iv. 171) — unknown to me; 5. Fawātiḥ al-Djāmāl in Persian — a treatise with this title is given in Flügel, Wiener Katalog, iii. 332, except that the latter is described as in Arabic; 6. Lu'mat al-Lā'im — or with the full title al-Khaṣif al-hā'im min Lu'mat al-Lā'im in Ahlwardt N^o. 3087; 7. Hidāyat al-Ṭālibīn — unknown; 8. Tafsir — probably the great commentary on the Kur'ān entitled 'Ain al-Hayāt, whose first volume I discovered in the Public Library in Leningrad (see Islamica, vol. 1, fasc. 2—3, p. 272). Nadjm al-Dīn is also known as a composer of Persian quatrains but it is still very difficult to decide whether the quatrains attributed to him are really his. Twenty-five of these poems were published in the Comptes-rendus de l'Académie des Sciences de Russie (1924, p. 36).

The Ṣūfī writings of Nadjm al-Dīn form a transition from the older Ṣūfism of the first theorists (the Nishāpūr school of the xth—xith centuries) to the later Ṣūfism of Ibn al-'Arabī and his successors (Ṣadr al-Dīn Kūnawī, Fakhr al-Dīn 'Irāqī). Like the earlier theorists Nadjm al-Dīn likes to deal especially with the practice of Ṣūfism, the stations on the way to true knowledge. Metaphysical questions however are also considered by him and his works with the writings of Ibn al-'Arabī form the basis for the further development of philosophical theory in the xiiith century. This is not the place to go fully into his conception of Ṣūfism; but it is not to be doubted that his teaching can hardly be neglected in a careful investigation of the history of the development of Ṣūfism.

NADJRĀN, a district (Wādī) and town in northern Yaman, according to others (Ibn Khurdādhbih, B. G. A., vi. 133, 248) in southern Nadjd or in the Hidjāz (Bakrī, Mu'ājam, p. 575). The position and course of the Wādī has not been exactly ascertained. It rises on the eastern slopes of the Yaman highlands, probably between 43° and 44° East Long., and runs, perhaps turning north at first, mainly in a southeasterly direction behind 18° and 17° N. Lat. finally disappearing in the great sand desert. The distance from Ṣanʿā [q.v.] is put at 6–7 days' journey (E. Glaser, Skizze der Geschichte und Geographie Arabiens, ii. 50); according to Philby's investigations (The Heart of Arabia, ii. 166 sq.), it is seven days' reasonable caravan journey south of Sulaiyil. The older idea that the course of the Wādī Nadjṛān ran N.E. (or that there was a more northerly twin Wādī Habūna) arose out of the erroneous idea first finally corrected by Philby (op. cit., p. 165, 222) that the Wādī Dawāsir, with which the Wādī Nadjṛān was wrongly thought to be connected, runs from S.W. to N.E.

The Wādī Nadjṛān drains a wide area of northern Yaman and ʿAsir (Hamdānī, Ṣifat Dīqāʾirāt al-ʿArab, p. 83, 110, 114, 247). It is, and was in antiquity, celebrated for its fertility. Of European travellers only Joseph Halévy visited it, in the spring of 1870. He describes (Bull. de la Soc. de Géogr., series vi., vol. xiii., p. 478) the valley, some 2 miles broad, as exceedingly fertile and well cultivated with villages concealed in thick palm-groves. Strabo (xvi. 781) calls it a peaceful and rich country. To Muslim writers it is a miracle of fertility and wealth, even more so than the Yaman in general; its cereals, vegetables and fruits were unrivalled (Hamdānī, p. 199 sq.); there were also mines there (Balādhuri, Kitāb Futūḥ al-Buldān, p. 14) and the staple products of the Yaman, leather and cloth, were also made there. To this day in less favoured parts of Arabia they talk of the prosperity of this Wādī (Philby, op. cit., ii. 226).

The population of the Wādī Nadjṛān, according to Philby, is comparatively large; the majority belong to the tribe of Yām. But several unrelated tribes, often at enmity with one another, share in the possession of this rich country. It was so in the early Muslim period. The Banu ʿI-Hārith b. Kaʿb, who appear in Ḥadīth as lords of Nadjṛān, were not really such. They belong to the large group of tribes Maḥḥidj, which was represented by other tribes also. Their rivals were and are Hamdān tribes (Hamdānī, p. 115, 9) among them Ḥashid, important at the present day, (subdivisions Yām etc.) and Bakil (subdivisions Shākīr etc.); other tribes like al-Azd, al-Afʿā etc. should also be mentioned. We have no reliable information about places with a settled population. In the eastern part of the Wādī, Halévy visited a village of Maḥḥlaf which was afterwards put on the maps at hazard. In the immediate vicinity was another village Ridjla, and an hour to the west Madīnat al-Khudūd (see below). The Arab geographers mention villages (ḡurā) of Nadjṛān and the names of some of them are given as well as those of districts, tributary wādīs, hills and springs.

Through Nadjṛān runs the very old caravan road from Ḥadramawt through the Ḥidjāz to the eastern Mediterranean [cf. MARʿIB]. Nadjṛān was of some importance as the last station in the Yaman on a caravan route from the Yaman to al-Yamāma and thence to Bahrain and the ʿIrāk. During Persian rule in the Yaman and later in the ʿAbbasid period this road must have been of no less importance than the one just mentioned to Syria, which latter however owing to its importance in the early period of Islām is almost alone mentioned in Muslim literature (A. Moberg, The Book of the Himyarites, p. lxi.; cf. also M. Hartmann, Die sudarab. Frage, p. 496, 509). On the stations on the road see Ibn Khurādādhbih (B. G. A., vi. p. 152 sq. and 193; A. Sprenger, Post- und Reise-routen, p. 134–139). A series of forts served to keep it safe (Sprenger, op. cit., p. 138; Hamadḥānī, B. G. A., p. 28; Yāqūt, Muʿdjam, iv., p. 541 s.v. al-Mushakkār and thereon Lyall, Mufaddalīyāt, ii., p. 105). On the present importance of the road and of Nadjṛān, see Philby, op. cit., ii. 226. The road in those days probably went several days' journey across the desert to the Wādī Dawāsir, which was the first station on the other side; at the present day Sulaiyil [q.v.] corresponds to it. This road via Nadjṛān was certainly that which connected the Yaman at different times with the ancient Babylonia in the east, with Syriac Christian as well as with Iranian culture.

Little is known of the town of Nadjṛān. Ptolemy mentions it as a metropolis. Aelius Gallus attacked it and destroyed it (Strabo, loc. cit.; Pliny, vi. 28 [32]). From this Glaser (loc. cit., ii. 50; cf. p. 224) concludes that there was no town of Nadjṛān after this but the existence of the town is proved in many ways for various later periods (see below). Now however, no town seems to bear the name. Halévy thought he had found the ruins of the old town in Madīnat al-Khudūd (see below), which he describes as considerable ruins on the south bank of the river bed. Of the city wall roughly built of granite the south and west sides were less destroyed than the others. A mosque, which still stood among the ruins, belonged, according to local tradition, to the early Muslim or even pre-Islamic period (J. A., ser. vi., vol. xix., p. 90 and 40). In remarkable agreement with this, Bakri, Muʿdjam, p. 80 says: "Al-Ukhdūd, which is mentioned in the Kurʾān, was in one of the towns of Nadjṛān. This city however is now in ruins and nothing is left of it but the mosque which ʿOmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb built".

On the history of Nadjṛān we have only scanty and mainly legendary notes. The name occurs several times in the South Arabian inscriptions: there is one (C. I. S., iv., No. 363) reference to the "towns" of Nadjṛān (ahḡār N.; cf. above ḡurā N.). This means the Wādī. In the oldest inscription of north Arabia, the Namāra inscription of the year 328, the name is also found.

In the tradition of the introduction of Christianity into the Yaman, Nadjṛān plays a part in keeping with its importance for the communications between Yaman and Mesopotamia (see above). According to one reference (Histoire Nestorienne, ed. Addai Scher, i. 218 sq. = Patrol. Orient., iv. 330), it was a merchant of Nadjṛān who first spread Christianity there after he had been converted in al-Ḥīra. Christianity is said to have received a further impetus in the time of Justinian from monophysite Christians who, expelled from Byzantine territory, came to al-Nadjṛān also via Ḥīra (op. cit., II/i. 51 sq.).

The Christian tradition of later persecutions of the Christians in South Arabia connected with Abyssinian invasions of the Yaman is widely disseminated; Nadjṛān was the principal scene of these, first perhaps under Sharḥbil Yakkuf in the last third of the fifth century, notably under Dhū Nuwās, who died in 525. On this tradition which exists in many forms, Greek, Syriac and Ethiopic, see A. Moberg, The Book of the Himyarites, p. xxiv.—lxiii., where the sources and other literature to be consulted are given.

Arabic literature has also something to say about these happenings, especially in the annotations of the Qur'anic exegetes on Sūra lxxxv. 4 sqq. on the Aṣḥāb al-Uḫdūd. But what there is of historical value in this Muslim tradition comes from Christian sources; only it is usually so distorted as to be almost unrecognisable. What it records regarding the introduction of Christianity into Nadjran by a certain Faimiyūn or 'Abd Allāh b. al-Thāmir is on the other hand a distortion of certain episodes in a Syriac Christian cycle of legends about the Persian martyrs Pethion and Yazdin and has really nothing to do with Nadjran or Arabia (A. Moberg, Über einige christliche Legenden in der islamischen Tradition, p. 5, 11 sq., 22, 30 and the references given). The name Madīnat al-Khudūd from the ancient Nadjran is of course the result of the localisation of al-Uḫdūd in Nadjran. Hamdānī (op. cit., p. 67, 169) mentions in the same region a Balad or town of al-Uḫdūd; C. van Arendonk mentions a hill Uḫdūd (De opkomst van het zaidietische Imamaat in Yemen, p. 168).

It is not till the time of Muḥammad and the early Caliphs that we have really historical references to the Yaman and even these have to be critically used. We are told that Khālīd was sent with 400 horsemen to the Banu 'l-Hārith b. Ka'b (and the Banū 'Abd al-Madān: Ibn Sa'd, ii/i. 112, 5) in Nadjran and made them adopt Islām and send an embassy in homage to the Prophet (Ibn Hishām, p. 958; Ibn Sa'd, i/ii. 72). 'Amr b. Ḥazm was appointed 'amil in Nadjran and 'Alī was ordered to collect the zakāt there (Wākidi-Wellhausen, p. 417 sqq.; Ibn Sa'd, ii/i. 122). In addition to pagans and Jews there were many Christians there who formed, it seems, an autonomous community. Muḥammad received an embassy from them also and concluded a treaty with them which guaranteed the possession of their property and the free exercise of their religion in return for a fixed contribution on their part (Ibn Hishām, p. 401 sqq.; Ibn Sa'd, i/ii. 84 sq., 35 sq.). This treaty was confirmed by Abū Bakr and 'Omar. 'Omar however at a later date drove the Christians and Jews out of the Arabian peninsula whereupon the Christians founded a new Nadjran in the 'Irāq, two days' journey south of Kūfa. The details are variously recorded and it is not quite clear to what extent 'Omar's orders were actually enforced. Bakrī (op. cit.) says that the Jews and Christians in Nadjran were not at all affected by the measure. In any case, at a much later date (see just below), there were not a few Christians in Nadjran and there are of course still many Jews in the Yaman. In the year 40 A. H. Nadjran was burned by Djarira, 'Alī's general (Ṭabarī, i. 3452). The scantiness of the historical tradition, fantastic accounts of the wealth of the region and the remarkable liberty enjoyed by Christians in Nadjran gave rise to legends and inspired poets. The "material" which thus arose is very fully detailed and utilised in H. Lammens, Le Califat de Yazīd Ier (M. F. O. B., v/ii., p. 327—369).

In the end we find Nadjran an important fortified town, often simply called al-Ḥadjar (cf. Hamdānī, p. 86), mentioned in the accounts of the fighting which led to the creation of the Zaidī imāmate in the Yaman in the third century A. H. At this period there were still Christians and Jews there, who were obviously still an important element and enjoyed considerable consideration from their Muslim neighbours (van Arendonk, op. cit., p. 128 sq.). On bishops of the Nadjranians or in the Yaman in the ixth and xth century from Syrian sources see Moberg, The Book of the Himyarites, p. liv.

The tribes of Nadjran submitted to Turkish rule as little as those of eastern and northern Yaman generally. Nadjran now belongs to the kingdom of Ibn Sa'ūd.

On other places Nadjran see Yāqūt, iv. 751, 757 sqq.; Hamdānī, p. 85.

NAFAKA. [See NIKĀḤ TALĀK.]

AL-NAFI^c. [See ALLĀH, ii.]

NĀFI^c B. AL-AZRAK AL-ḤANAFĪ AL-ḤANZALĪ, Abū Rāshid, according to some sources, the son of a freed blacksmith of Greek origin (Balādhuri, ed. de Goeje, p. 56), chief of the extreme Khāridjites [q. v.], who after him are called Azrakites [q. v.]. At first, after his secession to Ahwāz, Nāfi^c joined 'Abd Allāh b. al-Zubair [q. v.] in Makka. Soon, however, he and his followers turned their backs on the holy city and arrived before Baṣra, where they spread terror among the inhabitants, who left the town in multitudes. Al-Muhallab, however, succeeded in driving them back to Persia. They made a halt in Ahwāz, where they practised istī'rād, in accord with their doctrine. The bloody battle of Dūlāb, fought against Muslim b. 'Ubais, put an end to his life (64 or 65 = 683—684).

His special doctrine comprised the following points: 1. secession (bar'a) from the quietists (al-ka'ada); 2. examination (miḥna) of those who wanted to join his encampment; 3. declaring infidels those who did not perform hijra to him; 4. declaring it allowed to kill the wives and children of opponents. This is al-Ash'ari's enumeration, which differs slightly from that of al-Shahrastānī (p. 90).

1. The word occurs in the Qurʾān in two places. Sūra xxi. 72 runs: "And we bestowed on him [viz. Ibrāhīm] Isaac and Jacob as additional gift" (nāfilatan). In Sūra xvii. 81 it is used in combination with the vigils, thus: "And perform vigils during a part of the night, reciting the Qurʾān, as a nāfila for thee".

In ḥadīth it is frequently used in this sense.

"Forgiveness of sins past and future was granted him [Muḥammad] and his works were to him as supererogatory works" (Aḥmad b. Ḥanbal, vi. 250). — In another tradition it is said with reference to the month of Ramaḍān, that Allāh "writes down its wages and its nawāfil even before its beginning" (Aḥmad b. Ḥanbal, ii. 524). Of peculiar importance, also in a different respect, is the following ḥadīth kudsī: "When My servant seeks to approach to Me through supererogatory works, I finally love him. And when I love him I become the hearing through which he heareth, the sight through which he seeth, the hand with which he graspeth, the foot with which he walketh" etc. (al-Bukhārī, Riḳāḥ, bāb 38).

Finally the following tradition may be translated: "Whoso performs the wuḍʿū [q. v.] in this way [viz. in the way described in the foregoing part of the tradition], receives forgiveness of past sins and his ṣalāt and his walking to the mosque are for him as a nāfila" (Muslim, Ṭahāra, trad. 8; Mālik, Ṭahāra, trad. 30). In the parallel tradition (Muslim, loc. cit., trad. 7), the term used is kaffāra "expiation". — This parallelism is an indication of the effect ascribed to supererogatory works in Muslim theology, viz. the expiation of light sins (cf. al-Nawawī on Muslim, Cairo 1283, i. 308).

Further it must be observed that in theological terminology nāfila is often applied to those works which are supererogatory in the plain sense, in contradistinction to other works which have become a regular practice. The latter are called sunna muʿakkada, the former nāfila or sunna rāʿida (cf. infra, sub 2).

The place of supererogatory works in theology is further accurately defined in the Waṣīyat Abi Ḥanīfa, art. 7: "We confess that works are of three kinds, obligatory, supererogatory and sinful. The first category is in accordance with Allāh's will, desire, good pleasure, decision, decree, creation, judgment, knowledge, guidance and writing on the preserved table. The second category is not in accordance with Allāh's commandment yet according to His will, desire" etc.

The term for supererogatory works used here is not nāfila, but faḍila.

2. Nāfila is used in ḥadīth especially as a designation of the supererogatory ṣalāt (Bukhārī, ʿIdain, bāb 11; Tahadīdjūd, bāb 5, 27). Sometimes it appears in the combinations ṣalāt al-nāfila (Ibn Māḍja, Iḳāma, bāb 203) and ṣalāt al-nawāfil (Bukhārī, Tahadīdjūd, bāb 36).

In fiḥḥ this terminology is often, but not always followed, the other term for the supererogatory ṣalāts being ṣalāt al-taṭawwūʿ (e.g. Abū Ishāq al-Shīrāzī, Kitāb al-Tanbīh, ed. A. W. T. Juynboll, p. 26), a term that goes back to the Qurʾān (Sūra ii. 153, 180; ix. 80), and which occurs also in canonical ḥadīth (Abū Dāwūd has a Kitāb al-Taṭawwūʿ in his Sunan). The whole class of supererogatory ṣalāts is called nawāfil as well as sunan. Nawāfil, as a general designation of supererogatory ṣalāts, covers three subdivisions. The following juxta-positions may give a survey of the terminology:

It may be added that the term rawātib is used especially for the supererogatory ṣalāts preceding or following the maktūba; they belong to the first subdivision.

In Shīʿī fiḥḥ nawāfil is the widest term; by muraḡhghabāt the daily and non-daily supererogatory prayers are designated.

AL-SAIYIDA NAFĪSA, a mausoleum outside Cairo, south of the Mosque of Aḥmad b. Ṭūlūn in the direction of the sepulchral mosque of al-Shāfiʿī. Among the female saints [cf. WALI] in Cairo next to Saiyida Zainab bint Muḥammad [q. v.] and "Sitt Sekina" (Sukaina) "Sitt Nefisa" takes a very prominent place. In the official recitations of the Qurʾān, al-Saiyida Nafisa, where the reading is held on Sundays, takes third place among them all, immediately after Imām al-Shāfiʿī and Imām al-Ḥusainī (see Bergsträsser, in Isl., xxi. [1933], 110 sq.). The sanctuary is visited by both men and women, especially in the evening. The door leading to the sarcophagus itself is only opened once a year. The foundation contains a number of other buildings besides a mosque, including a library and Ṣūfī cells. The land around it is a much sought after place of interment.

Nafisa was a daughter of al-Ḥasan b. Zaid b. al-Ḥasan [q. v.]. She came to Egypt with her husband Ishāq al-Muʿtamin, a son of Djaʿfar al-Šādiq [q. v.]. She had a reputation for learning and piety. Shāfiʿī frequently visited her to collect traditions; on his death, his body was brought to her house so that she might say the prayer for the dead over him. She had children but her descendants soon died out. She herself died in Ramaḍān 208 (beg. of 824). Legend credits her with great karāma [q. v.]; for example as is told of several Egyptian, and not only Muslim saints, it is said that her prayers produced a great rising of the Nile in a single night. In contradiction of a story that her husband wanted to take her body to the family burialplace in the al-Bakī^c [q. v.] cemetery in Medina but was prevented by her devotees, is the general opinion that this is her tomb which she built with her own hands and in which she read the Qurʾān long before her death. — Several rulers took part in the development of the sanctuary, ʿAbbāsids and later Fāṭimids and Ottoman governors. The cupola over the grave was restored by the caliph al-Ḥāfiẓ in 532 (1138) and the mosque in 693—694 (1294—1295) by the Mamlūk al-Malik al-Nāṣir Muḥammad b. Kalāʾūn.

(R. STROTHMANN)

NAFS¹⁾ (A.), soul. Nafs, in the early Arabic poetry, meant the self or person, while rūḥ meant breath and wind. Beginning with the Qurʾān nafs also means soul, and rūḥ means a special angel messenger and a special divine quality. Only in post-Qurʾānic literature are nafs and rūḥ equated and both applied to the human spirit, angels and djinn.

I. The Qurʾānic uses. A. Nafs and its plurals anfus and nufus have five uses: 1. In most cases they mean the human self or person, e. g., iii. 54: "Let us call... ourselves and yourselves"; also xii. 54; li. 20, 21. 2. In six verses nafs refers to Allāh: v. 116b: "Thou [Allāh] dost know what is in myself [says ʿIsā], but I do not know what is in Thyself (nafsika)"; also iii. 27, 28; vi. 12, 54 and xx. 43. 3. One reference, xxv. 4 (cf. xiii. 17), is to gods: "They [āliha] do not possess for themselves (anfusihim) any harm or benefit at all!" 4. In vi. 130 the plural is used twice to refer to the company of men and djinn: "We have witnessed against ourselves (anfusinā)". 5. It means the human soul: vi. 93: "While the angels stretch forth their hands [saying:] Send forth your souls (anfus)"; also l. 15; lxiv. 16; lxxix. 40, etc. This soul has three characteristics: a. It is ammāra, commanding to evil (xii. 53). Like the Hebrew nefesh the basal idea is "the physical appetite", in Pauline usage ψυχή, and in the English New Testament "flesh". It whispers (l. 15), and is associated with al-hawā, which, in the sense of "desire", is always evil. It must be restrained (lxxix. 40) and made patient (xviii. 27) and its greed must be feared (lix. 9b). b. The nafs is lawwāma, i. e., it upbraids (lxxv. 2); the souls (anfus) of deserters are straitened (ix. 119). c. The soul is addressed as muṭmaʾinna, tranquil (lxxxix. 27). These three terms form the basis of much of the later Muslim ethics and psychology. It is note-

B. Rūḥ has five uses: 1. Allāh blew (nafakha) of His rūḥ, a. into Adam, giving life to Adam's body (xv. 29; xxxviii. 72; xxxii. 8), and b. into Maryam for the conception of ʿIsā (xxi. 91 and lxvi. 12). Here rūḥ equates with rīḥ and means the "breath of life" (cf. Gen. ii. 7), the creation of which belongs to Allāh. 2. Four verses connect rūḥ with the amr of Allāh, and the meanings of both rūḥ and amr are disputed. a. In xvii. 87, it is stated: "They ask thee [O Muḥammad] about al-rūḥ; say: al-rūḥ min amrī rabbī, and ye are brought but little knowledge". b. In xvi. 2, Allāh sends down the angels with al-rūḥ min amrihi upon whomsoever He wills of His creatures to say: "Warn that the fact is, There is no God but Me, so fear". c. In xl. 15, Allāh "cast al-rūḥ min amrihi upon whomsoever He wills of His creatures to give warning". d. In xlii. 52: "We revealed (awḥainā) to thee [O Muḥammad] rūḥan min amrinā; thou knewest not what the book was, nor the faith, but We made it to be a light by which We guide whomsoever We will of Our creatures". Whatever meanings amr and min may have, the contexts connect al-rūḥ in a. with knowledge; in b. with angels and creatures, to give warning; in c. with creatures, for warning, and in d. with Muḥammad, for knowledge, faith, light and guidance. Therefore this rūḥ is special equipment from Allāh for prophetic service. It reminds forcibly of Bezalel, who was "filled with the spirit of God in wisdom, in understanding and in knowledge" (Exodus xxxv. 30, 31). 3. In iv. 169, ʿIsā is called a rūḥ from Allāh. 4. In xviii. 4; lxxviii. 38 and lxx. 4, al-rūḥ is an associate of the angels. 5. In xxvi. 193, al-rūḥ al-amin, the faithful rūḥ, comes down upon Muḥammad's heart to reveal the Qurʾān. In xix. 17, Allāh sends to Maryam "Our rūḥ", who appears to her as a well-made man. In xvi. 104, rūḥ al-ḥudus sent the Qurʾān to establish believers. Three other passages state that Allāh helps ʿIsā with rūḥ al-ḥudus (ii. 81; ii. 254 and v. 109). This interrelation of service and title imply the identity of this angelic messenger, who may be also the rūḥ of 4. Thus in the Qurʾān rūḥ does not mean angels in general, nor man's self or person, nor his soul or spirit. The plural does not occur.

C. Nafas, breath and wind, cognate to nafs in root and to rūḥ in some of its meanings, does not occur in the Qurʾān, but is used in the early poetry (F. Krenkow, The Poems of Ṭufail and aṭ-Ṭirimmāh, London 1927, p. 32). The verb tanaffasa (Sūra lxxxi. 18) is derived from that meaning, while the only other Qurʾānic forms from the same radicals are falyatanāfasi ʿl-mutanāfisiṇa (lxxxiii. 26) and are derived in al-Ṭabari, Djāmiʿ al-Baiyān, Cairo 1321, xxx. 57, probably correctly, from nafisa, "he desired".

II. The Umayyad poetry first uses rūḥ for the human soul (Kitāb al-Aghānī, ed. 1285, xvi. 126, last line; Cheikho, Le Christianisme, Bairūt 1923, p. 338) where the Qurʾān had used nafs as in N^o. 5 above.

III. Of the early collections of traditions, Mālik's al-Muwattaʾa, Cairo 1339, i. 126 uses nasama, which does not occur in the Qurʾān, and nafs (ii. 262) for the soul or spirit, while Ibn Ḥanbal's Musnad uses nasam (vi. 424), nafs (i. 297; ii. 364; vi. 140) and nafs and rūḥ (iv. 287, 296).

1) For the sake of convenience in this article rūḥ is treated as well.

Muslim's al-Ṣaḥīḥ (Constantinople 1331), viii. 44, 162 sq. and al-Bukhārī's al-Ṣaḥīḥ, Cairo 1314, iv. 133, both use rūḥ and arwāḥ for the human spirit.

IV. The Tādj al-ʿArūs (iv. 260) lists 15 meanings for nafs and adds two others from the Lisān al-ʿArab, as follows: spirit, blood, body, evil eye, presence, specific reality, self, tan, haughtiness, self-magnification, purpose, disdain, the absent, desire, punishment, brother, man. It states that most of these meanings are metaphorical. The Lisān (viii. 119—126) finds examples of these meanings in the poetry and the Qurʾān. Lane's Lexicon faithfully reproduces the material (p. 2827b). The lexical treatments of nafs disclose these facts: 1. Any attribution to Allāh of nafs as "soul" or "spirit" is avoided. 2. In man, a. nafs and rūḥ are identified, or b. nafs applies to the mind and rūḥ to life, or c. man has nafsānī, two souls, one vital and the other discriminative, or d. the discriminative soul is double, sometimes commanding and sometimes forbidding.

V. The influences that affected the post-Qurʾānic uses of both nafs and rūḥ were the Christian and Neo-Platonic ideas of rūḥ with human, angelic and divine applications, and the more specifically Aristotelian psychological analysis of nafs. These influences are clearly shown in the records of the religious controversies.

A. Al-Ashʿarī [q. v.] (H. Ritter, Die dogmatischen Lehren der Anhänger des Islam von Abu 'l-Hasan 'Alī bin Ismā'īl al-Aṣʿarī, Istanbul 1929) reports the Rāfiḍīya doctrines of the incarnation of rūḥ Allāh in Adam and its transmigration through the prophets and others (p. 6, 46), as well as the conflicting positions that man is body (ḡism) only, body and spirit, and spirit (rūḥ) only (p. 61, 329 sqq.). His creed of the orthodox (p. 290—297) omits any statement about the nature of man.

B. Al-Baghḍādī [q. v.] (al-Farḡ bain al-Firaḡ, Cairo 1328) records the same heretical doctrines about man's nature (p. 28, 117 sqq., 241 sqq.), says the transmigration theories were held by Plato and the Jews (p. 254) and describes the incarnation beliefs of the Ḥulūliya sects [cf. ḤULUL] among whom he includes the Hallādjiya (p. 247). His position is "The life of Allāh is without rūḥ and nourishment and all the arwāḥ are created, in opposition to the Christian doctrine of the eternity of the Father, Son and Spirit" (p. 325).

C. Ibn Ḥazm [q. v.] uses nafs and rūḥ interchangeably of man's soul (Kitāb al-Fiṣal fi 'l-Milal, 5 parts, Cairo 1317—1321; v. 66). He excludes from Islām all who hold metempsychosis views, among whom he includes the physician-philosopher Muḥammad b. Zakariyā' al-Rāzī (i. 90 sqq.; iv. 187 sq.). He rejects absolutely the doctrine of some of the Ashʿariya of the continual re-creation of the rūḥ (iv. 69). He taught that Allāh created the spirits of all Adam's progeny before the angels were commanded to prostrate to him (Sūra vii. 171), and that these spirits exist in al-Barzakḥ [q. v.] in the nearest heaven until the angel blows them into embryos (iv. 70).

D. Al-Shahrastānī [q. v.] (Kitāb al-Milal wa 'l-Nihāl, ed. Cureton, part i., London 1842) in his description of the belief of the pagan Arabs concerning survival after death does not use the terms nafs or rūḥ, but says the blood becomes a wraith bird that visits the grave every hundred years. One of his most important sections (p. 203—240) deals with the orthodox and heterodox doctrines of al-rūḥ. Al-Ḥunafāʾ, or true believers, debate with al-Ṣābiʾa [q. v.], who are dualists, emanationists and gnostics. His account of the views of the Ṣābiʾa faithfully reflects the doctrines of the Ikhwān al-Ṣafāʾ (Rasāʾil, 4 vols., Bombay 1305), who taught that man is a whole compounded of a corporeal body and a spiritual nafs (i/ii., 14), and that the substance (ḡawhar) of the nafs descended from the spheres (al-aflāk). But al-Shahrastānī rejects the Neo-Platonic idea that human souls (nufūs) are dependent upon the souls of the superhuman spirit world (al-nufūs al-rūḥāniyyāt) (p. 210, 224 sq.), and the Hermetic doctrines that the nafs is essentially evil (p. 236) and that salvation consists in the release of the rūḥ from material bodies (p. 226 sq.). He applies the term rūḥānī to all spirits, good and evil (p. 213). His description of the nature of man (p. 216 sqq.) with three souls, vegetative, animal and human, each with its own source, need, place and powers, resembles that of the Ikhwān al-Ṣafāʾ (Rasāʾil, i/ii., 48 sqq.). Indeed, the Aristotelian analysis of the human soul as given in De Anima, and handed on by Alexander of Aphrodisias and Porphyry, had been adopted with little modification by the Muslim philosophers, such as al-Kindī [q. v.], al-Fārābī [q. v.] each of whom wrote a Kitāb al-Nafs, Ibn Sīnā [q. v.] who wrote two, and Ibn Miskawaih [q. v.], whose Tahdhīb al-Akhḫāl has the same immaterial (p. 1) and functional (p. 7) psychology for its ethical basis. Al-Shahrastānī achieved the long needed interpretation of the conflicting usages of nafs and rūḥ in the Greek and Christian heritage, and in the Qurʾān and Muslim tradition. But the philosophers, even with his support, were not able to force the Greek psychology upon orthodox Islam. The Mutakallims [s. art. KALĀM] and the great majority of Muslims broadened the Qurʾānic terminology, but retained the traditional views of the nature of the soul as a direct creation of Allāh having various qualities.

VI. Aristotle's principle of the incorporeal character of spirit had nevertheless found a permanent place in Muslim doctrine through the influence of Islām's greatest theologian, al-Ghazālī [q. v.]. In al-Tahānawī's Dictionary of the Technical Terms (ed. Sprenger, Calcutta 1862) are extracts of the doctrines of al-Ghazālī on man's rūḥ and nafs. He defines man as a spiritual substance (ḡawhar rūḥānī), not confined in a body, nor imprinted on it, nor joined to it, nor separated from it, just as Allāh is neither without nor within the world, and likewise the angels. It possesses knowledge and perception, and is therefore not an accident (p. 547 at top; cf. Tahāfut al-Falāsifa, Cairo 1302, p. 72). He devotes the second section of al-Kisāla al-Laduniya (Cairo 1327, p. 7—14) to explain the words nafs, rūḥ and qalb (heart), which are names for this simple substance that is the seat of the intellectual processes. It differs from the animal rūḥ, a refined but mortal body in which reside the senses. He identifies the incorporeal rūḥ with al-nafs al-muṭmaʾinna and al-rūḥ al-amrī of the Qurʾān. He then uses the term nafs also for the "flesh" or lower nature, which must be disciplined in the interests of ethics.

VII. This position of al-Ghazālī's was that of the theistic philosophers in general, as well as some of the Muʿtazila and the Shīʿa, but it has never dominated Islām. The great analytical philosopher and theologian, Fakhr al-Dīn al-Rāzī, could not bring himself to accept it. In his Mafātīḥ al-Ghaib, v. 435, commenting on Sūra xvii. 85, he quotes as the opinion of al-Ghazālī the statement that is in the latter's Tahāfut (p. 72; cf. also al-Rāzī's Muḥaṣṣal, Cairo 1323, p. 164), but on p. 434 (l. 9 and 8 from below) of the Mafātīḥ he acknowledges the strength of the corporeal doctrine, and in his Ma'ālim Uṣūl al-Dīn, on the margin of the Muḥaṣṣal, p. 117 sq., he definitely rejects as baseless (bātil) the view of the philosophers that the nafs is a substance (djāwhar) which is not a body (djism) and not corporeal.

VIII. Al-Baidāwī's [q. v.] system of cosmogony and psychology is given in his Tawāliḥ al-Anwār (lithograph ed. with commentary Abu 'l-Thana' al-Iṣfahānī and gloss by al-Djurdjānī, Stambul 1305, p. 285 sqq.; Brockelmann, G. A. L., i. 418, ii. 111, printed Cairo 1323). He discusses 1. The classes of incorporeal substances, 2. the heavenly intelligences, 3. the souls of the spheres, 4. the incorporeality of human souls, 5. their creation 6. their connection with bodies and 7. their survival. His cosmogony follows: Allāh, because of his unity, created only one Intelligence (ʿaql). This Second Intelligence, that emanated first (al-ṣādir) from Allāh, is the cause (ʿilla) of all other potentialities and is not body (djism), nor original matter (hayūlī) nor form (ṣūra). It is the secondary cause (sabab) of another intelligence with soul (nafs) and sphere (falak). There emanates from the second a third intelligence and so on to the tenth (p. 288) who is the rūḥ of Sūra lxxviii. 38 (cf. al-Baidāwī's Anwār al-Tanzīl, ed. Fleischer, ii. 383, l. 4) whose effective influence is in the world of the elements and who is the producer of the spirits (arwāḥ) of mankind. Below these intelligences are the high or heavenly angels, which the philosophers call al-nufūs al-falakīya, and the low nufūs, which are in two classes: earthly angels, in control of the simple elements and the earthly souls, such as the reasoning souls (anfus nāṭika) controlling particular persons. In addition (p. 285) there are the incorporeal substances, without effect or control, who are angels, some good (al-kurūbiyyūn) and some evil (al-shayāṭīn) and the djinn, who are ready for both good and evil. This is the classification he refers to in his comment on Sūra ii. 28 (ed. Fleischer, i. 47, 25). His psychology resembles that of al-Ghazālī, whom he mentions (p. 294). For the incorporeality of the soul (taḍjarrud al-nafs) he presents five arguments from reason, four Qur'ān verses and one tradition. His commentator remarks (p. 300) that these prove only that the soul differs from the body. He then argues that all nufūs are created when their bodies are completed. The nafs (p. 303) is not embodied in and is not close to the body, but is attached as the lover to the beloved. It is connected with that rūḥ which comes from the heart and is generated of the finest nutritive particles. The reasoning nafs produces a force that flows with that rūḥ through the body, producing in every organ its proper functions. These functional powers are perceptive, which are the five external senses, and the five internal faculties of the sensus communis, imagination, apprehension, memory and reason, and the active (al-muḥarrrika) which are voluntary (ikhtiyāriya) and natural (ṭabīʿiya, p. 308).

IX. The dominant Muslim doctrine concerning the origin, nature and future of al-rūḥ and al- nafs is most fully given in the Kitāb al-Rūḥ of Ibn Kaṭīm [q. v.] (Haidarābād, 2nd ed., 1324). Of his 21 chapters Ibn Kaṭīm devotes the 19th to the problem of the specific nature of the nafs (p. 279—342). He quotes the summaries given by al-Aṣḥārī (op. cit., p. 331—335), and by al-Rāzī (Mafātīḥ al-Ghaib, v. 431—434). He denies al-Rāzī's statement that the Mutakallims consider man to be simply the sensible body, and says all intelligent people hold man to be both body and spirit. The rūḥ is identified with the nafs, and is itself a body, different in quiddity (al-māhiya) from this sensible body, of the nature of light, high, light in weight, living, moving, interpenetrating the bodily members as water in the rose. It is created, but everlasting; it departs temporarily from the body in sleep; when the body dies it departs for the first judgement, returns to the body for the questioning of Munkar and Nakir, and, except in the cases of prophets and martyrs, remains in the grave foretasting bliss or punishment until the Resurrection. He rejects (p. 256) Ibn Ḥazm's doctrine that Adam's progeny are in al-Barzakḥ awaiting their time to be blown into embryos. He presents 116 evidences for the corporeality of the rūḥ, 22 refutations of opposing arguments and 22 rebuttals of objections. He represents traditional Islām.

X. The earlier Ṣūfis had accepted the materiality of the rūḥ. Both al-Kuṣhairī [q. v.] (al-Risāla, with commentary of Zakariyā' al-Anṣārī and gloss of al-ʿArūsī, Būlāḳ 1290, ii. 105 sqq.) and al-Hudjwiri [q. v.] (Kaṣḥf al-Maḥdjud, ed. Nicholson, London 1911, p. 196, 262) call the rūḥ a fine, created substance (ʿain) or body (djism), placed in the sensible body like sap in green wood. The nafs (al-Risāla, p. 103 sqq.; Kaṣḥf al-Maḥdjud, p. 196) is the seat of the blameworthy characteristics. All together make the man.

In addition to the philosophical position of the immateriality of al-rūḥ that al-Ghazālī had made orthodox, another interpretation of spirit developed which is essentially theosophical. Ibn al-ʿArabī [q. v.] (H. S. Nyberg, Kleinere Schriften des Ibn al-ʿArabī, Leyden 1919, p. 15, 11, 7 sqq.) divides "things" into three classes: Allāh, Who is Absolute Existence and Creator, the world, and an undefinable tertium quid of contingent existence that is joined to the Eternal Reality and is the source of the substance and the specific nature of the world. It is the universal and common reality of all realities. Man likewise is an intermediate creation, a barzakḥ (p. 22, 42) between Allāh and the world, bringing together the Divine Reality and the created world (p. 21, 42) and a vicegerent connecting the eternal names and the originated forms (p. 96). His animal spirit (rūḥ) is from the blowing of the divine breath (p. 95) and his reasoning soul (nafs nāṭika) is from the universal soul (al-nafs al-kullīya), while his body is from the earthly elements (p. 95 sq.). Man's position as vicegerent (p. 45 sq.) and his resemblance to the divine presence (p. 21) come from this universal soul, who has various other names, holy spirit (rūḥ al-qudus), the first intelligence (p. 51), vicegerent (khalīfa), the perfect man (p. 45) and the rūḥ of the world of command (ʿālam al-amr), which al-Ghazālī held to be Allāh's direct creation (p. 122, 1). In his Fuṣūṣ (lithograph ed. with commentary by al-Kāshānī, Cairo 1309, p. 12 sqq.) he says that Allāh appears to Himself in a form which thus becomes the place of manifestation of the Divine essence. This place receives a rūḥ, who is Adam, the khalīfa and the perfect man. He discusses (Nyberg, op. cit., p. 129 sqq.) the essence and properties of the rūḥ, quoting among others the view he says is "attributed" to al-Ghazālī which is in al-Tahāfut (as above). He finds the differences of doctrine harmless since all agree that the rūḥ is originated. In his tractate on the nafs and rūḥ (M. Asín Palacios, Tratado Acerca del Conocimiento del Alma y del Espíritu, in Actes du XIV^{ème} Congrès international des Orientalistes, Paris 1906, iii. 167—191) he describes how men may reach the distinction of "the perfect man" through the cultivation of the qualities of the rūḥ and the suppression of the nafs.

Ibn al-ʿArabī's contemporary, the poet Ibn al-Fārid (Nicholson, Studies in Islamic Mysticism, Cambridge 1921, chap. iii.), at times identifies his own rūḥ with that from which all good emanates (al-Tāʾīya al-kubrā, on margin of Diwān Ibn al-Fārid, Cairo 1319, ii. 4 sq.) and with the "pole" (kuṭb) upon which the heavens revolve (p. 113, 115). Al-Kāshānī, the commentator of al-Tāʾīya, explains that this identity is with the greatest spirit (rūḥ al-arwāḥ) and the greatest "pole". The compiler of the commentaries on the Diwān states (ii. 196) that incarnation (ḥulūl) and union (ittiḥād) with Allāh are impossible, but there is real "passing away" (fanā) and attainment (waṣl) of the rūḥ and nafs in the nafs of Allāh, for His nafs is their nafs.

ʿAbd al-Karīm al-Djīlānī carries this position of existential monism on to straight animistic pantheism. In al-Insān al-kāmil [q.v.] (Cairo 1334) the terms rūḥ al-ḥudūs, rūḥ al-arwāḥ and rūḥ Allāh stand for a special one of the aspects of the Divine Reality (al-Ḥaqīq), not to be embraced under the command "be" nor created. This spirit is the divine aspect in which stand the created spirits of all existences, sensible and intelligible (p. 94). Existence itself subsists in the nafs of Allāh, and His nafs is His Essence (dhāt). Moreover, every sensible thing has a created spirit (rūḥ) (p. 94). One of the aspects of the angel of Sūra xlii. 52, who is named the command (amr) of Allāh, and who is an aspect of Allāh as above, is given to the rūḥ of Muḥammad, which is identified as the rūḥ mentioned in the verse. That angelic and divine rūḥ thereby becomes the Idea (ḥakīka) of Muḥammad (p. 95 sq.) and he thereby becomes the "perfect man" (p. 96, 131 sqq.). The rūḥ which is the specific nature of the human nafs has five names: animal, commanding to evil, instinctive (al-mulḥama), reproving, and tranquil. When the divine qualities actually describe the nafs, then the names, qualities and essences of the gnostic (ʿarīf) are those of the One Known (Maʿrūf) (p. 130 sq.).

XI. In geomancy (ʿilm al-raml) the first "house" (bai) of the ummahāt [cf. MADAGASCAR, supra, iii. 73b] is called nafs because it guides to problems concerning the soul and spirit of the inquirer, and to the beginning of affairs (Muḥammad al-Zanātī, Kitāb al-Faṣl fī ʿIlm al-Raml, Cairo n. d., p. 7; cf. Henr. Corn. Agrippae, Opera, Leyden, n. d., but early xviiith cent., p. 412: Nam primus domus personam tenet quarentis).

AL-NAFŪSA, in Berber INFŪSEN, name of a Berber tribe. According to the common genealogical scheme (cf. Ibn Khaldūn, Kitāb al-Ibar, i. 107—117 of the text), the Nafūsa are one of the four branches of the large body of the Botr, whose name derives from their chief Mādghis al-Abtar. At present the dwelling place of the Nafūsa is south-west of Tripoli, on the plateau of the same name which from the frontier between Tunisia and Tripolitania tends eastward, and, if taken in the largest sense, comprises the regions of Nālūt, Fassāto and Yefren. The inhabitants of these regions are generally called Nafūsa, although, in a genealogical sense, this name can be applied to some groups only. Probably the name Djabal Nafūsa (in Berber Drār n Infusen), which originally belonged to a part of the plateau, was extended to the large area between Wāzzen and Yefren on account of the fact, that of the tribes inhabiting it, the Nafūsa were of prominent importance. This use of the name in its widest sense is also to be found in the book by Ibrāhīm b. Slimān al-Shammākī "Castles and Ways of the Nafūsa plateau" (1302 = 1884—1885), in which all the territories of Yefren, Fassāto and Nālūt are described.

The scarce data on the history of the Nafūsa, which we possess, are to be found, for the largest part, in Arabic sources. In the Greek and Latin authors of pre-Islamic times there is no single sure allusion to them. The name occurring in Corippus' Johannis (second song, l. 146: Quaeque nefanda colunt tristis montana Navusi), does not refer, in all probability, to a place or a tribe of Tripolitania, but rather of the Aurès (Awrās), its plateau or its neighbourhood. The fact that Navus represents a form closely connected with Nafūsa, proves only that the name was widely spread among the Berbers, that it is old and may be probably connected with such words as ennefus, fem. tenefust "right, to the right hand" in Auglin.

In Islamic times the name is recorded for the first time in connection with the capture of the town of Tripoli by ʿAmr b. al-ʿĀs (22 or 23). According to Ibn ʿIdhārī (i. 2 sq., text) during the siege the inhabitants called to their aid the Nafūsa, who came to their aid. At that time they were residing also in the vast plain of Djabāra, situated between the Djabal and the Sea; one of their chief towns, if not their capital, was Šabra on the coast (Roman Sabratha, formerly Phoenician), west of Tripoli, which by Ibn Khaldūn (Ibar, i. 181, l. 8, text) is called "the city of the Nafūsa". This town was taken by surprise and plundered by a body of cavalry sent by 'Amr. This raid was probably undertaken not only to continue the conquest farther westward, but also to punish the Nafūsa, whose territory 'Amr had invaded in order to conquer it (cf. al-Bakrī, p. 9, 10, text), and which he had to abandon by order of the Caliph.

According to some sources, the Nafūsa at that time were Christians; according to other reports, however, they were Jews. Our latest local information makes it probable that Christianity had spread widely among them; though the conversion of single groups to Judaism is not excluded. In fact traces of Byzantine basilicas have been found on the plateau, e. g. at Temézda, Iṭarmisen etc., which are also mentioned in some sources and which must have been used by large numbers of the indigenous population.

When the Arab had conquered North Africa, the Nafūsa of Šabra and of the coastal region retired, according to the common opinion, to the plateau, where they remained hostile towards the conquerors. A fresh study of the Tripolitan population, however, makes it clear that a part of them must have stayed in their old dwelling-places where they intermarried with other tribes and, in course of time, became arabicised. In fact there are tribes in the Western Džafāra and in Tripoli, the town and its surroundings (the regions of al-Sāhil, Tagiura, etc.), that, according to the local genealogy, derive from the Nafūsa. Apart from this ethnic tradition, there is the fact, recorded in several sources, that after the first case of intervention of the Nafūsa in the affairs of the town of Tripoli — which may have been partly due to a Christian opposition to the Muḥammadan invasion — they wanted, under successive dominations, to make their presence felt and their influence preponderant in the north-western region of Tripolitania, so that the outlines of the history of the small, but strong and civilised Berber unit may be supposed to be the following. Having its centre in the plateau, it intended to make felt, as often as possible, its dominion in the coastal region and thus keep the control of the main way of communication between Egypt and Ifrīkiya, which ran along the coast and which was followed by the various expeditions to the Maghrib. Even at present such aspirations may be stirred in the minds of the most cultivated of these populations, to such an extent that even some of them have reckoned with an eventual reoccupation of their old territories in Western Džafāra.

The period in which the Nafūsa, according to the sources available to us, vigorous were most active and took a part in the events happening in North Africa, was that of the great Khāridjī [q. v.] revolts, which began in 122 (739—740) and did not cease before the 15th (xth) century, i. e. before the era of the Fātimids. When the Wahbī doctrines began to spread among the North African populations in the second century A. H., they embraced them and so joined the rebellious movement of the Berbers against the Arab conquerors, a movement which, prepared by several other causes, found also some support in the Khāridjī heterodoxy. The Nafūsa embraced the Ibādī, i. e. the more moderate form of the Khāridjī doctrine, and remained ever faithful to it with heroic attachment. In alliance with other Berber tribes, either Ibādīs or other branches of the sect, they repeatedly made war upon the Arab governors of Ifrīkiya.

In 140 (757—758), they elected as their imām, probably with the intention of founding an Ibādīte principality — an intention which manifests itself also at other times — an Arab called Abu 'l-Khaṭṭāb 'Abd al-A'lā' b. al-Samḥ al-Mu'āfirī [q. v.], one of the missionaries of Ibādism in North Africa. Under his command and in conjunction with other Berber groups, they occupied Tripolis, fought against the Šufrite [cf. AL-ŠUFRIYA] Wafardjūma, who had sacked Kairawān where they had settled, and against the armies sent by the 'Abbāsids to reconquer Ifrīkiya. Finally, in 144 (761—762), Abu 'l-Khaṭṭāb and a large number of his followers perished near Tauorgha (Tawurghā) in a great battle against the general Muḥammad b. al-Ash'ath al-Khuza'i, the governor of Ifrīkiya.

Another notorious imām of the Nafūsa was a Berber Abū Ḥatim Ya'kūb [q. v.], whose enterprises survive in oral tradition on the plateau, who speaks of his 375 encounters with the Arabs. He was killed in battle in 155 (771—772).

When the Ibādī kingdom of the Rustamids [cf. RUSTAM], which had Tāhert as its centre, had been founded, the Nafūsa did not elect an imām of their own any more, but formed a part of this kingdom under a governor who depended upon it. Some of these governors, e. g. Abū 'Ubaida 'Abd al-Ḥamid al-Djanāwunī (of Igennāwen), Abū Maṣṣūr Ilyās (of Tendemmīra), are often praised by the Berbers of the Djabal, for their importance and ability in maintaining the interests of Ibādism, and also for their learning and piety.

The Nafūsa were a valuable support of the kingdom of the Rustamids, of which they formed the eastern bulwark. Being near the territory of the Aghlabides [q. v.], they shared to some extent the vicissitudes of this state which had arisen in Ifrīkiya in the beginning of the 9th century A. D. The town of Tripoli was in the possession of those princes; Western Džafāra, on the other hand, till near the Sea, and probably also part of Eastern Džafāra, was in the power or under the influence of the Nafūsa. When Tripoli was beleaguered in 267 (880—881) by the Tūlūnid prince al-'Abbās, who, having revolted against his father Aḥmad, sought to conquer Ifrīkiya at his own risks, the Nafūsa were called to aid, and, appearing without delay, they defeated the army of the invaders (according to other sources, their help was invoked by the inhabitants of Lebda). This fact, which reminds of the first siege of Tripoli by the Muslims, proves clearly the influence the Nafūsa possessed in northwestern Tripolitania and it accounts also for the severe blow dealt to them in 283 (896—897) by the Aghlabides, when Ibrāhīm II b. Aḥmad, who led an expedition from Tunis to Egypt, found his passage through the coastal region of Tripolitania barred by the Nafūsa. The bloody battle of Mānū, which was followed by acts of terrible cruelty inflicted upon hundreds of Nafūsa prisoners, and which is narrated in a more or less anecdotal form in the Sunnī as well as in the Ibādī sources, is ascribed, ultimately, to the desire of the Caliph to punish the Nafūsa who were the principal support of the heretical state of Tāhert; or to the resentment of the Aghlabides at acts of enmity committed by the Berbers, as well as in the humiliation they had suffered when the expedition of the Ṭulūnid al-'Abbās, which was directed against them, had been averted by the Nafūsa, to whom this exploit became a point of glory.

In reality, however, taking into account the whole political situation as well as the historical antecedents, it is evident that that battle, which is still mentioned in the oral tradition of the Ibādites as the most terrible disaster they ever suffered, was the inevitable encounter between the Aghlabide power and the supremacy of the Nafūsa exercised in the former's immediate vicinity and even in its own territory.

When the power of the Aghlabides as well as that of the Rustamids had been destroyed by the Fāṭimids [q. v.], the Nafūsa found themselves face to face with those new masters of Eastern Barbary. There exist reports of an instance of their strenuous opposition to Fāṭimid powers which endeavoured to subdue them in 310 (922—923); and which defeated them in the following year.

There are, however, reports concerning the part taken by the Nafūsa, or at least by tribes from the plateau, in the great Khārījī rebellion, which was led by Abū Yazīd and which ended with the victory of the Fāṭimids. Probably the Ibādite populations of the Djabal, although having given up the idea of forming one large autonomous state, endeavoured to avoid any dependence upon the various kingdoms and empires which successively held the supremacy in North Africa, while the latter, on the other hand, endeavoured, as far as possible, to obtain a footing also in the mountainous region which forms the strategical key to the plain stretching towards the coast.

When the Almohades [q. v.] undertook the conquest of Eastern Ifrīqiya under 'Abd al-Mu'min (554—555 = 1159—1160), the Nafūsa were also subdued by his army. Their territory became the scene of violent struggles and massacres, of raids and partial conquests during the long period of the revolt of the Banū Ghāniya who attempted to restore the Almoravid empire and who, from 580 (1184—1185) onwards, for nearly half a century and with varying success, fought chiefly in Oriental Barbary. In these fights Arabs of the tribe of Debbāb (belonging to the Banū Sulaim), took part who had come to Tripolitania during the well known invasion of the Banū Hilāl and Sulaim. Some clans of the Debbāb, especially the Maḥāmid and the Djuwārī, settled in the coastal region west of Tripoli, where the Nafūsa had exercised their power before. Yet the great mass of the latter must have retired to the plateau not at the time of the conquest, but in consequence of the Arab invasion.

The Nafūsa remained in nearly the same attitude of defence of their independence, during the supremacy in Ifrīqiya of the Hafsids [q. v.], and, afterwards, of the Turks. While other populations in the neighbourhood gave up their Ibādism in order to embrace Sunnism, and consequently became arabicised, the Nafūsa stuck to their faith and to their Berber vernacular, withdrawing themselves to the rough crests of their mountains, and from time to time taking part in the acts of hostility and in the rebellions which the interior opposed to the efforts of the government of Tripoli to maintain its own authority and, chiefly, to levy taxes.

In the nineteenth century, the Turks, after having retaken in 1251 (1835—1836) the direct administration of Tripoli, had to fight long and bitterly for the conquest of the plateau of the Nafūsa also. The struggle lasted, with varying success, till 1274 (1857—1858); in this period the shaiḫ Ghūma b. Khālifa distinguished himself by courage and endurance; he is usually represented as the hero of Berber independence defended against the Turks. In reality, however, he was an Arab and the Arab tribe of the Maḥāmid had the largest share in the wars, while the Berbers, according to all appearance, did not take part in them on a large scale. During the Italian occupation of Tripolitania, which began in 1911, the Nafūsa were at first hostile in accordance with their old aspiration to found an independent Ibādite kingdom which should extend up to the Sea and include the region of Sabratha. Defeated in 1913 by the valiant general Lequio near al-Aṣāba'a they offered their submission to the Italian authorities and ever since have proved very faithful subjects. When inner Tripolitania, in consequence of the effects of the Great War, was troubled by rebels, they showed an heroic attachment to Italy, fighting her enemies under great sacrifices. When in 1922 the reconquest of the inland had begun, they voluntarily took part in it, side by side with the regular troops, with perfect loyalty.

AL-NAFŪSĪ ABU SAHL AL-FARISĪ, Ibādite scholar of the Rustamid family, who lived in Tāhert in the iiird (ixth) century. Some say that he was one of those who by their learning and religious zeal helped to make that town famous. He was a complete master of Berber and served as interpreter under the imām Aflah b. 'Abd al-Wahhāb in the first half of the third century A. H., or even till 258 (871—872), and under Abū Hātim Yūsuf b. Muḥammad who, with a short interruption, was imām from 281—294 (894—907). This shows that the Rustamid princes of Tāhert spoke Arabic, as was to be expected from their Oriental origin, and needed interpreters in their dealings with the Berber speaking peoples. When the Fātimids had destroyed the Ibādite power, Abū Sahl settled at Marsa 'l-Kharez (La Calle, between Bône and the Tunisian frontier); or at Marsa 'l-Dajjdjād on the Algerian coast, between 'Ain Taya and Cape Djinet (cf. e.g. al-Bakrī, ed. de Slane, Algiers 1911, p. 64 sq., 82).

Al-Nafūsī is best known as the author of a big Berber Diwān, containing religious and historical poems, both dealing probably with the doctrines and history of Ibādism. It has been lost, like so many other works of Berber Ibādites; yet perhaps parts of it may be recovered by further search in the Mzāb, at Gerba and among the Nafūsa. At any rate, Abū Sahl has an important place in the literary history of the Berbers, especially the Ibādites, who composed books on theology and law, chronicles, poetry and biographies.

Such a literary movement is usually explained by the need which the heretics felt of making clear their doctrine, especially the points in which it differed from the sunna, to the inhabitants of the interior of the Central and Eastern Maghrib, who did not know Arabic, and who must have been numerous about 1000 A. D. Yet another thing, which can be seen to-day, must not be forgotten, viz. the attachment of these peoples to their own tongue as a symbol of opposition to the Arabic speaking world in general and Muslim orthodoxy in particular. At the end of the nineteenth and beginning of the twentieth century, some Berber groups in the neighbourhood of Yefren in Tripolitania were led by Sanūsī propaganda to give up their old Ibādite faith and embrace orthodoxy. This change in its turn caused the Berber dialect to be less used; as if heresy were bound up with the national language, and the giving up of the heresy removed the last obstacle to complete arabisation. This assumption is confirmed by some religious poems (they deserve to be called literature) in the region of Fassāto, where the love of the national language is still strong. In them the author says explicitly that he uses Berber to uphold and strengthen the Ibādite faith, which once flourished gloriously, but afterwards decreased, and is now well nigh disappeared. In past times also, the Berber literature of the Ibādites was partly a symbol of non-conformity and nationalism; so when Abū Sahl, who was rooted in Arabic civilisation by his origin, devoted himself to the study of Berber so as to become the best Berber scholar of his time and to compose in it his works. He must have felt in his deeply religious mind the connection between that language and the faith he professed.

NĀGPUR, a city, taḥṣīl, district, and division of the Central Provinces of British India. The modern Central Provinces and Berār, which formed part of the eighteenth century Bhonsla kingdom of Nāgpur, lie between 17° 47' and 24° 27' N. and 75° 37' and 84° 24' E., with an area of 113,285 square miles, and a total population of 17,951,147. Nāgpur division contains a population of 3,595,578; Nāgpur district 933,168; and the city 215,003 (1931 Census Report).

The history of this area, which roughly corresponds to Gondwāna, has been profoundly influenced by the long range of the Sātpura hills through which the Burhānpur—Asirgarh gap provided the chief route from Hindustān to the Dakhan. When the Muḥammadan invaders first came into contact with Gondwāna, it contained four independent Gond kingdoms: the northern kingdom of Garhā-Mandlā; two central kingdoms with their capitals at Dēogarh and Kherla respectively; and a southern state with its capital at Čānda. In the reign of Akbar the imperial forces overran the northern kingdom forcing it to pay tribute, despite the heroic efforts of the Dowager Rānī Durgāvati. After this the political predominance of the Gond chiefs shifted to Dēogarh which in its turn also suffered from the aggressive schemes of the Mughal emperors. Early in the reign of Awrangzib a punitive force under Dilir Khān entered both Čānda and Dēogarh, with the result that, in 1670, the ruler of Dēogarh embraced Islām as the price of the restoration of his kingdom (Ālamgīr-nāma, p. 1022—27). Both these states paid tribute to the emperor through a Muslim agent stationed at Nāgpur. This however is not the earliest reference to Nāgpur in the Muḥammadan period, for the Pādshāh-nāma of Lāhawrī describes its capture by Khān Dawrān, in 1637 (for a still earlier identification see Hira Lal, p. 10).

The most famous ruler of Dēogarh was the converted Gond chief, Bakht Buland, who visited the court of Awrangzib (Ma'āthir-i Ālamgīrī, p. 273). Because of his contumacious attitude he was replaced by another Muslim Gond named Dīndār (ibid., p. 340). For some years after this Bakht Buland remained in imperial service, until, escaping from imperial control, he once more raised the standard of revolt in Dēogarh (Muntakhab al-Lubāb of Khāfī Khān, ii. 461). Although Dēogarh was recaptured for a time by Awrangzib's forces, Bakht Buland remained in open rebellion and was never really subdued. Eventually under this able ruler the Dēogarh state comprised the modern districts of Čhindwāra and Betūl, together with portions of Nāgpur, Seoni, Bhandāra and Balāghāt. The last important Gond ruler was Čānd Sulṭān who died in 1739. It was he who fixed the capital at Nāgpur which he converted into a walled town.

Internal dissensions led to the intervention of Raghudjī Bhonsla, who was governing Berār on behalf of the Marāṭhā Pēshwā. Eventually, in 1743, the Marāṭhā leader took over the administration of the country. By granting a nominal authority to the Gond Rādja, Burhān Shāh, and his descendants, the Bhonslas possessed a useful pretext for disavowing, when expedient, the rights of the Pēshwā, but in practice reference was usually made to Pūna on important matters, such as the succession. Burhān Shāh's descendants have continued to occupy the position of state pensioners, and the representative of the family resides at Nāgpur with the title of Rādja or Sansthānik. Raghudjī's reign witnessed a great influx of Kunbīs and other Marāṭhās into Nāgpur. The treacherous attitude of his successor Djānodjī led to his defeat by the combined forces of the Nizām and the Pēshwā, and to his acknowledgement of the latter's supremacy.

It was under Raghudjī II that the Nāgpur kingdom attained its greatest extent and included practically the whole of the modern Central Provinces and Berār, together with Orissa and certain of the Čutiā Nāgpur states. Unfortunately for the solidarity of his kingdom he joined forces with Sindhia against the British, and, in 1803, after the battles of Assaye and Argāon, was compelled to subscribe to the treaty of Dēogāon, by which he was deprived of a third of his dominions (Aitchison, i. 415—417). He was succeeded in 1816 by his son, Parsodjī, an imbecile, who was murdered in the following year by the notorious Āppā Šāhib. On the outbreak of war between the British and the Pēshwā, in 1817, Āppā Šāhib attacked the British Residency but his troops were defeated in the brilliant action at Sitābaldī. This resulted in the deposition of Āppā Šāhib, who was succeeded by Raghudjī III, on whose death, in 1853, without heirs, natural or adopted, this dependent principality was declared by Dalhousie to have lapsed to the Paramount Power.

The British administered Nāgpur by means of a Commission until the formation of the Central Provinces in 1861. To-day, the city of Nāgpur supports a flourishing Muḥammadan community, in the suburb of Mehdiabāgh, the members of which are Dā'udī Bohrās of the Šī'a sect [see BOHORĀS]. The members of this community live together in the buildings of the institution, where their children are educated and their women taught suitable accomplishments.

NAHIYE, an administrative district in the Ottoman empire which corresponds somewhat to the Swiss canton or French commune. It is a subdivision of the kaḏā (kaḏā, q. v.), which may be compared with the French arrondissement and is governed by a ka'im-makām [q. v.] while the nāhiye is under a mudir. This official who used to be appointed by the wālī, the governor of the province, received his instructions from the ka'im-makām, to whom he was subordinate. The subdivisions of the nāhiye are called karaye, i. e. village. The term nāhiye for an administrative district is of recent origin. For the earlier provincial administration which did not know this name, cf. A. D. Mordtmann sen., Stambul und das moderne Türkenthum, N. S., Leipzig 1878, p. 1 sqq.

NAHĪKĪ, nisba from the pre-Islāmic divine name Nahik noted by Wellhausen and Nöldeke among the Tamim, the Nakha' (of Madhḥidj) and in Mecca before Islām. — In Kūfa and Sāmarrā it was the name of the Āl Nahik, a family of Šī'ī scholars of the tribe of Nakha': descendants of Nahik, grandfather of Kumail b. Ziyād, a partisan of 'Alī, also celebrated as the founder of the Kumailiya sect (or Kāmiliya: Ibn Sa'd, vi. 124; kaḥida of Mi'dān Samiṭi in Djāhiz, Ḥayawān, ii. 98). Two of its members settled in Sāmarrā (Tusi, Fihrist, p. 203; cf. p. 179, 196): the first 'Abd Allāh b. Muḥammad (Kashī, p. 6) was the heterodox writer of the Mīmīya sect mentioned by Mas'ūdi and Ibn Ḥazm whose name Friedländer, following Barbier de Meynard, had read "Bhnik" (sic: in Heterodoxies of the shīʿites, ii. 102–103; cf. Astarābādī, Manhajī, p. 299; Wellhausen, Reste arab. Heid., p. 67, 245). (LOUIS MASSIGNON)

AL-NAHL, “the Bee”, Sūra xvi. of the Qurʾān. The title is taken from verse 70: “Thy Lord has made this revelation to the Bee”. Khāzin (iii. 105) says that it was also called “Sūra of the Herds” because there are references in several passages to cattle. As to its date, it is reckoned among the later Meccan Sūras and includes several verses of Medīnese origin; the commentators however are not agreed on this point.

The Sūra of the “Bee” contains four abrogated verses: verse 69 is annulled by v. 92; verse 84 by ix. 5; verse 108, part 1, annulled by the end of the same verse and by ix. 5.

AL-NAHR, the constellation of the River (Eridanus). It corresponds to the Ποταμός, Flumen, Amnis of the ancients (cf. Aratos, Φαινόμενα, l. 358; Geminus, Εισαγωγή; Ptolemy, Almagest). Aratos observes (l. 360) — probably one of the first to do so, — that the river of heaven represents Eridanus (Ἠριδανός, river of the morning? or river of darkness, of the west?) turned into stars, into which Phaeton, son of Helios, fell, struck by the thunderbolt of Zeus, after his unsuccessful attempt to ride to heaven. [The opinions of the Greek authors varied regarding the identity of the earthly Eridanus. It is often identified as the Po (Padus), in later times however sometimes with the Rhone (Rhodanus, probably on account of the similarity of sound with “Eridanus”) or even with the Rhine (Rhenus) while Strabo denies there was such a river for he calls it τὸν μηδαμοῦ γῆς ὄντα “the nowhere existing”]. According to another view (Eratosthenes, c. 37), the constellation of the river represents the Nile since “this alone flows from the south” just as the river of heaven at the time of its culmination seems to flow from the south point of the horizon to the north; a third group of authors see in it the figure of Oceanos.

While Aratos clearly names only that portion of the river of heaven which lies between Orion and Cetus (the Whale), Eratosthenes and Hyginos continue it in a southeasterly direction as far as the neighbourhood of Canopus (α Carinae); on the other hand, Ptolemy, like all later writers, gives it its southwesterly direction and already calls the star of the first magnitude at its southern point (α Eridani, Achernar; cf. below) ἄρχαρος τοῦ Ποταμοῦ, the position of which however he gives incorrectly as he could not himself observe it in Alexandria on account of its great southern declination ($\delta +_{100} = -67^{\circ} 25'$).

Al-Nahr is one of the constellations of the southern heavens. In the north it is adjoined by the Bull (al-Thawr), in the east by Orion (al-Djabbār, the Giant, or al-Djawwāʾ, the Bride), the Hare (al-Arnab) and the most western subsidiary stars (khāridī al-sūra) of the Great Dog (al-Kalb al-akbar), which are now included in the constellation of the Dove and the Sculptor’s Tool, in the west by the Whale (Kīṭus or Kaiṭus). The constellation of al-Nahr contains, according to ‘Abd al-Rahmān al-Šūfī (210 sqq.), primary stars (i.e. those which form the figure, kawākib min al-sūra); there are no subsidiary stars included in it. It begins with λ Eridani on the left foot of Orion (β Orionis, Rigel), winds westwards to η Eridani, then southwards to about τ¹ and eastwards via τ² as far as τ⁹ to υ¹² Eridani and finally in a southwesterly direction via i, g, h Eridani to α Eridani.

The fresco in the dome of Qusair ‘Amra shows in the surviving portion the constellation of al-Nahr as a narrow ribbon, which runs directly westwards from the raised foot of Orion, a little below the equator and parallel with the latter in the direction of the Whale.

The Arabs give to the inverted quadrilateral formed by τ Orionis, λ, β and ψ Eridani, which appears to support the left foot of Orion (Rigel) the name “fore throne (foot-stool) of Orion”, Kursī al-Djawwāʾ al-muqaddam, in contrast to his “back throne”, Kursī al-Djawwāʾ al-muʾakkhar or ‘Arsh al-Djawwāʾ. The stars ζ, ρ, η and τ¹—τ⁵ Eridani together with ε and π Ceti, which enclose an area with very few stars in it, are called Udhī al-Naʿam, “Ostrich Nest”, the numerous small stars surrounding it are called al-Baid, “the eggs”, or al-Kaid, “the egg-shells”. The most southerly star in Eridanus, also the brightest (α Eridani, first magnitude), is called al-Zalīm, the “male ostrich”, or Akhir al-Nahr, the “last of the river” (in the Alfonsine Tables) whence comes the name still used at the present day Achernar or Acarnar. Between Achernar and Fomalhaut (i. e. Fam [Fum] al-Hūt, “mouth of the fish”, α Piscis Austrini) [in the region of the present Phoenix] are a considerable number of stars which the Arabs called al-Riyāl, “the ostrich chicks”. Al-Šūfī states that in Shirāz he observed a series of stars near the horizon which had the shape of a ship (zawraḳ) (α, κ, μ, β, ν, γ Phoenixis). The brightest among them (α, according to Šūfī, of third, in reality of second magnitude) forms with α Piscis Austrini and β Ceti [Deneb (Dhanab) Kaiṭus, “tail of the whale”] an approximately right-angled isosceles triangle with a line from α Piscis Austrini to β Ceti as base, the stars within which according to al-Šūfī are also to be included in al-Riyāl. The star α Phoenixis is called al-Difdaʾ al-thūnī “the Second Frog”, in contrast to the “First Frog”, al-Difdaʾ al-awwal, which is represented by α Piscis.

NAHR AL-MALIK. [See DIDJLA.]

AL-NAHRAWĀLĪ (NAHRAWĀNĪ), Arab historian. KUṬB AL-DĪN MUḤAMMAD B. ‘ALĀʾ AL-DĪN AḤMAD B. ŠHĀMS AL-DĪN MUḤAMMAD B. KĀDĪ KHĀN MAḤMŪD AL-MAKKĪ AL-KĀDIRĪ AL-KHĀRKĀNĪ AL-ḤANAFĪ was born in 917 (1511) in Mecca, to which his father, a member of a scholarly Indian family, had migrated from Nahrawāla in Gujjarāt. To complete his studies which had been begun under his father, he went in 943 (1536) to Cairo, where he was taught by al-Suyūṭī's pupils, and to Stambul. On his return home he received a teaching appointment in the Madrasa al-Ashrafiya. In 965 (1557) he again went to Stambul via Asia Minor and afterwards was appointed to the Kanbayātiya in Mecca. When in 975 (1567) the al-Sulaimāniya Madrasa was founded for all four orthodox rites, he went to it and later became Mufti of Mecca. He died in 990 (1582; according to others in 988 or 991).

His first literary effort seems to have been a description of his second journey to Stambul, which has not survived. His other works cannot be chronologically arranged with certainty. These are the poetical anthology, intended to supply quotations for letter-writers which in the Leyden (*Cat. cod. ar.*², i. 356) MS. is called Timḥāl al-Amḥāl al-sā'ira fī 'l-Abyāt al-farida al-nādira, in the Cairo (*Fihris*¹, iv. 220; ² iii. 68) al-Tamḥīl wa 'l-Muḥāḍara bi 'l-Abyāt al-mufrada al-nādira, and a collection of riddles entitled Kanz al-Asmā' fī Fann al-Mu'ammā, which is preserved in Berlin N^o. 7346, in the Escorial (Cat. Derenbourg, N^o. 556¹), in Stambul ('Ashir Ef., iii. 107, 296) and in Cairo (*Fihris*², iii. 307), which is quoted by 'Abd al-Kādir al-Baghdādī (Khizānat al-Adab, iii. 113), and on which Mu'in al-Dīn 'Abd al-Mu'in b. Aḥmad al-Bakkā' in 993 (1585) wrote a commentary entitled *al-Tirāz al-asmā' (MSS. in Uppsala, N^o. 63; Paris, N^o. 3417, 5; Escorial, op. cit., N^o. 536, 2; extracts in Leyden, op. cit., N^o. 522). It is not possible also to date his collection of biographical matter of which there only survives the synopsis Muntakhab al-Ta'rikh in Leyden (op. cit., N^o. 1045).*

His two principal historical works date from the last decade of his life. On 1st Ramaḍān 981 (May 3, 1573) he finished his history of Turkish rule in the Yaman entitled al-Barq al-Yamānī fī 'l-Fath al-Oṭhmānī; it begins with the year 900 (1494), describes the first Turkish conquest under the vizier Sulaimān Paṣha, the return of the Zaidis and the second conquest by the grand vizier Sinān Paṣha, to whom the work is dedicated; an appendix describes his conquest of Tunis and Goletta. He prepared a second edition after the accession of Sultān Murād III in 982 (1574); cf. S. de Sacy, in N.E., iv. (1787), p. 412—521 and to the MSS., in G.A.L., ii. 382 add Leyden, op. cit., N^o. 944; Paris (Blochet, Cat. des Mss. Ar. des nouvelles acquisitions, N^o. 5927), Escorial (Lévi-Provençal, N^o. 1720; Cairo, *Fihris*², v. 56), also D. Lopes, Extractos da historia da conquista da Faman pelos Othmanos texto ar. con trad. e notas, Lisbon 1892. In 985 (1577) he finished his history of Mecca dedicated to Sultān Murād, entitled al-I'tām bi-A'lām Balad (Bait) Allāh al-ḥarām, which Wüstenfeld published in the Chroniken der Stadt Mekka, vol. i., Leipzig 1857, and is printed Cairo 1303, 1305 (on the margin of Aḥmad b. Zaini Dahlān's Khulāṣat al-Kalām fī Bayān Umarā' al-Balad al-ḥarām), 1316; to the MSS. given in G. A. L., ii. 382 may be added Tübingen, N^o. 23; Paris, N^o. 1637—1642, 4924, 5932, 5999; Leyden (*Cat.*², i., N^o. 926—930); Cambridge (Browne, N^o. 4—44); Ambrosiana, H, N^o. 116 (Z. D. M. G., lxi. 77); Vaticana, N^o. 284; Sulaimāniya, Stambul N^o. 815; Nūri 'Oṭhmāniya, N^o. 3047; Cairo (*Fihris*², v. 32); Cat. Bankipore, xv. 1085; Aṣafiya, p. 178. This work was translated into Turkish by the famous poet Bākī [q. v.] (MSS. in Gotha, N^o. 158; Vienna, N^o. 895; Or. Ak., Krafft, N^o. 260; Cambridge, Suppl., N^o. 72; ed. by Gottwaldt, Kasan 1286). A synopsis entitled I'tām al-'Ulamā' al-A'lām bi-Binā' al-Masḥūd al-Ḥarām, MSS. Leyden, op. cit., N^o. 931; Cairo, *Fihris*², v. 32; Bankipore, xv. 1089, was made by his nephew Bahā' al-Dīn 'Abd al-Karīm b. Muḥibb al-Dīn b. 'Alā' al-Dīn, b. 29th Shawwāl 961 (Sept. 26, 1554) at Aḥmadābād in Guḍjarāt, brought up in Mecca by his uncle, then teacher in the Madrasa al-Murādiya, 982 (1575) Mufti of Mecca, 990 (1582) Imām al-Ḥaram, d. 15th Dhū 'l-Hidjja 1014 (April 24, 1606) (al-Muḥibbi, Khulāṣat al-Aṭhar, iii. 8).

His son Muḥammad in 1005 (1596) wrote a history of Mecca and Medina and of the exploits of Ḥasan Paṣha who became wālī of Yaman, entitled Ibtihād al-Insān wa 'l-Zaman fī 'l-Iḥsān al-wāṣil li 'l-Ḥaramain min al-Yaman bi-Maw-lāna 'l-'Adil al-Bāshā Ḥasan, Leyden, op. cit., N^o. 937; Cairo, *Fihris*¹, v. 2; ² v. 3.

NAHRAWĀN, or, according to the popular pronunciation, NIHRAWĀN (Yāqūt, iv. 846 sqq.), name of a large territory between Baghdād [q. v.] and Wāsiṭ [q. v.], known through the battle between 'Alī and the Khāridjites [q. v.] in 38 (658).

NAHW (A.), lit. direction, path, also intention, but gradually acquired the special meaning of grammar. The Arab philologists divide it into two branches: accidence, 'ilm al-ṣarf or taṣrif, comprising the theory of verbal stems and their conjugation, the formation of nouns and adjectives, the formation of the plural and of the feminine, etc., i. e. with individual word-forms only, and syntax, 'ilm al-naḥw in the narrower sense. The fundamental grammatical conceptions of the Arab philologists are taken from Aristotelian logic, which came via Syrian scholars to the Arabs (on the dependence of the Arabic phonetic system on the Indian, cf. Brockelmann, G. A. L., i. 97). As the beginnings of Arabic learning in general are lost in obscurity, so also is the origin of the appellation naḥw uncertain even to the Arabs themselves. The caliph 'Alī is said to have instructed Abu 'l-Aswad al-Du'ālī, who is regarded as the founder of the 'ilm al-naḥw, how he should divide up the subject and to have ended by saying: unḥu, "take this path", whence the new science received the name of naḥw. According to another story, Abu 'l-Aswad himself laid down the principles of Arabic grammar and said to the people: unḥuhu, "follow this", from this the name naḥw is said to be derived. The stimulus to deal with the problems of language is said to have come from the caliph 'Alī; he, the story goes, taught Abu 'l-Aswad the fundamental principles of naḥw and expounded to him the division of all language into three categories: ism, fī'l and ḥarf. Another explanation as to how Abu 'l-Aswad came to lay down the principles of Arabic grammar seems to be nearer the actual facts. Ziyād b. Abīhi [q. v.] asked him to put on record the principles of grammar which 'Alī had taught him; but he was reluctant to do this and asked the governor to excuse him this task. When however on one occasion he heard a Qur'ān reader make a mistake, which destroyed the sense, in reading the sacred book, he declared himself ready to carry out the task. He therefore had a clerk come to him, to whom he dictated and said: "When you see me in pronouncing a letter open the mouth completely (fataḥa), put a point above the letter; when I close it completely (ḍamma), put a point in front of it, and when I half close it (kasara), put the point below the letter". In this way the invention of vowel signs is traced back to Abu 'l-Aswad. Another story, which deals with the same question, tells how a newly converted mawlā made a grammatical error in the hearing of Abu 'l-Aswad; one of the latter's household laughed at this but Abu 'l-Aswad said: "These are mawlās who long for Islām, who accepted it and thereby have become our brethren. How would it do if we were to draw up the laws of language for them? He thereupon prepared the chapter on subject and object". There must certainly be an element of at least probability in these anecdotes. By the accession of non-Arabs to Islām the danger arose that the Arabic language might be corrupted by foreign elements; there was further the demand that the sacred text of the Qur'ān should be read aloud without error and its meaning accurately interpreted; there thus arose the necessity for a systematic investigation of the language of the sacred book and the laying down of the rules of its language, so that those ignorant of the language could guide themselves. Other anecdotes which relate to the problem of the origin of nahw and all of which, of course, like those already given, are to be regarded as awṭ'il, also describe Abu 'l-Aswad as its founder, so that he may with justice be called the earliest Arabic philologist (naḥwī). None of his writings has come down to us. He is regarded as the founder of the philological school of Baṣra, the origin of which must therefore go back to a very early period (Abu 'l-Aswad died about the end of the first century A. H.). Only to mention some of the most important, to this school also belonged Abū 'Amr b. al-'Alā and his pupils Abū 'Ubaida and al-Aṣma'i, to whom we owe much of our knowledge of the Djāhiliya, Sībawaihi, whose great work on grammar became "the book" par excellence, Khalil, who is regarded as the inventor of the system of prosody, and many others. Very early there arose in the new city of Kūfa a rival to the scholars of Baṣra. There also learned men began to deal with linguistic problems. While at first ideas were exchanged between the two schools, and students went from Kūfa to Baṣra to study, and well known Baṣran scholars came to Kūfa; gradually a considerable rivalry arose between the two. The Baṣrans laid greater stress on grammatical principles than the Kūfans and were in general regarded as more faithful and more accurate transmitters. The questions disputed and the differences between the two schools are dealt with in a work by 'Abd al-Rahmān b. Muḥammad b. 'Ubaid Allāh b. Abi Sa'īd b. al-Anbārī. To the Kūfan school also belonged al-Kisā'ī and al-Mufaḍḍal al-Dabbī. After the third century the centre of Arab learning was transferred to the capital of the Islāmic empire, Baghdād. In the new Baghdād school which arose there the differences in point of view between the Kūfan and Baṣran schools gradually disappeared.

(ILSE LICHTENSTÄDTER)

NĀ'IB (A.), literally "substitute, delegate" (nomen agentis from n-w-b "to take the place of another"), the term applied generally to any person appointed as deputy of another in an official position, and more especially, in the Mamlūk and Dihli Sultānates, to designate a. the deputy or lieutenant of the Sultān and b. the governors of the chief provinces (see also the article EGYPT, above, vol. ii., p. 164). In the Mamlūk system the former, entitled nā'ib al-saltāna al-mu'azzama wa-kāfil al-mamālik al-sharifa al-islāmiya, was the Vice-Sultān proper, who administered all the territories and affairs of the empire on behalf of the Sultān. This was, however, only an occasional office, and its holder is to be distinguished from the nā'ib al-ghaiba, the temporary governor of Cairo (or Egypt) during the absence of the Sultān or of Damascus during the absence of the nā'ib al-saltāna. The six niyābas of Syria which replaced the Ayyūbid mamlakas — Damascus, Ḥalab, Tripolis, Ḥamā, Ṣafad and al-Karak (their number was from time to time increased by the erection of Ghazza and other districts into separate provinces) — were each administered by a nā'ib al-saltāna (also entitled kāfil al-mamlaka), who was an "amir of a thousand", the nā'ib of Damascus being superior to the others. At the end of the viiith (xivth) century Egypt also was divided into three similar niyābas: Alexandria (from 767), Upper Egypt (al-waḍīh al-barī or al-ḫibīlī) and Lower Egypt (al-waḍīh al-baḥrī). The plain title of nā'ib was held by the commandants of the citadels of Cairo, Damascus, Ḥalab, etc., who were not under the jurisdiction of their respective governors, and by various amīrs of lesser rank holding subordinate commands. (For an instance of more recent use, see art. SHĀMIL).

In the Dihli Sultānate the nā'ib was the powerful minister who was the deputy of the king himself. The earliest reference to the office seems to be the appointment of Ikhtiyār al-Dīn Aitigin as deputy on the accession of Sultān Mu'izz al-Dīn Bahrām Shāh in 637 (1240) (Minḥādī al-Dīn, Ṭabaqāt-i Nāṣiri, in Bibl. Ind., p. 191). In fact, the support of the nobles was conditional upon the appointment of this person to the deputyship. Although this was a separate office from that of the wazīr, nevertheless under powerful nā'ibs, like Malik Kāfūr in the reign of 'Alā' al-Dīn Khaldījī and Khusrāw in the reign of Mubārak Shāh, its existence was not conducive to the growth of the powers of the wazīr.

In its most common acceptation, in Persian and Turkish as well as later Arabic, nā'ib signified a judge-substitute, or delegate of the qāḍī in the administration of law. In modern Arabic it means usually a Parliamentary deputy, while al-nā'ib al-'umūmī is the Public Prosecutor, the head of the Parquet (al-niyāba al-'umūmiyya).

NAWĀB [for nawwāb, intensivum of nā'ib (but not employed in Arabic), a puristic correction for nurwāb, shortened from nawwāb, the Arabic plural of nā'ib, employed as plur. dignitatis], the term used under the Mughal rulers of India to designate a viceroy or governor of a province. It is not known when the title first became current. It is sometimes found in combination with other titles, e.g. the Nawāb-Wazīr of Oudh, the Nawāb-Nāẓim of Bengal. The Nawāb of Arcot (Carnatic) was a governor under the authority of the Nizām of Haidarābād.

Nawwāb (Nawāb) is used also in Persia as a title of royal princes, and in India as an honorific, without necessarily having any office attached to it.

NABOB is an English corruption of Nawāb, which was also applied in a derogatory sense to wealthy Anglo-Indians who had returned from the east. It has been suggested that the term first became familiar to Englishmen in the second half of the eighteenth century.

NĀ'ILA. [See ISĀF.]

NĀ'ILĪ, properly YENI-ZADE MUŞTAFĀ ÇELEBİ, called after his father PİRİ KHALİFA also PİRİ-ZADE, a celebrated Ottoman poet. He is usually described as Nā'ili-i Qādim, "old Nā'ili", to distinguish him from Yeni Nā'ili, young Nā'ili, the poet and mewlewī Nā'ili Şālih Efendi of Monastir, author of several Şūfī works who died in 1293 (1876) in Cairo.

Nā'ili was one of the greatest Ottoman poets of the post-classical period, the period of the weak sultāns (Murād IV, İbrāhīm and Mehmed IV, 1058—1115 = 1648—1703), of rule by women and eunuchs (Kösem Sultān, Bektāsh Agha and Murād Agha) and of the grand vizierate of the Köprülü. He is a link between Nefī' and Yahyā and Nābī and Nedīm. He and Yahyā are the best poets between Nefī' and Nābī, the reviver of Ottoman literature.

Born in Constantinople, on the conclusion of his education he became secretary in the dīvān-i humāyūn and was ultimately a khalifa in the office of the Department of Mines (ma'den kalemī). As his Dīvān shows, he belonged to the Khalwetī order. He was a weak, delicate man of feeble constitution who died in 1077 (1667—1668) in exile, it is said, into which he had been sent by Fāzil Aḥmad Paşa Köprülü. Brusali Mehmed Tāhir's statement that his tomb was in the cemetery of the Sümbülü monastery in Fındıklı and that his remains were removed to the cemetery of Pera, when the road was widened, cannot be quite reconciled with the story of his banishment.

Nā'ili is one of the most interesting figures in the history of Turkish poetry. He did not, it is true, contribute anything essential to the actual development of Ottoman literature and gave it no new inspiration. He was an innovator but only in the field of style and language. He steadily worked to break down the rigidity and monotony of the post-classical school. His style is extremely artificial. His language is full of Persicisms but not in quite the same way as in the preceding periods. His diction is full of unusual Persian images and expressions with which he enriched the Turkish language in brilliant verses, somewhat exhausting however through the obscurity of their allusions. The fine new phrases and expressions are however not his own but are simply borrowings. Nā'ili succeeded in clearing away the stagnation of the literary language of the time by dropping the trite and hackneyed metaphors and phrases, which had been found in all dīvāns since Bākī and borrowed new phrases and constructions from the Persian.

Although he wrote in Turkish his diction is purely Persian. He follows his Persian models so slavishly that his language is unintelligible to a Turk who does not know Persian. But the Ottoman poets wrote only for themselves and their equals and not for the people whom they ignored.

Nā'ili is the chief representative of the highly developed and marvellously elaborated literary language in which, as Gibb says, a rich and delicate Persian embroidery is harmoniously sewn upon the Turkish background, while the two languages remain sharply distinguished from one another.

Nā'ili's characteristics are a charming freshness of phraseology, subtlety of imagination, an artificial, individual style, gracefulness, clarity and purity of language, succinctness of expression and polished style such as no poet of his time possessed. According to Mu'allim Nādjī, no Turk can read him without enthusiastically trying to imitate him, which is however hardly possible. His language is so finished and free from all superfluity that the meaning is often obscure and unintelligible. There is however a great deal that charms the reader, especially as his language is most melodious.

As a poet he has not the same powers as he has as a master of language and style. It is his language and not his poetic conception that is his strong point. He did not seek inspiration from his surroundings, like Yahyā, but from his Persian models.

Nā'ili's literary work consists only of a Dīvān, which was printed in Bulāk in 1253 (1837) (only about a third of the MSS. was printed however). It consists of four very fine hymns in honour of the Prophet (nā't), some 20 kaşidas the language of which resembles that of Nefī' and shows the same exaggeration. The kaşidas are dedicated to Murād IV and Mehmed IV, to the grand-viziers Kara Muştafā Paşa (1048—1053), Mehmed Paşa (1053—1055), Şālih Paşa (1055—1057), Şūfī Mehmed Paşa (1058—1059), to the Shaikhs al-Islām Behā' Efendi, Yahyā Efendi, Hāfiz Mehmed Efendi, the Defterdār and others. The Dīvān also contains a touching merthiye (elegy) written in the terdji-bend manner on the death of his brother who died young, which is almost too extravagant with its effective refrain; also a takhmīs, and some müseddes in the terdji and terkib manners and a terkib-bend.

His most important and most characteristic work is however over 200 ghazels in which he imitates Fuzūlî. In them he continually produces new expressions, new ideas and images, new significances of words. Besides a passion kept within natural bounds and a tenderness of feeling, which reminds one of Nedîm and makes a deep impression on any lover, there is an undeniable pessimism, reminiscent of Nâbî, in his outlook on life, probably as the result of political conditions and his poor health. Occasionally there is something cold and forced about him. One feels that his spirit is ill and troubled.

Na'îlî especially influenced Thâbit and Nazîm. His principal successors as poets were Hersegli 'Arîf Hikmet and Yenîshehîrlî 'Awnî.

NA'ÎMÂ, MUŞTAFÂ, a Turkish historian. Muştafâ Na'im known as Na'imâ was born in 1065 (1655) in Aleppo. After becoming a teberdâr (halberdier) in 1100 (beg. Oct. 26, 1688) in the imperial palace, he was promoted to be a secretary in the Diwân under the grand vizier Kalâ'ilîkoz Aĥmad Paşa. On the 28th Djumâdâ I 1116 (Nov. 28, 1704) he became chief accountant of Anatolia and in 1121 (1709) succeeded Ni'metî as master of ceremonies and imperial historian (vekhâ'f muwis; q. v.). He later filled several other offices (cf. F. Babinger, G. O. W., p. 245) and during the campaign in the Morea was assistant to the commander-in-chief (ser'asker). He died at the beginning of 1128 (Jan. 1716) at Old Patras, where he was buried in the outer court of the mosque which has now disappeared. On his tombstone cf. Brûsalf Mehmed Tâhir, 'Othmânîlî Mü'ellifleri, iii. 151 below, and on his death the firmân of the middle of Shawwâl 1128 in Aĥmad Rafîk, Hicri on ikinci asırda İstanbul hayatı (1100—1200), Stambul 1930, p. 52 sq.

The candid and accurate history of the Ottoman empire, which he wrote in his official capacity and which he based upon earlier histories like the works of Kara Çelebi-zâde [q. v.], Wedjîhî [q. v.], Aĥmad Şârik al-Manâr-zâde, Hâdjidjî Khalîfa [q. v.] and the imperial Ottoman history mentioned at the end of his work as begun but not finished by a certain 'İsmetî (cf. J. v. Hammer, G. O. R., iii. 326), covers the years 1000 (beg. Oct. 9, 1591) to 1070 (beg. Sept. 8, 1659). The full title of this much esteemed and largely used work is Rawdat al-Husain fî Khulâsat Akhbâr al-Khâfî-kain, in Hâdjidjî Khalîfa, No. 14525 called simply Ta'rih-i Wekâ'î.

Muştafâ Na'imâ also wrote several political treatises (Resâ'il-i siyâsiye), which have survived in a collected volume.

Na'imâ interpreted his duties as a historian very seriously and his incorruptible love of the truth secured his work a superiority over those of all other Ottoman historians of the time. On Na'imâ's view of the "duties of the historian" cf. his own words in A. W. Duda, Türkische Post, year iii., Stambul 1928, No. 324, p. 2. The original MS. of his Ta'rih is in Stambul in the collection of the Eriwan-Köshk. On the four editions and their variations cf. F. Babinger, G. O. W., p. 246; on the third edition see also J. A., 1868, i. 468. A French translation (still in MS.) was prepared by Antoine Galland (Fonds Français, No. 12,197 in the Bibliothèque Nationale); specimens of it were published by N. Jorga in the Actes et fragments à l'histoire des Roumains, i. (Bucharest 1895) p. 55.

NAKHČUWĀN (NAKHČEWĀN), a town to the north of the Araxes.

The town Nažovâna is mentioned in Ptolemy, v., ch. 12. The Armenians explain the name of Nakhčawan (Nakhčuan) by a popular etymology as nakh-idjewan ("Noah's first stopping-place" (although the name is apparently compounded with -awan "place") and locate the town in the province of Waspurakan (cf. Yâkût, i. 122), or in that of Siunikh. According to Moses of Chorene, i. ch. 30, Nakhčewan was in the area peopled by Median prisoners (mar) in whom we should see the ancestors of the Kurds of this region (cf. Balâdhuri, p. 200; nahr al-Akrâd). In the early Arab sources we find the form Nashawâ, Balâdhuri, p. 195, 200; Ibn Miskawaih, ii. 148; Sam'ânî, p. 560; Nashawâ. In the Saldjûk and Mongol period the predominant form is Nakdjuwân (as early as Ibn Khurdâdhbih, p. 122).

The town was conquered under 'Othmân by Ĥabîb b. Maslama. It was rebuilt under Mu'âwiya by 'Azîz b. Ĥâtîm. In 87 (705) the Arabs hanged a large number of Armenian notables, whereupon the town acquired a Muslim character. For a short time (about 900) the power was in the hands of the Bagratuni, but the town was reconquered by the Sâdjids [q. v.] and belonged henceforth to the domain of their vassal, the amîr of Golthn (Ordûbâd); cf. Markwart, Südarmenien, Vienna 1930, preface, p. 79, 93, 99—101, 115; text, p. 300, 362, 567. It figures in the wars of the Dailamî period (Ibn Miskawaih, ii. 148) and in the events of the Saldjûk period (cf. Ibn al-Athîr under 514 A. H.).

Nakhčuwân is more particularly associated with the family of Îldegizid atâbegs of Âdharbâidjân (531—632 = 1136—1225), cf. Mirkhwând, Rawdat al-Safâ, Lucknow 1894, p. 875—876) whose main centre it was, as is shown by the fine buildings a. the tomb (mashhad) of al-ra'îs al-adjall Rukn al-Dîn Djamâl al-Islām muḥaddam al-mashā'ikh Yūsuf b. Kaṭhīr (المالك (?), dated 557 (1162—1163); b. the tomb built by Shams al-Dīn Nuṣrat al-Islām Ildegiz for the malika Djalāl al-Dunyā wa 'l-Din Mu'mina khātūn (probably his wife, former wife of the Seldjūk Tughril II, d. 568, Ta'rikh-i Guzida, p. 472); on Ildegiz's stay at N. in 568, cf. Ibn al-Aṭhīr, xi. 290; c. the portico (now in ruins) built in 582 (1182) by the Atābek Abū Dja'far Muḥammad Pahlawān b. Ildegiz. Some localities depending upon N. (Erndjak etc.) were given in fief to the Georgian prince Elikum Orbelian by his brother Kīzl Arslan. When the Khwārizmshāh Djalāl al-Dīn exercised power in Ādharbaidjān, N. belonged to al-Malik al-Djalāliya, daughter of Muḥammad Pahlawān, Nasawī, ed. Houdas, p. 76, 266, 300. Under the Mongols the town was devastated, as is attested by Rubruck who visited it in 1253, ed. 1839, p. 384, cf. Howorth, History of the Mongols, iii. 82. The town suffered also from the wars between Turkey and Persia (under Murād IV); Ewliyā Čelebi, ii. 240, Tavernier (1664), ed. 1713, i. 53—55, and Chardin (1673), ed. 1711, i. 179, found it in ruins. Nakhčuwān was only rebuilt after 1828 when the khanates of Eriwān and Nakhčewān were ceded to Russia. Under the Persians, Nakhčewān (with the district of Āzā-Djirān = Ordubād) was directly under Ādharbaidjān and not Eriwān. Kalb 'Alī Khān of Nakhčewān was blinded by Aḳa Muḥammad, founder of the Qādjār dynasty. The last chief of Nakhčewān before the Russian occupation was Karīm Khān Kangarli. The nā'ib appointed by the Russians were Ihsān-Khān and Shaikh 'Alī Beg. The maḥall of the khanate were: Nakhčewān, Alindja-čay (Armenian Erndjak), Mawāzi-khātūn, Khok, Daralagez, and those of Āzā-Djirān: Ordubād, Akulis, Dasta, Bilāw, Činanāb. Among the dependencies of Nakhčuwān, Djulfa (since 1828) on the Russian-Persian frontier is very well known (Armenian Djuta) with the ruins of the old town and of an old bridge. (Zafar-nāma, i. 399; pul-i diyā al-Mulk) and the bridge on the Tabriz-Djulfa railway (built in 1906).

In 1834, after the Russian occupation (Dubois) the khanate (the town and 179 villages) numbered 30,323 inhabitants (besides 11,341 inhabitants of Ordubād and its 52 villages). In 1896 the town numbered 7,433 inhabitants (4,512 Muslims and 2,376 Armenians) and the district (uyezd) 86,878. In 1913 the town had 8946 and the district 121,365. After the Russian revolution of 1917, the greater part of Nakhčewān was made an autonomous republic (area 5,988 sq.km. with, in 1926, 12,611 urban, 92,345 rural inhabitants). This republic formed a kind of dependency of the more important Muslim republic of Ādharbaidjān (Bākū), from which it is separated however by the Armenian lands of the High Karabagh.

Nakhčewān on the Don is the settlement of Armenian colonists founded in 1780 on the Don and is at the present day a suburb of Rostov.

NAKHSHAB, a town in Bukhāra, also called Nasaf by the Arab geographers (cf. the similar evolution of Nashāwa from Nakhčawan). The town lay in the valley of the Kashka-Daryā, cf. Ibn Hawḳal, p. 376: Kashk-rūd, which runs southwards parallel to the Zarafshān (river of Samarkand) and runs towards the Amū-Daryā [q. v.] but before joining it disappears in the sands. Nakhshab lay on the road joining Bukhārā to Balkh 4 days' journey from the former and eight from the latter (cf. Muḥaddasī, p. 344). In the time of Iṣṭakhri (p. 325) the town consisted only of one quarter (rabaq) and a ruined citadel (kuhandiz). The river ran through the centre of the town (Ibn Hawḳal, p. 378).

The Mongols from the time of Čingiz-Khān (1220) used the region of Nakhshab for their summer encampments. The Čaghatāis Kābāk (1318—1326) and Qazan (killed in 1347) had palaces built there, as a result of which the whole district was called Qarshī ("palace" in Mongol) [q. v.] Qarshī is often mentioned in the time of Timūr (Zafar-nāma, i. 111, 244, 259 etc.) but it was eclipsed by Kish (Shahr-i Sabz, q. v.), the birthplace of Timūr, 3 days' journey above Qarshī. The citadel of Qarshī was of considerable strength and valiantly resisted Shaibānī Khān (cf. Shaibānī-nāma, ed. Mélioransky, p. 29) and 'Abd Allāh Khān of Bukhārā (in 965 = 1558). From the xviiith century onwards Qarshī began to rise at the expense of Kish and before 1920 was the second town of the khanate of Bukhārā with a population of 60—70,000.

The problem of identifying the ruins in the district of Qarshī has been studied on the spot by L. A. Zimin, who formulates his conclusions as follows: 1. The ruins of the ancient Nakhshab are around the hill of Shulluk-tapā (cf. Mahdī Khān, Ta'rikh-i Nādiri on the events of 1149) which marks the site of the old citadel, already in ruins in the xth century. 2. As a result of the erection of the Mongol palaces somewhere to the south of the river, the town begins to shift southwards, and at the end of the xivth century when Timūr built a citadel there it must have occupied in part the site of the modern Qarshī. 3. The remains of this citadel (which Shaibānī Khān and 'Abd Allāh Khān besieged in vain) ought to be sought near the ruins of Qal'a-yi Zahāk-i Mārān (about 2 miles S. W. from Qarshī).

NAKSHABĪ, SHAIKH DIYĀ' AL-DĪN (d. 751 = 1350), a famous Persian author (not to be confused with the famous Shāikh Abū Turāb Nakhsabī, d. 245 = 860). Very little is known of his career.

His nisba suggests that he came from Nakhsab [q. v.] but he went to India where he became a murid of Shāikh Farid, a descendant of the celebrated Shāikh Ḥamid al-Dīn Nāgūrī. The Akhbār al-Akhyār of 'Abd al-Ḥaḳḳ Dihlawī (Dihlī 1309, p. 104—107) says that he died in Badā'un after a long and contemplative life and that his tomb is there. Nakhsabī was a prolific writer who used his knowledge of Indian languages to translate Indian books into Persian. His best known work is the Tūfi-nāma ("Book of the Parrot") very popular in India and Central Asia, based on the Sanskrit Āṇḍasaptatī (partly translated into Greek by D. Galanos, Athens 1851). In the preface to this book Nakhsabī tells us that one of his patrons showed him an old Persian translation of this work and persuaded him to do it again as the language of the old translation was too simple and artless. Nakhsabī set to work and made a book of 52 chapters (called "nights") replacing some stories which did not seem to him sufficiently interesting by better ones.

The book, completed in 730 (1330), is in the usual form of a framework with inset stories and is characterized by unusually fine language and bold metaphors and similes. Nakhsabī's language however seems to have been too difficult and precious for later generations as by command of the Emperor Akbar, Abu 'l-Faḍl b. Mubārak rewrote the book in a simplified version (Rieu, p. 753^b). This version however was completely supplanted by Muḥammad Qādirī (xviith century) who reduced it to 35 chapters. Qādirī's version became the foundation of a large number of translations into Hindi (Āwārī and Ghawwāṣī), Bengali (Caṇḍicarāṇa Munshi), Turkish (Şarī 'Abd Allāh Efendi, pr. Bulāḳ 1254 and Constantinople 1256) and Qazan Tatar. There is also a metrical version in Persian by Ḥamid Lāhūrī (Bland, in J. R. A. S., ix. 163). The same theme is taken by a number of popular versions which were disseminated in Persia in cheap lithographs under the title Čil (čihil) Tūfi ("40 parrots"). The text of one of these was published by V. Zhukovski (St. Petersburg 1901). Nakhsabī's work was known in Europe as early as 1792 when M. Gerrans published a free English translation of 12 nights. Qādirī's version was translated into German by C. I. L. Iken (Stuttgart 1822); this edition contains an essay on Nakhsabī and specimens of his Tūfi-nāma by Kosegarten. The Turkish version was translated into German by L. Rosen (Leipzig 1858). So far no complete translation of the original work of Nakhsabī has been published although there is a French translation in MSS. in Munich. E. Berthels has translated the book into Russian but this version is also still in manuscript. The eighth night was published in original text and German translation by H. Brockhaus (Leipzig 1843 and in Blätter für literarische Unterhaltung, 1843, No. 242, 243, p. 969 sqq.). Nakhsabī's other works never attained anything like the popularity of the Tūfi-nāma but have almost all come down to us. Among them are: Gulriz "Scattered Roses", a novel dealing with the loves of Ma'sūm-shah and Nūshāba (pr. by Agha Muḥammad Kāzīm Shirāzī and K. F.

Azoe, Calcutta 1912, in Bibl. Ind.); Djuz'iyāt u-Kulliyāt ("Particulars and Generals") also called Čil Nāmūs (Rieu, p. 740^a), an allegory which deals with the descriptions of the various parts of the human body considered as the noblest work of God and as proof of His greatness; Ladhdhat al-Nisā', a Persian version of the Koka-Sāstra, an Indian work on different temperaments and sexual intercourse; Silk al-Sulūk, a collection of sayings of celebrated mystics (lith. Dihlī 1895), and Naṣā'ih u-Mawā'iz, a brief treatise of a Sūfī nature (Rieu, p. 738^a). His treatise ‘Ashara Mu-bashshara is only known from its mention in the Akhbār al-Akhyār (see above). All the prose works of Nakhsabī are embellished with ḳif'as scattered through them, which show that he was also an excellent poet.

NAKĪR. [See MUNKAR.]

NAQSHBAND, MUḤAMMAD B. MUḤAMMAD BAHĀ' AL-DĪN AL-BUKHĀRĪ (717—791 = 1317—1389), founder of the Naqshbandī Order. His name, which signifies "painter" is interpreted as "drawing incomparable pictures of the Divine Science" (J. P. Brown, The Darvishes, 2nd ed., p. 142) or more mystically as "holding the form of real perfection in the heart" (Miftāḥ al-Ma'ryā quoted by Ahlwardt, Berlin Catalogue, No. 2188). The title al-Shāh which is given him in a dirge cited in the Rashahāt means "spiritual leader". The nisba al-Uwaisī implies that his system resembled that of Uwais al-Karānī. His Acta were collected by one of his adherents, Ṣalāḥ b. al-Mubārak, in a work called Maḳāmāt Sa'iyidīnā al-Shāh Naqshband, which furnished material to the author of Rashahāt 'Ain al-Hayāt (893 = 1488), and from which large citations, apparently in the words of Naqshband himself, but translated from Persian into Arabic, are given in the modern work al-Ḥadā'iq al-wardīya fi Ḥaḳā'iq Adjillā al-Nakshbandīya by 'Abd al-Madīd b. Muḥammad al-Khānī (Cairo 1306). He was born in a village at the distance of one farsakh from Bukhārā, called Kushk Hinduwān, but afterwards Kushk 'Arifān. At the age of 18 he was sent to Sammās, a village one mile from Ramithan and three from Bukhārā, to learn Sūfism from Muḥammad Bābā al-Sammāsī. In this person's system the dhiḳr was recited aloud; Naqshband preferred that of 'Alā' al-Dawla 'Abd al-Khālīq al-Ghudjdawānī (d. 575 A. H.), who recited it to himself; and this led to ill-feeling between him and the other adherents of al-Sammāsī, who however, it is stated, ultimately confessed that Naqshband was right, and on his deathbed appointed him his khaliḳa. After this person's death he went to Samarḳand, and thence to Bukhārā, where he married, and whence he returned to his native village; thence he went to Nasaf, where he continued his studies under a khalīfa of al-Sammāsī, Amīr Kulāl. He then lived for a time in villages near Bukhārā given as Zewartūn and Anbikta, then studied with a khalīfa of Amīr Kulāl named 'Arīf al-Dīk-kirānī for seven years; after this he spent twelve years in the service of the Sultān Khalīl, whose rise to sovereignty is described by Ibn Baṭṭūṭa (iii. 49), and whose capital appears to have been Samarḳand. After this monarch's fall (747 = 1347) he returned to Zewartūn, where he practised philanthropy and the care of animals for seven years, and road-mending for another seven. The last years of his life appear to have been spent in his native village, where according to the Rashahūt he was buried. Vámbéry (Travels in Central Asia, 1864) gives Baveddin, two leagues from Bukhārā, as the name of the village which contains his tomb, "whither pilgrimages are made even from the most remote parts of China, while it was the practice in Bukhārā to go thither every week, intercourse with the metropolis being maintained by means of some 300 asses plying for hire".

The biographies bring him into connection with various places and persons. At Herāt a banquet was given in his honour by the Amīr Ḥusain (b. Ghīyāth al-Dīn al-Ghūrī; cf. Ibn Baṭṭūṭa, loc. cit.), where in spite of the Amīr's assertion that the food had been honestly obtained Nakshband refused it, and it had to be given away in charity. He was with this prince also at Sarkhas. Two or three pilgrimages and visits to Baghdād, Nisābūr and Tāyābād are mentioned. His sayings were collected by Muḥammad b. Muḥammad al-Ḥāfiẓ al-Bukhārī at the request of 'Alā' al-Dīn 'Aṭṭār al-Bukhārī (d. 802 A.H.) (Brit. Mus. Add. 26,294). Persian writings by him are mentioned in the Ḥadā'iq.

NĀKŪS (A.), pl. nawākīs, a kind of rattle used and in some places still used by Christians in the east to summon the community to divine service. It is a board pierced with holes which is beaten with a rod. The name, which comes from the Syriac nākūshā is not infrequently found with the verbs ḍaraba or ṣakka in the old Arabic poets, especially when early morning is to be indicated, e.g. 'Antara, app.; Labid, N^o. 19, 6; Z.D.M.G., xxxiii. 215; Mutalammis, ed. Vollers, p. 178, v. 6; al-A'shā in Nöldeke's Delectus, p. 26; Kitāb al-Aghāni, xix. 92. According to tradition, Muḥammad hesitated between this instrument and the Jewish trumpet before deciding on the call to prayer by the mu'adhḥins [s. ADHĀN].

AL-NAMĀRA, 1. a place in Syria. It is situated in the ḥarra of al-Ṣafa' on an eminence in the Wādī 'l-Shām, which runs from the Djebel al-Drūz (Djebel al-Hawrān) to the plain of Ruḥba, at the spot where it joins the Wādī 'l-Sa'ūṭ. It corresponds to the Roman military post of Namara (Waddington, Inscriptions, N^o. 2270). Less than a mile S. E. of al-Namāra, Dussaud found the Nabataean-Arab tomb inscription of the "King of all the Arabs", Maru 'l-Kais bar 'Amru, i. e. the Lakhmid Imru 'l-Kais b. NĀMĪK KAMĀL BEY. [See KEMĀL MEḤMED NĀMĪK.]

AL-NAML, the Ants, the title of Sūra xxvii. of the Qur'ān, the whole of which was revealed at Mecca. Nöldeke puts it among the Sūras of the second period. It contains 95 verses. Its title is taken from verse 18: "When the armies reached the valley of the Ants one of them said: 'O ye ants, return to your homes lest Solomon and his armies crush you without noticing it'". It contains one verse that was abrogated (verse 94 annulled by ix. 5).

(MAURICE CHEMOUL)

NAMRUD, also NAMRUḌH, NIMRUD, the Nimrod of the Bible, is associated in Muslim legend, as in Haggada, with the story of the childhood of Abraham. The Qur'ān, it is true, does not mention him but probably, as in many other cases, only from dislike of mentioning names. That Muḥammad was acquainted with the legend of Namrüd is evident from the following verses. "Do you not see how he disputed with Ibrāhīm about the Lord who had granted him dominion? When Ibrāhīm said: It is my Lord who gives life and death, the other replied: I give life and I slay. When Ibrāhīm said: God makes the sun rise in the east; do you make it rise in the west; then the liar was humbled" (ii. 260). The Qur'ān exegetists are probably right when they see Namrüd here disputing with Ibrāhīm and also when they refer to Namrüd the verse: "What did Ibrāhīm's people answer? They only said: Kill him, burn him; but God saved him from the fire" (xxix. 23). The legend is already richly developed in Ṭabarī, but it is at the beginning of the romance of 'Antar in the Abraham midrašh that we find its most luxurious development.

Ṭabarī already numbers Namrüd among the three or (with Nebuchadnezzar) four kings who, like Sulaimān b. Dāwūd and Dhū'l-Karnain, ruled the whole world. His astrologers told him that a child would be born who would overthrow his kingdom and destroy his idols. Ibrāhīm thus becomes one of those heroes of legend who are persecuted from the moment of birth by a tyrant, to whom they are destined to prove fatal, like Moses, Gilgamesh, Semiramis, Sargon, Karna (in the Mahābhārata), Trakhan (King of Gilgit), Cyrus, Perseus, Telephus, Agesthus, Oedipus, Romulus and Remus, Jesus (see Frazer, Folklore in the Old Testament, ii. 437—455). Ūsha, the wife of Āzar or of Tārikh (Terakh), is able to deceive Namrüd and his searchers. Ibrāhīm is born in concealment; maturing rapidly, he engages in a religious dispute with Namrüd; Namrüd cannot be God for God gives life and death. Namrüd replies that he can do this also for he can execute or pardon a man condemned to death. Namrüd has Ibrāhīm thrown into the fire; it becomes a cool health-resort. An angel keeps Ibrāhīm cool at which Namrüd marvels like Nebuchadnezzar at the preservation of the three young men in the fiery furnace (Daniel iii. 24 sq.). Namrüd resolves to attack the God of Ibrāhīm in his heaven. He feeds four young eagles on meat and wine till they are of a great size, ties them to the four corners of a chest, fastens a spear at each corner with a piece of meat on the point and sits in the chest; the eagles, trying to reach the meat, fly higher and higher. The mountains appear like antheaps and later the whole world looks like a ship in the water. It is in vain however for he falls to earth. Next he builds a tower in order to reach the god of Ibrāhīm, then the tongues are confused; in place of one Syriac tongue, 73 arose. God's angels admonish Namrüd. But he equips his armies against God. God sends an army of gnats against him, who eat the flesh and drink the blood of Namrüd's men. A gnat enters Namrüd's brain through his nose. For 400 years he had exercised his tyrannical rule and for 400 years he was tortured by the gnat until he died.

Muslim legend derives the name Namrüd from tamarrada: he who rebelled (against God). But there is another derivation, viz. from namra "tigress" in that version of the Namrüd legend in which Namrüd is suckled by a tigress. This version resembles the Romulus and Remus story (Jean de l'Ours) and culminates in the Oedipus story for Namrüd, brought up unknown, kills his father and marries his mother. Al-Kisā'i has preserved

Namrüd's father Kana'an b. Kūsh has a dream which troubles him; it is interpreted to mean that his son will kill him. The child is born, a snake enters his nose, which is an ominous sign. Kana'an wants to kill the child, but his mother Sulkhā entrusts him secretly to a herdsman; the latter's flocks scatter at the sight of the black flat-nosed infant. The shepherd's wife throws the child into the water; the waves wash him to the bank where he is suckled by a tigress. Already dangerous when quite a boy, as a young man he becomes a robber leader, attacks Kana'an with his band, kills him (without knowing that he is killing his father), marries his own mother and becomes king of the country and later lord of the world. Āzar (already in the Qur'ān the father of Ibrāhīm) builds him a marvellous palace flowing with milk, oil and honey, with mechanical singing birds — in the mediæval epic the wonderful feature of the Chrysotriklinium in Byzantium. The lore of astrology, the inheritance of Idris and Hermes he acquires by force from the pupils of Idris. Iblis teaches him magic. He has himself worshipped as a god. Then dreams, voices and omens frighten him. In spite of all Namrüd's cruel orders, Ibrāhīm is born, brought up and soon shatters the belief in Namrüd. Namrüd throws those who believe in God to the wild animals but they do not touch them. He denies them food; the sand of the desert becomes corn for them; on every grain of it is written: "gift of God". Namrüd throws Ibrāhīm into the fire but he is unharmed. Namrüd builds up a pile of fuel, the flames of which burn the birds for miles round — it is impossible to approach it. Iblis then designs a ballista which hurls Ibrāhīm on to the flaming pile. Ibrāhīm spends the finest time of his life there under blooming trees and amid rippling brooks. Namrüd then decides to attack the God of Ibrāhīm in heaven. Starved eagles fly up with his litter, until he hears a voice saying the first heaven is 500 years in width, it is 500 years between heaven and heaven, then comes infinity. Namrüd shoots an arrow against God; the arrow comes back stained with blood. Namrüd suddenly becomes grey and old and falls to the ground. But he plumes himself on having slain God. Then a gnat puts an end to his life.

The history of the Namrüd legend. Very little can have been taken from the Bible. Qur'ān expositors and collectors of legends call Namrüd ḏjabbār (tyrant) no doubt after the gibbor applied to Namrüd in the Bible (Gen. x. 6); Geiger also sees in ḏjabbār 'anid (xi. 62) an allusion to Namrüd. Ṭabarī (i. 217) also describes Namrüd as a mutadabbir. Muslim legend and Haggada (Targ. Shenī on Esther I, i.; Midr. Hagadol, ed. Schechter, p. 180—181; Gaster, Exempla of the Rabbis, N. 1) make Namrüd ruler of the world. From Haggada comes the association of Namrüd with the Tower of Babel and in particular with the childhood of Abraham, and with the latter's rescue from the fire (Gen. Rabba, xlix., l.). The death of Namrüd caused by the gnat is also based on Haggada, which makes Titus, the destroyer of the Temple, die in this way. Nebuchadnezzar comes to a similar end (see Grünbaum, Neue Beiträge, p. 97—99). The flight to heaven especially in the romance of 'Antar with the intervals of 500 years recall the ascent of Nebuchadnezzar in the Talmud (Chagiga, p. 13^a). But the flight has far more resemblance to that of Shāh Kai-Kā'ūs as described by Firdawsī (ed. Mohl, ii. 31—34). The Namrūd legend borrows from many directions. Ṭabari mentions that Namrūd had been identified as the Persian Ḍahhāk (Annales, i. 253) but he refutes this idea (Annales, i. 323, 324). Bible, Haggada and Persian epic were further developed, the marvels increased, an early history invented, Namrūd made an Oedipus, and in the Sīrat 'Antar he becomes the hero of a romance. The Muslim Namrūd legend then found its way into the late Jewish legend of Abraham. Bernard Chapira (see below) has published one such in Hebrew and Arabic. He is certainly wrong in taking seriously the authorship of Ka'b al-Aḥbār, this is one fiction out of many thousands. But the mutual influence of Haggada and Muslim legend is indisputable. The later Midraš, as M. Grünbaum has clearly shown, Pirkē R. Elieser, Tanna de bē Eliyahu, Midraš Haggadōl, Sefer haiyāshār, Shebet Mūsār of R. Eliyah Hakkohen from Smyrna, is influenced in the sections on Abraham and Nimrod by Muslim literature.

NĀMŪS (A.) is a word of many meanings. In St. John's Gospel xv. 26, the coming of the paraclete is announced. In the preceding verse a passage from the Psalms referring to the haters is quoted and ἐν τῷ νόμῳ αὐτῶν given as source. The verses in the Gospel from 23 on were already known to Ibn Ishāk in an Arabic version which came from a Syriac one as the reproduction of "paraclete" by al-manahmānā shows. In the same source the word νόμος was left untranslated: for we find it in Ibn Hishām in the form nāmūs. Biographical tradition makes Waraḳa b. Nawfal expressly assert the identification of Muḥammad with the paraclete promised by Jesus mentioned in the passage from the Gospel. The oldest forms of the tradition giving this episode represent a combination of the Gospel passage with Sūra lxi. 6. In later developments of the tradition the idea of a paraclete gradually falls into the background till it was finally interpreted as the name of an individual and even received an epithet. Thus we read in Ibn Hishām, p. 153 that Waraḳa replied as follows to his cousin who asked him about Muḥammad's first vision: "If thou hast reported the truth to me then truly the greatest nāmūs has come to him, who used to come to Mūsā, and then he (Muḥammad) is the prophet of this umma etc." In Ṭabari the "greatest nāmūs" is in a gloss expressly said to be Djibril.

As the personal interpretation is not sufficiently explained by meanings, known to be really old, of the true Arabic word nāmūs (root n-m-s) which exists alongside of the Greek loanword, and meanings like "the trusted one, confidant of a secret" seem rather to come from the Greek loanword already known in its reference to Djibril (against Dozy, Supplément, s. v.), it was natural to look for a specific use of the word νόμος which admitted of a personal interpretation and could at the same time have been known to the Arabs. Nyberg was reminded by the nāmūs doctrine of the Ikhwān al-Ṣafā' (see below) of the pseudo-Clementine writings; and T. Andrae derives the nāmūs of the Waraḳa tradition from the νόμος αἰώνιος of the pseudo-Clementines, which according to the book Κήρυγμα Πέτρου was revealed to Adam and afterwards again appeared to all prophets worthy of such an honour, lastly to Moses and to Jesus. However startling the agreement of the conception of νόμος αἰώνιος with the later forms of the Waraḳa tradition, the question still remains open, by what way a personal conception of νόμος could have entered Islām. Baumstark quoted a passage from the liturgy of St. James of Jerusalem: ἐκαλέσας αὐτὸν διὰ νόμου, ἐπαυδαγώγησας διὰ τῶν προφητῶν and observes that the liturgy was the authoritative one in the Beduin camps and must have existed in an Arabic translation. It is really quite natural to understand νόμος personally here. No explanation of our Waraḳa tradition can on the other hand be obtained from Mandaean writings as Lidzbarski has already pointed out in his translation of the Ginzā, p. 247 sq.

That there is a true Arabic word nāmūs has already been mentioned. The dictionaries give such varied meanings for it that we can only consider as old and original those that are confirmed by quotations. This holds for the meanings "hiding place, hunter's hut, monk's cell" probably also for "buzzer, midge" as nomen agentis from n-m-s to "buzz". On the other hand, not only the meaning "cunning" and its derivatives must be secondary, but also the already mentioned meanings referred to persons, the latter especially because the word so far as we know, is used also in the later literature predominantly in the material sense and the person connected with the idea is called ṣāhib al-nāmūs etc. (counter-example: Dozy, s. v.). Just as the material meanings predominate generally, so also does the meaning of the Greek loanword predominate, apart of course from the old poetry, from which the meaning "midge" and particularly the word nāmūsiya "mosquito net" have survived into the modern vernacular. Below we shall therefore deal only with the development of meaning of the Greek loanword.

The favourite meaning is divine law, with or without the addition of ilāhī. This law is revealed through the prophets, and only men of prophetic spirit can be wāḍi' al-nawāmīs in this sense. The double character, political and religious, of the Muslim constitution naturally very much favoured this conception. Thus, for example, al-Kāḷashandī, Ṣubḥ al-A'ṣhā, i., Cairo 1903, p. 280 gives as the first among the 'ulūm shar'īya, 'ilm al-nawāmīs al-muta'allāḥ bi 'l-nubuwwa. Ibn Sina expressly observes in his encyclopædia Aḫsām al-'Ulūm al-'aḥliya (in Madjmu'at al-Rasā'il, Cairo 1328, p. 230 sq.) in treating of politics that the pertinent works of Plato and Aristotle understand by vóμoc not "cunning" and "deceit", corresponding to the usage of the vernacular, but sunna, revelation, etc., for the laws of the community are dependent on prophecy and the divine law; similarly Sprenger, Dict. of Technical Terms, i. 40. Abū al-Haiyān al-Tawhīdī devotes the fourth of his Muḳābasāt to the nāmūs ilāhī (new ed., Cairo 1929).

Here we may mention Miskawaih's (Ibn Miskawaih) definition which is also of literary interest. In connection with his discussion of the function of the ḍinār as a measure of the equivalence (ʿadāla) of service and reward (Tahdhīb al-Aḫlāk, maḳāla iv., e. g. Cairo, Khairiyya, 1322, p. 38), he quotes an alleged saying of Aristotle according to which the ḍinār is a just nāmūs. Nāmūs, he adds, in striking contrast to Ibn Sina, means in Greek, siyāsa and tadbīr [q. v.]; Aristotle says in the Eth. Nic., the greatest nāmūs proceeds from God, the second is the judge, the third the ḍinār; the first, as a condition for just settlement between the claims of men, is the example which the two others follow. The well-known filiation of the Muslim books on Hellenistic ethics has resulted in this explanation finding a place in later derivatives from Miskawaih, e. g. in Naṣīr al-Dīn al-Ṭūsī, Aḫlāk-i Nāṣirī, i. 2, 7 (e. g. Tabriz 1320, p. 152), also Kīnālīzāde ʿAlī b. ʿAmr Allāh al-Ḥinnāʾī, Aḫlāk-i ʿAlāʾī (1248, i., p. 78) and each more fully than the preceding. As a result of these expositions al-Ṭūsī in the economic part of his book (ii. 2, p. 254) calls gold briefly the smallest nāmūs (translation in Plessner, Der ökonomische des Neupythagoreers „Bryson“, 1928, p. 63); and Kīnālīzāde also follows him (ii., p. 7).

The nāmūs doctrine of the Iḫwān al-Ṣafāʾ can only be briefly outlined here. In part i., p. 56 (Bombay ed.), the nāmūs is defined as a spiritual kingdom (mamlaka rūḥāniyya) which is upheld by 8 kinds of men. God appears as the wāḍiʿ al-nāmūs. Ṣāḥib al-nāmūs is from the context Muḥammad, in so far as one can identify from the context any individuals in the pages of the Iḫwān al-Ṣafāʾ. A few pages later Muḥammad is described as the wāḍiʿ al-nāmūs. In part iv., p. 57, the angels appear as teachers of the aṣḥāb al-nawāmīs. Any one who does not guide his life according to the commands and prohibitions of the latter, has no share in divine nāmūs (iv. 147). This spiritual kingdom is the element of the Iḫwān al-Ṣafāʾ; they slept in the cave of their father Adam [q. v.] for a long period until the fore-ordained time (miʿād) came under the rule of the Lord of the greatest nāmūs (Muḥammad?) and they perceived their spiritual state (madīna) which was raised in the air and from which Adam and his wife had been banished (iv. 107). If the Iḫwān al-Ṣafāʾ by common effort and uniform self instruction succeed in building a perfect spiritual state (fāḍila, cf. al-Fārābī!), this state will belong to the kingdom of the Lord of the greatest nāmūs, who has dominion over souls and bodies (iv. 211). The nāmūs thus even becomes a kind of divine being, where there is a discussion of the "philosophic service of God", which represents the higher stage in comparison with that of the Muslim teaching regarding obligations and duties. This philosophic service of God had been, they say, practised by the ancient Greeks on the first, middle, and last day of the month. The night of the first day was divided into three parts. The first was spent in worship of nāmūs, the second in meditation on the malakūt, the third in humble prostration before the Creator, confession of sins and repetition of prayers by Plato, Idrīs and Aristotle until the break of day (iv. 273 sqq.). Nevertheless the nāmūs here has not exactly taken the place of God. But in several passages of the encyclopædia he is represented as giving names. Thus he calls the spirits of the planets angels (ii. 97; cf. iv. 244); he does the same with the natural forces (ii. 102) and (iii. 10) with the nature of origin and decay. Above the spheres (dawāʾir) of the three kingdoms of nature and of man is the sphere of the divine nāmūs, whose members deal with the affairs of the nawāmīs and the divine revelations and which corresponds to the "surrounding" (ninth) sphere of the astronomers (iv. 251). As the nāmūs and the ability to become creative in him involves a special organisation of man, he has found an allegorical place in the physiology and psychology of the Iḫwān al-Ṣafāʾ; here indeed the conception changes from page to page. Thus in the first part of the work (2nd half, p. 48) five kinds of soul are described, two above and two below that of man. The former two are the soul of the angels and the divine (ḥudsiyya) soul, one of which is the stage of the soul of wisdom, the second that of nāmūs-prophethood. On the very next page the one is the intellectual soul of wisdom and the other the nāmūs-like angel soul. On p. 54 we find the following gradation: nature, soul, intellect, nāmūs. Nature receives through the soul free-will, through the intellect the power of thought and through the nāmūs commands and prohibitions. The parts of the soul are as follows: vegetable, animal, logical (human), intellectual (wise), nāmūs, angelic, which latter serves the nāmūs. Here again there is the tendency to personification. It is in keeping with this when in iv. 119 (cf. also iv. 146) the story of Socrates in prison (in agreement with the Greek tradition and mentioning the Phaedo) it is related that Socrates will not escape from prison for fear of the nāmūs; he justifies his attitude with the words: "He who does not respect the nāmūs is slain by it". When immediately afterwards the nāmūs is identified with the ṣarīʿa, it is difficult to say whether this is serious or only done out of caution. It is nevertheless remarkable that the sixth essay of the fourth part which treats of the nature of divine nāmūs, of the qualifications for prophethood and the qualities of a prophet, does not contain the word nāmūs at all but instead of it always has ṣarīʿa. The Iḫwān have spiritual powers of their own; these form a series of four stages, the third of which is the ḥuwwa nāmūsīyya; man attains it at 40 and it is the special characteristic of kings and rulers. Possessors of this power are called the distinguished and noble (fuḍalāʾ, kirām) brethren. Above it is only the ḥuwwa malakiyya (iv. 134 sq.).

The origin of the meaning "cunning" cannot be given with certainty; it possibly comes from the Arabic meaning "place of concealment". That it was particularly common in the spoken language is evident from the quotation given above from Ibn Sīna. In any case this meaning has undergone a remarkable amalgamation with the Greek "law" in the literature of magic for the word is there used for magical formulae, particularly those which are based on illusions of the senses. The pupil of al-Anṭākī [q. v.] in his Dhail on the latter's Tadhkira, s. v. simiyā (iii., Cairo 1924, p. 56), gives the namāwis as the first section of the science known by this name. But the meaning of the word is not limited to this kind of magic formulae.

Through translations from the Arabic the word entered the Hebrew literature of the middle ages with the meaning "law, religious law (of other peoples), morality, propriety"; in the latter meaning it has survived in the modern Hebrew vernacular. It is interesting to note that in the modern dialect of Mecca a similar change of meaning is found; according to Snouck Hurgronje, Mekkanische Sprichwörter, N^o. 10, nāmūs means the "spotless, honourable name" which one has among men; its opposite is 'ar, "shame".

The word nāmūs also plays a considerable part as the title of books.

The "greatest nāmūs" also occurs as the title of a book; cf. Ivanow, Catalogue, i. 335 sq.

NĀR. [See DIHAHANAM.]

NARSHAKHĪ, ABŪ BAKR MUḤAMMAD B. DJĀ'FAR (d. 348 = 959), author of the "History of Bukhārā", the original Arabic version of which he presented to the Sāmānīd Nūḥ b. Naṣr in 332 (943—944). In 522 (1128—1129) the book was translated into Persian by Abū Naṣr Aḥmad b. Muḥammad al-Kubāwī who omitted several "tedious" passages. Then in 574 (1178—1179) Muḥammad b. Zūfar prepared a new abbreviated edition of the book which he presented to Ṣadr 'Abd al-'Azīz b. Burhān al-Dīn, governor of Bukhārā. Finally an unknown author continued it down to the Mongol conquest. It was in the last form that the book was published by Schefer. The book contains many interesting notes on the situation in Central Asia before Islām and details not found elsewhere of the Arab conquest (from Madā'inī?). The Persian translator added further details from the works of Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Abd al-Rahmān b. Muḥammad al-Nishāpūrī and probably from [Abū Ishāk] Ibrāhīm

[b. al-'Abbās al-Šūlī], d. in 243 (857). The information about the townships of the district of Bukhārā, their monuments, their products, their old customs (such as lamentation for Siyāwush, p. 21) is very interesting.

The only translation so far is that into Russian by N. Lykoshin, Tashkent 1897 (ed. by Barthold). Cf. NASĀ (often NISĀ), the name of several places in Persia: in Khurāsān, Fārs, Kirmān and Hamadhān; cf. Yāqūt, iv. 778. (According to Bartholomae, nisāya means "settlement").

1. Nasā in Khurāsān was situated in the cultivated zone which lies north of the range separating Khurāsān from the Turkoman steppes. It corresponds to the Nisāia, Nisaiou pedion of the classical authors, celebrated for its breed of horses (Herodotus, iii. 106; cf. Strabo, xi., ch. xiv., § 7). Alexander the Great is said to have built an Alexandropolis at Nisāia. According to Isidore of Charax, ed. W. Schoff, Philadelphia 1914, p. 8, the tombs of the Parthian kings were in the town of Nisā. Rawlinson, in J.R.A.S., 1839, p. 100, believed he saw in the stock of Turkoman horses descendants of the ἵπποι Νισαίου [Avesta, Videvdāt, i. 7 seems to have a different locality in view].

According to Iṣṭakhri, the town of Nasā was very like Sarakhs (i. e. like the half of Marw) and had much water, many gardens and green places and the country round was very fertile. Muḥaddasī, p. 320, 331—332 says that the ten gates of the town were buried in verdure. He confirms the abundance of springs but says the water was not of good quality. Muḥammad Nasawī, Sīrat Djalāl al-Dīn, ed. Houdas, p. 22, says that the place was very unhealthy on account of its very warm climate and that the Turks could only live a short time there. According to Nasawī, p. 50, the town had a strong citadel. The number of tombs of shaikhs and famous men was so great that the Ṣufis called Nasā "little Damascus", cf. the biography of Shaikh Sa'īd (Asrār-i Tawhīd, ed. Żukowsky, p. 45) written in the xith century.

Yāqūt, iv. 776—778 places Nasā 5 days' journey from Marw, one day from Abiward and 6—7 days from Nishāpūr. Of its dependencies he mentions: i. 480: Bālūz (> Firūza); i. 857: Taftāzān; iii. 343: Shahristān; iii. 866: Farāwa (= Kīzīl-Arwat); iv. 328: Kauk. Durūn, with the fortress Tāk (afterwards Yazir) also belonged to Nasā, cf. Barthold, A istorii orosheniya Turkestana, p. 37—41. Cf. also the Ta'rikh-i Nādirī of Mahdī Khān (Nādir's stud was at Khurramābād, cf. under the year 1044). The ruins of the capital of Nasā are near the little town of Bagir about 12 miles from Ashkhābād and 8 from the station of Basmā'in on the Trans-Caspian railway.

2. The Nasā in Hamadhān perhaps corresponds to the Nisāya placed by the inscription of Darius (Behistun, i. 13) in Media. It is possible that the reference is to the plains of northern Luristān [q. v.] (Alishtar, Khāwa) where the well-known bronzes of Luristān were found; cf. Minorsky, in Apollo, London, Feb. 1931.

NASAF. [See NAKHSHAB.]

AL-NASAFI, nisba [cf. NASAF] of several eminent persons of whom the following may be mentioned:

I. ABU 'L-MU'IN MAIMUN B. MUHAMMAD B. MUHAMMAD ... B. MAKHUL ... AL-HANAFI AL-MAKHULI (d. 508 = 1114), one of the mutakallimūn [q. v.] whose scholastic position is between that of the early period as represented by 'Abd al-Kāhir al-Baghdādī [q. v.], who is still endeavouring to find a convenient arrangement and an adequate formulation of the contents of kalām, and the younger mutakallims who have at hand the necessary formulas for ready use. Of his works the following are known to me:

1. Tamhīd li-Kawā'id al-Tawhīd (Cairo, MS. 2417, fol. 1—30; cf. Fihris... Miṣr, ii. 51), a treatise in which the contents of the creed are proved according to the scholastic method. The first chapter consists of an exposition of the doctrine of cognition, the last of the doctrine of the imāmate. The work closes with a murshida which contains the doctrina de Deo in an abridged form; 2. Taḥṣirat al-Adilla (Cairo, MSS. 2287, 6673; cf. Fihris... Miṣr, ii. 8), an elaborate work on dogmatics of nearly the same scheme as the Tamhīd; 3. Baḥr al-Kalām, printed at Cairo 1329 (1911), differs from the two foregoing works in so far as it deals with heresies and is polemical. It is identical with Mubāhathat Ahl al-Sunna wa 'l-Djamā'a ma'a 'l-Firaḳ al-Dālla wa 'l-Mubtadi'a (Leyden, cod. or. 862) as well as with 'Aḳā'id' (Berlin, N^o. 1941; cf. Ahlwardt, Verzeichniss, ii. 400). The work is preserved in several libraries under one of these titles (Brockelmann, G. A. L., i. 426, where the number of five works must be reduced to three).

Bibliography: in the art.; cf. also Ḥājjidjī Khalifa, ed. Flügel, index, N^o. 6453.

II. ABU ḤAFṢ 'UMAR NAJIM AL-DIN (d. 537 = 1142), jurist and theologian. Of his works the only one edited is the 'Aḳā'id', which has the form of a catechism. It became popular and was much commented, probably because it was the first abridged form of the creed according to the scholastic method of the new orthodoxy. In Europe it became known as early as 1843 through the edition by Cureton (The Pillar of the Creed, N^o. 2). For editions of and commentaries on this work as well as for the other works of this scholar that have come down to us, cf. G. A. L., i. 427 sq.

(A. J. WENSINCK)

AL-NASAFI, ḤAFIZ AL-DIN ABU 'L-BARAKĀT 'ABD ALLĀH B. AḤMAD B. MAḤMUD, an important Hanafī legist and theologian, born in Nasaf in Sogdiana, was a pupil of Shams al-A'imma al-Kardārī (d. 642 = 1244—1245), Ḥamid al-Din al-Darī (d. 666 = 1267—1268) and Badr al-Din Khwāherzāde (d. 651 = 1253). He taught in the Madrasa al-Kuṭbiya al-Sultāniya in Kirmān, came in 710 to Baghdād and died in Rabi' I 710 (August 1310; according to Ḳurashī and Ibn Taghribirdī: 701) apparently on his way back to Idjādī (in Khūzistān), where he was buried. His pupils were Muzaffar al-Din Ibn al-Sa'ātī, author of the Madjma' al-Bahrain (d. 694 = 1294—1295), and Ḥusām al-Din al-Sighnākī, a commentator on the Ḥidāya (d. 714 = 1314—1315) [cf. AL-MARGHINĀNĪ].

The best of his works is thought to be the Kitāb al-Manār fī Uṣūl al-Fiqh, a concise account of the foundations of law (Dehli 1870, Constantinople 1326 and often later); there are numerous later commentaries but he himself wrote two, one of which is entitled Kashf al-Asrār (2 vols., Būlāḳ 1316). Out of his original plan of writing a commentary on the Ḥidāya of al-Marghinānī [q. v.] there came the lawbook modelled on it Kitāb al-Wāfi, on which he composed in 684 a special commentary, the Kitāb al-Kāfi (delivered in lectures in Kirmān in 689). He had previously prepared a synopsis of the Wāfi entitled Kanz al-Daḳā'iq (Cairo 1311, Lucknow 1294, 1312, etc.) which Ibn al-Sa'ātī in 683 (this is no doubt the correct reading for 633 in Kaffawī) heard him deliver in Kirmān. This synopsis was used as late as the sixteenth century in Damascus and at the al-Azhar in Cairo (v. Kremer, Mittel-Syrien u. Damaskus, Vienna 1853, p. 136; do., Ägypten, Leipzig 1863, ii. 51). The best known printed commentaries on the Kanz are: a. Tabyīn al-Ḥaḳā'iq of al-Zaila'ī (d. 743 = 1342—1343) in 6 vols., Būlāḳ 1313—1315; b. Ramz al-Ḥaḳā'iq of al-'Ainī (d. 855 = 1451) in 2 vols. Būlāḳ 1285 and 1299; c. Tabyīn al-Ḥaḳā'iq of Mollā Miskīn al-Harawī (written in 811 = 1408—1409), Cairo 1294, 1303, 1312; d. Tawfiḳ al-Rahmān of al-Tā'ī (d. 1192 = 1778), Cairo 1307 etc.; e. the most important: al-Baḥr al-rā'iq of Ibn Nudjaim (d. 970 = 1562—1563) in 8 vols., Cairo 1334.

He also wrote a series of commentaries, e.g. two on the Kitāb al-Nāfi' of Naṣir al-Din al-Samarḳandī (d. 656 = 1258) entitled al-Mustasfā and al-Manāfi'; on the Manẓūma of Naḍīm al-Din Abū Ḥafṣ al-Nasafī (d. 537 = 1442—43) on the differences of opinion between Abū Ḥanīfa, his two pupils, and al-Shāfi' and Mālik entitled al-Mustasfā, as well as a synopsis entitled al-Muṣaffā (finished on 20th Sha'bān 670); cf. Brockelmann, G. A. L., i. 428; also on the Muntakhab fī Uṣūl al-Din of Aḳhsikātī (d. 644 = 1246—1247; Ibn Taghribirdī, Ḥājjidjī Khalifa, N^o. 13095). On the other hand, he did not write a commentary on the Ḥidāya, as Ibn Kuṭlūbughā and Ḥājjidjī Khalifa, vi. 484 say (cf. the story of the origin of his Wāfi according to al-Itkānī [d. 758 = 1357] in Ḥājjidjī Khalifa, vi. 419). He also wrote a commentary on the Ḳur'ān, Madārik al-Tanzil wa-Ḥaḳā'iq al-Ta'wīl (printed in 2 vols., Bombay 1279, Cairo 1306, 1326).

His confession of faith al-'Umda fī Uṣūl al-Din (apparently also called al-Manār fī Uṣūl al-Din: Ḳurashī, Ibn Duḳmāk) became known quite early in Europe from Cureton's edition (Pillar of the creed, London 1843). In it he closely follows the 'Aḳā'id' of Naḍīm al-Din al-Nasafī (see above) and also wrote a special commentary on it: al-Ḳ'imād fī 'l-i'tikād.

AL-NASAṢĪ ABU 'ABD AL-RAḤMĀN AḤMAD B. SHU'ĀIB B. 'ALĪ B. BAḤR B. SINĀN, author of one of the six canonical collections of traditions [cf. HADITH], d. 303 (915). Very little is known about him. He is said to have made extensive travels in order to hear traditions, to have settled in Egypt, afterwards in Damascus, and to have died in consequence of ill-treatment to which he was exposed at Damascus or, according to others, at Ramla, in consequence of his feelings in favour of 'Alī and against the Umayyads. On account of this unnatural death he is called a martyr. His tomb is at Makka. Al-Nasaṣī's collection of traditions is divided into 51 chapters, each of which is subdivided into bābs. As to the subjects, considerable space is given to traditions dealing with the ceremonial duties ('ibādāt); the chapters ihbās, nahl, rukba and 'umrā (forms of bequest, donation etc.) do not occur in any of the other collections, although a part of the materials contained in them appears under different heads. On the other hand, chapters on eschatology (fiṭan, ḥiyāma, etc.), on hero-worship (manāḥib etc.), on the Kuṣ'ān are lacking.

Brockelmann mentions two other works by al-Nasaṣī: Fī Faql 'Alī, published at Cairo 1308, under the title Kitāb Khaṣā'is Amir al-Mu'minin 'Alī b. Abī Ṭalīb, and Kitāb al-Du'afā' (G. A. L., I, 182).

NAṢARĀ. Christians, more especially the adherents of the Oriental churches living under Muslim rule (differentiated from Rūm "Greek Christians", Ifrandj "Western Christians"). The word is derived from the Syriac Naṣrayā (Horowitz, Koran. Untersuchungen, p. 144 sqq.); the Arabic singular is Naṣrānī.

A. Before Islām.

A complete investigation of the materials for the history of Christianity in Arabia and among the Arabs before the rise of Islām has not yet been made, and only the principal facts can be summarily given here.

Christianity naturally spread into Arabia from Syria and al-ʿIrāq though no date can be given for the earliest infiltration. Bishops of the encampments are early mentioned but they should probably be assigned to Syria. Arab Christian history may be said to begin with the conversion of Ghassān [q. v.]; the chief al-Hārith b. Djabala was an ardent monophysite and in A. D. 542 or 543 he persuaded the empress Theodora to appoint Jacob Baradaeus as bishop of Edessa with a wandering commission, and Theodore as bishop of Buṣra in the monophysite cause. Nestorian Christianity came to Ḥīra [q. v.] at an early date. Its bishops are often mentioned from A. D. 410 till c. 1000 and a monastery was built there by 410. Three Nestorian patriarchs were buried there. Al-Mundhir III (d. 554) [cf. LAKHM] was a pagan though he had a Christian wife, who built the convent called after her Dair Hind, while some of the notables were also Christian. Theological controversy in the Greek empire drove many monophysites into exile in Ḥīra; in 518 a monophysite monastery existed, and from 551 monophysite bishops are recorded. Nu'mān III was converted c. 593 by the Nestorians.

Nestorian missions followed the trade routes, one of which followed the coast. Bishops in the district of Baḥrain are recorded in 575 and 676, in the island of Samāhīdj in 410, and in 'Umān in 424. Another route was across the peninsula. One story says that Naḍjran was evangelised by a native who was converted in Ḥīra; another sends monophysite exiles thither from Ḥīra, while a third brings the evangelist from Syria. Christianity had probably reached Naḍjran before 400. The Abyssinians invaded south Arabia in the beginning of the sixth century and conquered the country. As soon as they had withdrawn, a chieftain Masrūk or Dhū Nuwās, who was a Jew by religion, attacked and persecuted the Christians not only in Naḍjran but also in Ḥaḍramawt in 525. A second Abyssinian expedition defeated Masrūk, who was slain or drowned, and Abyssinian rule was firmly established. Probably these expeditions were part of Greek policy to set up an obstacle to Persia and crusading motives were secondary. The invaders would have introduced the monophysite faith if it was not already present. When the Persians conquered south Arabia they naturally then favoured the Nestorians. The great church of Ṣanʿā' seems to have been built on the site of a pagan sanctuary and a Nestorian bishop was appointed c. 800 A. D. [cf. ABRAHA, ḤIMYAR, ṢANʿĀ].

From the borders Christianity percolated into the interior. Bishops are recorded at Aila [q. v.], Dūma [cf. DJAWF] and Taimā', and most of the tribes in the north had some knowledge of the faith even if the saying attributed to 'Alī, "All they know of Christianity is wine-bibbing", is exaggerated. The tribes most affected were, in the west Salīḥ, Ghassān, Djudhām and Lakhm, in the east Taghlib, Bakr with ʿIdjl, Ḥanifa, Rabʿa, Tamīm and Tanūkh, and in the centre Ṭayy with Tha'laba and part of Kuḍā'a.

B. Under Islām (mediæval period).

1. History. It is generally recognised that the attitude of Muḥammad towards the Christians, which had at first been favourable, changed towards the end of his life: probably when the expanding boundaries of the Muslim state brought him into contact with Christian tribes [cf. art. MUḤAMMAD, iii. 735^a]. The problem of subject Christians scarcely arose during his lifetime, since his relations with Christian tribes and settlements (e. g. Aila, Dūma) were generally regulated by treaties, the best known of which is that concluded with the Christians of Nadjirān [q. v.]. By the terms of this treaty, the latter were allowed to keep their religion and manage their own affairs, if they paid a fixed tribute, entertained the Prophet's representatives for a month, gave certain supplies in the event of a war in the Yaman, and abstained from usury. To the same period belongs the general command given in the Qur'ān (ix. 29) to fight against those who have received a book until they pay tribute (here called al-djizya, q. v.) and are humbled.

The conquests of Khālīd b. al-Walid suddenly made the problem acute. During the reign of 'Umar it was solved, like all the problems of the state, in a hand to mouth way, usually by applying the precedent of the Nadjirān treaty. Hīra, the cities of Syria and Mesopotamia made individual treaties with the Muslim commanders; the terms differ in detail, but all include a fixed tribute. Muslim governors were set over the provinces and big towas, but the minor officials were not changed. The people paid much the same taxes as before and there was little interference with their social and religious life. Sometimes a church or part of one was taken and turned into a mosque; more often, probably, churches and monasteries were respected, as also were existing property rights. On the occupation of al-'Irāq there was a movement among the tribes to seize the conquered lands, and it would seem that a district was for a time assigned to the tribe Badjila (cf. Balādhuri, p. 267 sq.; Kitāb al-Umm, iv. 192), but in the end 'Umar applied the precedent established by Muḥammad on the conquest of Khaibar and left the conquered lands to their owners, to be administered as a trust for the benefit of the conquerors [see art. FAR]. On the other hand, he exiled the Christians of Nadjirān to al-'Irāq so that "there might be but one religion in Arabia", though isolated Christians lived in al-Madīna itself. 'Umar had a Christian slave who was set free at his death (Ibn Sa'd, vi. 110), and Abū Mūsa had a Christian secretary who accompanied him to al-Madīna. 'Umar is represented, even in Christian sources, as friendly towards Christians, and in his last charge he recommended the dhimmis to the care of his successor as "the support of your families".

During the following decades the treatment and status of Christians shows many contradictions, and was often determined apparently by individual caprice. While new churches were built even in towns founded by the Arabs, such as Fustāt and Baṣra, and the caliph even helped to restore the church at Edessa (Corp. Script. Chr. Or., ser. iii., xiv. 288), in many other places churches were destroyed, and both Mu'āwīya and 'Abd al-Malik tried to seize the cathedral at Damascus before al-Walid finally incorporated it in the mosque. Christians continued to hold high offices in the administration: Mu'āwīya had a Christian secretary, Ṣardjūn, who was succeeded by his son, and 'Abd al-'Azīz had as his treasurer a wealthy Christian, Athanasius, though 'Abd al-Malik despoiled him of much of his wealth. State accounts in Syria and Egypt were kept in Greek until the reign of 'Abd al-Malik, and local accounts in Egypt were still kept in Greek for long afterwards. There were Christians in the Muslim armies, and some gave military service instead of tribute. When the Djarādjima of Mount Lebanon were defeated, a clause in the treaty stipulated that they should wear Arab dress (Balādhuri, p. 161). Yet there was some persecution as well as cases of forced conversion. Jews were settled in some of the conquered towns because they were enemies of the Christians (Balādhuri, p. 127). The Jacobites paid a special tax to Mu'āwīya (Corp. Script. Chr. Or., ser. iii., iv. 70), and the government sometimes prevented the election of a patriarch. The Christian Arabs of Mesopotamia formed a special category; these paid double zakāt instead of tribute, but a chief of Taghlib was savagely tortured because he would not renounce his faith. Personal relations between Muslims and Christians were often friendly. It is said of a poet that "he never made love poems about the wife of a Muslim or a dhimmi" (*Kitāb al-Aghānī*³, iii. 291). 'Uthmān showed great honour to Abū Zubaid, and the relations of 'Abd al-Malik with the poet al-Akhtal are notorious [see art. AL-AKHTAL].

From this time, however, the condition of the subject Christians began to deteriorate. 'Abd al-Malik changed the system of taxation in Egypt, Syria and Mesopotamia (Dionysius of Tell Mahrē, ed. Chabot, p. 10; Abū Yūsuf, p. 23 sq.), and introduced the personal tax on non-Muslims. In many districts the form of receipt was a leaden seal fastened round the neck or wrist. 'Umar II gave orders to dismiss all dhimmis from government service, but such confusion resulted that the order was soon afterwards ignored. He was also the author of the famous "ordinances", in later times attributed to 'Umar I (cf. Abū Yūsuf, p. 73), which prescribed the restrictions to be placed on dhimmis and the wearing of the zunnār [q. v.] as their distinctive badge. (According to the Nestorian Chronicle [Patr. Or., xiii. 630], this had earlier been the badge of Christian scholars.)

By the end of the second century, as may be seen from the works of Abū Yūsuf and al-Shāfi'ī, the customs governing the dhimmis were more or less fixed, but insistence on them depended on the whim of the governor and the temper of the populace. It was now accepted that no new churches might be built in towns where Muslims lived, though the old might be repaired. A governor's fancy or a riot might destroy churches and there was no redress; the cathedral at Ṣan'a', for example, was destroyed for its wealth. At least six rebellions of the Copts took place during the century. Hārūn al-Raṣhīd reenacted the "ordinances" forbidding Christians to be like Muslims in dress and style of riding; but during the reign of Ma'mūn, the Christian headman of Būra in Egypt wore black on a Friday and rode in state to the door of the mosque, when his deputy entered and led the prayers. Their use of horses and riding saddles began to raise objection, and restrictions were placed on religious processions; crosses were sometimes tolerated though banners were forbidden. Taxation became heavier and cases of extortion are recorded. The caliph kept a careful eye on the Church and a patriarch had to get his approval and do him homage, often at a price. A discontented Christian found it easy to get government help in making trouble for his opponents. At this time Christian doctors became prominent as favourites of the caliph and they did not always use their influence in a Christian manner. Discussions on religion took place; at one, when Ma'mūn was present, the Catholicus, the Head of the Dispersion, the heads of the Ṣabians, the chief priest of the fire temple and Muslim theologians took part. Many Christians were in government service or were secretaries to public men, and even the fanatical al-Mutawakkil had a Christian secretary. In 236 (850) this caliph intensified the repressive laws. A Christian had to wear a yellow ṭailasān and the zunnār and a woman had to wear a yellow wrap out of doors. If he rode he must have wooden stirrups and two balls on the back of the saddle. Men (or slaves) had to wear the ghiyār [q. v.]. They were to be dismissed from the civil service. All new churches were to be pulled down and the cross might not be displayed at festivals. Their graves had to be flush with the ground. The tithe was levied on their houses and wooden devils fixed to them. Four years later they were forbidden to ride horses and were told to wear two yellow durrā'a. These laws are the limit of legal persecution and continued to govern in theory though not always observed in practice.

Christians were always to be found in the civil service; some even were connected with the army. In Egypt it was enacted that they should be present on Fridays when the Muslims were absent (Maḳrīzī, Khiṭaṭ, ii. 227). One was called wazīr in the time of al-Mu'tamid; it seems, however, that the title had become cheap and he was only a high official (Yāqūt, Irshād, ii. 130, 259). The first rulers to promote Christians to the highest rank were the Būyids [see 'ADUD AL-DAWLĀ] and the Fāṭimids. This was quite exceptional, but their strength and influence in the administration at all times can be seen from the constant complaints of the dishonesty of Christian secretaries. More especially in the finance department they possessed a quasi-monopoly, which lasted in Egypt down to the nineteenth century.

That Muslim intolerance did grow more bitter is shown by comparing the accounts of al-Aḳḥṭal in the Kitāb al-Aghānī with the remarks of Ibn Rashīq ('Umda, i. 21). In later times the rulers were often more tolerant or far-sighted than the populace; nevertheless, additional taxes were sometimes laid on the dhimmīs. In Egypt an extra dīnār was exacted from them between 1260 and 1280, in addition to the poll-tax, which was then called djāliya (Maḳrīzī, i. 106). At intervals fresh attempts were made to impose a distinctive dress upon them. Their request to wear white turbans with a badge was refused at the instance of Ibn Taimiyya [q. v.] and in Egypt blue became their distinctive colour. On the whole, they were worse off than their Muslim fellow-subjects, for, while both suffered from oppression by the ruler, they were liable in addition to be attacked by their fellow citizens. Cases of mass conversion still occurred, but the disappearance of the large Christian population of northern Mesopotamia, which continued down to the late middle ages to be the chief centre of Christianity in the Muslim dominions, is probably to be connected with the general decay of agriculture there.

2. Legal status. Here as elsewhere the facts of history do not fit the systems of the theorists, who condemned the laxity of the people on the one hand and the highhandedness of the rulers on the other. The general legal position and the legal view of taxation are outlined in the articles DHIMMA, DJIZYA and KHARĀJ. To this outline some details may be added from the system of Mālik, which is less liberal than that of Abū Ḥanīfa. Mālik taught that a treaty once made with dhimmīs cannot be changed. They may not enter mosques or Mecca and the blood money for them is half that for a Muslim. New churches may not be built in or near the towns of Islām though the old may be repaired. Mālik, when consulted, said that a Christian, who had blasphemed the Prophet, should be put to death, and this was done. A Muslim may not borrow from them, nor become a partner with them in business unless he is present at all transactions. Another opinion would let them be sleeping partners. A Muslim should not rent land from them as a mētayer, but it is not illegal, and one who is part owner of a house with a Muslim has the right of pre-emption. One, who is trading in his own town, pays no tax beyond the general tribute; if he goes to another town and buys goods with money brought with him, he pays the trade tax (tithe), but there is no tax on the sale of these goods. Dhimmīs must not kill sacrifices for Muslims; if they do, the sacrifices must be repeated. A Muslim woman should kill a beast rather than ask them to do so. If one marries a Muslim woman with the consent of her guardians, they shall all be punished, but if he pretended to be a Muslim, the marriage is invalid. They may not arrange a marriage for a Muslim woman nor a Muslim that of his dhimmī sister. Married dhimmīs are divorced by the conversion of the woman. Mālik did not approve of dhimmī foster-mothers for Muslim children. If a Muslim commits adultery with a dhimmī woman, he is punished according to his law and she is handed over to her co-religionists to be dealt with according to their law. The evidence of a dhimmī is not accepted. Should he turn Muslim, his evidence is still not accepted (i. e. about things that happened while he was a dhimmī), consequently dhimmī women cannot give evidence about a birth. If a Christian buys or is given a Muslim slave, the transaction is valid, but the slave must be sold to a Muslim. Muslim law applies to all business dealings between dhimmīs, except usury, though they may practise this among themselves. They may not be taught the Qur'ān. A Muslim may not prevent his Christian slave from drinking wine, eating pork and going to church. It may be noted that Māwardī admits the possibility of a dhimmī becoming wazīr (wazīr al-tanfīdh).

One authority says that eight acts put a dhimmī outside the law: an agreement to fight the Muslims, fornication with a Muslim woman, an attempt to marry one, an attempt to turn a Muslim from his religion, robbery of a Muslim on the highway, acting as a spy or guide for unbelievers, or the killing of any Muslim.

3. Social Status. The fact that Christians, like other dhimmīs, were citizens as it were at second remove, was of course reflected in their social position. The full consequences of this disability were to some extent mitigated by their numbers and influence in the public administration, and by their monopoly or quasi-monopoly of important professions. Christians were distinguished more especially as doctors (the family of Bukhtīshū', Ibn Buṭlān [q. v.] etc.) and druggists. A Muslim complained that he could get no patients in an unhealthy year because he spoke good Arabic and not the dialect of Djundaiṣābur [q. v.] and wore cotton instead of silk (Djāhiz, Kitāb al-Bukhārī, p. 85) and al-Ghazālī says that in many towns the only doctor was a dhimmī. Some were rich, and it was often their imprudent display which provoked the mob to violence. The prohibition of usury in Muslim law operated in favour of the dhimmīs as merchants and money-changers, and gave them the monopoly of such trades as those of goldsmiths and jewellers.

Apart from numerous instances of friendly personal relations between individuals, the generally good relations between the Muslims and Christians is shown by the universal celebration of the great festivals of the Christian year, and the holidays and fairs which accompanied the feasts of the patron saints at the principal monasteries (cf. A. Fischer, in Berichte über d. Verh. d. Sächs. Ak. d. Wiss. zu Leipzig, Phil.-hist. Kl., 1929). Christians took part in the intellectual life of the community, and the books they wrote are named with approval by the Muslim historians. The strict letter of the law regarding non-Muslims was not always applied. While marriage to a Muslima was always forbidden, fornication with one was not always punished with death. At times the Muslim murderer of a dhimmī was executed. Even the apostate sometime found mercy, on the ground that forced conversions were not valid. Christians kept Muslim slaves, both male and female, and acted for Muslims in business.

In spite of all this, the stigma of inferiority remained. The humiliating regulations, the need for constant watchfulness, the constant recourse to intrigue and influence to circumvent the law, the segregation of dhimmīs in many cities, inevitably sapped their morale. Still more serious were their legal disabilities; there could be no true justice for the dhimmī when his evidence was excluded from the Muslim courts, even though kādīs were enjoined not to discriminate against them in other respects, nor could there be any permanent social relationship in the absence of intermarriage. It is not surprising therefore that the Christian communities of the East gradually dwindled not only in numbers, but also in vitality and moral tone.

C. The Ottoman Empire.

Since the period of the Tanzīmāt [q. v.] the Ottoman Empire has gradually abandoned the governmental traditions of Muḥammadan states, and this change has fundamentally affected the treatment of its Christian subjects. On the other hand, this change was actually brought about by the very problems with which the Ottoman government became confronted through the existence of a large Christian population in its territory.

Up to the beginning of the sixteenth century the treatment of Christians in the Empire was, on the whole, in accordance with the prescriptions of the shari'a after the Ḥanafī madhhab as to the treatment of dhimmīs, the chief authority on these questions being the Multaqa 'l-Abhur of Ibrāhīm al-Ḥalabī (cf. the Constantinople edition of 1309, p. 90). Christians were subject to the payment of the djizye-i geberān, more often called kharādj in Turkey [cf. these two articles], whence the expression kharādj-guzār. This tax was levied in three classes, according to the financial capacity of the payers. D'Ohsson (Tableau, iii. 4 sqq.) says that in his time (about 1800) each year 1,600,000 tax-forms were issued for the non-Muslims, of which 60,000 were in the capital. The regulations as to the building and restoration of Christian churches were observed in principle; the Ḥanafī madhhab allows the restoration of decayed churches but not of churches deliberately demolished; Sheikhī Zāde, however, in his commentary on the Multaqa (Maḍīma' al-Anhur, printed Constantinople 1276, p. 415) complains that this distinction was not duly observed in his time (1666). From the xvth century indeed the building and rebuilding of churches was a subject of frequent intervention by the representatives of foreign Christian powers. The turning of churches into mosques by the Ottoman conquerors — such as the case of the Aya Sofia — was generally in concordance with Islāmic laws of war. Likewise the prescriptions about clothing were observed and from time to time reinforced; as late as the xviiith century certain sultāns such as ʿOṭmān III and Muṣṭafā III are known to have given special attention to this point.

We also find in the kānūn-nāmes — the contents of which were declared in accordance with the shari'a by the Sheikh al-Islām — some special clauses about non-Muslims (kāfirs). A kānūn-name of the time of Suleimān I prescribes that, in the case of certain crimes that are punished by fines, the fines of non-Muslims shall amount to only half the sum inflicted on a Muslim in each case (cf. the second kānūn-nāme, published as appendix to T.O.E.M., iii. 3, 4, 6). The same kānūn-nāme gives directions with regard to the inheritance of non-Muslims.

The Christians thus constituted in the Ottoman Empire, just as in other Muḥammadan states, a section of the population which, so far as their relations with the Government went, had minor rights compared to Muḥammadans and to which the high functionaries of the state never belonged. They were improperly designated by the term ra'ayā, which word originally means all subjects of a Muḥammadan ruler, in allusion to a well-known tradition which compares the ruler with a shepherd and his subjects with a flock (ra'īya, cf. al-Bukhārī, Djum'a, bāb 11). Hence the use of the term rayas in European works when speaking of the Christian subjects of the sultān. G'aur [q. v.] was a more or less contemptuous expression in the idiom of Muslim circles.

There had been, however, since the coming into existence of the Ottoman Empire, several circumstances that presented the problem of the Christian subjects in forms quite different from those prevailing in contemporary Muḥammadan states. The beginnings of the Ottoman state itself had been anything but orthodox. Ertoghrlu, according to most sources, was only a converted Muslim and Othmān and Orkhān, the founders of the state, had many dealings with the Christian aristocracy of Bithynia, some of whom joined readily the cause and the creed of the new conquerors. Christianity was at that time still widely spread in Asia Minor and was at first adapted to the rather unorthodox mystic form in which the Turcomans of Rūm had made acquaintance with Islām. Large parts of the population adhered for centuries to a Christian-Islāmic mixture of religious convictions, such as appeared in the derwish revolt under Simawna Oghlu Badr al-Din (cf. Babinger, in Isl., xi.), and as survived in the beliefs and practices of the Baktāshis and the mixed worship of certain saints by both the Islāmic and the Christian population. Survivals of this mixed creed were also observed among the so-called Crypto-Christians of Trebizond (cf. Hasluck, in Journal of Hellenic Studies, xli. 199 sqq.). It was only after the restoration of the Empire in the xvth century that the orthodox Islāmic attitude prevailed in the government of the sultāns, who repeatedly had to take strong measures against the heterodox elements.

During this same period it was of no less importance that the Ottoman Empire came to incorporate more and more territories in Europe exclusively inhabited by Christians. With the exception of eastern Thrace, northern Macedonia, Bosnia and Crete, the new subjects were never islamized in great numbers; in the Empire they came to form a very considerable minority, which was counterbalanced only by the large Muḥammadan population of the Asiatic territories. So long as the government and the Muḥammadan ruling class were strong, this did not affect the political system. But this ruling class itself, as well as their powerful military instrument, the Janissaries, were recruited in a large measure from the Greek and Slavonic Christian population of the European provinces and often kept up friendly relations with their non-converted kinsmen (one of the many instances is that of Djandarlı Khalil Pasha under Muḥammad II). Accordingly much consideration was shown to large parts of the Christian population, and the more so as many Christians served on minor posts in the state chanceries, where they performed important administrative duties (Crusius, Turco-graecia, p. 14). Besides, many high-placed persons, including the sultāns themselves, had, through their harems, many Christian relations without and within the Empire. So the domestic and foreign policy of the state often brought about measures of toleration, which were not altogether in accordance with the strict demands of Muḥammadan law. An outstanding example is the way in which Constantinople and its Christian inhabitants were treated after the excesses of the first days of the conquest were over. Muḥammad II did all that he could to repopulate his new capital, even with Greeks, when the Muḥammadan element proved insufficient; he even had a new Oecumenical Patriarch chosen not long after the conquest (cf. Fr. Giese, Die Stellung der christlichen Untertanen im Osmanischen Reich, in Isl., xix., 1931, p. 264 sqq.). Only afterwards, in the first half of the xvth century, when Muḥammadan fanaticism had increased, there was a party which invoking the fact that the town had been taken by force (anwatan), claimed the destruction of all churches that were left to the Christians, and only with great difficulty was evidence constructed to prove that Constantinople was really taken by a capitulation (cf. J. H. Mordtmann, Die Kapitulation von Konstantinopel im Jahre 1453, in Byzantinische Zeitschrift, xxi., 1912, p. 129 sqq.). Other signs of fanaticism in the same period are i. a. the intention attributed to Selīm I to convert all Christians to Islām, the wish of Murād III to turn all churches into mosques and the alleged oath of Murād IV to exterminate all Christians. Still, apart from these occasional outbursts, tolerance prevailed. In the capital a Greek Christian aristocracy and plutocracy was permitted to live in the quarter of Phanar; from their midst came influential persons such as Michael Kantakuzenos, the "pillar of the Christians" (Jorga, iii. 211) in the xvth century, and the well-known Phanariote families who later supplied dragomans to the Porte and the princes of the Danube principalities.

The official attitude towards the Christians was complete abstinence from their domestic religious and secular affairs so long as this did not affect the public order. This explains also the tolerance towards the activities of the Roman Catholic missionaries who were sent from the xvth century onwards to convert the eastern Christians. The government took no interest in the different denominations of Christians, while their internal divisions reinforced its authority. R. Gragger in his article Türkisch-Ungarische Kulturbeziehungen (Literaturdenkmäler aus Ungarns Türkeiseit, in Ungarische Bibliothek, i., No. 14, Berlin 1927) depicts the tolerant attitude and the sometimes amused interest of the Turkish Pashas in Hungary in the religious disputes between Roman Catholics and Protestants. On the other hand, the serious domestic troubles amongst the Greeks belonging to the much decayed Oecumenical Patriarchate, as the result of which the party of the patriarch Cyrillus Lucaris took, in the first half of the xvth century, a definite anti-Roman Catholic attitude, could not be wholly indifferent to the Porte, because from that time on the only political protector of the Greeks was the Ottoman government. Arbitrary measures, such as occasional executions of the patriarch (for the first time in 1657; v. Hammer, *G. O. R.*², iii. 474) and excesses in war time are not sufficient to refute the statement that the attitude of the government was on the whole tolerant.

What, at length, came to influence most deeply this attitude was the interest shown in the lot of the Christians by the governments of the Christian powers with whom the Porte began to enter into peaceful relations. In the first centuries those foreign Christians who were allowed to reside in the seaport towns fell within the category of musta'min. Legal conceptions of that time did not distinguish sharply between religious denomination and nationality, both being designated by the word millet; therefore a foreigner who embraced Islām was entirely assimilated to the Muḥammadan subjects of the sultān. In course of time millet came to be used also for the different "national" denominations of the Christians within the Empire. The first foreign power to be interested in the Christians of Turkey was the Vatican, as was manifested several times by the inevitable participation of the Popes in the preparation of anti-Turkish crusades. The Cardinal Protettore di Levante in Rome exercised, through his vicar, considerable influence on the Latin Roman Catholic community of Pera, which, since the conquest of Constantinople, had enjoyed, like the other Christian communities, administrative independence. This "religious protection" was not altogether in conformance with the wishes of the Christians themselves (G. Young, Corps de Droit Ottoman, Oxford 1905, ii. 124), but at those times the Porte followed a policy of non-intervention and did not seize the opportunity of placing these Christian inhabitants of her territory under her more direct control. The same policy made her accept without difficulty the remonstrances of a second, more powerful, protector, the King of France, who already before the conclusion of the treaty of 1535 had begun to act as intermediary between the Catholics in Jerusalem and other places in the Levant and the Porte. This intervention of France — which, in the eyes of Christian Europe, served her as an excuse for her entering into diplomatic relations with the Porte — was tolerated equally in favour of other than French ecclesiastics and missionaries, and of non-French Christian prisoners. Occasionally France's protection was also invoked by other than Roman Catholics; in 1639, the Oecumenical Patriarch himself asked the French King to declare himself protector of the Eastern Church. The French capitulation of 1673 recognized at last the protectorate of the King of France over the Roman Catholic foreign Christians, though a general protectorate over all the Christians in the Empire had been demanded originally; the famous capitulation of 1740 confirmed the dispositions of that of 1673 (cf. G. Pelissié du Rausas, Le Régime des Capitulations dans l'Empire Ottoman, Paris 1911, i. 80 sqq.). A third powerful protector of Christian interests, this time of the Greek Orthodox Christians, arose in the xviiith century in the person of the Russian Czar. Shortly after the fall of Constantinople Ivan the Great had begun to regard himself as successor of the Byzantine Emperors and, as the power of Russia increased, the Greek orthodox Christians in the western and eastern parts of the Empire came to look upon the Czar as their natural protector. Especially the Christian institutions in Jerusalem and the much impoverished patriarchate of that town benefited by the Russian religious interest. On the other hand, Russia learnt to use her influence with the Orthodox Christians as a powerful political instrument. The peace treaty of Küçük Kainardje (1776) recognized at last the right of the Russian diplomatic representatives to interfere in favour of the Christians in the Empire.

With the weakening of the Empire in the xviiith century the so-called "religious protection" became a heavy burden on Turkey's inner political conditions. Especially after the disastrous happenings under Maḥmūd II's reign, it became clear that the old Muḥammadan conception of the state, which left the non-Muslims entirely to themselves, or to others, could no longer be maintained. It was one of the chief stimuli to the introduction of the Tanzimāt. In order to retain as much control as possible over her Christian subjects the Porte now had to apply her governmental activity equally to non-Muslims and Muslims. Accordingly the Khatt-i Sherif of Gül-Khāne (1839) declared that perfect security was guaranteed to all subjects, Muslims or ra'ayā, as to their lives, their honour and their possessions. Still in the following years no important administrative measures were taken, while on the other hand the intervention of foreign powers in Christian affairs continued and led amongst other incidents to the outbreak of the Crimean War in 1853. An incident of 1843, in the meantime, had made the Porte give a formal assurance to the French and English ambassadors with regard to the non-application of capital punishment to persons who had renounced the Muḥammadan creed (Young, op. cit., ii. 11 sqq.).

The law of May 10, 1855 is an important landmark in the history of Ottoman policy towards the Christian subjects; this law abolished the capitation tax for non-Muslims and envisaged the possibility of their service in the army [cf. DIYZYA and the Bibliography of this art.]. This legislative measure was completed by the Khatt-i Humāyūn of February 18, 1856, which may be regarded as the Magna Charta of the rights of the non-Muslim subjects of the Empire; in this memorable edict the rights and privileges of the different religious denominations and their members were proclaimed with more detail; as to their military service the edict laid down the principle that it could be replaced by the payment of an exemption tax, which, under the name of bedel, came to be regularly applied to all non-Muslims. In accordance with the contents of the Khatt-i Humāyūn, the Ottoman legislation now began for the first time to take notice officially of the existence of the great number of Christian communities existing in the Empire. Organic statutes were elaborated for the more important of these communities (called millet): in 1860 for the Armenian Gregorian community and in 1862 for the Greek Orthodox community. In 1870 followed the institution, with the cooperation of the Porte, of the Bulgarian Exarchate, while in course of time a host of laws, decrees and regulations were issued, containing more detailed provisions with regard to these and the minor communities: Patriarchates of Antioch and Jerusalem, Mount Athos, the Serbian Church, the Nestorians, the Latin communities, and the different churches united with Rome (Armenians, Chaldaeans, Maronites, Melkites). This highly complicated legislation aimed at making these Christians Ottoman subjects in the full sense of the word, but met with great difficulties created by the existence of an ages-old system of autonomy and by the frequent intervention of the foreign powers. The leading principle of the government was to divest the purely religious authorities as much as possible of their power and to reinforce the power of the lay institutions. This policy led to endless troubles in which new regulations continually tried to restore order. In the constitution of Midḥat Paṣha (1876) Islam was proclaimed as the State religion, but immediately afterwards there follows the declaration that the profession of all recognized religions in the Empire is free and that all privileges granted to the different religious communities shall be maintained (art. 11). Art. 9 guarantees the personal freedom of all Ottoman subjects and art. 17 their complete equality before the law.

All the time during the period of reforms the Turkish government had to reckon with reactionary feelings against the g'ours in large sections of the Muḥammadan population, which in many instances made the application of equal treatment, before the law and elsewhere, illusory. This justified to a certain extent the never ending remonstrances of the European powers, who lost no opportunity of insisting on new reforms in favour of the Christians. Art. 62 of the treaty of Berlin (July 13, 1878) stipulated again for the equal treatment by the Ottoman government of all non-Muslim subjects, amongst others that every one, without difference of religion, should be admitted as a witness before the law courts.

The effect of the foreign intervention in their favour encouraged on the other hand large sections of the Christian population to disloyal feelings and actions against their legal government. While the latter did what it could do to assimilate the different groups of the population, the factors of dissolution became at the same time ever stronger. Even the peaceful relations that had hitherto characterized on the whole the intercourse between Muḥammadans and Christians — especially in the cities — began to make way for religious hatred between group and group, in which the government officials were often unable to observe the required neutral attitude. Amongst many other symptoms the Armenian troubles which began in 1889 in the Armenian wilāyets — where a racial antagonism between Muḥammadan Kurds and Christian Armenians had existed for centuries — were the most disastrous. They led to repeated Armenian attempts at revolt and to the notorious massacres in Constantinople of 1897.

By this development the treatment of the Christian subjects ceased to be a religious problem; it became a problem of nationality (millet in the new acceptance of the word) and of race, and at the same time one of the vital problems for the Empire. After the revolution of 1908 and the re-establishment of Miḥāṭ's constitution, these facts were not yet fully recognized. The Ottomanization of all subjects of the Empire was seriously attempted; the new representative bodies included a number of Christian members; occasionally there were Christian ministers. Then the world war precipitated the inevitable course of events. This time non-Muslims were for the first time incorporated in the Turkish army, but only for service behind the front. At the same time, the domestic policy of the Young Turks took a pan-Turkish turn, from which religious motives were quite absent. National Turkish feeling prevailed. The measures of deportation of Christian inhabitants from the frontier zones — measures from which the Armenians especially suffered terribly — were inspired by fear of disloyalty towards Turkey, though in their execution remnants of religious fanaticism, notably on the side of the Kurds, certainly played a large part.

The events after the armistice of Mudros have proved that a great part of the Christian population preferred independence or incorporation into a Christian state to remaining with Turkey. And the Turks themselves also were ready to part with their Christian subjects. Under these circumstances were concluded at Lausanne, in 1923, the agreements with Greece for the exchange of the Greek population of the new Turkish state against Turks established on Hellenic territory; only Constantinople and some islands were excluded from this measure. Since by the events of the war the number of Armenians and other Christians in Asiatic Turkey had already been reduced to a very small minority, the result was that the present Turkish republic has only to deal with a Christian population of no numerical importance, most of whom live in Constantinople. The Lausanne Treaty of 1923 contains in its articles 37—45 only the obligation for Turkey to treat the minorities on an equal basis with the Turkish subjects; it provides for their right to live after a personal legal statute of their own. Finally the treatment of Christians in Turkey has definitely ceased to be a legal problem in the old sense of the word since, by the alteration of the Constitution on April 5, 1928 the state has been completely secularized (cf. Tarih, Istanbul 1931, iv. 213) by cancelling the article declaring that the state religion is Islām.

AL-NASAWĪ, MUḤAMMAD B. AḤMAD B. 'ALĪ B. MUḤAMMAD, an Arabic historian, biographer of the last Khwārizmshāh Djalāl al-Dīn Māngūbirtī [q. v.], was born in Kharandiz (Yāqūt, ii. 415), an estate in the district of Nasā [q. v.] in Khurāsān where his family was reputed to have been already settled in the pre-Muḥammadan period (Hist., ed. Houdas, p. 53). During his father's lifetime he represented him when the vizier Nizām al-Mulk, dismissed from office by Sulṭān Muḥammad, visited the family estates on his journey to Khwārizm and was received by him (ibid., p. 30). He only mentions incidentally that he had stayed in his youth with Inančkhān in Māzandarān before the latter had risen to power. When the Mongols invaded Khurāsān in 1221 he had already succeeded his father in his ancestral citadel, which he saved from sacking by payment of 10,000 ells of cloth. Nizām al-Dīn al-Sam'ānī was his guest at this time; he enabled him to escape to Khwārizm before the arrival of the enemy and in gratitude Nizām al-Dīn procured him a rich grant of land from Ozlāgh Shāh, son of Muḥammad (p. 57 sqq.). When in Nasā, the capital of his district, Nuṣrat al-Dīn Ḥamza b. Muḥammad, the representative of a local royal family, came to power as successor to his nephew Ikhtiyār al-Dīn (p. 99), he appointed him his nā'ib (p. 104) and in this capacity he took part in a battle fought by Inančkhān, as governor of Khurāsān, at Nakhdjuwān near Nasā against the Mongols; according to the full story of the battle (p. 66), this was the only occasion on which he personally took part in a battle. When after the death of Sulṭān Muḥammad (1220) his eldest son Ghiyāth al-Dīn ascended the throne, Nuṣrat al-Dīn took the side of his younger brother Djalāl al-Dīn, and for this an expedition was sent against him under Tūlaḡ, son of Inančkhān. To save himself he sent Nasawī with 1,000 dinārs to Ghiyāth al-Dīn. After long wanderings and a two months' sojourn in Iṣfahān, he succeeded in giving the money to Djalāl al-Dīn's minister Sharaf al-Mulk, who then wrote a despatch to Tūlaḡ ordering him to abandon the siege of Nasā; but this arrived too late and Nuṣrat al-Dīn had already been slain (p. 109). Nasawī did not now dare to return home but went to Djalāl al-Dīn when the latter had entered Marāgha. He was appointed by him Kātib al-Inshā' (p. 110) and henceforth accompanied his master on all his campaigns. When Dīyā' al-Mulk 'Alā' al-Dīn to escape the jealousy of the vizier Sharaf al-Mulk had himself appointed governor of Nasā he aroused such discontent there by his misgovernment that he was dismissed. Nasawī was appointed in his stead governor of his native town with the title of vizier but had to stay with Djalāl al-Dīn and sent a deputy to his governorship (p. 149).

When Djalāl al-Dīn in 1230 was surrounded by the Mongols at Hānī and fought his way out once again, Nasawī became separated from him and was kept a prisoner for two months in Āmid but finally made his way to Maiyāfārikin where he learned of the sad end of his king who had been murdered by a Kurd on Aug. 16, 1231 (p. 245).

Ten years later in 639 (1241), he wrote the history of his sovereign entitled Sirat al-Sultān Djalāl al-Dīn Mankobirtī. He opens with a confused and romantic account of the early history of the Mongols and begins his subject with Muhammad's campaign to the 'Irāk in 614 (1217). He relies for his facts mainly on the stories of high officials of his hero's court; as a result his interest is mainly in diplomatic documents and administrative measures while military matters, which were his hero's main occupation, are dealt with rather briefly. His model was apparently the Kitāb al-Yamīnī of al-'Utbi which his master Nuṣrat al-Dīn was said to know by heart (p. 104); but he had not al-'Utbi's secure command of Arabic so that his style is fortunately much simpler and more matter of fact, in spite of all his attempts at rhymed prose and plays upon words. Persian influence on his style, which Houdas claims to notice, is on the other hand nowhere marked.

NASHĀT MIRZĀ 'ABD AL-WAHHĀB of Isfahān, one of the best Persian poets and stylists of the period of the early Qājārs. He was a physician in Shirāz and in his native city, devoting his leisure hours to poetry in which he displayed a great facility. He wrote verse in Arabic, Persian and Turkish and was further celebrated for his great skill in shikasta. Rumours of his poetical gifts induced the Qājār Fath 'Alī Shāh (1797—1834) to invite him to Teherān as court poet. There Nashāt soon rose to great honour and in 1809 was appointed Munshi al-Mamālik (secretary of state) with the title of Mu'tamad al-Dawla. In this capacity he carried through several important negotiations for the Shāh, such as the restoration of peace among the nomad tribes of Khurāsān in 1812 and 1818. Besides his own poems, he wrote an introduction to Ṣabā's famous Shāhanshāh-nāma and drew up a whole series of important diplomatic documents. Specially celebrated is the letter written by him to George III in which he expressed regret at the interruption of the friendly relations between England and Persia. He died in 1244 (1828—1829). He collected his poems into a book published in Teherān in 1266 (1850) under the title Gan-djīna-yi Nashāt (the "Treasury of Joy"). Nashāt's ghazels are all imitations of those of his great predecessors, particularly Ḥāfiẓ, but are distinguished by elegance and simplicity, smooth rhythm and considerable depth of feeling.

NASHWĀN B. SA'ID B. NASHWĀN AL-ḤIMYARĪ AL-YAMANĪ, an Arab philologist. The notices of this individual and his career are exceedingly scanty. In Yāqūt's Irshād and in Suyūṭī's Bughya he is described in laudatory terms in the usual phrases as a great scholar, authority on fiqh, philology and naḥw; he was also distinguished as a historian and poet and was equally versed "in the other branches of adab". He compiled a dictionary entitled Shams al-'Ulūm wa-Dawā' al-'Arab min al-Kulūm in eight (according to others eighteen) volumes which his son later revised and condensed into two volumes; he also wrote a treatise on rhyme, Kitāb al-Kawāfi, and a book of a religious and philosophical nature, Kitāb Ḥur al-'In wa-Tanbih al-Sāmi'in. We know neither the year nor the place of his birth, nor with whom he studied nor in what places he lived. Only one story of his life has survived and that sounds improbable. Yāqūt says he was a great chief who besieged cities and fortresses and ruled over a hill-tribe in the Ṣabr range. Al-Suyūṭī takes this story from Yāqūt. According to al-Suyūṭī, he was a follower of the Mu'tazila. He is said to have died on the 24th Dhu 'l-Hijja 573 (1117). The importance of Nashwān lies in the fact that he was particularly well acquainted with the South Arabian tradition. He took up the work of his predecessor al-Hamdānī [q.v.], the task of rescuing from oblivion the legends of the South Arabian kingdoms. He uses these as the basis of his work and gives long quotations from the writings of his predecessor. His famous so-called Ḥimyarite Qaṣida, al-Qaṣida al-Ḥimyarīya, is based on such traditions of the Ḥimyarite rulers; it celebrates their deeds and the splendour of their ancient kingdom. In the commentary on this poem the annotator gives very full notes, in which he narrates legends of South Arabian princes and their history. Von Kremer supposes, relying on internal evidence, that the author of the Qaṣida and the commentator are the same person i.e. that Nashwān himself wrote the commentary on his Qaṣida. The commentator, whose name is not given, must at any rate have been very well acquainted with Ḥimyarite tradition. In the already mentioned dictionary Shams al-'Ulūm, Nashwān also uses his knowledge of South Arabian history. Whether all the facts given by him are historical cannot be discussed here; many of them are certainly based on tradition, since Nashwān himself, as his nisba shows, was of South Arabian blood. His works played a part in the struggle of the tribes of south Arabian origin against the northern Arabs for predominance in the Muslim world.

(ILSE LICHTENSTÄDTER)

NASÎ (A.), intercalary month, intercalation, or man on whose authority an intercalation is undertaken, a word of uncertain meaning in Sūra ix. 37 and in Muḥammad's sermon at the farewell pilgrimage (Ibn Hishām, p. 968; cf. the article ḤADJĪJ). Nasîy, nasy and nas' are variants and the word is connected with nasa'a to "postpone" or "add" or with nasiya to "forget". In any case, it is given in Muslim tradition a meaning which brings it into connection with the method of reckoning time among the pagan Arabs. The Qur'anic verse describes nasî as "a further expression of unbelief" and it is therefore forbidden to the believers.

For the meaning of the word in the calendar we have the context of the above mentioned passages where sometimes the number of months in the year is put at twelve and sometimes the number of "holy" months at four. Qur'anic exegesis as a rule connects nasî with the "holy" months and explains it sometimes, it is true, as the postponement of the ḥadjj from the month fixed by God for it, but sometimes, and preferably, as "transference of the sanctity of one holy month to another, in itself not holy". The expositors are also able to give the reasons for such a postponement in full detail. As a rule however, these are pure inventions in which suggestions and perhaps memories of old traditions are freely expanded. A collection of such expositions in the form of regular ḥadīths is given in Ṭabarī, Tafsir, 2nd ed., x. 91—93.

The critical examination of these explanations reveals however traces of an older conception not quite unknown to Tradition, even in the form in which we have it, according to which nasî means either the intercalation of an intercalary month or the month itself. This interpretation of the word is the only one really acceptable in the circumstances. The association of the pre-Islāmic ḥadjj with annual markets made it necessary to fix the ḥadjj in a suitable season of the year. For that purpose a prolongation of the lunar year in some way was necessary and nothing contradicts that older tradition according to which it was obtained by the intercalation of an intercalary month. The lunar month was the only unit of time available for the purpose because it was the only one which the Beduins, the customers at the markets, could observe directly. Thus one had only to let them know at the ḥadjj of a year whether they had to reckon to the next ḥadjj twelve or thirteen months.

Definite evidence of this intercalation of a month is found in the astronomer Abū Ma'shar al-Balkhī (d. 272) in his Kitāb al-Ulūf (see J. A., ser. v., vol. xi. [1858], p. 168 sqq.) and following him in al-Birūnī who also deals at length with this intercalation in his Chronology (ed. Sachau, p. 11 sq., 62 sq.). According to him, the Arabs took this intercalation from the Jews. How much in what these scholars tell us is really historical knowledge and how much intelligent reconstruction can hardly be decided. It is remarkable however that al-Birūnī when dealing fully with the Jewish intercalation (op. cit., p. 52, 17) connects the Hebrew word for intercalary year, 'ibbār, with me'ubbārāth "pregnant woman" and observes: "they compare the addition of a superfluous month to the year to the woman carrying something which does not belong to her body". In this connection we may recall that Ṭabarī (op. cit., p. 91, 6) explains the Arabic nasî as nasî' "pregnant woman" among other interpretations, saying nusî'at al-mar'a, "on account of the increase which the child in her means". This agreement in the two explanations, which can hardly be accidental, might really indicate that nasî in the sense of intercalation or intercalary month is modelled on the Jewish 'ibbār and thus support al-Birūnī's statement which is in itself not impossible. Caussin de Perceval (J. A., ser. iv., vol. i., p. 349) even quotes the Hebrew nāsî (prince) as a title of honour of the leader of the Sanhedrin, to whom fell the duty of dealing with the intercalation (cf. Bab. Talmud, Sanhedrin, p. 112: "the intercalation of the year may only be done with the approval of the nāsî"). According to one of the meanings of the Arabic nasî given in Tradition, it was really the "name of a man" (see above), a meaning which is all the more remarkable in this connection, as it does not suit the Qur'anic passage. There is a definite agreement in the fact that in the Jewish intercalation only the month following Adar was an intercalary month while in the Arab system, as the critical examination of Tradition — contradicting the literal interpretation of its text — shows, only the month following Dhu'l-Ḥijja i.e. the intercalated month in both cases was inserted between the normal last month and the normal first of the year, Nisān or al-Muḥarram.

Nothing certain is known about the process of intercalation among the Arabs. It can only have been periodic and irregular attempts at correction based on observation of nature, particularly vegetation. The technical part must have been exceedingly simple and primitive. The same is true of the Jewish intercalation in the older period (see Bab. Talmud, op. cit., p. 10^b—13^b). As the Jewish system served to move the feast of Pesah to a suitable season of the year, the Arab system can only have been intended to do the same for the ḥadjj and the fairs associated with it in the vicinity of Mecca. It was not intended to establish a fixed calendar to be generally observed. The Beduins had never had one and they have no use for one. According to Tradition, the management of the nasî was a prerogative of the Banū Kināna: and indeed fairs were held on the lands of the Kināna.

NASÎB (A.), the introductory lines of the Arabic ḳaṣīda [q. v.] which are devoted to recalling the memory of a woman whom the poet loved long years before. The nasīb is, so far as we know, the only kind of love-poem which has survived to us from the Arabic literature of the pre- and early Muḥammadan period and is almost the only place where women are the subject in the poetry of the Arabs. The essential feature is that the subject of the nasīb is always the lament of a man for a lost beloved. Even in the earliest ḳaṣīdas that have survived the nasīb is already in the stereotyped form. It treats its subject again and again in the same way with only the slightest variations. We can distinguish three constantly recurring principal motives:

I. A Beduin on his wandering through the desert passes a spot where there are the traces of a tent-trench which has fallen in, dried camel dung, sooty stones, which once formed a cooking place, and tent-pegs. From these things he sees that this spot has been the resting-place of wandering Beduins. After some reflection he recalls that his tribe encamped here long before, jointly with another tribe, during the spring grazing and that he himself spent a happy time with his beloved. The poet usually then gives a description of the deserted camping place, the aṭṭāl; it can only be traced with difficulty as the wind and the rain which has fallen upon it have obliterated it and made it almost unrecognisable. The rain has produced a rich vegetation and gazelles and antelopes with their young have found shelter there.

II. The poet recalls the day when the two tribes, his own and that of his beloved, struck camp. There had been various signs of the approaching departure. The camels were brought back from the pastures and loaded; the raven, the bird of ill omen, also foretold the separation to the poet. In his mind he again sees the camels with their litters before him and compares them to ships. The women sit in the litters, among them his beloved. They go off and he follows them in spirit.

III. While grief for his lost beloved is keeping the poet awake, she sends him from far away her khayāl, a vision of herself. He is surprised that his delicate beloved has been able to travel so far, as she was never a good walker. The vision arouses painful memories in him and he weeps copiously as he recalls the beauty of his beloved.

Each of these three themes may be followed by a full description of the personality and journey of his beloved; she is a distinguished and modest lady, one of the noblest of her tribe; she is frequently married and sometimes even has children. Her husband is held up to ridicule. She is coquettish and likes to torment her lover. Her physical charms are described very fully and the various parts of her body celebrated in fine similes (in the style of the wasf, cf. the Song of Solomon and the Alt-ägyptischen Liebeslieder, ed. W. Max Müller). Her dress, her perfume and her jewellery are described in laudatory terms. The feelings of the lover are then detailed. Grief has made him old and grey; he is ill with longing for his beloved and after all these years his tears still flow at the thought of her.

Like all early Arabic poetry the nasīb in matter and structure follows with considerable strictness a definite chain of ideas so that there is a certain uniformity about it. We constantly find the same or similar comparisons; the ideas of the different poets do not differ essentially from one another but only the form and method of expressing them. The traces of the aṭṭāl look like writing made by the qalam on parchment. The girl is like a gazelle or an antelope, a simile which continuously recurs with new variations. The tears of the poet run like water from a leaky skin or fall like pearls from a necklace when the string is broken and so on. In consequence of the wealth of the Arabic language in synonyms these similes have an ever-new charm in spite of the many repetitions. Stereotyped metonymies, such as we find in all branches of Arabic poetry, are also common in the nasīb. Thus the beloved, the aṭṭāl, the showers of rain, and parts of the body etc. are designated by metonymy. The nasīb usually begins (in so far as it has survived in its entirety) with formal phrases: li-man al-diyār etc.; frequently it ends with da' dhā "leave this", whereupon the poet turns to the description of the camel.

The nasīb had already become fixed in form in the pre-Muḥammadan period, and no poet could break away from it. Gradually its contents became more and more colourless; it became more and more stereotyped and stiff. In the old Arab poetry there is already no difference between the nasīb of a Beduin and that of a townsman. Kais b. al-Khaṭīm, Ḥassān b. Thābit and 'Adī b. Zaid describe the beauty of their beloved in the same way as, for example, Imra' al-Kais, and lament their separation from her just like a Beduin poet. We must remember however that in the pre-Muḥammadan period even a townsman knew Beduin life (of 'Adī b. Zaid we know that he spent a part of the year in the desert; cf. Kitāb al-Aghānī, Cairo 1928, ii. 105). In later times however, the poets no longer knew the life of the desert from their own experience; the nasīb thus became more and more stereotyped. In the end it became a matter of ridicule that every qaṣida began with the lament at the aṭṭāl; a critic of the 'Abbāsīd period (cf. Goldziher, Abhandlungen, p. 144) asks whether every man with a command of language who would write a good poem must of necessity be lovesick.

From the nasīb we learn of amatory relations of a kind which probably played a considerable part in pre-Islāmic Arabia. These were unrestricted relations, not contracted in the forms which were already used in pre-Islāmic Arabia at a marriage. They were based on natural inclination and spontaneous devotion and ended with this. As is evident from the nasīb such unions were usually concluded in the spring grazing season when different tribes were encamping peacefully side by side. When the end of this fine season of the year came these love affairs also came to an end as a rule. The position and the reputation of the khulla (as the beloved is often called) were not affected by this illegitimate relation; she remained in her tribe and went off with them, while a baghīy did not live with her tribe.

As is the case with all Arab poetry, the question what is the oldest nasīb and its origin cannot be answered. Arab tradition records that Muḥalhil was the first to put a nasīb in front of a qaṣida; this does not mean however that he was the first to compose one. In the Kitāb al-Aghānī (Cairo [1928], ii. 123 sq.) we find a parallel to the nasīb. Al-Nu'mān sent to King Anushirwān a girl with an accompanying letter which described her merits of mind and body. In the tales of the root Nights also, nasīb-like poems are inserted but these are all of a comparatively late period. Many parallels may be found in the Song of Solomon, and old Egyptian love-poems resemble in spirit and conception and frequently often in phrase the Arabic nasīb.

NAṢĪBĪN, a town in Mesopotamia. The name is certainly of Semitic origin and to be derived (with Philon Byblios in Steph. Byz.; Müller, F. H. G., iii. 571, frg. 8) from Naṣīb = σῆλαι (naṣīb). The idol of Naṣīb is said to have been called Abnil (Assemani, Bibl. Orient., i., Rome 1719, p. 27), i. e. "stone of El" (according to W. Robertson Smith, Religion of the Semites, London 1927, p. 210, note 1). On coins the usual form of the place-name is NEṢIBI (Uranios in Steph. Byz.: Νέσιβις; Pliny, Nat. hist., vi. 42: Nesebis); in the Scriptores Historiae Augustae and elsewhere we find the forms Nitibi(n), Nitibeni, Nizzibi etc. (J. Markwart, Südarmenien u. d. Tigrisquellen, Vienna 1930, p. 259 sq., note 1). In Armenian the town is usually called Mchin (on the form see Markwart, op. cit., p. 166 sq., note 3); Matt'ēos of Edessa (ed. Watarshapat, 2nd ed., 1898, p. 245 = Dulaurier's transl., p. 206) calls it "Nsepi, also called Mchin or Nsepin" (also on p. 62 Nsepi). But he also mentions a "Nsepin, which is the town of Sibar" (p. 187 = p. 158, ch. xcvi. of Dulaurier's translation which (p. 413) wrongly connects these with our Naṣīb and Sippara) which lies on the left bank of the Euphrates on the road from Severak or Sevaverak (Arabic Suwaidā) to Ḥiṣn Maṣṣūr (Armen. Harsan Msroy) (Matt'ēos, p. 157 = 130 Dulaurier; 186 sq. = 157 sq. Dulaurier). This Nsepin corresponds to the "town of Naṣīb on the bank of the Frāt, called Naṣīb al-Rūm, 3—4 days journey from each of Āmid and Ḥarrān on the road from Ḥarrān to the land of Rūm" (Yāqūt, Mu'djam, iv. 789), in Pseudo-Wākidi (Futūḥ Diyār Rab'ia wa-Diyār Bakr, transl. by B. G. Niebuhr, in Schriften der Akademie von Ham., vol. 1/iii., Hamburg 1847, p. 50, 175 sq.) mentioned along with Suwaida, i. e. Süverek, as Naṣīb al-Ṣaghīr, the name of which is marked on the Turkish General Staff's map of 1333 (1917—1918), scale 1:200,000, sheet Siverak-Kharput, 20 miles almost due west of Siverak and 1½ miles from Kaṇṭara at a bend of the Euphrates. The Syriac authors usually identify Naṣīb with the Šōbhā of the Bible and say that Nimrod founded the town (Michael Syr., Chron., transl. Chabot, i. 20; Barhebraeus, Chron. Syr., ed. Bedjan, p. 8).

The town lay in the plain below the Μαγδον ὄρος [see TÜR 'ABDĪN] on the river Mygdonios (Theophyl. Simok., ed. de Boor, v. 5, 3: Μυγδων), the Hirmās of the Arabs, Nehar Māsā or Māshī of the Syrians (Assyr. Kharmish); Nöldeke, in Z. D.M.G., xxxiii. 328), the modern Djaghdjagh. The country between Naṣīb and the Tigris was called Bēth 'Arabāyē by the Syrians (Theophyl. Simok., i. 13, 8: Βεαβαῖες, iii. 16, 2; v. 1, 2; 3, 2: Ἀραβία; G. Hoffmann, Aussätze aus syr. Akten pers. Märt., p. 23, note 170), by the Armenians Arvastan (cf. Arwāstān, in J. A., 1869, p. 168; Arwāstān-i Ḥrōm; Justi, Beiträge, i. 16, 24; Marquart, Erānshahr, p. 162 sq.).

The town is mentioned as early as Assyrian times under the name Naṣībina, first, so far as we know, about 900 B. C. in the reign of Adad-nirāri II (O. Schroeder, W. V. D. O. G., xxxvii., No. 84, i. 41 sq.). In the period between 852 and 715 B. C. it was the capital of a province whose governors were allowed to hold the eponymate (Forrer, Provinzeinteilung des assyr. Reiches, p. 32, 106; Schachermeyr, article Nasibina in Reallexikon d. Vorgesch., viii., 1927, p. 449). In the last wars of the Assyrians with the Babylonians Naṣībina is mentioned in 612 B. C. (C. J. Gadd, The Fall of Niniveh, London 1923, p. 35, Cuneiform tablet, British Museum 21901, reverse, l. 48).

Seleucus I is said to have settled Nisibis with Greeks (C.I.G., iv. 6856; Tscherikower, Philologus, suppl.-vol. xix., part 1, p. 89 sq.). The Macedonians called the town Ἀντιόχεια ἡ ἐν τῇ Μυγδονίᾳ (Strabo, xvi. 747). In the reign of Antiochus IV the town struck coins with the legend Ἀντιόχεων τῶν ἐν τῇ Μυγδονίᾳ (Brit. Mus., Catal. Seleucid. Kings, p. 42, No. 86—88; Head, Historia Numorum 2, p. 815). Tigranes of Armenia took the town from the Parthians, who then held it, and put his brother Guras (Ghōr) in command of it; in the war against him, Lucullus occupied it in 68 B. C. (Plutarch, Luc., p. 32, 4 sqq.). The Armenian historians say that the town was from the middle of the second century B. C. to the beginning of our era the capital of the Arsakunid kings and later of king Sanatrūg (St. Martin, Mémoires sur l'Arménie, i., Paris 1818, p. 161; Marquart in Herzfeld, in Z.D.M.G., lxxviii. 659 sq.). About 37 A. D. the Parthian king Artabanus III took it from the Armenians and gave it to king Izates of Adiabene (Joseph., Ant., xx., 3, 2). In the period of the Parthian war of Corbulo (62 A. D.) it was Parthian or Adiabenean (Tacit., Annal., xv. 5). The emperor Trajan took Nisibis again and Hadrian restored it to the Parthians (Dio Cass., lxxviii. 23). In the Parthian war of Lucius Verus, it again suffered a siege by the Romans, as a result of which a pestilence broke out in it (Lucian, De conscrib. hist., p. 15). The Parthians fled across the Tigris and the town then doubtless repassed into the hands of the Romans. After the victory of Septimius Severus over Pescennius Niger, the princes of Osrohoëne and Adiabene asked that the emperor should withdraw the Roman troops from Nisibis in return for an acknowledgment of his suzerainty (Dio Cass., lxxv. 1, 2 sqq.). The emperor then went to Nisibis in 195 A. D. and made it the capital of a new province; it was now given the name of Septimia Nesibi Colonia Metropolis (Dio Cassius, lxxv. 3, 2; Hill, Catal. of Greek Coins, Brit. Mus., Arabia, Mesopotamia and Persia, London 1922, p. cviii sq. and 119—124; Macdonald, Catal. of the Hunterian Collection, iii. 315, pl. lxxix.). After the emperor's departure the governor Laetus defended the town against the attacks of the Parthians. After the assassination of Caracalla in 217 B. C. the Parthians again besieged the town but then made peace with Macrinus. The first Sāsānian Ardashīr at once besieged Nisibis (Zonar., xii. 13; Geogr. Synkell., p. 674). It was taken by the Persians in the reign of Maximinus but in 242 regained by Gordian III's son-in-law Timesitheus; Philip the Arabian, under whom it was given the name of Julia Septimia Colonia Nisibis Metropolis, soon withdrew however from the whole of Mesopotamia. Odenathus of Palmyra in 261 again took Nisibis from the Persians and destroyed it (Histor. Aug., Trebellius Pollio, Triginta tyranni, p. 13, 5). Diocletian made the town, which had become Roman again at the peace of 297 A.D. (Marquart, Erānshahr, p. 169), the sole centre of trade between Persia and the Roman empire (Petr. Patric., frg. 14, in F.H.G., iv. 189; Cod. Just., iv. 63, 4; Expositio totius mundi et gentium, p. 22 in Riese, Geogr. lat. min., p. 108) and one of the principal fortresses on the Mesopotamian limes (on the limes see Poidebard, Syria, xi., 1930, p. 33—42). In the Persian wars of Constantius, Nisibis, Orientis firmissimum claustrum (Ammian. Marcell., xxv. 8, 14), was thrice besieged (338, 346 and 350 A.D.) (Peeters, Anal. Boll., xxxviii., 1920, p. 285—373). During the first siege died the monk Jacob of Nisibis, the teacher of Ephraim, who had built the great church in his native town in 313 A.D.; perhaps he is to be regarded as the founder of the "Persian school" of Nisibis, which Ephraim transferred from there to Edessa in 363 as a result of the persecutions by Shāpūr II (on it see I. Guidi, Gli statuti della scuola di Nisibis, in Giornale della Società Asiatica Italiana, iv., 1890, p. 165—195; J.-B. Chabot, L'école de Nisibe, in J.A., ser. ix., viii., 1896, p. 43—93; Baumstark, Gesch. d. syr. Literatur, Bonn 1922, p. 113 sq.; Th. Hermann, Die Schule von Nisibis vom 5.—7. Jahrh., in Zeitschr. f. neutestam. Wiss., 1926, p. 89 sqq.).

In the war of 359 Shāpūr II at first passed by Nisibis on his way to Tela and Amida, while the Roman army was stationed at Nisibis (Ammian. Marc., xx., 7, 1—8). After the death of Julian, Jovian had to cede among other things the great fortress of Nisibis by the peace of 363 (Amm. Marc., xxv. 7, 91). The inhabitants were allowed to migrate to Amida (Amm. Marc., xxv. 8, 17—9, 6; Zosim., iii. 33 sq.; Ps.-Dionys. of Tellmahre, Chron., under the year 674; Syr. Vita of Ephraim, ed. Lamy, p. 24 sq.; Faustos Byz., Venice 1832, p. 26; Nau, in R.O.C., ii., 1897, p. 58). They were perhaps sent on from here and settled in the above mentioned "Little Naşibin". From this time the fortress on the limes was Sargathon, 70 stadia west of Nisibis, the modern Serdje-Khān (Honigsmann, Syria, x., 1929, p. 283 sq.). The Romans made frequent attacks on the lost town but always without success, for example in 421—422 A.D. after their victory at Sargathon (Socrat., Hist. Eccl., vii. 18), in 503 under their general Areobindos (Jos. Styl., ch. 54, p. 44, ed. Wright; Mich. Syr., transl. Chabot, ii. 159), in 526—527 under the Dux and Stratelates Timostratos (Zach. Rhet., ix. 1, p. 256) and in 572 under Patricius Marcianus (John of Ephesus, iii. 6, 2). In the sixth century the inhabitants were still inclined to be friendly to the Romans (Ps.-Zach. Reth., vii. 5, p. 211, ed. Land). After the Nestorian academy of Edessa had been transferred to Nisibis in 489 by the Metropolitan Barşawmā as a result of the persecutions of the Nestorians in the Byzantine empire, the town remained for centuries the intellectual centre of Nestorianism (cf. also Mas'ūdī, Kitāb al-Tanbih, ed. de Goeje, p. 150). In the reign of Khusrāw II the Church of St. Sergius in Nisibis was built (Theophyl. Simok., v. 1, 7). Sergius Stratelates was held in particular veneration by the nomad tribes of this region (Nöldeke's Tabarī, p. 284, note 1; Peeters, in Hushardzan, Vienna 1911, p. 187; Herzfeld-Sarre, Archäol. Reise im Euphrat- u. Tigrisgebiet, i., 1911, p. 138, note 2).

In the year 18 (639) 'Iyādh b. Ghanm advanced against Naşibin which after a brief resistance submitted to the Arabs on the same terms as had been granted to al-Ruhā' (Caetani, Annali dell' Islām, iv. 35, 37, 55, 57, year 18 A.H., § 83, 87, 127, 129; according to al-Balādhuri, ed. de Goeje, p. 175 sq. and al-Kh̄wārizmī, ed. Baethgen, in Abh. f. d. Kunde d. Morgenl., viii/iii. 110 sq. not till the following year; cf. Caetani, op. cit., p. 165, 19 A.H., § 42b, 43). In the reign of 'Abd al-Malik in 684 A.D. Buraida rebelled in Naşibin (Mich. Syr., ii. 469; Barhebr., Chron. Syr., ed. Bedjan, p. 111; Caetani, Chronographia islamica, i. 755, 65 A.H., § 15). An earthquake devastated the town in 717 (al-Kh̄wārizmī, op. cit., p. 122, year 99 A.H.). The Metropolitan Cyprianus in 758—759 completed the choir of the Church (ḫbyḫn) and the altar of the Cathedral of Naşibin (al-Kh̄wārizmī, op. cit., p. 128, year 141 A.H.). In the period of troubles in Mesopotamia the people of Dārā, Naşibin and Āmid used to go out on plundering expeditions (Mich. Syr., iii. 103; Barhebraeus, Chr. syr., p. 153). A band of Karmātas in 315 (927—928) attacked Kafartūthā, Rās al-'Ain and Naşibin (al-Mas'ūdī, Kitāb al-Tanbih, p. 384).

Saif al-Dawla began his campaign against Armenia in 328 (940) from Naşibin (Freytag, in Z.D.M.G., x. 467). Byzantines in 331 (942) under John Kurkuas invaded Mesopotamia and took Maiyāfāriḳīn, Arzan and Naşibin (Barhebraeus, op. cit., p. 179; Weil, Gesch. der Chal., ii. 690). Naşibin by this time probably belonged to the Ḥamdānid Nāşir al-Dawla (cf. Barhebraeus, p. 183 under the year 347 [958]; Z.D.M.G., x. 482). After his death in 358 (968—969) his son Abu 'l-Muzaffar Ḥamdān was for a short time governor of Naşibin (Z.D.M.G., x. 485). The Byzantines again attacked the town under the Domesticus (the Armenian Meḥ) on the 1st Muḥarram 362 (Oct. 12, 972) and instituted a dreadful massacre in it (Barhebraeus, p. 192; Z.D.M.G., x. 486; Weil, iii. 19 sq.; Yahyā b. Sa'īd al-Anṭākī, ed. Kračkovsky-Vasiliev, p. 145 = Patrol. Orient., xxiii., Paris 1932, p. 353 wrongly makes the Emperor John Tzimiscēs himself conduct the campaign; cf. against this: D. N. Anastasievich, in Byz. Zeitschr., xxx., 1929—1930, p. 403 sq.).

Ṭoghrolbeg's army in 435 (1043) laid waste the country round Naşibin (Barhebraeus, op. cit., p. 226). Sulṭān Ghiyāth al-Dīn in 1106 sent Abū Maṣṣūr al-Djawālī, lord of al-Mawṣil, to Naşibin against the Franks (Mich. Syr., iii. 193). Soon afterwards the Ortoḳid İlghāzī Nađīm al-Dīn took the town (Mich. Syr., op. cit.; Barhebraeus, Chron. Syr., p. 273) and after the Sulṭān had granted it to the emir Mawdūd b. Altuntekin (Mich. Syr., iii. 215) İlghāzī took it again in 513 (1119—1120) (ibid., p. 217). But it changed hands again very soon, when in 515 (1121—1122) Sulṭān Maḥmūd gave it to the emir Bursuḳī along with al-Mawṣil, D̲j̲azirāt b. 'Omar and Sindjār (Barhebraeus, p. 283). The Franks in 523 (1128—1129) advanced as far as Āmid, Naşibin and Ra's al-'Ain (Barhebraeus, p. 289). In 1134, Zangī put down a rising in Naşibin (Mich. Syr., iii. 242). Bābek, installed there as governor by Zangī himself, destroyed all the fortresses in the neighbourhood so that Zangī might have no base against him (Mich. Syr., iii. 264). Nūr al-Dīn of Ḥalab in 1171 took the town without opposition and dealt rigorously with the Nestorian Christians there. All their new buildings were destroyed the treasures plundered and about 1,000 volumes of their writings burned (Mich. Syr., iii. 339 sq.). After his death, his nephew Saif al-Dīn of al-Mawṣil seized the town (Mich. Syr., iii. 360). It surrendered to Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn in 1182 (Barhebraeus, Chron. Syr., p. 360). In the following year the latter gave to 'Imād al-Dīn Sindjār, Naşibin and other towns in exchange for Ḥalab (Barhebraeus, p. 362) and he ruled there till his death in 594 (1198) (Barhebraeus, p. 398, 402). In the region of Naşibin there was fierce fighting in 582 (1186—1187) between Kurds and Turkomans (Barhebraeus, p. 370). 'Imād al-Dīn was succeeded in 1198 by his son Kuṭb al-Dīn but Nūr al-Dīn Arslānshāh of Mawṣil immediately took the town from him. But when a severe epidemic wrought great havoc in his army, he abandoned it and Kuṭb al-Dīn returned thither (Barhebraeus, p. 402). Nūr al-Dīn in 600 (1203—1204) had to break off a second siege of Naşibin prematurely (Barhebraeus, p. 416 sq.). Malik al-'Adil took the town in 606 (1209—1210) from Kuṭb al-Dīn (Barhebraeus, p. 424). After his death (615 = 1218—1289) it passed to Malik al-Ashraf of Urfa (Barhebraeus, p. 424, 439).

The Arab geographers placed Naşibin in the fourth clime, the southern boundary of which ran about 12 farsakh south of the town on the direction of Sindjār (al-Mas'ūdī, Kitāb al-Tanbīh, p. 32 sq., 35, 44). According to Yāqūt, it lay on the upper course of the Hirmās in the midst of numerous gardens. Ibn Ḥawqāl, who in 358 (968—969) visited the town which lay at the foot of Djabal Bālūsā, speaks of the pleasant life in it, apart from the dangerous scorpions found there. Al-Maḳḍisī describes the fine houses and baths, the market, the Friday mosque and the citadel. Ibn Djabair also visited it in 580 (1184—1185) and mentions its gardens, the bridge over the Hirmās inside the town, the hospital (māristān), several schools and other places of interest. In the viiith (xivth) century it was already for the most part in ruins; but the Friday mosque was still in existence and the gardens around it from which rose-water was exported (Ibn Baṭṭūṭa). Ḥamd Allāh Mustawfī, according to whom the walls had a circumference of 6,500 paces, praises its fruits and wine but laments the unhealthy moistness of the climate, the large number of scorpions and the plague of midges.

Hülāgū in 657 (1259) occupied al-Ruhā, Naşibin and Harrān (Weil, Gesch. der Chalifen, iv. 10). The Mongol Khān Mangū Timūr [q. v.] died, poisoned in Djazīrat b. 'Omar, on his way from there to Naşibin on the 16th Muharram 681 (April 26, 1282; Barhebraeus, p. 546 sq.). When Timūr Khān in 1395 was on his way to Tūr 'Abdīn, the people of Naşibin and Ma'arra hid in caves from the Mongols but were suffocated in them with smoke (App. to Barhebraeus, Chronography, ed. Wallis Budge, ii., p. xxxiv.). The Ḥasanāyē Kurds in 1403 pillaged Naşibin and the country around (ibid., p. xxxvi.).

The town passed into the hands of the Ottomans in 1515 (v. Hammer, G. O. R., ii., Pest 1828, p. 449 sq.). It became the capital of a sandjak in the pashalik of Āmid (Hādjdī Khalifa, Djihan-numā, Stambul 1732, p. 438). Later it was placed in the sandjak of Mārdīn in the pashalik of Baghdād (St. Martin, Mémoires sur l'Arménie, i., Paris 1818, p. 161 sq.). To its position on the southern border of the highlands and on the road from al-Mawṣil to Syria it owes its great strategic and commercial importance. The building of the Baghdād railway has brought it new life; it is said now to have about 50,000 inhabitants.

NAŞİF AL-YĀZIDJĪ. [See AL-YĀZIDJĪ.]

NĀSIKH. [See NASKH.]

DAYĀ SHANKAR KAUL NASĪM (1811—1843) was a Kashmīrī paṇḍit who studied poetics under Ātiṣh. His fame rests entirely on one poem, a romance called Gulzar-i Nasim, composed when he was 22. It greatly resembles Mir Ḥasan's Sihṛ al-Bayān, and is generally awarded the second place among Urdū poetic romances. Naşīm also translated the Arabian Nights into Urdū. Naşīm is among the great Urdū mathnawī (mathnawī in the sense of poetic romance) writers, and is one of the very few Urdū authors who were Hindūs.

AL-NAŞİR LI-DĪN ALLĀH, ABU 'L-'ABBĀS AḤMAD B. AL-MUSTAḌRĪ BI-AMR ALLĀH, the 34th 'Ab-bāsid caliph (575—622 = 1180—1225), was the son of a Turkish slave-girl named Zumurrud.

He was the only caliph of the later period of the caliphate who was able to pursue a consistent policy. This was entirely directed towards restoring the temporal power of the caliphate. The caliph was assisted by the fact that the Saldjūk empire which had previously held the secular power had begun to collapse. In the confusion which brought about its final downfall, the caliph did all he could to hasten its end and did not hesitate to support the Khwārizmshāh Takash as the strongest rival of the dying Saldjūk empire in his fight against the last Saldjūk Sultān Tughril II. This struggle finally ended in the defeat of the Saldjūks at Raiy where Tughril died fighting (Rabi' I, 590 = March 1194).

As a result of the diversity of the political aims of the two allies a quarrel broke out between the caliph and the Khwārizmshāh as soon as negotiations for the partition of the Saldjūk territory were begun. The caliph wished to seize the opportunity to extend his personal estates by incorporating the Persian provinces while the Khwārizmshāh in the exercise of the temporal power wished to succeed to the whole inheritance of the Saldjūks. While Takash was involved in war in the east, Ibn al-Qaṣṣāb, the caliph's vizier, was able to conquer Khūzistān and other Persian provinces (beg. of 591 = 1195). His troops were however completely routed by Takash on his return (Shābān 592 = July 1196) so that the caliph had to abandon his conquests. Only Khūzistān was left to him.

In the years following, the caliph had a hand in the intrigues of local rulers in Persian 'Irāk, usually against the Khwārizmshāh (from 596 = 1200 'Alā' al-Dīn Muḥammad). The disputes with the latter culminated in 613 (1216) when the caliph had a supporter of the Khwārizmshāh, Oghalmish, vizier of the governor of Persian 'Irāk, assassinated by Ismā'ili envoys. The Khwārizmshāh now began to prepare for the decisive struggle against the caliph; he prepared for war and in 614 (1217) invaded Persian 'Irāk. Here, in order to destroy the caliph as a political force also, he had his 'ulamā' in a fetwā declare the caliph al-Nāsir unworthy of the caliphate and appointed an 'Alid named 'Alā' al-Mulk from Tirmidh as imām. The caliph in vain attempted through negotiations to persuade the Khwārizmshāh to retreat. Instead he advanced on Baghdad from Hamadhān. But he was unable to deal his blow at the caliph owing to an unexpected circumstance; for in consequence of the early coming of a severe winter, which destroyed his army, the Khwārizmshāh was forced to abandon his march and return home with the intention of advancing on Baghdad next year.

In order to meet the danger threatening him, the caliph however in the meanwhile began negotiations with the Mongol Cingiz Khān in order to persuade him to attack the Khwārizmshāh. In 616 (1219) the latter was attacked and decisively defeated by Cingiz Khān before he could resume his intended campaign against Baghdad. He died while fleeing from the Mongols on an island in the Caspian Sea (617 = 1220).

The caliph had thus achieved his immediate aim and rid himself of his most dangerous opponent for the moment. But the Mongols were approaching perilously near him, especially after the conquest of Marāgha (618 = 1221) had established them in Ādharbāidjān. At first however, there were only minor complications with the Mongols.

On the other hand, after the temporary withdrawal of the Mongols, the young Khwārizmshāh Djalāl al-Dīn Mangubartī, Muḥammad's son and successor, attacked al-Nāsir and took Khūzistān from him.

As al-Nāsir had concentrated his whole attention on the east where he was fighting to strengthen and increase his private domains, he took no interest in the west where Saladin was waging his great struggle with the Crusaders and gave Saladin very insufficient help in spite of several appeals from him.

Al-Nāsir's policy seems also to have aimed at the restoration of the internal unity of Islām in addition to restoring the temporal power of the caliphate. He himself had a leaning to the Shī'a of the Imāmī sect (Twelver-Shī'a) and invited Alids to his court; he seems to have wished to reconcile in his person the claims of 'Abbasids and 'Alids. He also established an agreement with the extreme Ismā'ili sect of the Assassins. In 608 (1211-1212) the Grand Master of the Assassins, Ḥasan III, abandoned his claims to the imāmate and paid homage to the 'Abbasid caliph.

Al-Nāsir's efforts to centralise round his person the order of chivalry known as the futuwwa in a reorganised form are also perhaps connected with his political plans; in 578 (1182-1183) he had himself been admitted by the Shaikh 'Abd al-Djabbār b. Šaliḥ into the futuwwa order. He then only allowed those of the organisations of the order to remain in existence which acknowledged his personal control. By admission into the order he was then able to establish connections with the princes of the Muslim world, who now regarded him as the head of their order (the chroniclers tell of this in the year 607 = 1210). Ibn al-Furāt gives us a description of the robing of a prince as an external sign of his admission into the order in the presence of the caliph's envoy (the story is reproduced in v. Hammer, in J. A., 3rd ser., vi., 1855, p. 285 sq.). The strict regulations introduced by the caliph into the futuwwa order are well illustrated in the edict of 9th Šafar 604 (Sept. 4, 1207), published by P. Kahle in the Oppenheim-Festschrift, which the caliph had issued on the occasion of the murder of a member of the order.

Al-Nāsir died on the last night of Ramaḍān 622 (Oct. 6, 1225) at the age of about 70. Ibn al-Aṭhīr describes him as tyrannical towards his subjects and inconsistent in his measures; his fondness for the futuwwa and its sporting activities (cross-bow shooting, training carrier pigeons) seems to him a strange caprice. Ibn al-Ṭiṭṭakā judges him more favourably; he describes him as unceasingly engaged in the duties of a ruler and lays stress on his rich endowments, although he also mentions his fondness for money. When a mediæval Muslim ruler is reproached with covetousness it usually only means that he was endeavouring to carry through a sound and cautious financial policy. Al-Nāsir is further reproached with having allied himself with the Mongols and thus being the cause of the great disaster which the Mongol hordes later inflicted on the lands of Islām.

Among buildings known from inscriptions to have been built by al-Nāsir are the Talisman Gate in Baghdad (618 = 1221-1222; blown up in March 1917 on the retreat of the Turks from Baghdad) and the sanctuary of the Mahdī (Ghaibat al-Mahdī) in Samarra. Both are interesting and suggestive for his political aims, the latter as a distinctly Shī'a sanctuary for his Shī'a tendencies and the Talisman Gate for the remarkable pictorial representation once visible upon it; the caliph seated between two dragons, the jaws of which he is tearing apart and grasping their tongues. According to M. van Berchem's brilliant interpretation, we have here the caliph represented as victorious over two enemies, who had disputed his spiritual power: the Grand Master of the Assassins Ḥasan III as for a time the representative of the most radical opposition to the orthodox 'Abbāsid Caliphate, who had finally paid homage to the caliph in 608 and died in 618; the other, the Khwārizmshāh who had dared in 614 to set up an anti-caliph but was overcome in 617 and died a fugitive. In this connection the inscription also is interesting; in it the caliph uses the expression al-da'wa al-ḥādīya, which is a name the Assassins gave themselves (cf. M. van Berchem, in J. A., ser. 9, vol. ix., 1897, p. 456 and 462), for his own caliphate.

AL-NĀSĪR IBN 'ALENNĀS (the last name is also written 'Alnās, 'Annās and even Ghilnās by Ibn 'Idhārī), fifth ruler of the Ḥammādid dynasty, succeeded his cousin Bulukkin b. Muḥammad in 454 (1062). His reign marks the apogee of the little Berber kingdom founded by Ḥammād [q. v.]. The ephemeral rise of the Ḥammādid was the immediate result of the downfall of their relations and neighbours, the Zirids of Ifrīkiya, the first victims of the Hilālī invasion. On his accession, al-Nāṣir, who lived in the Ka'at Bani Ḥammād, was already ruler of a little kingdom, the chiet towns of which were Ashīr [q. v.], Miliana, Algiers, Hamza (Bura), Ngau and Constantine. Shortly afterwards, he regained Biskra whose governor had rebelled against Bulukkin; but his chief hope of extending his territory lay in the decline of the kingdom of Kaïrawān.

The abandonment of the old capital by the Zirid al-Mu'izz and his flight to al-Mahdiyya (1057) had left Ifrīkiya a prey to anarchy. The country districts were in the hands of the Arabs and the towns had chosen their own rulers; on all sides governors were in rebellion; leaders of the tribes imposed their authority on the threatened citizens; some towns turned to the Ḥammādid who were able to protect them. The people of Kaṣṭiliya [q. v.] for example sent a deputation to al-Nāṣir to convey him their homage; the people of Tunis did the same. At their request the Ḥammādid sent them as governor 'Abd al-Ḥaḳḳ of the Ṣanhādja family of the Banū Khurāsān. The latter worked wonders; he negotiated agreements with the marauding Arabs which secured the safety of the city. Later, after casting off Ḥammādid suzerainty, he made Tunis the capital of a kingdom.

If the arrival of the invading nomads had meant an immediate accession of strength to al-Nāṣir and an increase of population and economic activity to his capital, they were not without danger as neighbours. The Arabs soon involved him in a dangerous adventure. In 457 (1064) the Athbadj, one of their tribes, asked him to help them against their enemies, their brethren the Riyāh, who had joined the Zirid ruler Tamīm [q. v.]. Al-Nāṣir agreed, seeing an opportunity to invade and perhaps annex Ifrīkiya. He put himself at the head of a large army which included Arabs, Ṣanhādja, and even Zenāta, led by the king of Fās, al-Mu'izz b. 'Aṭiya. The Riyāh in their turn received subsidies and arms from al-Mahdiyya. The armies met at Sbiba, near the ancient Sufes. From the first the Zenāta of Fās, won over by the enemy, gave way, which resulted in the rout of al-Nāṣir. With great difficulty he reached Constantine with 200 men, then the Ka'at the outskirts of which were systematically sacked by the Arabs.

After this disaster al-Nāṣir tried to make terms with the prince of al-Mahdiyya; the negotiations failed, perhaps through the fault of the ambassador, and al-Nāṣir incited again by the Athbadj, resumed hostilities against the unfortunate Zirid kingdom. He entered Laribus and Kaïrawān (460 = 1067) but these successes led to nothing; he had to abandon them again as he could not hold his conquests. These adventures, into which he was dragged by the Arabs and which brought him no lasting advantage, lasted for some ten years. In 470 (1077) al-Nāṣir made peace with the Zirid Tamīm and gave him his daughter in marriage.

The Arab scourge which had ruined the kingdom of Ifrīkiya began now to threaten seriously the Ḥammādid kingdom. The Zenāta, hereditary enemies of the Ṣanhādja lords of the Ka'at, found among the immigrant nomads allies always ready to resume the conflict. In 468 (1075), the Zenāta chief Ibn Khazrūn, supported by the Arab Banū 'Adī of Tripolitania seized Msila and Ashīr. Al-Nāṣir succeeded in driving him back to the desert where, drawing him into a trap, he had him murdered. He sent his son al-Manṣūr against the Zenāta Banū Tuḍjīn, who had joined the Banū 'Adī and were laying waste the country districts of the Central Maghrib. The rebels were caught and tortured.

The Athbadj Arabs themselves, of whom al-Nāṣir had hoped to make valuable auxiliaries, proved most undesirable neighbours. Although he seems to have put down — not without cruelty — the majority of the revolts, life in his ancestral capital became more and more difficult from year to year. This decided him to select another. Occupying the lands of the Bidjāya Berbers, he founded there, on the site of the ancient port of Saldæ, a town which was first called al-Nāṣiriya and later became known as Bougie. There he built the splendid Palace of the Pearl (Kaṣr al-Lu'lu'). "Having peopled his new capital he exempted the inhabitants from the kharaḳ and in 461 (1068) he settled there himself" (Ibn Khaldūn). The exodus of the Ḥammādid royal family to the coast was caused by the same event as had led the Zirids of Kaïrawān to move to al-Mahdiyya: the settlement of the nomad Arabs in Barbary and the insecurity which resulted in the interior. This exodus was only completed under al-Nāṣir's successor, his son al-

Manṣūr [q. v.]. The latter assumed power at his father's death in 481 (1088).

AL-NĀSIR, the name of two Aiyūbids.

I. AL-MALIK AL-NĀSIR ṢALĀḤ AL-DĪN DĀWŪD B. AL-MALIK AL-MU'AZZAM, born in Djumādā I 603 (Dec. 1205) in Damascus. After the death of his father at the end of Dhu 'l-Ka'da 624 (Nov. 1227) Dāwūd succeeded him on the throne of Damascus and the Mamlūk 'Izz al-Dīn Aibak acted as regent. Dāwūd's uncles however, covetous of territory, did not leave him long in peace. Al-Malik al-Kāmil [q. v.] first of all claimed the fortress of al-Shawbak [q. v.] and when it was refused him he occupied Jerusalem, Nābulus and other places (625 = 1228). In this perilous position, Dāwūd appealed to another uncle al-Malik al-Ashraf, who administered the Aiyūbid possessions in Mesopotamia. The latter came to Damascus but then took al-Kāmil's side and arranged with him a formal division of the whole kingdom. By the arrangement between the two brothers al-Ashraf was to receive Damascus and Dāwūd Ḥarrān, al-Raḡḡa and Ḥimṣ, while al-Kāmil took southern Syria with Palestine, and Ḥamāt was left to Dāwūd's brother al-Malik al-Muzaḡffar. But when Dāwūd would not consent to this, al-Ashraf began to besiege Damascus. After al-Kāmil had concluded peace with the Emperor Frederick II he joined al-Ashraf and after a three months' siege, forced his nephew to yield (Sha'bān 626 = June–July 1229) whereupon al-Ashraf was recognised as lord of Damascus under al-Kāmil's suzerainty while Dāwūd had to be content with al-Kerak [q. v.], al-Shawbak and several other places. In spite of this unfriendly treatment, Dāwūd remained loyal to al-Kāmil when the other Aiyūbids [q. v.] combined against him, and entered his service in Egypt. Soon after al-Kāmil accompanied by Dāwūd had taken Damascus, he died in Radjab 635 (March 1238) and Dāwūd whom al-Kāmil had appointed governor of Damascus had to return to al-Kerak. In Egypt al-Kāmil's son al-Malik al-'Ādil was recognised as his successor and appointed his cousin al-Malik al-Djawād Yūnus governor of Damascus. When Dāwūd tried to assert his claims to Damascus he was defeated at Nābulus. In the following year Yūnus, who did not feel secure against Sulṭān al-'Ādil, exchanged Damascus with his cousin al-Malik al-Ṣāliḥ Aiyūb for Sindjār, al-Raḡḡa and 'Āna. This pleased neither al-'Ādil nor Dāwūd so they joined forces for an attack on Aiyūb. The events that followed have already been fully related in the article AL-MALIK AL-ṢĀLIḤ NAḌJM AL-DĪN AIYŪB so that the reader may be referred to it. After Dāwūd had lost all his possessions except al-Kerak he appointed his youngest son al-Malik al-Mu'azzam 'Isā as his deputy and fled to Ḥalab (647 = 1249–1250) where he was kindly received by al-Malik al-Nāṣir Yūsuf (see below). His private fortune in the form of valuable jewels, valued at least 100,000 dinārs, he entrusted to the care of the caliph al-Musta'ṣim, who acknowledged the receipt of them but never could bring himself to restore the treasure entrusted him. Soon afterwards Dāwūd's two older sons, who had felt themselves neglected, turned to Sulṭān al-Malik al-Ṣāliḥ Aiyūb and offered him al-Kerak in return for fiefs in Egypt which offer the latter gladly accepted. Alleging unfavourable reports about Dāwūd, al-Malik al-Nāṣir Yūsuf had him brought to Ḥimṣ in the beginning of Sha'bān 648 (Oct. 1250) and put under arrest. In 651 (1253–1254) he was released on the intercession of the caliph on condition that he was not to stay in any lands under the rule of al-Malik al-Nāṣir Yūsuf. He therefore wanted to go to Baghdad but was not admitted into the city. He then lived for a time very wretchedly in the region of 'Āna and al-Ḥaditha until he found a place of refuge in al-Anbār. His appeals to the caliph were not answered; finally however, the caliph obtained him permission to settle in Damascus. After several unsuccessful efforts to get back his property in Baghdad which had been confiscated, he was in the desert when he was taken prisoner by al-Malik al-Mughith, then lord of al-Kerak and al-Shawbak and brought to al-Shawbak. As the caliph thought he could be of use to him in the impending fight with the Mongols, he sent an envoy to al-Shawbak to fetch him; the envoy was bringing him back to Damascus when he heard of Hūlāgū's capture of Baghdad; he thereupon left Dāwūd who went to al-Buwa'idā, a village near Damascus. Here he died of the plague on 27th Djumādā I, 657 (May 12, 1259). Abu 'l-Fida' speaks highly of Dāwūd's eloquence and poetical gifts.

II. AL-MALIK AL-NĀSIR ṢALĀḤ AL-DĪN ABU 'L-MUZAFFAR YŪSUF, born in Ḥalab on 19th Ramaḡān 627 (Aug. 1, 1230). His father was al-Malik al-'Azīz, lord of Ḥalab, his mother Fāṭima, daughter of Sulṭān al-Kāmil. On 4th Rabi' I (Nov. 5, 1236) Yūsuf succeeded his father under the guardianship of his paternal grandmother Ḍa'ifa Khatūn bint al-Malik al-'Ādil [see ḤALAB]. After her death in Djumādā I 640 (Nov. 1242) Yūsuf himself assumed the reins of government and soon extended his power over most of Syria. When Aiyūb the Sulṭān of Egypt with the help of the Khwārizmians had conquered Palestine and also Damascus Yūsuf became ultimately involved in the conflict. The Khwārizmians were dissatisfied with Aiyūb, went over to al-Malik al-Ṣāliḥ Ismā'il, lord of Ba'albek and Boṣrā, and laid siege to Damascus on his behalf. The lords of Ḥimṣ and Ḥalab then appeared on the scene. The Khwārizmians were completely routed (644 = 1246) and Ismā'il had to flee to Ḥalab and take refuge with Yūsuf [see AL-MALIK AL-ŠĀLIḤ NAḌJM AL-DĪN AIYŪB]. In 646 (1248–1249) the latter's general Shams al-Dīn Lu'lu' al-Armanī attacked Ḥimṣ [q. v.] and after a two months' siege forced the emir al-Malik al-Ashraf to capitulate and cede the town to Yūsuf in return for Tell Bāshir [q. v.]. Two years later, the latter conquered Naṣibin, Dārā and Qarkisiyā from the Atābeg of al-Mawṣil Badr al-Dīn Lu'lu' [see LU'LU']. After the assassination of Tūrānshāh [see AIYŪBIDS] in 648 (1250), Yūsuf was made sultān by the Damascus emirs and in Rabī' II (July 1250) he entered Damascus. To avenge the murder of Tūrānshāh he prepared for war against Egypt and proposed an alliance with Louis IX of France; but these negotiations came to nothing. In Raddjāb of this year (Oct. 1250) the Syrians were defeated by the Egyptian emir Fāris al-Dīn Aḳṭai near Ghazza. Yūsuf did not lose courage however but prepared for a new attack on Egypt. In the vicinity of al-'Abbāsa [q. v.] he met the Egyptian army (Dhu 'l-Ka'da 648 = beg. of Feb. 1251); victory was within Yūsuf's grasp when the treachery of his Turkish mamlūks turned the scale in favour of Egypt. Yūsuf had to take to flight, several Syrian princes were taken prisoners and Aḳṭai invaded Syria where he occupied Nābulus and several other important towns until a strong Syrian force finally checked his further advance. After long negotiations, peace was finally concluded at the beginning of the year 651 (1253) by which Yūsuf had to give up any claims on Egypt, but a year or two later war very nearly broke out again. On the advance of the Mongols under Hūlāgū [q. v.], Yūsuf endeavoured to avert the danger by showing a humble frame of mind and sent envoys with presents to the Mongol camp; but when he began to calculate on getting support from other Muslim rulers and answered a threatening message from Hūlāgū in a challenging fashion, the latter laid siege to Ḥalab. Yūsuf seems at first to have thought of advancing against him to raise the siege. He encamped in front of Damascus and sent messengers with appeals for help in all directions but as neither Syrians nor Egyptians answered him and Ḥalab fell into the hands of the Mongols (658 = 1260), there was nothing left for him but to abandon Damascus and go south. Ḥamāt, Ba'albek and Damascus were taken and Yūsuf had finally to surrender to Hūlāgū. The latter had him executed, probably after the defeat of the Mongols at Ḥimṣ towards the end of the year 659 (1261; see also the article ḤALAB). According to Abu 'l-Fidā', Yūsuf was distinguished for his scholarship and poetical gifts; he was further kindly and good natured and fond of good living and so lacked the strength to maintain order in his kingdom.

AL-NĀSIR, the name of two Mamlūk sultāns.

I. AL-MALIK AL-NĀSIR NĀSIR AL-DĪN MUḤAM-

MAD, the ninth sultān of the Bahri Mamlūks, son of Sultān Kalā'ūn [q. v.] and a Mongol princess named Aslūn (Ashlūn) Khātūn. Born in the middle of Muḥarram 684 (Dec. 1285), he received homage as sultān after the assassination of his brother al-Malik al-Ashraf Khalil in Muḥarram 693 (Dec. 1293). After the two emirs Zain al-Dīn Ketbogha al-Manṣūrī and 'Alam al-Dīn Sandjar al-Shudjā'i had agreed that the former should hold the office of administrator of the government (niyābat al-saltāna) and the latter the vizierate, these appointments were confirmed by the nine year old sultān; but the agreement between the two high officials was not long maintained. When al-Shudjā'i tried to get rid of his rival, he was unsuccessful and was himself killed. In order to get all the power into his own hands, Ketbogha pardoned the two murderers of Sultān Khalil, who naturally felt it necessary to overthrow Nāsir in order to escape his vengeance, and when al-Khalil's old Mamlūks mutinied out of indignation, they were brought to terms by the loyal troops. Ketbogha then succeeded without much difficulty in persuading the emirs that the political situation required a man and not a child on the throne, whereupon al-Nāsir was deposed and Ketbogha proclaimed sultān with the title al-Malik al-'Adil (Muḥarram 694 = Dec. 1294). Two years later (Muḥarram 696 = Nov. 1296), Ketbogha shared the fate of his predecessor. He was succeeded by one of al-Khalil's murderers, al-Malik al-Manṣūr Ḥusām al-Dīn Lādjin al-Manṣūrī who was murdered in Rabī' II 698 (Jan. 1299). The emirs in authority then agreed to recall the 14 year old Nāsir who was in al-Kerak and in Djumādā I (Feb. 1299) he entered the capital in order to receive for the second time the diploma of sultān from the caliph and the oath of fealty from the emirs. The actual rulers were now the administrator of the kingdom Sallār al-Manṣūrī and the commander-in-chief of the troops, Rukn al-Dīn Baibars al-Djāshnagīr. The most important event in the period was the war with the hereditary enemy, the Mongols. In Rabī' I, 699 (Dec. 1299) the Ilkhān Ghāzān [q. v.] crossed the Euphrates and was soon before Ḥalab. In the same month Nāsir who had left Cairo in Dhu 'l-Hijja 698 (Sept. 1299), because the Egyptians had long been afraid of a Mongol invasion, reached Damascus. The sultān encountered the much superior enemy near Ḥimṣ, his tried emirs were defeated and the army returned to Egypt in great disorder while Ḥimṣ fell into the hands of the Mongols. Damascus met the same fate, except the citadel which was bravely defended by its Egyptian commander Ardjawāsh. In the meanwhile the Egyptians were preparing with desperate energy to resume the struggle and in Raddjāb 699 (March–April 1300) a new army left Cairo. But when the Mongols found they could not take the citadel of Damascus, they withdrew before it came to a battle and the Egyptians reoccupied Damascus, Ḥalab and the whole of Syria. After an unsuccessful campaign against northern Syria in Rabī' II 700 (Jan. 1301) which only resulted in the pillaging of the region visited by the Mongols, Ghāzān sent an embassy to open up peace negotiations; but as these overtures came to nothing, the decision was left to arms for the third time. In Shabān 702 (April 1303) the Mongol general Kuṭluṣhāh (Kuṭluḡshah) crossed the Euphrates and at the same time a portion of the Egyptian army under the command of Baibars al-Djāshnagīr entered Damascus. On 2th Ramaḍān (April 20), a battle was fought on the plain of Mardj al-Suffar after the rest of the Egyptian troops under Sulṭān al-Nāṣir and the caliph al-Mustakfī had joined Baibars. Nightfall put a stop to the desperate fighting but it was renewed next day and ended with the total defeat of the Mongols; 10,000 prisoners are said to have fallen into the hands of the victors. Ghāzān died soon afterwards and his successor Ūldjaitū did not dare to measure his strength with his formidable opponent. For the rest al-Nāṣir's second reign was a fairly peaceful one apart from a few military enterprises of slight importance. At the beginning of the year 702 (1302), an expedition was sent against the Templars who had established themselves in the island of Arwād on the Syrian coast and harassed the mainland opposite [see ṬARTŪS]. The district of Sīs [q. v.] was also invaded; its ruler had made common cause with the Ilkhān and did not send Egypt the usual tribute promptly. The Egyptian authorities were on the whole on good terms with foreign powers; on the other hand, home affairs gave cause for anxiety. After the defeat at Hims, the Beduins in Upper Egypt rebelled against the authorities and levied taxes on their own account. A large army was therefore equipped to punish the rebels. At the same time, the governor of Kūṣ advanced from the south and cut off their access to the southern desert. The rebellion was put down with ruthless vigour, the men massacred without mercy, the women and children taken prisoners and property carried off. Many took refuge in caves difficult of access but they were suffocated with smoke in them. The large Christian and Jewish elements in the population had also to suffer a great deal. Several of the Umayyad, 'Abbāsīd and Fātimīd caliphs had already issued special regulations affecting non-Muslims and the 'Abbāsīd al-Mutawakkil had gone furthest in this direction; in general however, such measures were only enforced for a short period and were therefore usually repeated after a time; at least this is true of Egypt. In al-Nāṣir's reign many Christians were holding honoured positions as officials when suddenly from some insignificant cause the secret jealousy of the Muslims flared up and in 701 (1300–1301) an edict was issued which ordered among other things that in future Christians should wear blue and Jews yellow turbans in order to be at once distinguishable from the true believers nor were they to be allowed to carry arms or ride horses. Very soon a prohibition was issued against the appointment of Christians and Jews to the offices of the sulṭān or of the emīrs. The immediate consequence of this measure was that several churches were destroyed by the fanatical mob and the others remained closed until the authorities allowed them to be reopened at the demand of the Byzantine emperor and other Christian rulers. On the 23rd Dhū 'l-Hijja 703 (Aug. 8, 1303) the whole of Egypt was affected by a terrible earthquake in which not only many private houses but also palaces and mosques were destroyed and large numbers of people perished. All traces of the catastrophe were however obliterated with the greatest energy and the emīrs and well-to-do citizens vied with one another in spending lavishly to restore the shattered buildings. After an unsuccessful attempt to escape from the tutelage of the two emīrs

Sallār and Baibars, both of whom aimed at the sole power and regarded each other with suspicion, the sulṭān, who was prevented from exerting any influence in the government, left the capital on the 24th Ramaḍān 708 (March 7, 1309) under the pretext that he wished to perform the pilgrimage to Mecca but went instead to al-Kerak. On reaching the citadel, he told the emīrs who accompanied him that he was abandoning the pilgrimage and abdicating in order to live in peace in al-Kerak. Baibars was proclaimed his successor under the title al-Malik al-Muẓaffar on the 23rd Shawwāl (April 5, 1309) while Sallār remained in office as administrator. Baibars however enjoyed no real popularity; an oppressive rise in prices made him hated among the people who without justice blamed him for the difficult times. Sallār was intriguing secretly and al-Nāṣir was vigorously adding to the number of his followers in Syria. When Baibars heard that al-Nāṣir had entered Damascus and the Syrian emīrs had gone over to him, there was nothing left for him but to abdicate and appeal for mercy to his rival. The latter pardoned him and even offered him the lordship of Ṣihyawn [q. v.]. But after he had made his entry into Cairo al-Nāṣir had Baibars strangled (beg. of Shawwāl 709 = March 1310). Very soon afterwards, Sallār was also disposed of; he died of starvation in prison. The Mongols not long after this resumed hostilities. Two emīrs who did not feel safe with the sulṭān went to the Ilkhān Ūldjaitū and urged him to invade Syria. The Mongol expedition did not however go beyond the siege of the town of al-Rahba (Ramaḍān 712 = Jan. 1313). When the Mongols saw that their efforts were unavailing, they abandoned their plan of campaign and retired. At the beginning of the year 715 (1315) a campaign was undertaken against Malatya, on the course of which see the article MALATYA. At the same time, the lord of Sīs had to cede several strongholds and increase his annual tribute. Little Armenia was several times invaded by the Mamlūks who wrought great havoc there. In Mecca the sons of the Sharīf Abū Numayī [q. v.] were engaged in a prolonged struggle for supremacy; as the Mamlūk sulṭāns claimed to exercise a kind of suzerainty over the two holy cities, al-Nāṣir intervened without however playing any very effective part. His authority was recognised in Madīna in 717 (1317) and when he intervened in the domestic troubles of the Yaman and sent troops thither to support al-Mudjāhid, one of the pretenders to the South Arabian throne, he was assisted by the Meccans (725 = 1325). In the meanwhile, the situation had improved in favour of al-Mudjāhid so that the troops sent to his help by al-Nāṣir had to return amid great hardships after achieving nothing. Al-Nāṣir also tried to extend his power into Nubia. For this purpose he sent in 716 (1316–1317) a Nubian prince named Abd 'Allāh, who had been converted to Islām and brought up in Egypt, with an army to put him on the throne. He succeeded in driving out the legitimate heir but the latter was able after a time to return and expel the intruder 'Abd Allāh whose tyrannical rule had made him generally hated. Al-Nāṣir was more successful in N. W. Africa; in 711–717 (1311–1317) he was mentioned as sulṭān in the khutba in the pulpits of Tunis, whose ruler, the Hafṣīd Abū Zakariyā' Yahyā, owed his throne to him. In 723 (1323) he finally concluded peace with the Ilkhān

Abū Saʿīd. After the latter's death in Rabi' II 736 (Nov. 1335), Ḥasan Buzurg pledged himself to recognise al-Nāṣir's suzerainty if the latter would support him with an armed force. Al-Nāṣir, who was a better diplomat than soldier and had not the courage to intervene at the decisive moment, did not fulfil the condition. Al-Nāṣir had diplomatic relations with most of the rest of the known world and at his court appeared embassies not only from the Golden Horde, the Ilkhāns, the Rasūlids of Yaman, the king of Abyssinia, and the Ḥafṣids of Tunis, but also from the Emperor of Byzantium, the Czar of Bulgaria, the Pope, the King of Aragon, Philip VI of France and Sulṭān Muḥammad b. Tuḡluḡ of Dihli. Al-Nāṣir died in Dhu 'l-Ḥijja 741 (June 1341); he left eight sons, who reigned one after the other but were themselves ruled by the emirs who were usually quarrelling among themselves. His immediate successor on the throne was al-Malik al-Manṣūr Saif al-Dīn Abū Bakr, who was deposed after only two months in favour of another son of the late sulṭān.

In al-Nāṣir's third reign the position of the Christians improved, and he frequently tried to alleviate their hard lot, although his efforts sometimes failed against the stubborn opposition of the Muslim clergy. The ordinances of the period when Sallār and Baibars were the real rulers were at least not enforced to the full extent and we even find that the sulṭān put Christians, i.e. Copts, into the government offices, presumably simply because they were cleverer and more wily than the Muslims. Men of learning were treated with a benevolent interest, and the Aiyūbid Abu 'l-Fida' [q. v.], celebrated as a historian and geographer, was the sulṭān's trusted friend "perhaps the only one among all the nobles whom al-Nāṣir treated till his death with equal love and respect" (Weil, iv. 400). Al-Nāṣir further abolished many taxes which oppressed the people. He built canals and roads and carried out other public works for the improvement of means of transport. Architecture in particular flourished exceedingly; among the splendid buildings which date from his reign special mention may be made of al-Ḳaṣr al-Ablaḡ, al-Madrasa al-Nāṣiriya, and Djāmi' al-Nāṣir. These works however cost large sums of money and there were really no bounds to his extravagance. He was able through his long reign to maintain the Mamlūk state in its place among the great powers, and he was also able to make his authority felt at home. In some respects he reminds one of Sulṭān Baibars I; like the latter he was little scrupulous in his choice of means. To undeniable gifts he added suspicion, covetousness and a revengeful nature, and it has been observed, undoubtedly with justice, that al-Nāṣir inspired more awe than respect.

II. AL-MALIK AL-NĀṢIR NĀṢIR AL-DĪN ḤASAN, the nineteenth sulṭān of the Bahri Mamlūks, son of the preceding. After the murder of his brother al-Malik al-Muzaḥḥar Saif al-Dīn Ḥādjdī, Ḥasan who was then only eleven, or, according to others, thirteen years old was proclaimed sulṭān on the 14th Ramaḍān 748 (Dec. 18, 1347). Another son of the sulṭān al-Malik al-Nāṣir Muḥammad b. Ḳalā'ūn, called Ḥusain, was also put forward but this plan fell through and he never attained the throne at a later date. More important than the elevation of this minor prince to the throne was of course the distribution of the high offices of state among the emirs; the emir Baibogha Arwas became administrator of the kingdom, his brother Mendjek al-Yūsufi vizier, and the chief emir Shaiḡhū, Atābeg of al-Malik al-Ṣāliḡ Ṣālaḡ al-Dīn Ṣāliḡ [q. v.], afterwards sulṭān. Thanks to Baibogha's adroit policy, al-Nāṣir was able to survive for four years, although, except for the last few months, he exercised no influence worth mentioning on affairs of state. His reign was filled with unedifying quarrels among the ruling emirs and systematic raiding by the Beduins. The most noteworthy event of the period was however the visitation of a great part of the world by the devastating pestilence, which, known in Europe as the "Black Death", spread from Asia through Egypt and over almost all Europe to England and Scandinavia. In Egypt the plague raged in the second half of the year 749 (1348—1349) being accompanied by a no less fatal cattle-plague. In Syria it had appeared a few months earlier. Everywhere countless men fell victims to the angel of death and it is not surprising that the political and economic life of the state was crippled. The plague only died down in the following year. In Shawwāl 751 (Dec. 1350) the sulṭān succeeded in getting rid of the most powerful emirs and taking the reins of government into his own hands, but after a very few months he was deposed and his brother al-Malik al-Ṣāliḡ Ṣālaḡ al-Dīn Ṣāliḡ, the eighth of the sons of sulṭān Muḥammad b. Ḳalā'ūn, was placed on the throne (Djumaḍā II 752 = Aug. 1351). He ruled only for three years; on the 2nd Shawwāl 755 (Oct. 20, 1354) he was dethroned and his brother al-Nāṣir restored. The real ruler at first was Shaiḡhū; but in 758 (1357) the latter was waylaid and so severely wounded that he died a few months later. His successor Ṣarghatmish, who was suspected of having instigated the murder, did not allow the sulṭān the slightest independence, but was however arrested in Ramaḍān 759 (Aug.—Sept. 1358). In Muḥarram 761 (Nov.—Dec. 1359) the governor of Ḥalab undertook an expedition against Sis and established Muslim garrisons in Adana and Tarsus. About the same time, the troops who had been sent to Mecca by the Egyptian government to settle the endless family feuds there were defeated by the Meccans and those taken prisoners sold in Yanbu' as slaves. On hearing this the sulṭān is said to have sworn to exterminate the sharīfs completely; but before he could carry out this plan, he was himself deposed. For, as he wished to preserve his independence, he quarrelled with the powerful emir Yalbogha, who had reproached him with his extravagance. The latter combined with several other dissatisfied emirs and prepared to fight. Al-Nāṣir was defeated and had to abandon his plan of escaping secretly to Syria. Instead he was taken prisoner and handed over to his enemy Yalbogha (Djumaḍā I 762 = March 1361). His ultimate fate is unknown; according to one, in itself quite credible, story he was strangled and his body thrown into the Nile. His mosque (Djami' Sultan Hasan) built in Cairo in the years 1356–1363 is considered the most important example of Egyptian-Arabic architecture.

AL-NĀSIR, honorific of the fourth sovereign of the Maghribī dynasty of the Mu'minids or Almohads [q. v.], ABŪ 'ABD ALLĀH MUHAMMAD B. YA'KŪB AL-MANŠŪR B. YŪSUF B. 'ABD AL-MU'MIN. He was proclaimed on the death of his father on the 22nd Rabi' I 595 (Jan. 25, 1199). The beginning of his reign was marked by the suppression of a rising led by an agitator in the mountainous country of the Ghumāra and a long stay at Fās during which he rebuilt a part of the wall of the ḥaṣaba of this city. Hearing of the rising of Yahyā b. Ishāk Ibn Ghāniya in Ifriqiya, he set out for the eastern part of his empire and laid siege to the town of Mahdiyya [q. v.] which was taken on the 27th Djumādā I 602 (Jan. 9, 1206). He returned to Morocco in the following year leaving as his deputy in Ifriqiya the shaiḫ Abū Muḥammad 'Abd al-Wāḥid b. Abi Ḥafṣ al-Hintāti, ancestor of the Ḥafṣids [q. v.]. At the same time, he sent from Algiers against Majorca [cf. BALEARIC ISLANDS], which had belonged to the Banū Ghāniya since the period of the last Almoravids, a fleet which took the island; this remained in Muslim hands till 627 (1230). In 607 (1211) al-Nāṣir sent an expedition to Spain which ended in a disaster to the Muslim troops in front of Ḥiṣn al-'Ikāb or las Navas de Tolosa [q. v.] on 15th Ṣafar 609 (July 16, 1212). This severe reverse deeply affected al-Nāṣir who returned to Morocco and made his subjects take the oath of allegiance to his son Yūṣuf. He then retired to his palace. He died in Ribāṭ al-Faṭḥ (Rabat, q. v.) on 10th Sha'bān 610 (Dec. 25, 1213). According to some chroniclers, he died a violent death on the same date in Marrākush, his capital, the victim of a conspiracy hatched by his viziers.

AL-NĀSIR. [See UṬRŪSH.]

AL-NĀSIR LI-DĪN ALLĀH, official name of several Zaidi imāms.

I. Among the Caspian Zaidis this title was borne by 1. AL-NĀSIR AL-KABIR AL-UṬRŪSH [q. v.] and his great-grandson 2. AL-NĀSIR AL-ṢAGHİR AL-ḤUSAIN B. AL-ḤASAN B. AL-ḤASAN B. 'ALĪ. The latter gained for himself a dominion beginning in Hawsam, where he could find associations with the earlier period of Zaidi rule. He laid great emphasis on the religious character of Zaidism; he gave out of the state treasury funds to support people who learned the Qur'ān by heart. He was also a poet. After his death (476 = 1083), his tomb in Hawsam was a much visited place of pilgrimage.

II. Among the Yaman imāms this title was borne by 1. AL-NĀSIR AḤMAD, son of al-Hādī Yahyā and his brother's daughter Fāṭima. In the heavy fighting which the father had to wage in order to found the new state, Aḥmad had been more distinguished than his elder full brother Muḥammad. Homage was, it is true, paid first to the latter as al-Murtaḍā shortly after the death of al-Hādī (289 = 911); but after 6 months he abdicated as he could make no progress against the Ḳarmaṭian 'Alī b. Faḍl, and suggested as his successor the vigorous Aḥmad, whom the Banū Ḳhawlan especially favoured. As a poem composed when allegiance was sworn to him in Ṣafar 301 (Aug.—Sept. 913) challenged him to do, he made war on the Ḳarmaṭians his first duty and played a considerable part at least in damming back the threatened Ismā'īlisation of the Yaman. He died at Ṣa'da, probably in 315 (927); his tomb is there. All succeeding bearers of the title except the next one: 2. ABU 'L-FATH AL-NĀSIR AL-DAILAMĪ, so called from his first Caspian sphere of activity, were of his family although of different lines. In the Yaman, in contrast to his predecessors, he began operations south of Ṣan'ā', fell in 447 (1055) fighting 'Alī al-Ṣulaiḥi there and was buried near Ḍhamār. The life of 3. AL-NĀSIR ṢALĀḤ AL-DĪN was marked by internal strife which ultimately caused his death. In the first half of the viiith (xivth) century, several imāms had disputed the succession. About the middle of the century, his father al-Mahdī 'Alī b. Muḥammad attained considerable influence, which was however much reduced in the period before his death at Ḍhamār in 774 (1372). Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn became sole imām and advanced as far as the Tihāma against the Rasūlids [q. v.]. But when in 793 (1391) he died at Ṣan'ā', his death was concealed for two months on account of the insecurity and his body was concealed in the castle in a coffin covered with plaster. It was only when rumours of his death reached the Qāḍī al-Dawwārī in Ṣa'da that the latter arranged for his burial in Ṣan'ā'. The son 'Alī b. Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn could only obtain recognition as "Imām of the Djihād" and fell in 840 (1336), one of the many victims of the great plague. When in spite of opposition a Zaidi power was once more built up, it was destroyed by the young dynasty of the Ṭāhirids from the Tihāma (850–923 = 1446–1517), especially by its second member 'Abd al-Wahhāb b. Dāwūd, from 883 (1478), until at the end of the ixth (xvth) century AL-Hādī 'Izz al-Dīn b. al-Ḥasan again reestablished and extended their power. His son 4. AL-NĀSIR AL-ḤASAN B. 'IZZ AL-DĪN (c. 900–929 = 1494–1523) who had primarily inherited from his father a love of learning, could only maintain a limited power in the north. He had to put up for a long time with an anti-imām al-Manṣūr Muḥammad b. 'Alī al-Sarāḍjī in Ṣan'ā'. 5. AL-NĀSIR AL-ḤASAN B. 'ALĪ B. DĀWŪD at the end of the xth (xvth) century organised in the north one of the centres of resistance to the Turks who had been penetrating into the country since 927 (1521) and 943 (1536) but was taken prisoner by them in 1004 (1596–1597). Among the pretenders within the family of al-Manṣūr b. al-Ḳasim (d. 1029 = 1620), the liberator from the first Turkish conquest, was 6. AL-NĀSIR MUḤAMMAD B. ISHĀK B. AL-MAHDĪ AḤMAD; he set up first in 1136 (1723–1724) in the north in the hills of Sufyān among the Banū Bakil, then in 1139 (1726–1727) away in the south at Ṣafār but had finally to submit to his cousin's son al-Manṣūr al-Ḥusain b. al-Ḳasim b. al-Ḥasan b. al-Mahdī Aḥmad and died in 1167 (1753) as a private individual in Ṣan'ā'. In 1252 (1836) the dissatisfied troops who had been discharged by the very extravagant imām al-Manṣūr 'Alī b. al-Mahdī 'Abd Allāh summoned 7. AL-NĀSİR 'ABD ALLĀH B. ḤASAN to the imāmate. He had inherited strong religious tendencies from his grandfather al-Mutawakkil Aḥmad and from his great grandfather al-Mahdī 'Abbās and insisted on the strict observance of the neglected sharī'a. He had even to appoint teachers to instruct in the divine service. He was ambushed and murdered with 6 followers in 1256 (1840) while on a peaceful excursion to the Wādī Ḍahr northwest of Ṣan'ā' by people of the Banū Ḥamdān and was succeeded by the brother of his predecessor, al-Ḥādī Muḥammad b. al-Mahdī 'Abd Allāh, who had been long kept in prison by 'Abd Allāh b. Ḥasan. — As required of an imām, most of the above wrote a great deal; a number of works, chiefly of a legal nature, have survived, mainly by the earlier Yaman imāms.

NĀSİR 'ALĪ of Sarhind (d. in Dihlī on the 6th Ramaḍān 1108 = March 29, 1697), one of the best of the Persian poets of India, who were by this time very numerous; their productions however are for the most part of little artistic value. Of his life we know only that he travelled a great deal but finally settled in Sarhind where he enjoyed the favour of the governor Saif Khān Badakhshī and of the Amīr al-Umarā' Dhū 'l-Fikār Khān. His principal work is a version of the love story of Madhumalat and Manūhar in Persian verse, the original having been written in Hindi by Shaikh Djamnān. The same subject was taken after Nāsir 'Alī by Mīr 'Askar 'Ādil Khān Rāzī (d. 1696), one of the governors of Delhi under 'Ālamgir (1659—1707), who called his poem Mīhr u-Māh. Besides the poem Nāsir 'Alī wrote a short mathnawī, Sūfī in character, and a description of Kashmīr both of which still survive. His lyrical Dirwān was collected by his friends after his death; it consisted of the usual ghazels, some Sākī-nāma's and poems in praise of the Kalendar dervishes (lith. Lucknow 1244 and 1281 and Cawnpore 1892).

NĀSİR AL-DAWLA ABŪ MUḤAMMAD AL-ḤASAN B. 'ABD ALLĀH, a prince of the Ḥamdānīd dynasty [q.v.]. From the year 308 (920—921) he acted as lieutenant to his father, Abū 'l-Ḥaidjā 'Abd Allāh [q.v.], in the governorship of al-Mawṣil, and on the latter's death in 317 (929) succeeded to the leadership of the Ḥamdānīd family. Owing to the part played by Abū 'l-Ḥaidjā in the second temporary deposition of the 'Abbāsīd caliph al-Muqtadir [q.v.], the latter, on his restoration, attempted to put an end to the Ḥamdānīds' control of al-Mawṣil by appointing a governor unconnected with them. Nevertheless when this officer died during the same year, al-Ḥasan was confirmed in all his father's holdings.

The Ḥamdānīds profited by the rapid decline in the power of the 'Abbāsīds that set in from this time to extend their rule; and though they remained tributary to the caliphs, by 332 (943—944) they had secured control of most of the Djazīra and of northern Syria. Al-Ḥasan also made two unsuccessful attempts, in 322 (934) and 326 (938), to add Āḥarbaīdjān to his dominions. During the early part of this period of expansion al-Ḥasan was much occupied in the suppression of local rebellions. He was anxious also to remain in the caliph's good graces, and for this reason declined to assist the general Mu'nis [q.v.] in his quarrel with al-Muqtadir, which ended in the latter's death. In 323 (935), however, the caliph al-Rāḍī attempted to displace him in the governorship of al-Mawṣil in favour of his uncle Sa'īd. Al-Ḥasan thereupon had Sa'īd murdered; and though al-Rāḍī at first sought to impose his will by force of arms, he was in the end obliged to agree to al-Ḥasan's restoration.

The reign of al-Rāḍī saw the final collapse of the traditional 'Abbāsīd system of government with the appointment of Ibn Rā'īk as amīr al-umara' [q.v.]. This development resulted in a still greater weakening of the caliphs' power; and in 327 (938—939) al-Ḥasan made an attempt to withhold his dues, which, however, were promptly exacted by Ibn Rā'īk's successor, Badīkam [q.v.]. In 330 (941—942), again, when the caliph al-Muttaḳī [q.v.] and Ibn Rā'īk (who had meanwhile been restored) fled to al-Mawṣil from Baghdad on its occupation by the brothers al-Barīdī [q.v.], al-Ḥasan had Ibn Rā'īk assassinated, forced the caliph to give him the amirate together with the laḡab Nāsir al-Dawla, and later married his daughter to the caliph's son. But though he and his more celebrated brother 'Alī, who was at the same time entitled Saif al-Dawla [q.v.], were able to restore al-Muttaḳī to his capital and drive the Barīdīs back to al-Baṣra, they were almost immediately obliged by a revolt of the Turkish troops under Tūzūn [q.v.] to retire again to al-Mawṣil. Al-Muttaḳī now appointed Tūzūn amīr in Nāsir al-Dawla's place. But his evident helplessness encouraged Tūzūn to abuse his power; and in 332 (943—944) the caliph again sought refuge with the Ḥamdānīds. Saif al-Dawla now tried, though without success, to defeat Tūzūn in battle, while al-Ḥasan removed the caliph for greater safety from al-Mawṣil to Raḡḡa. After some months, however, al-Muttaḳī was persuaded by Tūzūn's professions of loyalty into returning to Baghdad, only to be met on the way by the amīr, who blinded and deposed him. On this Nāsir again withheld his dues. But Tūzūn and al-Mustakfī [q.v.], the new caliph, came against him and forced him to pay. Tūzūn, however, died in 334 (945—946), whereupon Nāsir made a bid to recover the amirate. But later in this same year Baghdad was occupied by Aḥmad b. Būyḥ Mu'izz al-Dawla [q.v.]; and henceforward Nāsir's career hinged chiefly upon the maintenance of his power against that of the Būyids.

The struggle began immediately. As soon as he was established in Baghdad Mu'izz al-Dawla led an expedition against the Ḥamdānīds, and though Nāsir al-Dawla forced him to return to the capital by himself occupying the east bank and blockading the Round City, in the end he drove the Ḥamdānīd forces out. Nāsir retired to 'Ukbarā, and from there sued for a peace that should grant him the tributary lordship of all the country north of Takrīt, as well as Syria and Egypt. But a revolt among his Turkish troops forced him to flee before this was concluded, and it was only by the aid of a force sent by Mu'izz that he succeeded in suppressing it. Mu'izz's object in helping him was no doubt to preserve some order in the Ḥamdānīd dominions until he should be ready to absorb them. For he now took one of Nāṣir's sons as a hostage for his obedience, and two years later led another expedition against al-Mawṣil. This again came to nothing, however, since Mu'izz was obliged to make peace before attaining his object, owing to the outbreak of trouble in Persia, where his brother required his assistance. Nāṣir now agreed to pay tribute to Diyār Rabī'a, the Dījazira and Syria, and to have the names of the three Būyids pronounced in the khutba after that of the caliph throughout this territory.

It was not till 345 (956—957) that further trouble arose between the rival potentates. In that year Mu'izz was called away from Baghdād to deal with a revolt, whereupon Nāṣir sent two of his sons to occupy the capital. Mu'izz, however, succeeded in overcoming the rebel; and on his return the Ḥamdānids decamped. Yet in spite of this provocation Mu'izz contented himself with exacting an indemnity and a renewal of Nāṣir's contract to pay tribute, and it was only when Nāṣir withheld the second year's payment that he took further steps against him. He then advanced into his territory, took al-Mawṣil and Nişibin, and finally sent a force to al-Rahba. Nāṣir, who had fled first to Maiyāfārikin and then to Aleppo, which was now held independently by Saif, attempted to make peace. But Mu'izz rejected his advances, and came to an agreement only when Saif offered to take his brother's place as tributary for al-Mawṣil, Diyār Rabī'a and al-Rahba.

Five years later, in 353 (964), Nāṣir opened negotiations to recover his position as tributary for these territories. But he included in his demands one, for the recognition of his son Abū Taghlib al-Ghaḍanfār [q. v.] as his successor, which Mu'izz was unwilling to grant. He again attacked the Ḥamdānids, occupying both al-Mawṣil and Nişibin. But they were more successful in withstanding him on this occasion; and an agreement was arrived at whereby Abū Taghlib undertook the payment of tribute for his father's former holdings.

In 356 (967) both Mu'izz and Saif died. Almost the last action recorded of Nāṣir is the advice he then gave his sons to refrain from attacking Mu'izz's son and successor Bakhtiyār till he should have exhausted the resources bequeathed to him. For on the death of Saif, to whom he had been much attached, Nāṣir lost all interest in life, and so antagonized his family by his avarice that they resolved to take the control of affairs into their own hands. Abū Taghlib, who had in any case taken his place as tributary, and his mother, Nāṣir's Kurdish wife Fāṭima bint Aḥmad, contrived to gain possession of all his property and fortresses; and when Nāṣir attempted to enlist the help of another son, they imprisoned him in the castle of al-Salāma in the fortress of Ardūmuşt. He died, still in confinement, either the next year, 357 (968), or the year after.

Nāṣir al-Dawla's rule was disastrous for the territory over which he had control. The contemporary Ibn Ḥawkal [q. v.] refers in several passages to his ruinous exactions and tyrannical seizures of land (see his descriptions of al-Mawṣil, Balad, Sindjār and Nişibin). And Miskawaih notes that by bringing fictitious claims against landowners he would force them to sell to him at low prices, till he became not only the lord, but also the owner, of most of the region of al-Mawṣil.

NĀSİR-I KHUSRAW, whose full name was ABŪ MU'IN NĀSİR B. KHUSRAW B. ḤARITH, one of the most important Persian poets of the xth century.

Life. Nāṣir was born in 394 (1003) in Kubā-diyan in the district of Balkh. The Persian historians usually call him 'Alawī which in this case can hardly mean descent from the caliph 'Alī but simply indicates his adherence to the Shī'a. His father was probably a small landowner in the vicinity of Balkh. Nāṣir received a good education and was early acquainted with almost all branches of the learning of his day. In the forties of the xth century we find him as an official in Marw where, according to his own confession, he led a rather dissolute life. In 1045 however, a sudden change came over him, the real reasons for which are unknown, but which Nāṣir himself explained by a prophetic dream. He decided to give up his position and all his pleasures and went on pilgrimage to Mecca on which he visited the Ka'ba four times. This journey had important results for Nāṣir. He left Persia at a difficult period, when the country was being laid waste by the continued wars between the various princes. He found the same wretched picture in all the other Muslim countries which he had to traverse on his journey. Only Egypt proved a pleasing exception; there he saw prosperity, rich bazaars, harmony and tranquillity. As the Ismā'īli dynasty of the Fāṭimids were ruling in Egypt at this time, Nāṣir concluded that Islām had diverged from the true path and that only Ismā'īlism could save the true believers from inevitable ruin. Nāṣir made the acquaintance of several Ismā'īli dignitaries, joined their sect and finally received the blessing of the caliph al-Mustansir (1036—1094) in order to spread the new teaching in his native Khurāsān. He was consecrated as a hujjā, a fairly high official in the complicated Ismā'īli hierarchy. Returning to Balkh he devoted himself with the greatest zeal to his new task. But the Saldjūks who ruled the land soon became convinced that Nāṣir's activity was a serious threat to them. He was persecuted and had to flee from Balkh. He went first to Māzandarān but found that this also was not safe enough and was finally forced as a last resort to take refuge in the Yumgān valley among the inaccessible mountains of Badakhshān. There in these poor and inhospitable highlands the aged poet spent his last years; there his most important works were written and there he died in 1060 or 1061 (452—453). Down to the present day there has survived in this region a little sect known as the Nāṣiriya, which owes its origin to the "saint Sho Nosir" and tells fantastic stories about its founder.

Works. Nāṣir's works were probably very numerous but have survived only in very imperfect and corrupt form. The most important is the great philosophical Diwān, which was composed in the miserable years of his exile. The artistic value of his poems is not especially high, the style is often clumsy and awkward but the philosophical matter which still awaits its investigator is of very great importance for the history of Persian literature. It is a complete encyclopædia of Ismā'īlī teaching but of course unsystematic and disconnected. From the linguistic standpoint also the work is of extraordinary interest. A good edition of the Persian text appeared in Teherān in 1928. Two not very long didactic poems are appended to the Diwān: Rūshanāi-nāma, which presents a whole philosophic system having an undeniable similarity with the teaching of Avicenna, and Sa'adat-nāma which sharply criticises the aristocracy of the kingdom and praises the peasant, "the nourisher of every living creature".

The best known of Nāṣir's prose works is the Safar-nāma, a description of his pilgrimage to Mecca which is an exceedingly valuable source of the most varied information. Unfortunately this work has come down to us only in a very mutilated form and has probably been edited by a Sunni hand. The other works of Nāṣir are mainly Ismā'īlī textbooks. Among them first place should be given to the Zūd al-Muṣāfirīn. It is an encyclopædia of a special character which deals with the most varied questions of a metaphysical and cosmographical nature. A good edition of the Persian text was published in Berlin in 1923 (Kaviani). No less important is the Wādih-i Dīn, an introduction to Ismā'īlism, which gradually initiates the reader into Ismā'īlī beliefs by means of quotations from the Qur'ān cleverly put together. A number of other similar pamphlets like Umm al-Kitāb, which were quite recently fairly widely disseminated among Ismā'īlīs of the Pamirs are credited to our author but so far nothing definite has been ascertained about their authenticity.

Although a considerable portion of Nāṣir's works is now available in good editions, one cannot yet assert that sufficient light has been thrown upon his striking personality. It would be particularly valuable if his philosophical system could be studied as it is of far reaching importance for the history of thought in Persia.

AL-NĀṢIRA, Nazareth, the home of Jesus, lies in a depression sloping to the south surrounded by hills in a fertile district. While the hills to the north and northeast are not very high, in the northwest the Djebel al-Sikh rises to 1,600 feet above sea-level. The name of the town, which does not occur in the Old Testament, is found in the New and in the Greek fathers of the Church in the varying forms Naṣarā, Naṣaret and Naṣapeṣ with ζ, but according to Jerome it had in Hebrew a šade, which is confirmed by the Syriac Nāṣrat and the Arabic Nāṣira as well as by the Talmudic derivative form נוצרי, pl. נוצרים while the Christian Arabic has ζ. All these forms as well as Naṣapynōs (Mark i. 24) have in the first syllable an o obscured to o in Talmudic. In Christian Aramaic there is a subsidiary form נצורת with o in the second syllable with which is connected the derivative Naṣaparioṣ (Matt. xxvi. 71; John xviii. 5), cf. ṭāw Naṣaparioṣ aīpeioṣ (Acta xxiv. 5). The Mandaean term Naṣoraeen (e.g. Dalman, Aram. Gramm., 2, p. 178; Gressmann, in Z. A. T. W., xliii. 26 sq.) is usually connected with this but Lidzbarski (Mandäische Liturgien, p. xvi. sq.; Z. S., i. 230 sqq.) wants to explain it as "observers", while Zimmern (Z. D. M. G., lxxiv., p. 429 sqq., 76, 46) seeks its origin in the Babylonian nāṣira. That the Arabic naṣarā, Christians, naṣrān and naṣrānīya come from the name of the town is known to the Arab writers.

Nazareth, which in the time of Jesus was a little town of no importance (cf. John i. 47: "what good can come out of Nazareth"?; it is not even mentioned by Josephus), was not in the early Christian period one of the places of the New Testament to which large numbers of pilgrims went. According to Epiphanius, it was inhabited exclusively by Jews till the time of Constantine the Great. The number of Christians however gradually increased and was maintained after the Muslim conquest (636). In the time of Arculf (c. 670) it had two churches, and in 332 (943) Maṣ'ūdī mentions a church held in great veneration there, no doubt the church of St. Mary. Before Galilee was conquered by Tancred and the Crusaders, Nazareth was destroyed by the Saracens; it revived under Christian rule, especially after the bishopric of Scythopolis was transferred thither. The Russian abbot Daniel (1113—1115) has given us a very good picture of the Church of the Annunciation and of the Well of Mary there in this period. In 1187, Saladin took Nazareth and at the peace between him and Richard (1192) it remained in his hands. In 1251, during the last unsuccessful crusade, Louis IX undertook a pilgrimage from Akka to Nazareth. Yāḳūt (623 = 1225) who relies on the Gospel story instead of Muslim legend mentions Nāṣira as a village 13 miles from Ṭabariya. In 661 (1263) the Mamlūk Sultān Baibars ordered the emir 'Alā' al-Dīn to destroy Nazareth and particularly the Church of St. Mary. Dimashki (c. 1300) calls it a Jewish town belonging to the province of Şafat and inhabited by Yamanis, and Khālil al-Zāhiri (d. 872 = 1468) numbers it among the townlike villages in Şafat. The Christian visitors however describe Nazareth as a wretched village inhabited by very few Christians with a ruined church and complain of the hostile attitude of the Muḥammadan population. It was not till 1620 that better days dawned when the Druse chief Fakhr al-Dīn [q. v.] opened the town to the Franciscans. The Roman Catholic monastery with the Church of the Annunciation was rebuilt, although not completed till a century later. There were only a few Christians in addition to the monks in the town, until in the middle of the xviiith century the Shekh Zāhir al-'Amr of 'Akka increased its prosperity after which they gradually grew in number. In 1890 according to G. Schumacher, there were 7,419 inhabitants in the town of whom 1,825 were Muslims, 2,870 Greek Catholics and the remainder Christians of other confessions; since then the number has increased. Jews were not allowed to live there. The great monastery with the Church of the Annunciation in the southeast belongs to the Roman Catholics, the Church of the Annunciation in the northeast to the Greek Church. The Muslims have a mosque of considerable size and five walis. The well of Mary which has a dome over it and is open on one side, has its water brought from a spring below the Greek Church of the Annunciation.

AL-NASR, the vulture. It gets its name from the fact that it tears the dead animals on which it feeds to pieces with its beak and devours them. It eats till it can no longer fly. It is said to attain the age of 1,000 years. Its eyes are so sharp that it can see its prey at a distance of 400 farsakh; its sense of smell is equally sharp but fragrant scents are so deadly to it that they destroy it. It shows great endurance in flying and follows armies and pilgrim caravans in order to fall upon the corpses of man and beast. It also follows flocks because it is particularly fond of stillborn lambs, a statement which is confirmed by Brehm who says it attacks lambing sheep. It lays its eggs on high cliffs and is said not to sit on them but to leave them to the heat of the sun. It is however very anxious lest its eggs or young be eaten by bats and therefore covers them with the leaves of the plane-tree. The use of the gall, brain, flesh and bones in mediæval times corresponds to the usage in ancient medicine.

al-Nasr was also the name of a deity in pre-Islamic Arabia (see Wellhausen, Reste, p. 23).

AL-NASR, the title of Sūra c.x., taken from its first verse. The word means "help, assistance" and is often used of God's help in war and then with the meaning of "victory". Sūra lxi. 13 is also associated with al-fath, cf. xlviii. 13. The Sūra clearly belongs to a later period and verse 2 in particular recalls the year 9, the Year of the Embassies. It is therefore natural to refer al-fath (verse 1) in keeping with the frequent use of the word to the capture of Mecca, except that it is not mentioned as a fact (as Weil, Ibn Hishām, p. 933 translates it) but is represented as an assumption, which is also true of verse 2. This is perhaps only a rhetorical figure intended to emphasise the general prevalence of the idea and does not exclude reference to a particular event.

NAŞR B. AḤMAD B. ISMĀ'IL called al-Sa'd, a Sāmānid. After the murder of his father in Djumādā II, 301 (Jan. 914) the eight year old Naşr was put on the throne and the able vizier Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad b. Aḥmad al-Djaihāni given the regency. Soon afterwards the people of Sistān rebelled against the Sāmānids and placed themselves under the rule of the governor Badr al-Kabir appointed by the caliph al-Muktadir. At the same time the caliph's generals al-Faql b. Ḥumaid and Khālīd b. Muḥammad al-Marwazī occupied the towns of Ghazna and Bust which were in the possession of the Sāmānids. When al-Faql fell ill, Khālīd rebelled against al-Muktadir, routed the troops sent against him and went to Kirmān where he encountered a force sent against him by Badr. The battle ended in Khālīd's defeat; he was himself wounded and taken prisoner; he died soon afterwards of his wounds. In the same year, the uncle of Naşr's father Ishāk b. Aḥmad b. Asad rebelled in Samarkand and marched on Bukhārā, accompanied by his son (Ramādān 301 = April 914) but was driven back by Ḥamūya (Ḥammūya) b. 'Alī. A second attempt also failed; Ishāk took to flight again and Samarkand fell into the hands of the government troops. He then tried to hide himself but had finally to come out of his place of concealment and throw himself on Ḥamūya's mercy. The latter took him to Bukhārā where he remained till his death, while his son Ilyās went to Farghāna. In the year 302 (914—915) another son of Ishāk's, Abū Ṣāliḥ Manşūr, stirred up trouble in Naisābūr in combination with al-Ḥusain b. 'Alī al-Marwazī (al-Marwarrūdhī), who had rendered great service to the Sāmānids but felt he had been neglected by them. After Manşūr's sudden death Ḥusain, who was suspected of having poisoned him, went to Naisābūr and seized the town. In Rabi' I 306 (Aug.—Sept. 918) he was taken prisoner by Aḥmad b. Sahl, a tried general, who had been long in the service of the Sāmānids, and brought to Bukhārā, while Aḥmad took up his residence in Naisābūr. Ḥusain was after some time released and given a position at the court of Naṣr; for some unknown reason he was again thrown into prison and ended his days there; in the following year, Aḥmad b. Sahl deserted the Sāmānids because Naṣr had not kept his promise to him, and recognised only the caliph's authority. He went from Naisābūr to D̲jurd̲jān and drove out its governor Ḳarategin. He then returned to K̲hurasān and entrenched himself in Marw; in Rādjab 307 (Dec. 919) however, he shared the fate of Ḥusain. Ḥamūya cunningly succeeded in enticing him out of the town. Aḥmad was defeated and taken prisoner and died a few months later in Bukhārā in prison. In Ṭabaristān also there was fighting. After the death of the Zaidi imām al-Uṭrūsh [q. v.], al-Ḥasan b. al-Ḳāsim, called al-Dā'ī al-Saghīr, was recognised as his successor. In 308 (920—921) the latter sent his general Lailā b. al-Nu'mān al-Dailamī to D̲jurd̲jān. From there he went first to Dāmaghān and then to Naisābūr where he had the khutba read for al-Ḥasan b. al-Ḳāsim (D̲hu 'l-Hij̲d̲ja 308 = April—May 921), after Ḳarategin had been put to flight. In the neighbourhood of Ṭūs he encountered Ḥamūya b. 'Alī whom the government of Bukhārā had sent against him. At first a considerable part of the Sāmānid army took to flight but Ḥamūya himself stood firm and Lailā had no further success; he had to take to flight, was captured and beheaded by Ḥamūya's orders (Rabī' I 309 = July—Aug. 921). Ḳarategin then returned; but when he left D̲jurd̲jān and Abu 'l-Ḥusain b. al-Ḥasan b. 'Alī al-Uṭrūsh seized the town, Naṣr sent 4,000 horsemen there, led by Sīmdjūr al-Dawātī, who at once laid siege to Abu 'l-Ḥusain. When the latter made a sortie with a force twice this size, he fell into an ambush but escaped to Astarābād̲h̲ and thence to Sāriya. Sīmdjūr then went to Astarābād̲h̲; but when his efforts came to naught he bribed Abu 'l-Ḥusain's deputy Mākān b. Kākī and persuaded him to pretend to vacate the town for a time and then to reoccupy it. This was done as arranged; Sīmdjūr occupied Astarābād̲h̲ but soon returned to Naisābūr whereupon his subordinate, only left there as a feint, was driven by Mākān first out of Astarābād̲h̲ and soon afterwards out of D̲jurd̲jān. In 310 (922—923) Ilyās b. Ishāk rebelled in Farghāna and went to Samarkand; this enterprise came to nothing through the ability of Abū 'Amr Muḥammad b. Asad, who with 2,500 men prepared an ambush and scattered Ilyās's army, said to have numbered 30,000 men. After some time, the latter joined the governor of al-Shāsh, Abu 'l-Faḍl b. Abī Yūsuf, but had again to take to flight and went to Kāshghar where he joined the Dihkān Toghāntegin. After failing in an attempt to invade Farghāna he returned to Kāshghar. He was finally pardoned by Naṣr and settled in Bukhārā. About the same time Abu 'l-Faḍl Muḥammad b. 'Ubaid Allāh al-Bal'amī [cf. BAL'AMĪ] was appointed vizier in place of Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad b. Aḥmad al-Djaihānī. In the year 314 (926) Naṣr at the instigation of the caliph al-Muqtadir undertook an expedition against al-Raiy where Fātik, a freedman of the rebel governor Yūsuf b. Abī 'l-Sādj, was ruling. He took the town in D̲jumādā II (Aug.—Sept. 926) and returned to Bukhārā after two months' stay there. Al-Raiy remained in possession of the Sāmānids till the beginning of Sha'bān 316 (Sept. 928) when the governor appointed by Naṣr fell ill and surrendered the town to the 'Alid al-Ḥasan al-Dā'ī and his general Mākān b. Kākī. In 317 (929—930) or 318 (930—931) Naṣr's brothers, Yahyā, Manṣūr and Ibrāhīm, whom he had imprisoned in the citadel of Bukhārā, succeeded in regaining their freedom with the help of their followers among the dissatisfied elements of the citizens and seized the town. When Yahyā claimed the throne, Naṣr who had gone to Naisābūr at the head of a large army to assist the caliph against the rebel Asfār b. Shīrīya had to return as quickly as possible and after several encounters with Yahyā was able to restore order. Yahyā was pardoned and the governorship of K̲hurasān given to the emir of Ṣaghāniyān Abū Bakr Muḥammad b. al-Muzaḥḥar. On the fighting in D̲jurd̲jān and Kirmān see the article MĀKĀN B. KĀKĪ.

The last year of Naṣr's reign was marked by a great revival of Shī'a propaganda, which had never ceased in K̲hurasān and had been particularly encouraged just at this time by the rise of the Fātimid caliphate. When the people of Naisābūr paid homage to an 'Alid named Abu 'l-Ḥusain Muḥammad b. Yahyā as caliph, Naṣr invited him to Bukhārā and when he left not only gave him a robe of honour but also granted him an annual allowance from the treasury. Ḥusain b. 'Alī al-Marwazī had been converted to the Shī'a by Fātimid emissaries in K̲hurasān. He was followed by Muḥammad b. Aḥmad al-Nakhshabi (al-Nasafi) who transferred his activities to Bukhārā and gained a number of proselytes among the high officials. He finally succeeded in winning Naṣr himself over to his party and in inducing him to pay the Fātimid caliph al-Ḳā'im [q. v.] a considerable sum to atone for the death of Ḥusain b. 'Alī who had pined away in a Bukhārā prison. This naturally aroused the wrath of the orthodox clergy, who were joined by the Turkish guards and provoked a powerful reaction. Naṣr regretted his complaisance and is said to have abdicated in favour of his son Nūh, who had not been guilty of any heresy. Naṣr's ill-health may have contributed to this decision. The details are variously recorded; in any case, the Shī'is in Bukhārā and K̲hurasān were persecuted and al-Nakhshabi with several followers executed.

According to the usual statement, Naṣr died after thirteen months illness of pulmonary consumption on 27th Rādjab 331 (April 6, 943); others say he was murdered like his father. According to some reports, he died earlier, on 12th Ramaḍān 330 (May 31, 942). This latter date perhaps refers not to his death but to his abdication. Nūh's formal accession in any case only took place after his father's death.

If we may believe Ibn al-Athīr, Naṣr was distinguished by a singular gentleness of character; according to other sources however, this was not the case. He was also celebrated as an enlightened patron of poets and scholars and is particularly held in honour for encouraging the poet Rudagi [q. v.] in every way.

NAṢR B. SAIYĀR AL-LĀITHĪ, governor of Khurāsān. As early as 86 (705) we find him distinguishing himself in the campaigns of Ḳutaiba b. Muslim [q.v.] in Central Asia and from this time onwards his name is often mentioned in history. In 106 (724) he took part in the campaign conducted by Muslim b. Sa'īd al-Kilābī, governor of Khurāsān, against Farghāna. When the two tribes of Rabi'a and al-Azd refused military service, Naṣr was sent with the Muḍaris against the mutineers and defeated them at al-Barūkan near Balkh. After serving for some years as commander of Balkh he was relieved of his office but afterwards restored to it. When the governor of Khurāsān Asad b. 'Abd Allāh al-Kasri [q.v.] died and the caliph Hishām b. 'Abd al-Malik sought counsel of a trusted adviser, who was acquainted with the conditions in Khurāsān, regarding the filling of the vacant post, the latter proposed among other names that of the seventy-four year old Naṣr because he was "abstemious, experienced and shrewd" (ʿaṣīf muḍjarrab ʿaḳīl), and in Radjab 120 (June—July 738) he received the diploma of investiture. He honestly endeavoured to live up to the above description of him. The old cities of Khurāsān were four in number: Merw, Naisābūr, Merw al-Rūdh and Herāt; there were also special commands in Balkh, Samarkand and Khwārizm. After taking over the governorship, Naṣr transferred his headquarters from the remote Balkh to the more central Merw. In 121 (738—739) he declared war on his Turkish neighbours and advanced to Samarkand. From there he penetrated to Ushrūsana and thence on to al-Shāsh. The Turkish chief Kurşul, who had shortly before killed the Khākān and was regarded as one of the leading personalities among the Turks, along with al-Ḥārith b. Suraidj, a Murdji'i who had rebelled against Arab rule and taken refuge among the unbelieving Turks, endeavoured to check his progress; when the opposing forces actually met however, Kurşul was taken prisoner and killed. Naṣr then made peace with the ruler of al-Shāsh on condition that he banished al-Ḥārith, whereupon the latter went to Fārāb while Naṣr continued his campaign into Farghāna without winning any considerable success. The result was that he had to be content with concluding a treaty of peace. The Soghdians who had at an earlier date migrated to join their Turkish neighbours in al-Shāsh and Farghāna, but found the troubled conditions prevailing after the assassination of the Khākān intolerable and wished to return to their old Iranian home, were treated by Naṣr with a wise leniency and an agreement was come to by which the Transoxanians who had been converted to Islām but had gone back to the faith of their fathers were not to be persecuted in any way, the private debts and arrears of taxes of the emigrants were remitted and the Muslim prisoners taken by them were only to be restored to liberty after the evidence of witnesses had been taken and a judicial decision given. These measures, it is true, provoked not only the displeasure of the Arab emirs in Khurāsān but also the dissatisfaction of the caliph Hishām; nevertheless Naṣr succeeded in carrying out his plans. As regards domestic politics he regulated the relations between the Muslims and those under their protection by an important reform in the system of taxation, by which he ordained that all landowners, including Muslims, should pay the land-tax (kharāj) while the poll-tax (ḡizya) should be imposed on non-Muslims exclusively. But the deep rooted clannishness of the Arab caused him continual difficulties. In the first four years of his tenure of office he chose his subordinates exclusively from the tribe of Muḍar; then he began to be little more broad-minded in this respect and to pay some attention to the Yamanis and thus gradually to pave the way to a reconciliation of the tribes at feud with one another. In the year 123 (740—741) the governor of the 'Irāk, Yūsuf b. 'Omar al-Thakafi, endeavoured to arouse the caliph's suspicions of him; Hishām however saw through his plan and left Naṣr in his post. When al-Walid II ascended the throne in Rabi' II 125 (Feb. 743) he confirmed Naṣr in office but soon afterwards allowed himself to be persuaded by Yūsuf b. 'Omar to recall him and therefore ordered him to come to Damascus and to bring with him all kinds of hunting-birds and musical instruments. Naṣr however did not hurry and before he reached the frontier of al-'Irāk, the news of the caliph's assassination reached him and he at once turned back. When al-Walid's successor, Yazid III, appointed Maṣṣūr b. Djumhūr governor of al-'Irāk and Khurāsān, Naṣr refused to recognise him. In 126 (743—744) trouble broke out among the Azd and Rabi'a in Merw. When Naṣr wanted to pay the troops not in money but with the gold and silver instruments procured for the caliph al-Walid they mutinied; Djuda'i b. 'Alī al-Kirmānī put himself at their head and appealed to their feelings by demanding vengeance for the Banu 'l-Muhallab who had been mercilessly persecuted by the Umayyads, a course which he knew would appeal to them. When the Muḍaris appealed to Naṣr to render al-Kirmānī innocuous, he declined at first but later yielded to them and had him arrested (end of Ramadān 126 = middle of July 744); but a month afterwards he escaped from prison. Negotiations were then opened between Naṣr and al-Kirmānī but they led to no real decision. A much more dangerous opponent was al-Ḥārith b. Suraidj who at the end of Djumādā II 127 (beginning of April 745) again appeared in Merw after a many years' sojourn among the Turks. In order to be safe from this rival, Naṣr had unfortunately secured a pardon for Ḥārith and his followers from the caliph Yazid III and after his arrival in Merw he endeavoured to win al-Ḥārith over by the greatest indulgence and friendliness. He even went so far as to confer on him the governorship of Transoxania; but all his efforts were in vain; al-Ḥārith adhered firmly to his Murdji'i conceptions and stubbornly refused to recognise Naṣr as governor. As his following was steadily growing, he finally demanded that Naṣr should resign his office and leave the choice of his successor to a court of arbitration. Naṣr said he would agree to this, but when he declined to obey the judgment of the court insisting on his resignation, open fighting broke out. Al-Hārith tried to take the city by surprise but was driven back (end of Djumādā II 128 = end of March 746). He then joined forces with al-Kirmānī and they attacked Našr with their combined strength. After several days' fighting, the latter had to abandon Merw and retire to Naisābūr; it was not long however before the two rebels fell out. Among other things al-Kirmānī's cruelty made him hated; in addition there were the endless feuds among the various Arab tribes. After al-Hārith's most influential follower Bišr b. Djurmūz al-Ḍabbī had left al-Kirmānī with 5,000 men, al-Hārith soon followed his example but was killed in the fighting that ensued (end of Raddj 128 = April 746). Al-Kirmānī was now lord of Merw. The Yamanīs stood by him while the Muḍarīs sought refuge with Našr in Naisābūr. Našr's position was by no means an enviable one. So long as al-ʿIrāk was in the hands of the Khāridjīs and the ʿAlid rebel ʿAbd Allāh b. Muʿāwiya [q. v.], Našr's communications with the caliphate were cut and even after Yazid b. ʿOmar b. Hubaira had regained al-ʿIrāk for Marwān II, he could not reckon on any very considerable help. There was therefore nothing left for him but to concentrate his efforts on the reconquest of the city of Merw. After repeated encounters between his troops and those of al-Kirmānī, he went there in person and pitched his camp opposite that of his opponent. The two rivals continued to fight with varying fortunes without being able to bring about a decision. Našr's appeals to Marwān and Ibn Hubaira for reinforcements remained unheeded; in view however of the danger that threatened from Abū Muslim [q. v.], the leader of the ʿAbbāsid propaganda, negotiations were begun between Našr and al-Kirmānī. After a son of Hārith b. Suraidj had killed al-Kirmānī to avenge the death of his father, the Khāridjī Shaibān b. Salama took his place and in the name of the Azd concluded a truce for one year. Abū Muslim was able however to bring this agreement to nothing by persuading ʿAlī b. Djudaʿ al-Kirmānī that Našr had instigated the murder of his father and the Azd who were devoted to him broke the truce just concluded and resumed hostilities against Našr. When Abū Muslim was approached for assistance by the two combatant parties he was able to come forward as an arbiter and decided in favour of the Azd against the Muḍar. He then entered Merw, according to the most probable statement in Rabīʿ II 130 (Dec. 747), and made the inhabitants swear allegiance in general terms to a caliph of the family of the Prophet without a name being mentioned. For Našr there was nothing left but to seek safety in flight. From Merw he fled via Saraḫs and Tūs to Naisābūr, where the news reached him that his son Tamīm, whom he had sent against Abū Muslim's general Kaḥṭaba b. Šhabīb al-Ṭāʿī [q. v.] had been defeated and slain at Tūs. From Naisābūr he went to Kūmis and thence to Djurdjān. Nubāta b. Ḥaṇẓala al-Kilābī was here with a large army which Ibn Hubaira had at last sent him by the caliph's orders. But Našr and Nubāta did not cooperate and in addition the Kaīsīs went over from the former to the latter. On the 1st Dhu ʿl-Hidjja 130 (Aug. 1, 748) Nubāta was defeated by Kaḥṭaba and fell in the battle. After his defeat Našr could no longer stay in Kūmis but fled, pursued by Kaḥṭaba's son Hasan, to al-Raiy, without receiving any support from the Umayyad officials. Reaching al-Raiy, he fell ill; nevertheless he wished to continue his journey to Hamadhān but was no longer able to move without assistance; he had to be carried and died in 12th Rabīʿ I 131 (Nov. 9, 748) in Sāwa [q. v.] at the age of 85. Našr combined with his eminent qualities as a statesman considerable gifts as a poet.

NAŠR ALLĀH B. MUḤAMMAD B. ʿABD AL-ḤAMID ABU ʿL-MAʿĀLĪ of Šīrāz, a Persian author and statesman, vizier of the Ghaznawid Khusraw Malik (1160—1186) by whose orders he was arrested and executed. Našr was the first Persian to succeed in giving a satisfactory Persian version of the celebrated Khalīla u-Dimna. His version is based on the Arabic of ʿAbd Allāh b. Muḥaffaʿ and was completed about 538—539 (1144), i. e. in the time of Bahrāmshāh (1118—1152). For a long time his translation was regarded as a model of elegant Persian style which could not be surpassed and served as the basis for the metrical version by Kānīʿī (658 = 1260) and for a series of Turkish translations. It was only in the xvth century when even Našr Allāh's language appeared too homely and archaic that his translation was superseded by the celebrated Anwār-i Suhailī of Ḥusain Wāʿiẓ al-Kāshifī [q. v.], d. 939 (1532—1533).

NAŠR AL-DAWLĀ ABU NAŠR AḤMAD B. MARWĀN, third and most important prince of the Marwānid dynasty [q. v.] of Diyār Bakr. He succeeded to the provincial sovereignty on the death of his elder brother, Mumahhid al-Dawlā Abū Maṣṣūr Saʿīd, in 401 (1010—1011), after a struggle with the latter's murderer, and was in the same year formally recognized by the ʿAbbāsid al-Kādir, from whom at the same time he received his laqab, and by the Būyid amīr, Sultān al-Dawlā. Though now established in the capital, Maiyāfāriḳin, he was unable to obtain effective control of Āmid, the next most considerable city of the province, until 415 (1024—1025), when his tributary, Ibn Damna, who had hitherto ruled it, was assassinated; and during his reign of over fifty years, he suffered several ineffective attacks on his territory from the Uḳailids of Diyār Rabīʿa, to whom he appears, at one period at all events, to have paid tribute (see Ibn al-Aṭṭir, ix. 121), and to whom, in order to compose a quarrel arising out of his divorce of a lady of that family, he was obliged, in 421 (1030), to cede Nişibin. In 433 (1041—1042) Diyār Bakr was invaded from Ādharbāidjān by the bands of Ghuzz Turks which had pushed northwards on the advance of the Seldjūkid leaders into the Djabāl; and for two years parts of it were subjected to their depredations. Otherwise the province enjoyed, throughout his reign, a tranquillity remarkable in this troubled age.

The ruler of Diyār Bakr was regarded as a principal guardian of the frontier of Islām, and as such was expected to harass the Christians whenever opportunity offered (see the letter addressed to Naşr al-Dawla by the Seldjūkid Tuğhrīl-beg: Ibn al-Athīr, ix. 275). Nevertheless Ibn Marwān's relations with the Byzantine Empire were for the most part amicable, being based on a pact of mutual non-aggression, to which both parties appealed when it was infringed. The only important breaches of this agreement occurred in 418 (1027), when Naşr al-Dawla seized Ruhā (Edessa), which, however, was recovered by the Greeks four years later, and in 426 (1034—1035), when an attempt was made by the Christian inhabitants of that city, in league with Arabs of the Numair tribe, to invade his territories. Later their good relations were of use to the Emperor — Constantine X —, who in 441 (1049—1050) obtained Ibn Marwān's help in securing from Tuğhrīl-beg the release of the Georgian general Lipariti with whom he had been in league against the Georgian king, and who had been captured the year before by Tuğhrīl's half-brother Ibrāhīm Ināl. Up to 436 (1045) Armenia, which also marched in part with Diyār Bakr, was still independent of the Empire; and in 423 (1032) a Marwānid commander led a successful raid into this country. In 427 (1035—1036), on the other hand, a ḥadjdj caravan from northern Persia was attacked and looted near Ānī by Armenians of the Sunāsuna tribe, upon which Ibn Marwān forced the aggressors to give up their prisoners and booty.

Early in Naşr al-Dawla's reign the north of Syria and parts of the Djabira contiguous to Diyār Bakr were obliged to acknowledge the suzerainty of the Fātimid caliphs, though their hold on these parts remained somewhat precarious. And his own territories were menaced by Fātimid pretensions, when in 430 (1038—1039) the governor of Damascus, Anūshṭikin al-Dizberī, who was then reasserting his rule in northern Syria, projected an attack on Diyār Bakr. This, however, came to nothing.

The reign of Naşr al-Dawla saw the rise of the Seldjūkids from complete obscurity to the empire of Persia and the Trāḳ. His first communication with them occurred as early as 435 (1043—1044), on the Ghuzz invasion of Diyār Bakr, when he addressed a letter of protest to Tuğhrīl, who, though he was scarcely in a position to do so, undertook to restrain the marauders. (It may be noted, nevertheless, that Ibn al-Azrak describes this Ghuzz invasion as having been actually instigated by Tuğhrīl, who, he says, granted the province as a fief to its two leaders in advance; cf. Amedroz, The Marwānid Dynasty of Maiyāfāriqin, in J.R.A.S., 1903, p. 137. Surely this author is mistaken in considering the date 434 as wrong, since it agrees exactly with those given by Ibn al-Athīr). Eight years later Naşr al-Dawla acceded to Tuğhrīl's demand for recognition as suzerain; and this subservience, which was renewed in 446 (1054—1055), when Tuğhrīl made a triumphal tour through Ādharbāidjān and Muslim Armenia, spared Diyār Bakr the experience of a Seldjūkid visitation. In the following year, however, Tuğhrīl's attention was drawn to the murder of a Kurdish chieftain by Naşr al-Dawla's son Sulaimān, his lieutenant in the Djabira; and in 448 (1056—1057), when the sultān was obliged to visit al-Mawşil in order to oppose a combination of Shīʿi leaders headed by al-Basāsiri [q. v.], he forced an indemnity from Ibn Marwān by laying siege to Djabirat Ibn ʿUmar.

Naşr al-Dawla was sagacious, or fortunate, in his choice of the three wazirs who served him in turn, namely Abu 'l-Qāsim al-Isfahānī, to whom he owed his throne (in office 401—415 = 1010—1025), Abu 'l-Qāsim al-Maghribī [q. v.] (in office 415—428 = 1025—1037) and Abū Naşr Ibn Djabir (afterwards entitled Fakhr al-Dawla) [q. v.] (in office 430—453 = 1039—1061). It was no doubt owing in part to their abilities that the remarkable tranquillity enjoyed by Diyār Bakr during his reign was turned to advantage and resulted in an equally remarkable prosperity. This Naşr al-Dawla fostered by a reduction of taxation and by renouncing the practice of fining the rich in order to augment the revenues. Nevertheless his court is said to have surpassed those of all his contemporaries in luxury, and many instances are quoted of his profusion and generosity. Maiyāfāriqin became during his reign a centre for men of learning, poets and ascetics, as also a refuge for political fugitives. Among the latter were the Būyid prince al-Malik al-ʿAziz [q. v.], who was ousted from the amirate in 436 (1044—1045) by his uncle Abū Kalīdjār [q. v.], and the infant heir of the ʿAbbāsīd al-Kāʾim — afterwards al-Muktadī [q. v.] — who was removed with his mother from Baghdād on the occasion of its occupation in 450 (1058) by al-Basāsiri.

Naşr al-Dawla is described as being resolute, just, high-minded and methodical, and though much addicted to sensuality, he was strict in his observance of religious injunctions. He died, aged about eighty, on 24th Shawwāl 453 (November 1061), leaving Fakhr al-Dawla still in office to secure the succession to his second son, Abu 'l-Qāsim Naşr, Nizām al-Dīn.

(HAROLD BOWEN)

NAŞR AL-DĪN (pron. Naşreddin) KHODJA, the hero of the stories of wit and stupidity among the Turks, who bears a strong resemblance to the German Till Eulenspiegel, the English Joe Miller, the Italian Bertoldo, the Russian Bala-kirew, etc. Various opinions are current about his life. One tradition for example makes him a learned man of the time of Hārūn al-Rashīd, but another makes him a contemporary of the Khwārizm-shāh 'Alā' al-Dīn Takash (reigned c. 1172—1200). The two traditions are not to be taken seriously; at most they might be regarded as an indication that many of the jests of the Khodja date from the period of the caliphate or that some of them came through a Persian intermediary.

The other versions of the life of Naşreddin can be divided into two groups, of which the first puts him in the xivth and beginning of the xvth century (the period of Bāyazid I, Timūr and the eighth Karamanid 'Alā' al-Dīn), and the second in the xiiith century (the period of the Saldjūk 'Alā' al-Dīn).

The first view appears to come from the Travels of Ewliyā Čelebi (iii. 16—17). There, for example, the story of Timūr's meeting with the Khodja in the baths is told, when the Khodja said that he would give 40 akke for Timūr's shirt but nothing for him himself. In spite of all the improbability of such an utterance and in spite of the fact that the older tedhkires put this answer in Aḥmadi's [q. v.] mouth (cf. also E. J. W. Gibb, Ottoman Poems, 1882, p. 166—167) Ewliyā's story, was given currency in Europe by Cantimir, Diez, Goethe, von Hammer, etc. When Mehmed Tewfik accepted this story of Ewliyā's in his editions of the jests of Naşreddin and Buadam (since 1883) which were later translated into German (about 1890), it was given renewed life and became almost the predominant opinion in Europe.

The second group of traditions champions the xiiith century as the period of Naşreddin and relies on the following facts. Firstly the poet Lāmi'ī (d. 1532—1533) asserted in his Leṭā'if, that Naşreddin was a contemporary of Shaiyād Hamza who lived in the xiiith century; secondly in old manuscripts the Khodja is associated with the Sulṭān 'Alā' al-Dīn. Köprülü-Zāde (see Bibl.) therefore inclines to the view that he was a contemporary of the Saldjūk 'Alā' al-Dīn (xiiith century). Sh. Sāmī Bey (Kāmūs al-A'lām, vi. 4577) and P. Horn (see Bibl.) had already decided for the Saldjūks and the latter definitely for 'Alā' al-Dīn, but Köprülü-Zāde supported his view by evidence, partly new, which we proceed to quote: 1. the inscription on the tomb of Naşreddin in Aḳshehir bears the date 386, which on the supposition that it is reversed, would indicate that the Khodja died in 683 (1284—1285); 2. on two authentic charters of endowment (waḳfiya) of the year 655 (1257) and 665 (1266/7) respectively, a certain "Naşreddin Khodja" appears before the kaḏī as a witness, and 3. the statement which the former mufti of Siwri-Ḥişār, Ḥasan Efendi, made about 45 years ago in the Medimū'a-i Me'arif about Naşreddin, agrees with this assumption. According to Ḥasan Efendi, Naşreddin was born in the village of Khorto (خورتو) near Siwri-Ḥişār in the year 605 (1208—1209), held there the office of Imām in which he succeeded his father, and moved in 635 (1237—1238) to Aḳshehir where he died in 683 (1284—1285).

Although this evidence is by no means to be rejected off hand, it seems to have been completely neglected by other scholars (Krymski in 1927 [see Bibl.] does not even mention Köprülü's book) except for my article entitled Je li Nasreddin-hodža živeo? ("Did Nasreddin Khodja really live?") in the Christmas supplement to the Belgrade Politika (Jan. 6, 1932), where it was described as worthy of consideration, if not yet absolutely convincing.

After all these traditions and opinions, it is not a matter for surprise that some scholars (H. Ethé, R. Basset, M. Hartmann, A. Wesselski [see Bibl.]) have been more or less sceptical about the historicity of the Khodja.

These doubts are to some extent closely connected with the question of the origin of Naşreddin's jests. Basset, for example, thinks (in Recherches sur Si Djeh'a...) that they are a translation of the old Arabic droll stories which were current in large numbers at the end of the fourth (tenth) century about a certain Djuḥā (Djoḥā) of the tribe of Fazāra in Kūfa. Djuḥā's stupidity became proverbial among the Arabs, as is already evident from Maidānī (d. 1124) (cf. Arabum proverbialia, ed. G. Freytag, i. 403, N^o. 175), and a Book of Anecdotes of Djuḥā (کتاب نوادر جحا) is expressly mentioned as early as the Fihrist of al-Nadīm (d. 995) (cf. Flügel's edition, i. 313). This collection, which had previously reached the west through oral transmission, was translated into Turkish in the xvth or xvth century and the hero identified with a certain Naşreddin Khodja, whose existence Basset thinks is at least doubtful.

This thesis of Basset's was not everywhere accepted without demur. Horn and Christensen (see Bibl.), for example, do not believe in a translation from the old book of Djuḥā's jests and Wesselski holds the view "that there is no evidence of the existence of any story of Djuḥā in the period before that of Naşreddin's alleged or actual life, which could with certainty be assumed to be the source of one of the jests of Naşreddin". M. Hartmann describes Naşreddin's jests as the common property of the literature of the world, expressed to some extent in a specifically Turkish guise and therefore regards any question as to whether there ever was such a person as of little importance. Horn and Krymski also regard the Khodja's jests as folk stories found almost everywhere. Christensen thinks similarly but admits that these jests form an independent collection "into which probably very many stories from the old book (of Djuḥā) have been incorporated".

Whatever the truth may be, one thing seems to be certain: the immediate source for most of the stories of Naşreddin is to be sought, as Basset and Hartmann say, in the world of Arabic culture and Islām where Djuḥā certainly is often the hero of such anecdotes. In other words, Djuḥā might be regarded as the ultimate prototype of many of the adventures of Naşreddin. While Basset's theory then may not be correct in all details, it seems to be right in its main features, especially in the fact that it has directed the student of Naşreddin to the influence of the rich Arabic literature of humorous anecdote. That many of these stories are originally not Arabic but Persian, Syriac, Indian, Greek, etc. is quite natural, especially when we remember that they are common to many literatures, but in this case it must often have been the Arabic version that was the source upon which the Turkish drew.

For the problem of Naşreddin it is also important to put on record that stories of Djuḥā are very early mentioned by Persian poets and authors (Minūčihri, d. 1040—1041) or transmitted (a story in Anwarī [d. c. 1190], three stories in Djalāl al-Dīn Rūmī [d. 1273] and a dozen stories in 'Ubaid-i Zakānī [d. 1370—1371]). When we remember the part played by Persian culture among the Saldjūks of Rūm and their Ottoman successors, we cannot consider it impossible that some stories of Djuḥā may have come to the Turks through Persian literature.

This is all the more probable as Djalāl al-Dīn Rūmī himself spent the greater part of his life in Anatolia (especially in Konya) and used Djuḥī's (as Djuḥā is called among the Persians) popularity to illustrate his mystic ideas (cf. Mathnawī, ed. Nicholson, ii. 3116 sqq.).

Particularly in view of this popularity and the fact of oral transmission, it is not impossible that the common people altered the name Djuḥā (Djoḥa), which was strange to them, into Khodja, as Basset repeatedly insists (Mélanges africains et orientaux, Paris 1915, p. 49). On the other hand, there may have been a droll Khodja named Naşreddīn among the Ottomans (or Seldjuks), around whom gathered humorous stories of others, in addition to his own jests, and thus became the typical representative of wit and stupidity. For this reason he was probably also credited with the tales of the simplicity of Karakūsh [q. v.], Saladin's steward, who had been dead since 1201.

Other jests attributed to Naşreddīn go back several centuries further which is proof that they cannot originate with him. The fact that most of the jests are not original is obvious (cf. e.g. Wesselski's parallels), in spite of all the changes and transformations they have undergone among the Turks.

One of the Turkish versions (with additions) was, according to Basset, translated in the middle of the xth (xvii) century into Arabic and thus the Turks returned to the Arabs part of what they had formerly borrowed from them. Naşreddīn and Djuḥā, being similar types, later became amalgamated in such a way that the Arabic editions identify the two in the title: Nawādir al-Khodja Naşr al-Dīn Efendi Djuḥā. Sometimes however, the Arabs distinguish between the two by calling Naşreddīn the "Rumelian Djuḥā" (Djuḥā al-Rūmī).

This Djuḥā of the Nawādir easily reached the Berbers through the Arabs as Si Djehā (Djoḥā). In a similar way the Nubians procured their Djauha and the Maltese their Djahan. Whether the fool of Sicilian popular story, Giufà or Giucà also comes from Djuḥā is a further question.

On the other hand, the Turkish version of the jests of Naşreddīn (under his or another name or anonymously) became known not only to the Rumanians, Bulgars, Greeks, Albanians, and Jugoslavs but also in Armenia, Georgia, the Caucasus, the Crimea, the Ukraine, Russia, Turkestan etc. On these long travels, Naşreddīn naturally underwent many changes; distortions and additions were made which are quite foreign to the Turkish text, so that the number of his (or Djuḥā's) stories increased to several hundreds (in Wesselski to 515 or 555). The oldest manuscript (Leyden, N^o. 2715), which was already in the possession of a European in 1625, only contains 76 jests.

The first edition of the chapbook on Naşreddīn, which was the foundation of many later editions, appeared in 1837 (125 jests). Mehmed Tewfik's edition (1299 = 1883) in which the coarse stories of the chapbook are omitted only contains 71 but a few months later Tewfik published a further 130 under the name Bu Adam ("This Man", i.e. the same Naşreddīn) (in the final edition of 1302 Bu Adam only contains 96 stories). Anecdotes of Naşreddīn were later collected by I. Kúnos from the lips of the people between Aidin and Konya and separately published (Budapest 1899, with 166 stories and introduction, and in Radloff's Proben der Volksliteratur der türkischen Stämme, vol. viii., St. Petersburg 1899). The fullest, but uncritical, Turkish edition is that of Behā'ī (pseudonym of Weled Çelebi), the fourth edition of which (1926) contains nearly 400 anecdotes.

The Turkish editions in the Roman alphabet are much shorter (e.g. Nasrettin Hoca Hikayeleri, 1928 [only 79 pp.] and Letaifi Nasrettin Hoca, 1929 [only 96 pp.]) or are divided into various periods of Naşreddīn's life (like the Nasrettin Hoca of Kemalettin Şükrü 1930—1931, in four parts).

The first European translations were based on the early editions of the Turkish chapbook: the German by Camerloher and Prelog (Triest 1857, with 126 jests) and the French of Decourdemanche (Les plaisanteries de N. hodja, Paris 1876, also containing 126 anecdotes) which was increased in the second edition (1908) by those about Karakūsh. Decourdemanche also provided a translation based on much larger material (he drew upon unpublished manuscripts also) entitled Sottisier de Nasr-Eddin-Hodja (Brussels 1878, with 321 humorous anecdotes). While the translation by Camerloher and Prelog made it possible for R. Köhler to find many stories told of Naşreddīn in European collections and to trace many of them back to an Indian origin (Orient und Occident, i. [1862]; a later edition with additions in his Kleineren Schriften zur Märchenforschung, i. [1898]), Decourdemanche's translation served Dragomanov as the basis for his studies on the dissemination of stories of Naşreddīn in the Ukraine (Kiewskaya Starina, 1886).

Later (about 1890) Mehmed Tewfik's edition, including a portion of Bu Adam was translated into German by Müllendorff (Reclam N^o. 2735). The remainder of the Bu Adam stories (N^o. 131—226) were translated by Menzel; the much too long Abenteuer Buadems (= N^o. 197) in the Türkische Bibliothek (vol. xiii., 1911) and the others in the Beitrügen zur Kenntnis des Orients, vol. ix. (1911), p. 124—159. Naşreddīn's jests have also been translated into English, Russian, Hungarian, Greek, Serbo-Croat, Little Russian, Bulgarian, etc. Wesselski's Der Hodscha Nasreddin (1911) is at present the most complete translation of these anecdotes in a number of versions (see Bibl.).

In conclusion, it may be mentioned that some anecdotes of Naşreddīn were retold by A. Pann in Rumanian (1853), by Murad Efendi (= Fr. v. Werner) in German (1878), by V. Veličko in Russian (1892), by V. Ştürat in Little Russian (1896) and by Köprülü-Zāde in Turkish verse (1918).
